133. "Salutis humanæ dator. All Saints. Late in middle ages.

134. "Salutis æternæ sator." Ascension. Ambrosian.

135. "Salve, Regina." Antiphon at lauds and compline. By Hermannus Contractus, or by Peter of Monsoro, bishop of Compostella.

136. "Salvete, Christi vulnera." Precious Blood. Sixteenth to eighteenth century.

137. "Salvete, clavi et lancea." Lance and Nails. As preceding.

138. "Salvete, flores martyrum." Holy Innocents. Prudentius.

139. Sancta mater, istud agas." See "Stabat Mater."

140. "Sanctorum meritis." Common of Martyrs. Sixth to ninth century.

141. "Solemne laudis canticum." Feast of St. Catharine of Ricci. Eighteenth century.

142. "Somno refectis artubus." Monday matins. St. Ambrose.

143. "Splendor paternæ gloriæ." Monday lauds. As preceding.

144. "Stabat Mater." Seven Dolours. According to Wadding, by Giacopone da Todi, a disciple of St. Francis in the thirteenth century. It is inserted in the works of St. Bernard as given in a MS. at Utrecht.

145. "Summæ Deus clementiæ." Seven Dolours. Sixteenth to eighteenth century.

146. "Summæ parens clementiæ." Saturday matins. Ambrosian.

147. "Summæ parens clementiæ." Trinity Sunday. Compiled from the preceding and other ferial hymns.

148. "Summi parentis filio." Sacred Heart. As No. 118.

149. "Summi parentis unice." St. Mary Magdalen's day. By Odo of Clugny (d. 942).

150. "Te deprecante corporum." End of "Gentis Polonæ." See No. 54.

151. "Te Deum laudamus." Sunday matins. Attributed to St. Ambrose, but certainly older.

152. "Te Joseph celebrant." St. Joseph. Sixteenth to eighteenth century.

153. "Te lucis ante terminum." Compline. Ambrosian.

154. "Te, mater alma." Feast of the Maternity. Sixteenth to eighteenth century.

155. "Te redemptoris." Blessed Virgin Help of Christians. Modern.

156. "Te splendor et virtus Patris." St. Michael and All Angels. By Rabanus Maurus, archbishop of Mayence (d. 856).

157. "Telluris alme conditor." Tuesday vespers. Ambrosian, and, as Mone thinks, by Gregory the Great.

158. "Tibi, Christe, splendor Patris." St. Raphael. By Rabanus Maurus. An adaptation of the "Te splendor." See No. 156.

159. "Tinctam ergo Christi sanguine." Lance and Nails. Sixteenth to eighteenth century.

160. "Tristes erant Apostoli." Feasts of Apostles. The second half of "Aurora cœlum." See No. 20.

161. "Tu natale solum." Feast of St. Martina. Urban VIII.

162. "Tu Trinitatis unitas," with the second strophe "Nam lectulo." Friday matins. Gregory the Great.

163. "Tu Trinitatis unitas," with the second strophe "Ortus refulget." Imitated and partly borrowed from preceding.

164. "Ut queant laxis." St. John Baptist. By Paulus Diaconus, properly Paul Warnefrid, a scholar at Charlemagne's Court, and author of the "History of the Lombards."

165. "Veni, creator." Pentecost. Commonly attributed to Charlemagne, but found in MSS. written before his day. Probably by St. Gregory the Great.

166. "Venit e cœlo." Agony in the Garden. Sixteenth to eighteenth century.

167. "Verbum supernum prodiens e Patris æterni sinu." Advent. Ambrosian, and not later than second half of fifth century.

168. "Verbum supernum prodiens, nec Patris linquens dexteram." Corpus Christi. St. Thomas of Aquin.

169. "Verbum supernum prodiens, salvare quod perierat." Feast of Lance, &c. A text of this hymn is given by Mone from a MS. of the fourteenth century.

170. "Vexilla regis." Passion Sunday, Finding and Exaltation of the Cross. Venantius Fortunatus. See No. 22.

171. "Virginis proles." Common of Virgins. A mediæval imitation of St. Ambrose.

172. "Virgo virginum præclara." From "Stabat Mater." See No. 144.

173. "Vix in sepulcro." Feast of St. John Nepomuc. Eighteenth century.

HYMNS AND SEQUENCES IN THE MISSAL.

1. "Dies iræ." By Thomas of Celano, disciple of St. Francis, about 1250.

2. "Exultet jam angelica." Holy Saturday at blessing of the Paschal candle. Ascribed to St. Augustine.

3. "Gloria in excelsis." [See DOXOLOGY.]

4. "Gloria, laus et honor." Palm Sunday at the procession. By Theodulf, bishop of Orleans (d. 821).

5. "Lauda, Sion." Corpus Christi. St. Thomas of Aquin.

6. "Salve, sancta parens." Introit in Mass of Blessed Virgin. Sedulius, in fifth century.

7. "Stabat Mater." See above, No. 144.

8. "Veni, Sancte Spiritus." By the French King Robert, son of Hugh Capet (d. 1031).

9. "Victimæ paschali." Easter. Attributed by an Einsiedeln MS. of the eleventh century to Wipo, chaplain to Conrad II. (eleventh century).

(Cardinal Thomasi, "Opp. tom. ii., continens psalterium," Romæ, 1747; Daniel, "Thesaurus Hymnolog." Halle, 1841; and Mone, "Lat. HYPOSTATIC UNION. The union of Christ's human nature to the hypostasis or person of God the Word. [See CHRIST.]

I

ICONOCLASTS ("Breakers of images"). A name given to the powerful party which set itself against the religious use of images, and disturbed the peace of the Church during the eighth and the former half of the ninth century.

1. First Stage of the Controversy (726–775).—Leo III., known in history as "the Isaurian" (717–741), published an edict against images. Both the exact date (Hefele places it in 726) and the purport of this edict are uncertain. The Emperor is said to have acted by the advice of Constantine, Bishop of Nacolia, and it is certain that shortly before the Khalif Jezid II. had set the example—natural, of course, in a Mohammedan—of destroying images. Possibly Leo may have believed that he was removing a cause of scandal to Jews and Saracens, and taking away an occasion of superstition from ignorant Christians. Leo, however, met with immediate and strenuous opposition. The destruction of a famous image of Christ over the brazen door of the palace led to an uproar among the people. Leo was resisted by Germanus, the Patriarch of Constantinople, and condemned by Pope Gregory II. St John of Damascus, who was living under the rule of the Khalifs, published three discourses in defence of images, entitled λόγοι ἀπολογητικοί. The Emperor threatened to destroy St. Peter's image at Rome and to take the Pope captive; and his rage was further inflamed by the rebellion of Cosmas. The suppression of the rebellion was followed by a new edict against images, in 730, and by fresh acts of violence. A fleet was sent to Rome, in order to revenge Gregory's anathema published in a Roman synod of the year 732; and, although this attack failed, Illyria was torn from the Holy See, and its possessions in Lower Italy seized. Leo's successor, Constantine V. (Copronymus), continued his father's work. Again the Emperor's zeal against images caused a rebellion, but this, too, was quelled, and in 754 Constantine convoked a council of 338 bishops—with which, however, neither the Pope, nor the Patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, would have anything to do. This Council of Constantinople, which pretended to be œcumenical, anathematised those who venerated images: and this anathema was the excuse for additional severity. Monasteries were destroyed, and many monks—among them John of Monagria and the abbot Stephen—died as martyrs for the faith and traditional usage of the Church.

2. Second Stage of the Controversy (775–842).—The persecution abated, though it did not cease, under Leo IV. (775–780). His wife, Irene, who held the regency after her husband's death, set herself to restore the veneration of images, and was supported by Tarasius, the new Patriarch. Irene and Tarasius convoked a general council, to which Pope Hadrian I. was invited, and to which he promised to send legates. The soldiers made it impossible to hold the assembly in the imperial city, but the Fathers met in 787 at Nicæa. The Papal legates—viz. the archpriest Peter and the abbot Peter—presided, their names being always mentioned in the Acts before those of the other members, but the business was mainly conducted by Tarasius. The decrees were signed by at least 308 bishops, or proxies for bishops, but it appears from the Acts that besides the bishops a large number of monks and clerics, not entitled to vote, were present at the deliberations. It was on October 13, and in the seventh session, that the ὅρος or definition of faith was issued. In it the council teaches that the figure of the cross, and "holy images, whether made in colours, or of stone, or of any other material," are to be retained. They are not to become objects of "adoration in the proper sense (τὴν ἀληθινὴν λατρείαν), which is to be given to God alone," but they are useful because they raise the mind of the spectator to the objects which they represent. It is right to salute, honour, and venerate them (ἀσπασμὸν καὶ τιμητικὴν προσκύνησιν), to burn lights and incense before them, not only because this is in accordance with the tradition of the Church, but also on the ground that such honour is really given to God and his saints, of whom the images are intended to remind us. The council uses the word "worship" (προσκυνεῖ) of the veneration due to images, but, as we have seen, carefully explains the sense in which the word is employed. This decision was approved by Pope Hadrian, as he himself declares in a letter to Charlemagne.

The Iconoclast spirit revived in Leo V., "the Armenian" (813–820), Theodore, abbot of the monastery of Studion, at Constantinople, being the champion of the orthodox cause. Michael II., "the Stammerer" (820–829), tried to reconcile the friends and enemies of images, but his son Theophilus (829–842) persecuted the monks who adhered to the Nicene definition. On February 19, 842, his widow Theodora, brought the images back in triumph to the chief church at Constantinople, and this day, which marks the close of a long and dreary strife, is still kept by the Greeks as the "Feast of Orthodoxy."

3. The Controversy in the West.—Pope Hadrian sent a very unfortunate translation of the Acts of the Nicene Council to Charlemagne. The latter stated his objections in a document sent to the Pope, and known as the "Libri Carolini."[1] He rejects both synods—the Iconoclast one at Constantinople in 754, and Second Council of Nicæa—and asserts that God alone is to be adored (adorandus) and worshipped (colendus), while the saints are only to be venerated (venerandi). A certain "adoration" (adoratio) may, indeed, be given to men—e.g. by bowing reverently before them, or by kissing, but even this is to be withheld from images, because they are lifeless, and it is foolish to burn incense or lights before them. Moreover, although images may lawfully be used in churches, their use is by no means necessary. The great Council of Frankfort, in 794, also rejected the Nicene decree, evidently misled, as

[1] Petavius (De Incarnat. xv. 12, 3, 8) thinks that only extracts from the "Libri Carolini" were sent to Pope Hadrian; and so Hefele, Concil. iii p. 713, 2nd ed. The authenticity of the "Libri Carolini" was denied by Bellarmin, for reasons abundantly refuted by later Catholic scholars—e.g. Sismond and Natalis Alexander. An unsuccessful attempt to attack the authenticity was made once more by Dr. Floss, De Suspecta Librorum Carolinorum . . . Fide, Bonn, 1860.

Charlemagne had been, by the faulty translation, which made no distinction between supreme worship (λατρεία) and secondary veneration. Indeed, this synod attributes to and condemns in the Nicene council a doctrine which it had expressly, and in set terms, rejected.

(The principal ancient authority on the Iconoclasts is Theophanes (d. 818). His "Chronographia" is published among the Byzantine historians (Bonn, 1839). Later authors—e.g. Cedrenus (sec. xi.), Zonaras (sec. xii.), Constantine Manasses (sec. xii.), Glycas (sec. xv.), draw from him. In modern times, the whole or part of the history has been investigated by the Protestants, Goldust, "Imperialia Decreta de Cultu Imaginum," 1608; Dallæus, "De Cultu Imaginum," 1612; Spanheim, "Restituta Historia Imaginum," 1686; and by the Catholics, Maimbourg, "Histoire de l'Hérésie des Iconoclastes" (not always trustworthy), Paris, 1683; Marx, "Bilderstreit der Byzantinischen Kaiser," Trier, 1839; and by Hefele, "Concil." iii.—which last has been chiefly followed here.)

ICONOSTASIS (εἰκονόστασις). A wooden wall which in Byzantine churches separates the choir from the nave. It is so called because icons or images of Christ, the Blessed Virgin, &c., are placed upon it. The iconostasis is found in Greek and Russian churches, but it is doubtful whether it was known before the middle ages.

IDOLATRY. [See IMAGES and SAINTS.]

IGNORANCE. St. Thomas (1 2ndæ, lxxvi. 2) distinguishes ignorance from mere nescience. The latter he explains to mean the simple absence of knowledge; the former implies absence of knowledge in one who is capable of acquiring it. He proceeds to show that ignorance may easily involve sin, since a person is bound to use all reasonable means in order that he may have the knowledge necessary for the performance of his duties. Thus all men are bound to learn, so far as they can, the general principles of religion and morals; and a man sins grievously who remains from his own negligence in the belief that a false religion is true, or that an unlawful course of action which he is pursuing is really lawful. The degree of his sin will differ according as the obligations which he does not fulfil through ignorance are more or less serious, and according to the amount of negligence or malice which his ignorance implies. Thus, while a man is never excused from sin of omission or commission on the plea of ignorance which he can be fairly expected to overcome, this vincible ignorance, as it is called, admits of subdivisions, representing different grades of guilt. A man may use some but not enough industry in removing his ignorance, which in that case is said to be "simply vincible;" he may take scarcely any pains to remove it: then his ignorance is "crass;" he may positively wish to be ignorant, in order that he may sin more freely: then his ignorance is known as "affected." The reader must understand that up to this point we have been speaking of the sin which lies in the ignorance itself, not in the evil act to which the ignorance leads; and the conclusion which we have reached is that all vincible ignorance of the things a man's duty requires him to know is in itself sinful. A physician who practises his profession without the knowledge which he can and ought to have sins, even if as a matter of fact he happens to prescribe what is really best for his patients.

With regard to the guilt of sins ignorantly committed, invincible ignorance altogether excuses from sin, because no man can incur moral guilt without any intention direct or remote to transgress God's law. A Protestant who thinks the Catholic religion idolatrous, and cannot reasonably be expected, considering his education, circumstances, &c., to think otherwise, is guiltless so far in the sight of God. So, again, if a person is aware that he sins but is invincibly ignorant of circumstances which aggravate or change the nature of his crime, he is responsible only so far as he knows or may know what he is about. A man, for example, who, meaning to kill his enemy, kills his father unawares, is of course a murderer, but he is not a parricide. We pause here to observe that although every man may know the first principles of the moral law and the most obvious deductions from them, he may be invincibly ignorant of certain precepts which belong to the natural law of right and wrong. This point is profusely argued and illustrated by St. Liguori, "Theol. Moral." lib. i. § 170.

Supposing that a man is responsible for his ignorance, it may still diminish the guilt of the sins which he ignorantly perpetrates. Such is the case with ignorance "simply vincible," and even, though in a less degree, with "crass" ignorance. When, however, a man remains ignorant to sin more freely (ignorantia affectata) St. Thomas (loc. cit. a. 4) holds that "such ignorance seems to increase the voluntary character of his act and its sin" ("videtur augere voluntarium et peccatum").

Censures are not incurred by those who are invincibly ignorant of their existence, though they may be aware that the action forbidden under censure is wrong. If the censure is imposed only on those who sin knowingly, it is held by some theologians that even a person whose ignorance is "affected" escapes the censure. The other opinion is better supported; but "crass" ignorance undoubtedly would serve to save a person from a censure promulgated in these or similar terms.

We may mention in conclusion that St. Thomas (1 2ndæ, qu. vi. a. 8) and other theologians also divide ignorance into that which is "antecedent"—i.e. which precedes all action of the will; "consequent" or voluntary ignorance; "concomitant," when a man acts in ignorance, but is so minded that he would act in just the same manner if he understood the nature of his deed. We need not, however, dwell on this distinction, since "antecedent" coincides with vincible, "consequent" with invincible ignorance, while "concomitant" ignorance has no influence on moral action.

IMAGE OF GOD. We read in Genesis i. 26 that God said, "Let us make man to our image and likeness, and let him rule over the fishes of the sea and the birds of the air," &c. Petavius, "De Opificio Sex Dierum," lib. ii. cap. 2–4, elaborately discusses the meaning of these words and the history of their interpretation. We select the most important points from his account, adding a few remarks drawn from other sources.

1. Although the text quoted speaks of Adam only as created in God's image, it is plain that neither this likeness itself (see Genesis v. 1–3) nor the dominion over the beasts which flows from it (see Genesis ix. 3, and cf. Ps. viii. 6) has been wholly forfeited by the fall. At the same time it has been partially lost, and thus St. Paul, Coloss. iii. 10, speaks of the likeness to God as restored in Christ.

2. We may at once dismiss the anthropomorphite error mentioned by Epiphanius that the likeness to God consists primarily in the bodily shape. Such an interpretation is contrary to the principles of the Mosaic as well as of the Christian religion. God has no body, and no bodily form as such can be like Him (see Exod. xx. 4, Deut. iv. 12, 15 seq., Is. xxxi. 3). Here we may observe that though many parallels to the expression with which we are concerned may be quoted from heathen writers (e.g., Knobel and Dillmann, ad loc., quote εἰκὼν θεοῦ from Lucian, "De Imag." 28, "Ad effigiem moderantum cuncta deorum," from Ovid, "Met." i.83, and also refer to Juvenal xv. 142), the force of the passages is blunted by the fact that the heathen had much less perfect notions than the Jews of God's spiritual nature.

3. We may also set aside the beautiful explanation of Tertullian, who makes the likeness refer to the Incarnate Word, who made man in the likeness of that bodily form which He was to take. "So runs," he says ("Resurr. Carnis," 6), "the speech of the Father to the Son, 'Let us make man,' &c. . . . He made him to the image of God, i.e., Christ. Thus that slime, even then taking the image of Christ who was to come in the flesh, was not only a work of God, but also a pledge." Even if the plural number indicates the mystery of the Trinity, there is no hint in the text that man was made in the image of one Divine Person rather than in that of another.

4. Petavius distinguishes that which was made like to God and that in which the likeness resides. The whole man, he says, with his double nature (bodily and spiritual), was made in the likeness of God. But he maintains, following the general teaching of the Fathers, that the reason or foundation of this likeness resides chiefly in the soul. The essential point of the resemblance lies in man's possession of intellect and will, which separates him specifically from the beasts and makes him like God. This essential likeness is perfected by accidental qualities —viz. by the natural and supernatural virtues—and in consequence of these accidental perfections one man may be more like God than another. In man, who is the head of the woman, this accidental likeness is more perfect than in woman (1 Cor. xi. 7).

5. He goes on to say that this likeness overflows (redundat) from the soul to the body, and no doubt his erect carriage, the perfection of his form, the way in which his intelligence manifests itself in his features, mark man out as like God and fit to rule over the lower creation.

This seems to be the view adopted in the recent edition of our English Catechism, where man's likeness to God is said to reside "chiefly" in his soul.

6. From the time of St. Ambrose (Petavius quotes "De Dignitate Conditionis Humanæ," cap. xi.), it has been common to see the image of the Trinity in the three powers of the one soul—viz. memory, understanding and will. Different writers, however, have fixed upon different powers of the soul as representing the Persons of the Trinity.

7. Still older is a distinction made between "image" and "likeness." Irenæus (v. 6, 1), whose view has been largely accepted in the Church, supposes that man was made in the image of God by nature, and became like God by the gift of the Holy Spirit. A similar distinction has been defended by so good a scholar as Delitzsch, but Petavius is surely right in rejecting it. The Hebrew (literally "in our image, according to our likeness") shows more clearly than the Greek or Latin, which insert the copula "and," that the two words are practically synonymous.

IMAGES. The idolatrous worship of images is vehemently condemned in the Scriptures, and in the Old Testament two forms of idolatry are specially reprobated. First, we find denunciations of worship paid to images of false gods, such as Moloch, Astarte, &c. Here the whole meaning and intention of the religious act was bad. No respect was due to such a divinity as Baal; to worship him was an act of treason against the living God, so that there could be no possible excuse for venerating his image. But besides this, the law and the prophets condemn worship given to images of the true God. It seems clear that the calf worship begun at Mount Sinai, and continued in the northern kingdom at Bethel, &c., was meant as the worship of the true God set before Israel in this symbolical form.[1] But this worship also is denounced—e.g. by Amos and Osee—and was really idolatrous, because it conveyed false notions of God, who is a pure spirit, so that although, e.g., Jeroboam professed to worship Jehovah, he was really serving a god of his own imagination. To prevent such idolatrous errors, to which the Jews were constantly tempted by the example of the surrounding heathen, the Hebrew worship was regulated in each detail by God. Images they had in the tabernacle and the Temple, for the cherubim were placed in the holy of holies, and the walls and pillars were adorned with figures of palms, pomegranates, &c. But these figures were placed in the tabernacle from which the pattern of the temple was taken by the express ordinance of God, and the Jews were by no means left to their own discretion in the use of sacred images and symbols.

The prohibition of idolatry conveyed in the first commandment continues, it is needless to say, in full force. Idolatry is evil in its own nature, and necessarily a sin of the deepest dye, whoever it may be that commits it. Moreover it is possible to commit this sin without falling into the gross and brutal error of identifying a lifeless image with the Divinity. Therefore the Council of Trent (Sess. xxv. De Invocatione, &c.) not only reprobates the delusion that the godhead can be really portrayed by material figures; it also states that in images there is no divinity or "virtue, on account of which they are to be worshipped, that no petitions can be addressed to them, and that no trust is to be placed in them."

At the same time the Tridentine Fathers, following the Second Council of Nicæa, advocate the true use of images. The danger of idolatry has at least to a very great extent passed away from Christian nations. Further, God Himself has taken a human form which admits of being represented in art. So that the reasoning of Moses in Deut. iv. 15 no longer holds,[1] and on the whole matter the liberty of Christians is very different from the bondage of Jews. Images, according to the Tridentine definition, are to be retained and honoured, but abuses and all occasion of scandal to the rude and ignorant are to be removed. The object of images is to set Christ, his Blessed Mother, the saints and angels before our eyes, while the council adds that "the honour which is given to them is referred to the objects (prototypa) which they represent, so that through the images which we kiss, and before which we uncover our heads and kneel, we adore Christ and venerate the saints, whose likenesses they are." "The council," says Petavius, "De Incarnat." xv. 17, "could not have declared more expressly that the cultus of images is simply relative (σχετικόν): that they are not in themselves and strictly speaking (per se et proprie) adored or honoured, but that all adoration and veneration is referred to the prototypes, inasmuch as images have no dignity or excellence to which such honour properly appertains." We cannot imagine any better exposition than that of this great theologian, who, among many other merits, is always distinguished for his sobriety and his avoidance of useless subtleties. His words explain the doctrine of the Church and remove all possibility of scandal, when we find the Church in the Good Friday Office inviting the faithful to adore the cross. It is the suffering Saviour, not the dead wood which Catholics adore [See CROSS].

[1] See Exod. xxxii. 5, where Aaron calls the idolatrous feast a feast to Jehovah; and 3 Kings xxii. 6, from which it appears that prophets who sanctioned the calf-worship were still considered prophets of Jehovah.

[1] "Ye did not see any likeness on the day that the Lord spake to you on Horeb from the midst of the fire, lest ye should act wickedly and make for yourselves a graven image," &c.

The use of images in the Church dates from the very earliest times. The Church no doubt was cautious in her use of images, both because the use of them in the midst of a heathen population might easily be misunderstood, and also because the images might be seen and profaned by the heathen persecutors. It is, as Hefele and De Rossi maintain, for this latter reason that the Council of Elvira, in the year 306, forbade the placing of "pictures in the churches, lest what is worshipped and adored should be painted on the walls." Certainly the Church of that time did not reject the use of Christian art—witness the numerous sacred pictures recently brought to light in the Roman catacombs. Many ancient works of art which have come down to us from the old Spanish church—e.g. the beautiful sarcophagi of Saragossa—prove that there was no difference of feeling or opinion on this matter between Spanish and Roman Christians. But whereas the Roman churches were under, the Spanish were above, ground. Hence the anxiety of the council to avoid the mockery and actual danger which the sight of images might have created.

We can trace the veneration of images and the Tridentine doctrine concerning it through the whole history of the Church, but here a few instances must suffice. The early Christian poet Prudentius speaks of himself ("Peristeph." ix. 9 seq.) as praying before an image of the martyr Cassian. We read that at a conference held between St. Maximus and the bishop Theodosius the Fathers present bent the knee to the images of Christ and the Blessed Virgin.[1] The principles of Gregory the Great on the respect due to images are well known. When Serenus, Bishop of Marseilles, removed images from the church on the ground that they had proved an occasion of idolatry, Gregory tells him (Ep. ix. 105) that he ought not to have broken images placed in the church as means of instruction, not objects of adoration. In sending Secundinus images of Christ, the Blessed Virgin and St. Peter and St. Paul, Gregory writes (Ep. ix. 52): "I know you do not ask for the image of our Saviour to worship it as God, but that, being reminded of the Son of God, you may be inflamed anew with love of Him whose image you long to see. And we on our part do not prostrate ourselves before it as a divinity, but we adore Him whom by means of the image we bring to mind in his birth, in his passion, or as He sits on his throne."

Two qualifications must be made to the doctrine stated in a previous part of this article. We have said that no images can really resemble the divine nature which is immaterial. But there is no harm in symbolical representations of the Holy Trinity, or of the divine Persons singly. The contrary proposition was condemned by Pius VI. (Synod of Pistoia, prop. 69), in the bull "Auctorem fidei." Again, though images have no virtue in themselves, God may be pleased to give special graces at particular shrines. This is taught in the same bull, and the words of St. Augustine (Ep. 78) are aptly quoted: "God, who divides special gifts to each according as He wills, was not pleased that these [marvels] should take place in all the shrines of the saints."

IMMACULATE CONCEPTION OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN. 1. The Meaning of the Doctrine.—Benedict XIV. ("De Fest." clxxxvii. seq.), quoting Frassen, a Scotist theologian, distinguishes between active and passive conception. The former consists in the act of the parents which causes the body of the child to be formed and organised, and so prepared for the reception of the rational soul which is infused by God. The latter takes place at the moment when the rational soul is actually infused into the body by God. It is the passive, not the active, conception which Catholics have in view when they speak of the Immaculate Conception. For there was nothing miraculous in Mary's generation. She was begotten like other children. The body, while still inanimate, could not be sanctified or preserved from original sin, for it is the soul, not the body, which is capable of receiving either the gifts of grace or the stain of sin. Moreover, from the fact that Mary sprang in the common way from Adam our first father, it follows that she was the daughter of a fallen race and incurred the "debt" or liability to contract original sin. Adam was the representative of the human race: he was put on his trial, and when he fell all his descendants fell with him, and must, unless some special mercy of God interposed, receive souls destitute of that grace in which Adam himself was created. In Mary's case, however, God's mercy did interpose. For the sake of Him who was to be born of her and for "his merits foreseen," grace was poured into her soul at the first instant of its being. Christian children are sanctified at the font: St. John the Baptist was sanctified while still unborn. Mary was sanctified earlier still—viz. in the first moment of her conception. She received a gift like that of Eve, who was made from the first without sin, only the immaculate conception is rightly called a privilege, and a privilege altogether singular, because in the ordinary course of things the Blessed Virgin would have been conceived and born in original sin. We beg the reader to remember that what we have written up to this point is the universal teaching of theologians, and we have carefully abstained from entering on scholastic disputes (e.g. as to the remote and proximate debt of sin), because we believe that the mere statement of the doctrine is enough to remove many prejudices from the minds of candid Protestants. So far from derogating from, the Catholic doctrine exalts, the merits of Christ. He who redeemed us redeemed her. He who sanctified us in baptism sanctified her in her conception. Nor could any Catholic dream of comparing Mary's exemption from sin, we do not say with the sinlessness of the Divine nature, for such a comparison would be insane as well as blasphemous, but with the sinlessness of Christ as man. Sin was a physical impossibility in the human soul of Christ, because it was hypostatically united to the Divinity. Mary, on the other hand, was sinless by the grace of God. "Thou art innocent," says Bossuet, addressing Christ, "by nature, Mary only by grace; Thou by excellence, she only by privilege; Thou as Redeemer, she as the first of those whom thy precious blood has purified" ("Sermon pour la fête de la Conception de la Sainte Vierge"). No better summary could be given of the Church's doctrine.

2. History of the Controversy on the Doctrine.—The controversy, so far as we know, began in the twelfth century. The church of Lyons had adopted the custom, which already prevailed elsewhere (see the article on the feast), of celebrating the feast of Mary's conception. St. Bernard (d. 1153) remonstrated sharply with them, in great measure because the feast had not been approved at Rome. The authenticity of this letter has been disputed, but on grounds, as Benedict XIV. implies, absolutely insufficient. Besides, little would be gained even if the letter were spurious, for Petavius ("De Incarnat." xiv. 2) has proved, from other passages in his works, Bernard's opinion to have been that the Blessed Virgin was not conceived immaculate, but was sanctified in the womb like Jeremias and St. John the Baptist. Benedict XIV., following Mabillon, declines to accept the theory that St. Bernard had the active, not the passive, conception in his mind. At the same time it must be remembered that the saint refers the whole matter of his dispute with the canons of Lyons to the judgment of the Roman Church. The quotations in Petavius from St. Peter Damian, St. Anselm, Peter Lombard, and others, abundantly prove that St. Bernard's opinion was the prevalent one before and during his own age. In the following century St. Thomas (iii. 27, 2) held that Mary was only sanctified in the womb after her body was already informed by the soul (post ejus animationem), and he argues that if the Virgin "had not incurred the stain of original guilt," she would have stood in no need of being saved and redeemed by Christ, whereas Christ, as the Apostle declares, is the saviour of all men.[1] But the strongest evidence to the prevalence of the belief that the Virgin was not conceived without sin is supplied by Scotus "In Lib. III. Sentent." d. iii. qu. 1, n. 4). He gives his own opinion in favour of the immaculate conception with a timidity which clearly betrays his consciousness that the general opinion was on the other side. After maintaining that God might, had He so chosen, have exempted the Blessed Virgin from original sin, and might on the other hand have allowed her to remain under it for a time and then purified her, he adds that "God knows" which of these possible ways was actually taken; "but, if it is not contrary to the authority of the Church or of the saints, it seems commendable (probabile) to attribute that which is more excellent to Mary."

Scotus, however, farther on in the same work (d. 18. qu. 1. n. 4), expresses a more decided view, and he inaugurated a new state of opinion, though the change did not come at once, and the story told by Cavellus, an author of the fourteenth century whom Benedict XIV. quotes, is probably a mere legend. According to this story, Scotus defended the doctrine of the immaculate conception at Cologne and Paris, and a disputation which he held in the latter place induced the Paris University to adopt the doctrine, and won for Scotus himself the title of the "Subtle Doctor." Scotus died in 1308, and events which happened in 1387 show how rapidly the Scotist opinion had spread and how deeply it had struck root at least in France. A Dominican doctor, John Montesono, had publicly denied the immaculate conception, whereupon he was condemned by the University and by the Bishop of Paris, and though he appealed to the Pope (or anti-Pope) Clement VII., he did not dare to appear, and was condemned for contumacy. The Fathers of the Council of Basle begged Cardinal Torquemada (Turrecremata) to prepare a treatise on the question, and so he did; but circumstances prevented him from laying it before the council, and his treatise, which was adverse to the doctrine, was practically unknown till it was published by the Master of the Sacred Palace with the consent of Paul III., then Pope. The decree of Basle, which defined that the doctrine asserting Mary's immunity from original sin was "to be approved, held, and embraced by all Catholics, as being pious and consonant to the worship of the Church, to Catholic faith, right reason, and Holy Scripture," was passed in 1439, when the council had become schismatical, so that it in no way bound the consciences of Catholics. It serves, however, to mark the general feeling of the time; and other signs of the hold the doctrine had obtained are not wanting. It was asserted at a provincial synod in Avignon in 1457. Forty years later the University of Paris required an oath to defend the doctrine from all who proceeded to the doctor's degree, and the tenet was embraced with ardour by the Carmelites, the different branches of the Franciscan order, and by men of the highest distinction among the secular clergy.

The matter gave rise to keen discussion at Trent, and although most of the bishops held the doctrine, the council contented itself with a declaration that in defining the truth that the whole human race fell under original sin it did not intend to include in the decree "the blessed and immaculate Virgin Mary," but desired that the Constitutions of Sixtus IV. should be observed. These Constitutions had been issued in 1476 and in 1483. In the former the Pope granted indulgences to those who said the Mass and office which he had approved for the feast of the Conception. In the latter he condemned those who accused persons who celebrated the feast of mortal sin, or those who maintained that the doctrine itself was heretical. Pius V., in 1570, forbade all discussion of the doctrine in sermons, permitting, however, the question to be handled in assemblies of the learned. Paul V., in 1617, prohibited attacks on the doctrine in public assemblies of any kind, while Gregory XV., in 1622, strictly forbade anyone to maintain, even in private discussions, that the Blessed Virgin was conceived in original sin. He made an exception, however, in favour of the Dominicans, to whom he granted leave to maintain their own opinion in discussions held within their own order, and he was careful to add that he in no way meant to decide the theological question, but, on the contrary, forbade anyone to accuse those who denied the immaculate conception of heresy or mortal sin. Benedict XIV., writing about the middle of the last century, sums up the whole state of the 1842), declared that here, as in other places, the MSS. of St. Thomas had been corrupted. But this position does not admit of serious defence question in his day thus: "The Church inclines to the opinion of the immaculate conception; but the Apostolic See has not yet defined it as an article of faith."

So matters stood, when on February 1, 1849, Pius IX., wrote from Gaeta to the bishops of the Catholic world. He asked them for an account of their own opinion and of the feeling entertained in the churches subject to them on the expediency of defining the doctrine that the Blessed Virgin was immaculate in her conception. The Italian, Spanish, and Portuguese bishops, about 490 in number, were nearly unanimous in their wish for the definition. On the other hand, there were bishops of great eminence in France, Germany, and Switzerland who were of a different mind. Some of these last thought that the doctrine was not prominent enough in Scripture or tradition to be made an article of faith; others deprecated a definition which would put fresh difficulties in the way of Protestants or timid Catholics; others, again, were afraid to pronounce at all on so hard a matter. Nearly six years later the question was closed. On December 8, 1854, Pius IX., in the presence of more than 200 bishops, issued his solemn definition that the immaculate conception of Mary was a truth contained in the original teaching of the Apostles and an article of divine faith. The definition was accepted by Gallicans as well as by Ultramontanes, for it was notorious that the entire episcopate gave full assent to the doctrines of the Papal bull. Indeed, the opposition made within the Church to the new definition was of the most insignificant kind.

3. The Doctrine in its Relations to Scripture and Tradition.—A Catholic is bound to hold that the doctrine recently defined was contained in the faith once delivered to the saints by the Apostles. On the other hand, he is under no obligation of believing it possible to produce cogent historical proof (over and above the Church's decision) that the doctrine was so contained. It is enough to show that no decisive argument can be brought against the apostolic origin of the Church's present belief, and there are at least probable traces of its existence in the Church from the earliest times. Petavius—justly, as we think—dismisses many passages from the Fathers, which have been cited in support of the doctrine. He points out that if the Fathers speak of Mary as "stainless," "incorrupt," "immaculate" (ἄχραντος, ἄφθαρτος, ἀμίαντος), it by no means follows that they believed her to have been conceived immaculate. Still tradition does supply solid arguments for the belief in question.

First, from the earliest times and in every part of the Church Mary in her office at the Incarnation was compared and contrasted with Eve before the fall. We find the parallel between the two drawn by Justin Martyr ("Trypho," 100), by Irenæus (iii. 22, 34, v. 19), by Tertullian ("De Carne Christi," 17), not to speak of later Fathers; indeed, the doctrine that Mary is in some sense the second Eve is a commonplace of primitive theology. This comparison enters into the very substance of the theology of St. Irenæus. He urges the parallel between Mary and Eve, just as he insists on the resemblance between Adam and Christ, the second Adam. As Eve was married and yet a virgin, so Mary, "having an appointed husband, was yet a virgin." Eve listened to the words of an angel: so also Mary. Eve's disobedience was the cause of our death: Mary, "being obedient, became both to herself and all mankind the cause of salvation." "The knot of Eve's disobedience was loosed by Mary's obedience." The Virgin Mary became "the advocate of the virgin Eve." It is true that whereas Eve of course was made immaculate, yet this is just the point where Irenæus fails to draw the parallel between Eve and Mary. It must be remembered, however, that in Irenæus, as in the Ante-Nicene Fathers generally, there is no explicit statement of the doctrine of original sin, so that we cannot expect an explicit statement that Mary was exempt from it. There is further a presumption that if Irenæus could have had the question, "Was Mary conceived in sin?" proposed to him he would have answered in the negative. His whole theory of the Incarnation turns on the proposition, "Man could not break the bonds of sin, because he was already bound fast by them." He in Adam had been already worsted by the devil. When, therefore, he tells us that Mary untied the knot of Eve's disobedience, we may infer that she never had been bound by it in her own person.

The tradition that Mary was the second Eve was familiar to great Fathers of the later Church. But one of these, St. Ephrem (A.D. 379), gives much more explicit evidence—the most explicit evidence, so far as we know, to be found in patristic writings—of belief in the immaculate conception. Not many years ago the famous Syriac scholar Bickell edited, with a Latin version of the Syriac, the "Carmina Nisibena" of the saint. There is no doubt as to the authenticity of these poems. In hymn 27, strophe 8, St. Ephrem speaks thus: "Truly it is Thou and thy Mother only, who are fair altogether. For in Thee there is no stain, and in thy Mother no spot. But my sons [i.e. the members of the Church of Edessa] are far from resembling this twofold fairness." Elsewhere Ephrem places first among fallen men infants who die in baptismal innocence; so that it must be freedom from original not actual sin which he ascribes to Mary. So (ii. 327 a.), "Two were made simple, innocent, perfectly like each other, Mary and Eve, but afterwards one became the cause of our death, the other of our life." It is most important to appreciate this testimony at its real value. It is not only or chiefly that it proves the existence of the belief which we are discussing, in the fourth century. This no doubt it does, and it enables us summarily to dismiss the confident assumption of many Protestant scholars that the belief arose for the first time in the middle ages. But besides and above this, St. Ephrem supplies an authentic commentary on the meaning of the tradition that Mary was the second Eve. We may well believe, considering how early and in what various quarters it appears, that this tradition was Apostolic. And just at the time when the doctrine of original sin becomes prominent in Christian theology, St. Ephrem assumes without doubt or question that this tradition implies Mary's entire exemption from the cause, and supplies us with reasonable grounds for believing that the doctrine of the immaculate conception is coeval with the foundation of the Christian Church.

A word or two must be said about St. Augustine. Undoubtedly his theory on the transmission of original sin by the act of generation drove him to believe that Mary, being conceived in the ordinary way, must have been conceived in sin. So Petavius understands him, and the Saint's own language seems to be clear and decisive on this point. Thus ("De Nuptiis et Concep." i. 12), he teaches that all flesh born "de concubitu" is "flesh of sin," and ("In Genesim ad lit." x. 118) he expressly affirms that on this ground Mary's flesh was, while Christ's was not, "caro peccati." Again, in "Contr. Julian." v. 15, his language is still more definite, for he says that original sin passes to the child from the "concupiscentia" of the parents, and that therefore original sin could not infect the flesh of Christ, since his Virgin Mother conceived Him without concupiscence. It may, we think, be affirmed without irreverence to so great a doctor, that this language about sin passing to the flesh involves confusion of thought; and probably very few nowadays would maintain that "concupiscentia" in itself natural and innocent, though caused as a matter of fact by the fall, can possibly be the cause of original sin. The fact that St. Augustine is driven to the position he takes with regard to Mary by the exigencies of a theological theory, probably mistaken, and certainly never approved by the Church, diminishes, if it does not altogether destroy, the force of his testimony. On the other hand, great weight belongs to the testimony which St. Augustine bears to the immaculate conception, because in giving it he speaks, not as a theologian, but as a Christian. He is impelled in this latter case by Catholic instinct and tradition, not by any theory of his own. His testimony is as follows. He is arguing ("De Natura et Gratia," cap. 36) against the Pelagian theory that some of the saints had been wholly exempt from actual sin. He denies the truth of the statement altogether. All have sinned, "excepting the holy Virgin Mary, concerning whom for the honour of the Lord I would have no question raised in treating of sin. For how do we know what excess of grace to conquer sin on every side was bestowed on her whose lot it was (quæ meruit) to conceive and bring forth Him who certainly had no sin." We fully admit that it is actual, not original, sin which St. Augustine is thinking of directly. But on his own principles he was bound to hold that exemption from actual implied freedom from original sin. Thus he asserts categorically ("Contr. Julian." v. 15) that if Christ had been conceived in sin, He must needs have committed actual sin ("peccatum major fecisset, si parvulus habuisset"). Let the reader observe that this theory, unlike that referred to above on the transmission of sin, is supported by the tradition and subsequent decision of the Church. It is of course conceivable that Mary might have been conceived in sin and then enabled by a special and extraordinary grace to avoid all actual trespass. In any case we may safely say that St. Augustine might easily have accepted the Church's present doctrine. It would have satisfied most fully this inclination to believe that Mary "for the honour of the Lord" was enabled to "overcome sin on every side." The freedom from actual would have followed suitably upon her preservation from original sin, and the progress of her life would have been consonant with its beginning.

Finally, the rapid acceptance of the doctrine within the Church, when once it came under discussion, might of itself dispose individual Christians to believe it and prepare the way for definition. The one positive objection was that if Mary was conceived immaculate Christ could not have been her saviour and redeemer. When once the truth was apprehended that Mary's exemption from original sin was due to the merits of her Divine Son, and magnified instead of detracting from them, the belief in this exemption grew and spread throughout the Catholic world. We cannot expect Protestants to appreciate this argument. But to a Catholic, who believes that the Holy Spirit directs the minds of the faithful, and specially those of the saints, the very fact of the doctrine's acceptance affords a strong presumption of its truth. He would naturally be loath to believe that God allowed the Christian people to cling so zealously to a doctrine which had no solid foundation, and which, if untrue, would be an error of a very serious kind. He would recognise in the belief of so many saints a judgment superior to his own, and a greater quickness to discover the "analogy of the faith." The solemn definition of the Church would but enable him to hold with greater security what he already held as a certain and pious opinion.

(The evidence for and against the doctrine is given by Petavius, "De Incarnat." xiv. 2. Perrone published his treatise "De Immaculato B. V. M. Conceptu: an dogmatico decreto definiri possit," at Rome in 1853. Still better known is the work of Passaglia, also at that time a Jesuit, "De Immaculato B. V. Conceptu," Romæ, 1854. A collection of ancient documents relating to the doctrine was made by a third Jesuit, Ballerini.)

IMMACULATE CONCEPTION, FEAST OF. The Greek emperor Manuel Comnenus (died 1180), in a Novella quoted by Balsamon, mentions the feast of the Blessed Virgin's Conception as one to be observed by the people on December 9. In the West it is kept on December 8. England, it is said, was the first among the countries of Western Europe to keep this feast, and a Council of London held in 1328 attributes its introduction to St. Anselm; but an Epistle of the Saint which begins with a formal notice on the subject is probably spurious.

From England the celebration seems to have passed to Normandy, and then south to Lyons. St. Bernard reproved the canons of that city for introducing a custom which had not the sanction of the Roman Church. St. Buonaventura (died 1274) ("In Lib. III. Sentent." d. iii. qu. 1) mentions the custom of keeping the feast, and says he does not dare either to approve or disapprove it. It is certain, however, that the feast had established itself in the calendar of the Roman Church before the middle of the fourteenth century. Sixtus IV., towards the close of the fifteenth century, sanctioned an office and Mass proper to the day; for which, however, a new office was substituted by Pius V. Clement VIII. made the feast a greater double. Clement IX. added an octave; Clement XI. made it a holiday of obligation. Under Pius IX. the office was again changed, and the feast was entitled that of the "Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary." The present Pope raised it to a double of the first class. (Benedict XIV. "De Festis.")

IMMORTALITY OF SOUL. [See SOUL.]

IMMOVEABLE. [See FEASTS.]

IMMUNITY. Ecclesiastical immunity is defined to be "the right by which churches and other sacred places, as well as ecclesiastical persons and their property, are free and discharged from secular functions and burdens, and from acts repugnant to the sanctity and reverence which are due to them."[1] It is of three kinds—local, real, and personal. On local immunity, which is of ecclesiastical institution, see SANCTUARY. Real immunity is the right whereby it is claimed that the property of the Church and the clergy are exempted from secular jurisdiction and from all fiscal and other burdens imposed by secular authority. Personal immunity is the right of the clergy to be exempted from all lay jurisdiction [see JURISDICTION].

The real and personal immunity of the clergy are generally held by canonists to be of divine right. Several passages are adduced from the Old Testament, among which the most striking is 1 Esdr. vii. 24, where the emperor Artaxerxes, addressing through Esdras the "keepers of the public chest" beyond the river, gives them to understand that "concerning all the priests, and the Levites, and the singers, and the porters, and the Nathinites, and ministers of the house of this God," they, the keepers, "have no authority to impose toll or tribute or custom upon them." The words of Christ (Matt. xvii. 24, 25) form an important text bearing on the subject. Earthly kings exempt from tribute their own children and their servants; Christ, therefore, as the Son of God, is rightfully exempt from the payment of the didrachma, which was destined for the support of the divine worship in the Temple. Moreover, the words "that we may not scandalise them" show that Peter and the other Apostles, as Christ's servants, are included under the same exemption. In Peter it is held that the clergy of the Catholic Church of every age is included by representation. Christ and his servants the clergy are therefore by right exempt from tax or tribute; nevertheless, sooner than cause scandal by availing Himself of this exemption, Christ bade Peter pay the sum demanded for them both; and the pastors of the Church have generally acted similarly in later times.

Political reasoning on general grounds might be employed in support of the claim of the clergy to an exemption from taxation. As kings do not tax their own children, so Governments, in a natural state of things, do not tax their own servants or officials. The officials of a Government constitute the agency by which it fulfils its duty of protecting and regulating society; and taxes are raised in order that it may have the means of supporting these officials while so engaged. To make the officials themselves pay taxes is, theoretically, an absurdity; it is giving them money with one hand and taking it away with the other; though of course there may be sound reasons of practical convenience why this should be done. So it is with the Catholic clergy; regarding them as the moral police of society, a wise State would recognise them as its children and its servants, and assume that, as a general rule, they would spend their own money in such a way as to promote peace, order and well-being more effectually than would be the result if the State were to tax them to the same amount, and spend the money for them.

The early history of clerical immunity is given in great detail by Thomassin.[1] Constantine exempted from all tribute his private property and "ecclesias Catholicas;" he also ordered that no public functions of a lay character should be imposed on the bishops.[2] Constantius at the beginning of his reign passed edicts highly favourable to this immunity, but revoked them after the Council of Arminum (359), except in the case of clerics who were very poor, and whose temporal business was of trifling value. By a law passed shortly before his death he replaced things nearly on their old footing. These vacillations in the policy of the emperors were of continual occurrence; thus while Julian the Apostate abolished all clerical immunities, Valentinian restored them. The great bishops of the fourth century took patiently the imperial demands on their temporalities, and complied with them; but on the spiritual side they were inflexible. Writing of his refusal to grant one of the Milan churches to the Arians, at the request of Valentinian II., St. Ambrose said, "If he asks for tribute, we do not refuse it. . . . . We pay to Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's, and to God the things which are God's. A church belongs to God, and ought not certainly to be assigned to Cæsar." Thomassin argues that St. Ambrose was quite aware that immunity was the Church's right, but that he preferred to pay taxes rather than cause offence. "Ambrose knew that from Christ—the Church—the Clergy—tribute was not due, but yet was paid; and paid all the more nobly because it was not owed."

In the feudal ages, when fiefs and manors were granted to the Church to be held on feudal terms, the question of ecclesiastical immunities became much complicated. As a bishop who held a fief under some secular prince had to do homage to him for it, kneeling before him, placing his hands between the lord's hands, and swearing to become his "man"—a spectacle which moved grief and indignation in the breast of many a zealous pontiff and saint—so, as to all other services (rent, corvées, troops, &c.) which the vassal was bound to render to his lord by the condition of his tenure, he could not, if a churchman, plead the ecclesiastical immunity, though it still subsisted in full force as to lands held in frank almoigne.

[1] III. i. 33–45.

[2] Euseb. H. E. x. 5.

The Council[1] of Trent[1] entreated all Catholic princes not to allow their servants and officials to violate, through cupidity or carelessness, "the immunity of the Church and of ecclesiastical persons which had been established by the ordinance of God and canonical sanctions." At the present day, through the continual encroachments of the lay power, immunity as regards taxation exists nowhere in Europe; and even that shred of privilege by which the burden of military service was taken off the necks of aspirants for the priesthood has been swept away by the so-called Liberals in France and Italy. (Ferraris, Immunitas Ecclesiastica; Thomassin, "Vetus et Nova Eccl. Disciplina.")

IMPEDIMENTS OF MARRIAGE. The contract of marriage between certain persons and in certain cases is null and void by the law of God, natural and revealed. So far Protestants are at one with us, for they would not dream of holding that marriage between father and daughter or brother and sister was valid. But Catholics further maintain with the Council of Trent (Sess. xxiv. De Matrimon. can. 4) that the Church may institute impediments which nullify the contract of marriage. The principle on which this tenet rests is a very simple one. Marriage between baptised persons, according to the Catholic doctrine, is a sacrament, and therefore this contract falls under ecclesiastical authority. Just as the State may pronounce certain natural contracts which are lawful in themselves null and void—just as, for example, it may for the general good nullify certain engagements made by minors or at play, so the Church may interfere with the freedom of the marriage contract. The State, on the contrary, has no power to nullify marriage, because the sacrament of marriage does not fall under civil jurisdiction, although as the formalities of marriage affect the public order, the State may regulate them—e.g. provide that persons about to be married should have their names registered, &c.

Impediments are of two kinds. They may render marriage unlawful merely, in which case they are called "mere impedientia;" or they may nullify it, in which case they are known as "dirimentia." We shall treat of these impediments as settled by the existing law, adding historical notices.

1. Impedimenta mere Impedientia:—

(a) Time. The solemnities of Marriage must not take place between Advent Sunday and Epiphany, or between Ash Wednesday and Low Sunday. So the Council of Trent, Sess. xxiv. De Reform. Matr. cap. 10. Marriage, solemnly celebrated, is forbidden in these times because they should be devoted to penance or else to a joy purely spiritual. Marriages in Lent were generally prohibited in ancient times: marriages in Advent and Christmas time only in certain places, though Gratian inserts this latter prohibition in his "Decretum." Some provincial councils forbade marriage on Sundays, from three days before the Ascension to the first Sunday after Pentecost, &c.[1]

(β) Ecclesiastical Prohibition.—This includes the marriage of a Catholic with a baptised person not a Catholic, which marriage is valid, but, unless a dispensation has been obtained, unlawful. Such marriages are forbidden by the Councils of Elvira (anno 306), can. 16, and of Laodicea, can. 10 and 31. The Council of Chalcedon, can. 14, forbids "readers and singers" (ἀναγνῶσται καὶ ψάλται) to marry an heretical girl. The reason of this prohibition has always been the same, viz. the danger that the children will not be brought up Catholics. Hence in some of the rules just quoted exception is made in favour of marriage with heretics who promise to become Catholic. Marriages without previous proclamation of banns are also forbidden by the Church.

(γ) Simple vow of chastity, such as is made privately or in congregations like the Sisters of Mercy, &c., which are not religious orders in the canonical sense.

(δ) Previous engagement to another person, unless the engagement has been lawfully annulled—e.g. by mutual consent. This impediment, like (γ), depends on the natural law.

2. Diriment Impediments:—

(a) Error and conditio affecting the substance of the contract. Thus a man who goes through the form of marriage with one woman, mistaking her for another, really marries neither. This impediment comes from the natural law.

[1] Sess. xxv. De Reform. c. 20.

[1] See Chardon, Hist. des Sacr. tom. vi., "Mariage," c. 3.

If a person marries a slave unawares, the marriage is null. For the Roman and early Church law on this subject see Döllinger, "Hippolytus and Callistus," Engl. Transl. p. 147.

(β) Vows of chastity, if solemn, and holy orders. The reader will find under the article CELIBACY an account of the gradual process by which holy order came to be a diriment impediment. The ancient Church did not expressly distinguish between simple and solemn vows, but Chardon quotes a letter of Pope Innocent I. to Victricius of Rouen in which a very similar distinction is recognised. The Pope divides nuns who have made the vow of continence into two classes—viz. those who have and those who have not received the veil publicly from the Church. The former, if they marry, he treats as unfaithful to Christ their spouse, and excludes from communion till the person they marry is dead. On the latter he merely imposes penance for a time. Moreover, the Synod of Elvira, can. 13, forbids virgins consecrated to God, in case they break their vow, to communicate, even on their deathbeds, unless they have done penance and ceased to cohabit ("abstineant a coitu").[1] So again the First Council of Toledo (anno 400), canon 16, only admits a nun ("devota"), to penance if separated from the man she has unlawfully married ("caste vivere cœperit, recesserit et pœnituerit"). So the Second Synod of Orleans, canon 17, with respect to deaconesses; and many other ancient authorities. The Trullan Synod, canon 44, treats the marriage of a monk as an act of unchastity.

(γ) Consanguinity and affinity. [See the articles so entitled.]

(δ) Public decorum ("publica honestas"). If A is or has been betrothed to B, A cannot validly marry a third person related in the first degree of kindred to B. He cannot, e.g. marry B's mother, daughter, or sister. A similar rule, of course, binds B. So the Council of Trent, for in the older canon law the impediment from betrothal extended to the fourth degree. Again, if A has been married to B, but has not consummated the marriage, he cannot marry afterwards anyone related to B in the first, second, third, or fourth degree. This impediment was adopted from the Roman law, and is not referred to by the Fathers.

[1] Even then only in case this fall has been a single act of weakness atoned for by a life-long penance.

(ε) Crime. (1) Adultery between two persons accompanied by a promise of marriage when they are free to contract it. (2) Successful conspiracy to murder a husband or wife in order that the conspirators may marry. (3) Adultery and murder with the intention of marriage combined, even if there be no conspiracy or previous promise of marriage, are diriment impediments. Also from the Roman law.

(ζ) Difference of religion ("disparitas cultus") makes the marriage of a baptised and unbaptised person null. In the early Church, such unions, though often prohibited, were not regarded as invalid, and nearly all theologians, according to Chardon, are agreed that custom only has made the impediment a diriment one.

(η) Grave fear, if unjustly caused with a view of bringing marriage about. Probably this cause nullifies marriage by the natural law.

(θ) Another marriage tie still existing ("ligamen"). If one of the parties has been previously married, there must be a moral certainty that his or her previous partner is dead. In any case in which the priest or the parties themselves doubt, recourse must be had to the bishop, who will judge whether the moral certainty exists.

(ι) Defect of age. Boys cannot marry before completing their fourteenth, girls before completing their twelfth, year, "nisi malitia suppleat ætatem."

(κ) Clandestinity. No one doubts that from the earliest times marriages, wherever it was possible, were contracted in the face of the Church; indeed Tertullian ("De Pudic." c. 4) tells us that marriages contracted otherwise were thought extremely disreputable. Chardon quotes a declaration of Charlemagne, Capitularies of French kings, and decrees of Eastern emperors, which prove that marriage without the ecclesiastical ceremonies was treated as absolutely null, and such was the discipline both in East and West till the twelfth century, for Ivo of Chartres quotes the False Decretals to this effect. But, soon after, the discipline changed in the West. The validity of clandestine marriages was fully recognised by the Church, and the common opinion of the mediæval doctors made the essence of marriage consist in the free consent of the contracting persons. The Council of Trent introduced a new condition for the validity of the contract, and therefore of the sacrament. It declared all marriages null unless contracted before the parish-priest, or another priest approved by him for the purpose, and two or three witnesses. Hence, e.g., two persons marrying in France merely before the magistrate are really not married at all. But in order to avoid the difficulties which would otherwise have arisen, the decree of Trent was not promulgated in Great Britain, several German States—indeed, in Protestant countries generally, nor in the United States; so that the marriages of Protestants or Catholics made before the Protestant clergyman or magistrate or without any functionary in these countries are valid. In 1741 Benedict XIV. declared clandestine marriages in the Low Countries valid unless each of the parties was Catholic. Pius VI. in 1785 made a similar declaration with regard to Ireland.[1]

(λ) Impotentia (antecedens et perpetua).

(μ) Raptus. If a man carries off a woman from one place to another with the view of marrying her, the Church nullifies any marriage between them so long as the woman is in the man's power. The impediment still exists even if the woman consents to the marriage. The Church will accept no proof of freedom on the woman's part short of her removal from her suitor's power. Severe laws were made against the crime of raptus by the Roman emperors, beginning with Constantine. Justinian absolutely prohibited marriage between the raptor and the woman he had carried off. So did Charlemagne in his Capitularies; and the Greek Church maintained a similar discipline "It is," says Chardon, speaking of the Western Church—"it is specially in the ancient councils of France that raptus has been expressly declared a diriment impediment." The councils he quotes range from the sixth to the eighth century, and they certainly prohibit subsequent marriage between the raptor and his victim, though it may be doubted whether they meant to pronounce it null. However, in the anarchy towards the end of the ninth and during the tenth centuries these canons fell into disuse. Pope Lucius III. decided that when a girl was carried off, her marriage with the man who had seized her was valid, provided she consented to it freely. Innocent III. followed the same principles. The Council of Trent introduced the present rule at the request of the French king. The reader will observe that it is less strict than the prohibitions of the old French canons. The Council of Trent permits marriage between the raptor and the raptee, provided the latter is out of the former's power when she gives her consent.

3. Dispensations from Impediments.—If the impediments arise from the natural or divine law, no human power can dispense from them. The Pope may dispense from such as are of ecclesiastical origin; while bishops in virtue of their ordinary power can only set aside the "impedimenta mere impedientia." Bishops, however, may often dispense from certain diriment impediments as apostolic delegates. The facility with which dispensations are given has increased enormously since the thirteenth century. Gregory the Great granted marriage dispensations in favour of the English who were just converted to the faith. So Gregory II. in favour of the Germans. But in numerous instances dispensations, such as would easily be granted nowadays to ordinary Catholics, were refused even to crowned heads. It was in vain that the Council of Trent tried to restore the ancient rigour. (See Chardon, "Hist. des Sacr.," and Gibert, "Histoire ou Tradition de l'Eglise sur le Sacrement du Mariage."

IMPOSITION OF HANDS even in the old dispensation (Gen. xlviii. 14, Deut. xxxiv. 9) symbolised the conveyance of grace and power. The rite has been retained under the new law, and in two instances (the imposition of hands in ordination and confirmation) it has received a sacramental efficacy. The following are the most noteworthy instances in which the Church employs or once employed the rite.

(1) As Christ blessed the children, laying his hands on them (Matt. xix. 13), so the bishop laid his hands on the catechumens as they made the first step towards reception into the kingdom of God. Thus Eusebius ("Vit. Constant." iv. 61, where see the note of Valesius) tells us that Constantine, when preparing shortly before his death for baptism, first received the imposition of hands accompanied with prayer (τῶν διὰ χειροθεσίας εὐχῶν ἠξιοῦτο). This ceremony was repeated during the catechumen's course of preparation, at the renunciation of the devil (Tertull. "De

[1] As to the question whether clandestine marriages of Protestants are valid where the Council of Trent has been proclaimed and not restricted by any Papal declaration such as those just quoted, see Ballerini on Gury De Matrim.

Coron." 3) and at the exorcisms (Orig. "In Jos." Hom. xxiv. 1). Probably it is this imposition of hands which is intended in can. 39 of the Council of Elvira and can. 6 of the Council of Arles (see Hefele, "Concil." i. p. 172 seq.), and it is still retained in our baptismal rite.

(2) As Christ laid his hands on the sick, so did the Church's ministers ("Constit. Ap." ii. 41, Cyprian, "De Laps." 16) on those who were spiritually sick—viz. on penitents. It is no longer the custom to lay on hands in the sacrament of penance, but it seems to have lasted till some time after the Reformation, and is still practised, if we have been rightly informed, by priests of the unreformed Carmelite order.

Hands were also laid on heretics when reconciled to the Church. "Let no change be made," such are the words of Pope Stephen (apud Cyprian, Ep. 174) "beyond the traditional usage of laying hands on them unto penance."

Imposition of hands was also used in blessing marriages (Clem. Al. "Pæd." iii. 11, p. 291, ed. Potter), in miraculous healing of the sick (Irenæus, apud Euseb. "H. E." v. 7), in consecrating virgins and ordaining deaconesses. These last customs do not exist in the modern Church, except that in the ceremonies which precede extreme unction the priest holds his hand over the sick man.

The imposition of hands in confirmation and order is treated of in the articles on these sacraments, but it may be convenient to notice here a rite which occurs in the Roman Mass, just before the consecration. though it does not, strictly speaking, form part of our present subject, since it is an extension and not an imposition of hands. It is, however, connected with an imposition of hands in the old law. Then he who offered sacrifice put his hand on the head of the victim (see Levit. i. 4, iii. 2, 8, 13, iv. 5, 15), whether the sacrifice was a holocaust, eucharistic, or expiatory. This rite indicated the "personal and intimate relation between the worshipper and the victim" (Kalisch on Levit. i. p. 176). It is with the same intention that the priest holds his hands extended at the prayer "Hanc igitur" over the gifts of bread and wine "which are soon to be changed into the victim of our peace." The rite does not appear to be ancient, for the Ordo Romanus down to the fifteenth century simply prescribed the extension of the hands at this prayer, and Le Brun ("Explic. de la Messe," part iv. a. 5) does not seem to have found our present rubric in any missal older than 1481.

INCARNATION. The Catholic doctrine of the Incarnation has been already explained under the word CHRIST. Here we confine ourselves to an account of the word and its synonyms.

The history of the word and its synonyms is given with great fulness by Petavius, "De Incarnat." ii. 1. In St. John's gospel we are told that the Word "was made flesh," where, as Maldonatus remarks, "flesh" (like the Hebrew בָּשָׂר : e.g. in Gen. vi. 12, "all flesh had corrupted its way") is only another word for "man," though the word is fitly chosen to mark the extreme condescension of God the Word. St. Justin, "Apol." i. 61, combines the two words "became flesh" into the single verb "flesh-made" (σαρκοποιηθείς[1]); while in the Latin version of Irenæus, v. 1, 3, we meet with the technical term which has been so familiar ever since. viz. Incarnation (incarnatio). The Greek Fathers use a word nearly equivolent, viz. σάρκωσις. They also employ ἐνανθρώπησις, "being made man," for which St. Ambrose has the word humanatio, in order to express the truth that the Word took perfect human nature, that He had a human intelligence as well as a human body and animal soul, and so to exclude the heresy of Apollinaris. The Fathers also use other words which are less plain and explicit. Most commonly they call the Incarnation the "economy" (οἰκονομία), meaning that Christ took flesh in order to provide for our salvation. They often substitute for the bare word "economy" fuller expressions, such as "the economy according to the flesh," "according to man," and the like. They also speak of the Incarnation as the "condescension" (συγκατάβασις), the "taking," "assuming," "clothing Himself in flesh," as the "mingling" (viz. of the two natures), incorporation (incorporatio); &c. &c.

INCENSE. It is certain from Tertullian, "Apol." 42, and from many other early writers down to St. Augustine, that the religious use of incense was unknown in the primitive Church. Le Brun quotes St. Ambrose to prove that incense was used in the churches of his day, but the quotation can scarcely be said to prove the point. On the other hand, Dionysius the Areopagite—whose works were first quoted in 532, but may have been written a good deal earlier—distinctly mentions

[1] Cf. σαρκωθέντα in the Nicene Creed.

("Hierarch. Eccles." iii. § 2) the censing of the altar by the chief priest. The use of incense is also mentioned in the first Ordo Romanus, which may belong to the seventh century, and in the liturgies which go by the names of St. James, St. Basil, and St. Chrysostom. Possibly also the fourth (al. third) canon of the Apostles, which forbids anything to be placed on the altar at the oblation except "oil for the lamp and incense," may refer to the incense as liturgically used. If so, we should be justified with Le Brun in supposing that incense was introduced into the Church services when the persecution of the heathen ceased and the splendour of churches and ritual began.

Some authors believe that incense was at first introduced to sweeten the air, and certainly a "Benediction of Incense" used in the time of Charlemagne and given by Martene points in this direction. But the mystical significations of incense are obvious. It symbolises the zeal with which the faithful should be consumed; the good odour of Christian virtue; the ascent of prayer to God. It is used before the introit, at the gospel, offertory and elevation in High Mass; at the Magnificat in vespers; at funerals; &c.

INCLUSI, INCLUSÆ. Recluses, men and women. A monk or nun might, with the permission of the superior, be shut up permanently in a cell, either near to or within the precincts of the monastery, whence he or she could not come forth but by licence of the bishop. Cassian describes the inclusi of his day; as a class, they were not then held in great esteem. The manner of life of a female recluse in the twelfth century may be clearly seen from the treatise "De Institutione Inclusarum,"[1] ascribed to St. Ailred of Rievaulx. The writer addresses his counsels to his own sister, who had retired into a cell; he earnestly warns her to shun idleness and frivolous conversation; from the general tone of his remarks it is plain that the life of a female recluse was beset by great and peculiar dangers and temptations. (Ducange, Inclusi.)

INDEX OF PROHIBITED BOOKS. Since the dawn of civilisation, the perception of the influence for good or evil exerted by books has induced the authorities of every strongly constituted State to control their circulation. Not to search for other instances, the speech which Livy[2] puts in the mouth of the consul Postumius (B.C. 186) shows the sternness of Roman feeling on the subject. Addressing the assembled people in the forum, and about to denounce the foul Bacchic rites of which he had discovered the trace, "How often," he says, "in the time of our fathers and grandfathers, was the duty imposed on the magistrates of forbidding the practice of foreign rites; of driving away [foreign] priests and prophets from every corner of the city; of searching for and burning books of magic; of putting a stop to every system of sacrificing that was not according to the custom of Rome!" In Christian times the danger of bad books was recognised from the first. The converts at Ephesus (Acts xix. 19) voluntarily brought their magical books to St. Paul and cast them into the flames. One of the Apostolic Canons (lx.) orders the deposition of any one in the ranks of the clergy who should publish in the Church as holy "the falsely inscribed books of the impious." The practice of the primitive Church in condemning and suppressing heretical or dangerous books was uniform. The erroneous writings of Origen were brought to the Roman Pontiff, Pontianus, to be condemned by him; Leo the Great by letter suppressed and prohibited the books of the Priscillianists.[1] Descending to the middle ages, we find Leo IX. in a synod at Vercelli (1050) condemning and ordering to be burnt the writings of Erigena and Berengarius on the Eucharist.[2] The Council of Constance (1415) ordered all the books of John Huss to be publicly burnt at the council, and that all bishops should make diligent search for copies and burn them wherever found. Leo X. in the bull Exsurge, Domine (1520), condemned the earlier heretical writings of Luther. The invention of printing, and the extension of facilities of communication between State and State, made it evident to the hierarchy that if the influence of books was to be kept under control, new methods must be adopted. When copies of books were slowly multiplied by the labour of scribes, it was sufficient to await their publication before examining them, and trust to being able, if they were to be suppressed, to call in, get hold of, and cancel the few copies in circulation. But when the printing-press could turn out a thousand copies of a work in a few days, everything was changed. It then became necessary that the books should be examined before they were printed; censors were appointed, and a system of licensing came into force. "The first known instance of the regular appointment of a censor on books is in the mandate of Berthold, archbishop of Mentz, in 1486;" and a few years later, in 1501, "a bull of Alexander VI., reciting that many pernicious books had been printed in various parts of the world, and especially in the provinces of Mentz, Cologne, Treves, and Magdeburg, forbade all printers in these provinces to publish any book without the licence of the archbishops or their officials."[1]

In the movement of what is called the Reformation, a deluge of books containing doctrine more or less erroneous was poured over Europe, and it became evident that if booksellers were to know with certainty what they might sell, and the Christian faithful what they might read, it would not do to trust to an "imprimatur" on the title-page, which might be forged, or come from Protestant censors; but that a list or catalogue of books condemned by the Church must be drawn up and published. The matter was taken up by the Council of Trent (sess. xviii.), which appointed a commission of some of its members to collect and examine the censures already issued, and consider and report on the steps which it was advisable to take about books generally. This commission compiled an Index of Prohibited Books accordingly, but the council in its last session (1563), finding that from the multiplicity of details it was not desirable to frame any conciliar decision, remitted the whole matter to the Pope. In conformity with this reference, St. Pius V., a few years later, erected the Sacred Congregation of the Index, with a Dominican friar for its secretary. Sixtus V. confirmed and enlarged their powers.

"The Congregation of the Index of Prohibited Books consists of a competent number of Cardinals, according to the good pleasure of the Pope, and has a secretary taken from the Order of Preachers, and a great number of theological and other professors who are called Consultors, the chief of whom is the Master of the Apostolic Palace [CURIA ROMANA], the primary and official Consultor of this Congregation."[2]

A Constitution of Benedict XIV. (1753) gives minute instructions as to the principles and methods to be observed by the Congregation in its work of examining and judging books. Some idea of these principles may be gained from the following paragraph. "Let them know that they must judge of the various opinions and sentiments in any book that comes before them, with minds absolutely free from prejudice. Let them, therefore, dismiss patriotic leanings, family affections, the predilections of school, the esprit de corps of an institute; let them put away the zeal of party; let them simply keep before their eyes the decisions of Holy Church, and the common doctrine of Catholics, which is contained in the decrees of General Councils, the Constitutions of the Roman Pontiffs, and the consent of orthodox Fathers and Doctors; bearing this in mind, moreover, that there are not a few opinions which appear to one school, institute, or nation to be unquestionably certain, yet nevertheless are rejected and impugned, and their contradictories maintained, by other Catholics, without harm to faith and religion—all this being with the knowledge and permission of the Apostolic See, which leaves every particular opinion of this kind in its own degree of probability."

Numerous editions of the Index have appeared from time to time. That issued under Benedict XIV. (Rome, 1744) contains between nine and ten thousand entries of books and authors, alphabetically arranged; of these about one-third are cross-references. Prefixed to it are the ten rules sanctioned by the Council of Trent, of which the tenor is as follows. The first rule orders that all books condemned by Popes or General Councils before 1515, which were not contained in that Index, should be reputed to be condemned in such sort as they were formerly condemned. The second rule prohibits all the works of heresiarchs, such as Luther and Calvin, and those works by heretical authors which treat of religion; their other works to be allowed after examination. The third and fourth rules relate to versions of the Scripture, and define the classes of persons to whom the reading of the Bible in the vulgar tongue may be permitted. The fifth allows the circulation, after expurgation, of lexicons and other works of reference compiled by heretics. The sixth relates to books of controversy. The seventh orders that all obscene books be absolutely prohibited, except ancient books written by heathens, which were tolerated "propter sermonis elegantiam et proprietatem," but were not to be used in teaching boys. The eighth rule is upon methods of expurgation. The ninth prohibits books of magic and judicial astrology; but "theories and natural observations published for the sake of furthering navigation, agriculture, or the medical art are permitted." The tenth relates to printing, introducing, having, and circulating books. Persons reading prohibited books incur excommunication forthwith (statim).

Luther, Calvin, Melanchthon, Cranmer, Jewel, &c., are named as in the first class —i.e. as heresiarchs. Among books of more or less note are named the Dialogo of Galileo, the Satire Menippée, the Anti-Coton, and the Augustinus of Jansenius. Among the English authors whose works are prohibited occur the names of James I., Barclay, Usher; bishops Sanderson, Bull, and Pearson; Cave and Hobbes; but not Hooker, nor Milton, nor Chillingworth, nor Bunyan, nor Swift.

INDICTION. A fiscal term, meaning the proclamation of a tax, "quicquid in præstationem indicitur." After the reorganisation of the empire under Diocletian and Constantine, it was customary to proclaim the taxes yearly, and the name of the notice thus given, indictio, was transferred to the year itself. Every fifteen years there was a re-valuation of property, which would lead to material alterations in the terms of the tax-notices. To one of these quindecennial periods the name of "circle of indictions," and then briefly "indiction" was given. This came to be used as a means of denoting the date of a transaction; a thing was said to happen "indictione V." or "X."—that is, in the fifth or tenth year of the circle of indictions then current. Of course the denotation of time was incomplete, for it included no statement of the number of such circles which had elapsed since the epoch from which the computation started. This mode of reckoning the years, which makes its appearance about the middle of the fourth century, continued to be used even into the middle ages, after all notions connecting it with taxation had disappeared. The first indiction is supposed to have commenced on September 24, 312, on which day Constantine gained a great victory over Maxentius. The rule for finding the indiction of any year is as follows: to the given year A.D., reckoning it to commence on January 1, add 3; divide the amount by 15; the remainder is the number of the indiction; if there is no remainder, the indiction is 15. The number 3 must be added, in order to make the portion of the date A.D. which is anterior to the commencement of the indictions (312 years), divisible by 15 equally with the portion subsequent to that date. Suppose we wish to know the indiction of A.D. 595, the year in which Pope Gregory despatched St. Augustine to Britain; $\frac{595+3}{15} = 39$, with rem. 13; the indiction number for this year is therefore 13. "Indict. XV." applies only to the portion of the year from January 1 to September 24; from the latter date to the end of the year it is Indict. I.

INDULGENCE. Indulgentia is a technical term in the Roman law, meaning amnesty or pardon; and in much the same sense it occurs in the Latin of the Vulgate, where it is synonymous with remissio, as may be seen by comparing Isai. lxi. 1, with Luc. iv. 18. In the language of the Church it has acquired a much more definite and restricted meaning, and an indulgence in the theological sense of the word is defined by Amort in his classical work on the subject, as "a remission of the punishment which is still due to sin after sacramental absolution, this remission being valid in the court of conscience and before God, and being made by an application of the treasure of the Church on the part of a lawful superior."

1. The Catholic Doctrine on Indulgences, as given in the preceding definition, implies several points of Catholic belief which need elucidation.

(a) An indulgence does not remit either the guilt or the eternal punishment of sin, much less are the authorities of the Church wicked and blasphemous enough to give permission to commit sin for the future. The guilt of sin is forgiven chiefly by the sacraments of baptism and penance, and even these are of no avail unless the sinner turns to God with sincere and supernatural sorrow and with firm purpose of amendment. An indulgence cannot be obtained for unforgiven sin. Before anyone can obtain for himself the benefit of an indulgence the guilt must have been washed away and the eternal punishment, if his sin has been mortal, must have been forgiven. Thus, instead of being an encouragement to sin, the desire to obtain an indulgence is a powerful motive to repentance. If the phrase "remission of sin" occurs in the grant of an indulgence, the Church, after the example of Scripture (e.g. 1 Pet. ii. 24), uses the word to denote the remission of punishment. Benedict XIV. ("De Syn. Diœc." xiii. 18, 7) holds that indulgences granted "from punishment and guilt" ("a pœna et culpa") are spurious. Others (see Ferraris, "Prompt. Bibliothec." art. Indulgentia) understand the form as conveying to the confessor power to absolve sacramentally from reserved cases.

(β) Even when the guilt of sin and the eternal punishment sometimes due to it have been removed by repentance and absolution, a temporal punishment may still remain. Even after Nathan told David his sin was forgiven, it was nevertheless punished by the death of his child. Baptism, it is true, annuls both the guilt and all the penalty due to sin. The absolution accorded in the sacrament of penance is less efficacious (Concil Trid. sess. xiv. De Pœn. can. 15). St. Paul made the incestuous Corinthian suffer in this world that his soul might be saved. The Church of all ages in giving sacramental absolution has imposed penances on the sinner. Usually speaking, the sacramental penance, at least in the present mild discipline of the Church, leaves a debt of temporal punishment, and this debt is cleared by grant of an indulgence. The grant of this indulgence is an act of jurisdiction, not of order, and it is quite distinct from sacramental absolution. Of course, this indulgence cannot free the repentant sinner from temporal punishments involved in the very fact of repentance—e.g. from restoring stolen goods, retracting calumnies, taking the necessary means, however painful, to avoid future falls; or, again, from the natural consequences of sin, such as shame, sickness, and the like. Nor, again, does the Church ever excuse a sinner from all sacramental penance; nay, more, a person most enlightened on the real value of indulgences, and most eager to gain them, is of all others the most likely to afflict himself with voluntary mortifications, recognising in them powerful helps to overcome himself, to obtain that perfect aversion even from the slightest sin which is required before a plenary indulgence can be gained, and to avoid future falls. Heaven helps those who help themselves. We have seen that indulgences are a powerful incentive to repentance; now we see that they encourage strictness of life and, indeed, all Christian virtue.

(γ) Indulgences are not merely a remission of canonical penances (this error is condemned by the Church, Thes. Lutheri, prop. 19; Synod. Pistoi. prop. 40), but they also avail before the justice of God. Otherwise, as St. Thomas argues ("Suppl." qu. xxv. a. 1), the indulgence would be a loss and not a gain, and the Church would excuse her children from canonical penances, and abandon them to more grievous sufferings in Purgatory. The error of Luther and the Jansenist Synod of Pistoia on this part of the subject really springs from misconceiving the nature of canonical penance. This will appear more fully when we discuss the history of indulgences. Here it is enough to say that just as in imposing canonical penance the Church acts in the name of God and exercises a power of binding given by Him for the profit of souls, so in remitting it she exercises a power of loosing by the same divine authority. The power of the keys (Matt. xvi. 19, xviii. 18; cf. John xx. 22, 23) enables her not only to forgive sins, but to open the kingdom of heaven. Thus St. Paul (1 Cor. v. 4) imposed penance "with the power of the Lord Jesus" and relaxed it (2 Cor. ii. 10) "in the person of Christ." Penalty so relaxed was no longer due, either here or hereafter, so that the doctrine of indulgences exhibits at once the justice of God and his infinite mercy.

(δ) An indulgence does not only remit, but also satisfies the justice of God for, the temporal punishment of sin. The Church has recourse to the infinite merits of Christ, which suffice to satisfy for all guilt and all penalty, and to the merits of saints who have done penance more than sufficient to pay the temporal punishment due to their own sins. They obtained an abundant reward for their own good deeds, but many of their actions had a penitential character which availed for others if not needed for themselves. Theologians express this characteristic of an indulgence when they say it is solutio as well as absolutio, both payment and remission; or, again, that it is "a juridical absolution," including a payment of the debt from the treasure of the merits of Christ and the saints.

We may end this explanation by quoting the words of the council, which anathematises those who "assert that they [indulgences] are useless, or deny that the power to grant them exists in the Church."

II. The History of Indulgences confirms the teaching of the present Church, because it shows that the difference between ancient and modern practice is to be explained by change of circumstances, not of principle.

(α) In primitive times many years of heavy penance were exacted for great sins, but these penances were curtailed if the penitent had displayed great contrition (Cyprian, Epp. 15–17, and 33), and this indulgence was usually granted when persecution was impending or begun (Cyprian, Ep. 57, 7). We read of one case (Euseb. "H. E." v. 32) in which the canonical penance, which had, as a rule, to be performed before absolution, was wholly remitted. The way in which this indulgence was most commonly granted deserves particular notice. A confessor in prison and expecting death for Christ, sent a letter of peace ("libellus pacis") to the bishop in favour of some brother who was under penance—e.g. for apostasy—and the bishop, if satisfied of his contrition, restored him to the peace of the Church (see Cyprian, Epp. 15–17, and 33). Here we have the modern doctrine of indulgence in full operation among the Christians of the third century. We find the belief in the "treasure of merits," for Tertullian ("De Pud." 22), when he had become a Montanist, reproaches the Catholic Church on this very ground. "You give," he says, "even your martyrs this power. Who permits man to grant the things which must be reserved for God? Who pays for another's death" (i.e. the death due to sin) "save only the Son of God?" The indulgence was given by ecclesiastical authority, as has been already shown. Lastly, it availed before God, and was no mere remission of canonical penance. For Cyprian (Ep. 18) speaks of those "who have received letters from the martyrs, and can be assisted by this prerogative before God." "He [the Lord] can mercifully pardon him who repents, labours, prays; He can set down to his account whatever the martyrs have asked, and the bishops (sacerdotes) have done for such persons" ("De Laps." 36). No modern theologian could put the Church's doctrine better.

(β) From the Seventh Century to the Crusades.—As public was gradually replaced by private penance (though canonical penance was still very severe), indulgences were often granted in the form of commutation—i.e. a lesser work was supplemented from the "treasure of merits" and made equivalent to a greater one. Alms to churches, monasteries, or the poor, the pilgrimages—greatly in vogue from the tenth century onwards—to Jerusalem, Rome, and Compostella, were substituted for so many days, years, &c., of canonical penance. This commutation is said to have begun in England and then to have spread south; and we may notice here the origin of the terminology still in use, when indulgences are granted for forty days, seven years, &c. After the eleventh century plenary indulgences, though rare, are met with. Thus Urban II., in the famous assembly at Clermont to promote the Crusades, gave a plenary indulgence to the Crusaders ("iter illud pro omni pœnitentia reputetur") by the authority of St. Peter and St. Paul. At the First General Council of Lyons, Innocent IV. gave a plenary indulgence to those who went on the Crusade at their own cost, provided they were contrite for their sins; and an indulgence proportioned to their zeal to those who helped the Crusaders by money or advice.

(γ) Later History of Indulgences.—The period of the Crusades marks a turning-point in the history of indulgences, for they were given more and more freely from that time onwards. In the first place it is to be noted that indulgences were given for wars analogous to the Crusades. For example, at the Council of Siena, in 1425, a plenary indulgence was offered to those who took arms against the Hussites; while wars against the Waldenses, Albigenses, Moors and Turks were stimulated by the same means. From the eleventh century indulgences were given at the dedication of churches and on the anniversaries of such dedications. Innocent III. in 1215, at the Fourth Lateran Council, limited these spiritual favours to the grant of a year's indulgence at the dedication and one of forty days at the anniversary. The great indulgence of the jubilee was given first in 1300. Urban IV., Martin V., Eugenius IV., granted indulgences to those who assisted at the divine office on Corpus Christi. The canonisation of saints was accompanied by grants of indulgence, the first known instance being an indulgence given by Honorius III. at the canonisation of Lawrence, Archbishop of Dublin. Since the Dominicans made the use of the rosary, and the Franciscans that of the crucifix, popular in the Church, it became customary to attach indulgences to such objects of devotion, and at last indulgences were so freely given that there is now scarcely a devotion or good work of any kind for which they may not be obtained. This common use of indulgences led theologians to draw out more fully the theory on which the doctrine of indulgences rests, and thus, just at the beginning of the eleventh century, the phrase "treasure of merits" occurs. The attacks of Wiclif, Huss, Luther, and the Jansenists served to develop the teaching of the Church on this head still more perfectly. The Council of Trent, however, energetically prohibited the "disreputable gains" made from those who desired to obtain indulgences ("pravos quæstus pro his consequendis"), "from which a most plentiful cause of abuses had flowed into Christian nations (Sess. xxv. Decret. de Indulg.).

III. Application of Indulgences to the Dead.—In the ninth century Pascal I. and John VIII. bestowed such indulgences on the souls of those who had fallen fighting for the Church, and it is evident from the language of St. Thomas ("Suppl." qu. lxxi. a. 10) that such indulgences were common in his day. No doctrinal difficulty will be felt on the matter if the real intention of the Church be apprehended. Sixtus IV., in his Constitution of Nov. 27, 1477, lays down the principle that indulgences of this kind are only given "by way of suffrage." His meaning is that the Church has no direct power over the souls of the departed. She can but humbly entreat God to accept the merits of Christ, and, having respect to them, mercifully to remit the whole or a portion of the pains due to the souls suffering in Purgatory. The Church has reprobated the error of those who maintained that indulgences could not profit the dead (Prop. Lutheri, Prop. 22; Synod. Pistoi. Prop. 42).

IV. Indulgences may be given by the Pope throughout the Church; by primates, metropolitans, and bishops within the limits of their jurisdiction. By bishop must be understood a bishop actually ruling a diocese; bishops in partibus, and even coadjutors with the right of succession, have no such power; nor again have vicars general or capitular, abbots, generals of orders, &c., &c. The power, however, may be delegated to any cleric. Moreover, the Fourth Lateran Council, can. 62, confined the bishop's power in the matter to an indulgence of a year at the dedication of a church, and of forty days on other occasions. Nor can a bishop add another forty days for an indulgence already given for the same good work by his predecessor (see the decree of Clement IX., Novem. 20, 1668). Archbishops may give the same indulgences as bishops, not only in their own dioceses, but also in those of their suffragans, and this even if they are not engaged in visitation (cap. "Nostro; De Pœn. et Rem.," v. 38). Cardinals, even if not bishops, may give an indulgence of 100 days in their titular churches; the Great Penitentiary exercises the same power; while legates and nuntios may give an indulgence of 100 days and more (not, however, of a year) within the territories committed to their care, and may also grant an indulgence of seven years and seven periods of forty days to those who visit a particular church or chapel, provided they worthily confess and communicate and pray according to the intention of the Pope. All persons who grant indulgences are bound to do so only for reasonable causes, and to take care that there is some proportion between the work done or at least between the object in view and the grace accorded. Thus the Council of Constance orders persons suspected of heresy to be asked "if they believe the Roman bishops can grant indulgences for reasonable causes."

V. The conditions on which indulgences may be obtained are that the person desirous of gaining them be a member of the Church; that he should perform the good work exactly as prescribed; and that he should be, at least before concluding the work prescribed, in a state of grace. Whether this last condition is necessary to obtain indulgences for the dead is uncertain; it can hardly be so in the case of indulgences applicable only to the dead—e g. in the case of a Requiem Mass at a privileged altar. In order to gain the whole of a plenary indulgence it is further necessary to detest and have the purpose of avoiding so far as possible even the least venial sin. If an indulgence is granted for a particular day, the day is reckoned from midnight to midnight, unless the day be a feast with a vigil, for then the time for gaining the indulgence extends from first to second vespers. For plenary indulgences, it is usual to prescribe confession, communion, and prayer for the Pope's intention. Those who are accustomed to confess every eight days may, without further confession, gain all indulgences which are offered during the week. Communion may be made the day before the feast on which the indulgence is given. Five Paters and Aves for the Pope's intention are considered sufficient. No indulgence can be gained for a work already commanded.

VI. Divisions of Indulgences.—Plenary remit all, partial a portion, of the temporal punishment due to sin—e.g. an indulgence of forty days, as much as would have been atoned for by forty days of canonical penance. "Indulgentiæ pleniores" convey to the confessor faculties to absolve from reserved cases; "plenissimæ" further faculties to commute vows. Indulgences may be temporal—i.e. granted only for a time; or again perpetual or indefinite, which last till revoked. Even indulgences granted by delegated power continue in force after the death of the cleric who bestows them. If a feast on which an indulgence is given is transferred, the indulgence remains attached to the original day, unless the celebration in foro—i.e. the abstinence from servile work, &c.—is transferred also. Personal indulgences are those granted to particular persons—e.g. to an order, confraternity. Local indulgences may be gained only in a particular place. Supposing a church is pulled down to be re-erected under the same title, or if it is replaced under competent authority by a church with the same title in another place, the indulgences may be gained in the new building. But a church which possessed indulgences as the church of a religious order, forfeits them if it passes into the hands of seculars; however, French churches which belonged to Franciscans before 1789 and are now Franciscan no longer, still have the indulgence of Portiuncula. Real indulgences are those attached to crucifixes, medals, &c. It is only the original owner of these objects (i.e. the first owner after the indulgence was attached) who can gain the indulgences, and the indulgence is lost if the object is sold or given away. A person, however, may get objects indulgenced with a view of distributing them to others. In that case the indulgences remain good, even if they pass through the hands of any number of persons, provided that they have not been appropriated to use by the intermediate persons. The owner must have the object with him, though not necessarily in his hands, unless this condition is expressed in the grant. A rosary may be restrung and some of the beads (not, however, the greater number) may be replaced by others without forfeit of the indulgences.

Among the most famous of plenary indulgences are that of the jubilee already mentioned; the indulgence given by priests (who receive power from the Pope to confer it) to the dying; the indulgence given with the Papal blessing [see the article BLESSING]. The most celebrated local indulgences are gained by visiting the seven chief churches and privileged altars at Rome; by pilgrimages to the holy places in Palestine; or visiting the stations mentioned in the Missal. The Popes (especially Clement XII., in 1731) gave all the indulgences to be gained at the holy places to those who make devoutly the Way of the Cross at the "Stations" erected by Franciscans. Faculties similar to those of the Franciscans are now granted to others. An account of other indulgences, such as that of the Portiuncula and the Sabbatine indulgence, will be found under special articles. Indulgences without number have been given to confraternities, persons who wear scapulars, medals, &c. Pius IX. (April 14, 1854) bestowed on those who wear the blue scapular of the Immaculate Conception and say six Paters, Aves, and Glorias in honour of the Trinity and the Immaculate Virgin, and for the exaltation of the Church, extirpation of heresy, &c., all the indulgences which could be obtained by visiting the seven Roman basilicas, the holy places of Jerusalem, the Church of Portiuncula at Assisi, and that of Compostella. Even confession and communion are not required for these indulgences. Large and often plenary indulgences are attached to the recitation of short prayers (though usually confession and communion are required, if the indulgence is plenary), and to the use of blessed crosses, medals, &c. Sixtus V., at the close of the sixteenth century, introduced the custom of blessing objects, and so attaching indulgences to them. A priest with the necessary faculties has only to make a sign of the cross over the rosary, medal, &c. Other acts of piety—e.g. examination of conscience, hearing sermons, visiting the Blessed Sacrament—are also largely indulgenced.

VII. Indulgences which have been Abrogated or declared Apocryphal.—(a) According to a supposed decree of September 18, 1669, and Benedict XIV. ("De Syn." xiii., 18, 8), no partial indulgence of 1,000 years or upwards is authentic. But the decree cannot be found in the Archives of the Congregation of Indulgences, and its existence is disputed. (β) The Council of Trent (Sess. xx. cap. 9) lays down the principle that indulgences must be given everywhere gratis, and the bull "Etsi dominici" of Pius V., issued in 1567, annuls the indulgences of the quæstors and collectors of alms. (γ) Clement VIII. and other Popes have abrogated indulgences said to be given in the form of a jubilee, as also (δ) the indulgences given to rosaries, images, &c., before the rescript of Clement VIII. "De forma indulgentiæ" (anno 1597). (ε) All indulgences given before the Constitution of Clement VIII. "Quæcunque" (March 7, 1604), "Romanus Pontifex" (May 13, 1606), and before the Constitution of Paul V. (November 23, 1610), to orders, confraternities, colleges or chapters, are revoked unless these indulgences have been renewed. (ζ) The indulgences said to have been given by Alexander VI. to the Bridget rosary are apocryphal; so are those which Urban VIII. is said to have given to the crosses of St. Turibius, and Pius V. to the crosses of Caravaca in Spain. A long list of apocryphal indulgences is given in the decree of Innocent XI. "Delatæ sæpius" (March 7, 1678).

(The chief authorities on the subject are Bellarmine, "De indulg. et jubilæo libri duo;" Amort. "De orig., progressu, valore ac fructu indulg.," Aug. Vind. 1735; Theodorus a Spir. S. "Tract. dogmatico-moralis de indulg.," Romæ, 1743; Benedict XIV. "De Syn. diœc." lib. xiii. cap. 18; Ferraris, "Prompt. Biblioth." We have been chiefly indebted to Amort and to the excellent article "Ablass" in the new edition of Wetzer and Welte.)

INDULT (indultum, something granted by favour). A licence or permission granted by the Pope, whether to a corporation or to an individual, authorising something to be done which the common law of the Church does not sanction. A familiar instance is that of the Lenten indults, by which the Pope authorises the bishops, according to the circumstances of different countries, to dispense more or less with the rigour of the canons as to the quadragesimal fast. In former times indults chiefly related to the patronage of church dignities and benefices.

INFALLIBILITY. [See CHURCH OF CHRIST and POPE.]

INFIDEL. One who is not among the fideles, the faithful of Christ. Popularly, the term is applied to all who reject Christianity as a divine revelation. In order to reject it, they must have heard of it; those, therefore, who have never heard of Christianity are not in popular language called infidels, but heathens, though they are included under the theological term "infideles." Nor are heretics, even Unitarians, to be called infidels, for they do accept the religion of Christ as divinely revealed, however erroneous or fantastic their notions as to the nature of the revelation may be.

INNOCENTS, HOLY, FEAST OF, is celebrated in the Latin Church on December 28, in the Greek on December 29th. Among the Greeks the feast is known as that of the "14,000 holy children" (τῶν ἁγίων ιδ' χιλιάδων νηπίων).

From the earliest times the Church has regarded the children whom Herod slew in his desire to make sure of killing Christ, as Martyrs. Irenæus (iii. 16, 4) asserts this clearly, and so does St. Augustine (lib. iii. "De Symbolo ad Catech."). But it is uncertain when this feast began to be kept. A homily attributed to Origen in which this feast is mentioned is certainly spurious, and although in an ancient catalogue of St. Augustine's discourses we find two "tractatus" "De Octavis Infantium," Thomassin ("Traité des Festes," p. 275) explains this as referring to Low Sunday, the octave of Easter Sunday, on the vigil of which children were in those times commonly baptised. However, a separate festival of the Holy Innocents is mentioned in the "Calendar of Carthage," the date of which may be approximately fixed from the fact that the latest martyrs whose names it gives died in 484. In the rule of Chrodegang (d. 766) the feast is placed among the "chief solemnities." The Mass is said in purple vestments, probably because the Innocents did not enter heaven immediately after their martyrdom. They had to wait till Christ at his Ascension opened it to "those who believe." On the octave, Mass is celebrated in red, the usual colour of martyrs.

St. Thomas (2 2ndæ, qu. cxxiv. a. 1) mentions the opinion of some who thought that the use of reason was accelerated in the case of the Innocents, so that they were able consciously to embrace death for Christ. But he himself dismisses the opinion as without warrant in Scripture "The shedding of blood," he says, "for Christ takes the place of baptism Whence, as in children the merit of Christ operates through the grace of baptism, and obtains glory for them, so in those slain for Christ the martyrdom of Christ operates and obtains for them the palm of martyrdom."

In the middle ages it was usual for children to keep a time of festivity in honour of the Holy Innocents, which lasted, according to Durandus, from St. Stephen's Day to the Octave of the Epiphany. Boys used to sit in the canons' stalls; one of them, who was vested in episcopal robes, gave his blessing pontifically. The Council of Basle (Sess. xxii.) condemned the extravagances of this celebration, which was accompanied by the celebration of the Feast of Fools. But the feast of children is still innocently observed in some monasteries and convents, and Thomassin surely errs by excess of rigour when he speaks of it as impious.

INQUISITION. In no age of Christianity has the Church had any doubt that in her hands, and only in hers, was the deposit of the true faith and religion placed by Jesus Christ, and that, as it is her duty to teach this to all nations, so she is bound by all practicable and lawful means to restrain the malice or madness of those who would corrupt the message or resist the teacher. Some have maintained that no means of coercion are lawful for her to use but those which are used in the internal forum [FORUM INTERNUM] and derive their sanction from anticipated suffering in the next world. The power of the Church, according to Fleury,[1] is "purely spiritual," and he held with Marsilius that the Pope could employ no coactive punishment of any kind unless the emperor—i.e. the civil power—gave him leave. From such a view it logically follows that St. Paul ought to have asked the permission of Sergius Paulus before striking Elymas the sorcerer with blindness! The overwhelming majority of the canonists take the opposite view—namely, that the Church can and ought to visit with fitting punishment the heretic and the revolter; and since the publication of the numerous encyclical letters and allocutions of the late Pope treating of the relations between Church and State, and the inherent rights of the former, the view of Fleury can no longer be held by any Catholic.

For many ages after the conversion of Constantine it was easier for the Church to repress heresy by invoking the secular arm than by organising tribunals of her own for the purpose. Reference to ecclesiastical history and the codes of Justinian and Theodosius shows that the emperors generally held as decided views on the pestilent nature of heresy, and the necessity of extirpating it in the germ before it reached its hideous maturity, as the Popes themselves. They were willing to repress it; they took from the Church the definition of what it was; and they had old-established tribunals armed with all the terrors of the law. The bishops, as a rule, had but to notify the appearance of heretics to the lay power, and the latter hastened to make inquiry, and, if necessary, to repress and punish. But in the thirteenth century a new race of temporal rulers rose to power. The emperor Frederic II. perhaps had no Christian faith at all; John of England meditated, sooner than yield to the Pope, openly to apostatise to Islam; and Philip Augustus was refractory towards the Church in various ways. The Church was as clear as ever upon the necessity of repressing heretics, but the weapon—secular sovereignty—which she had hitherto employed for the purpose seemed to be breaking in her hands. The time was come when she was to forge a weapon of her own; to establish a tribunal the incorruptness and fidelity of which she could trust; which in the task of detecting and punishing those who misled their brethren should employ all the minor forms of penal repression, while still remitting to the secular arm the case of obstinate and incorrigible offenders. Thus arose the Inquisition. St. Dominic is said by some to have first proposed the erection of such a tribunal to Innocent III., and to have been appointed by him the first inquisitor.[1] Other writers trace the origin of the tribunal to a synod held at Toulouse by Gregory IX. in 1229, after the Albigensian crusade, which ordered that in every parish a priest and several respectable laymen should be appointed to search out heretics and bring them before the bishops.[2] The task of dealing with the culprits was difficult and invidious, and the bishops ere long made over their responsibility in the matter to the Dominican order. Gregory IX. appointed none but Dominican inquisitors; Innocent IV. nominated Franciscans also, and Clement VII. sent as inquisitor into Portugal a friar of the order of Minims. But the majority of the inquisitors employed have always been Dominicans, and the commissary of the Holy Office at Rome belongs ex officio to this order.

The Congregation of Cardinals of the Holy Inquisition was first erected by Paul III. (1542), and remodelled by Sixtus V. about forty years later. "It is composed of twelve cardinals; of a commissary . . . . who discharges the functions of a judge ordinary; of a counsellor or assessor, who is one of the presidents of the Curia; of consultors, selected by the Pope himself from among the most learned theologians and canonists; qualificators, who give their opinions on questions submitted to them; an advocate charged with the defence of persons accused, and other subordinate officials. The principal sittings of the congregation are held under the immediate presidency of the Pope."[1] This supreme court of inquisition proceeds against any who are delated to it, and in former times used to hear appeals from the sentences of similar courts elsewhere, and to depute inquisitors to proceed to any place where they might appear to be needed. The duties and powers of inquisitors are minutely laid down in the canon law, it being always assumed that the civil power will favour, or can be compelled to favour, their proceedings. Thus it is laid down that they "have power to constrain all magistrates, even secular magistrates, to cause the statutes against heretics to be observed," and to require them to swear to do so; also that they can "compel all magistrates and judges to execute their sentences, and these must obey on pain of excommunication;" also that inquisitors in causes of heresy "can use the secular arm," and that "all temporal rulers are bound to obey inquisitors in causes of faith."[2] No such state of things as that here assumed now exists in any part of Europe; nowhere does the State assist the Church in putting down heresy; it is therefore superfluous to describe regulations controlling a jurisdiction which has lost the medium in which it could work and live.

The canon law also assumes that all bishops, being themselves inquisitors ex vi termini into the purity of the faith in their respective dioceses, will co-operate with the official inquisitors. Each may inquire separately, but the sentence ought to proceed from both; if they disagree, reference must be made to Rome. The proceedings taken against the Lollard followers of Wyclif by Archbishops Arundel and Chicheley between 1382 and 1428,[1] illustrate both the points noticed above: 1. that the civil power in pre-reformation times was wont to give vigorous aid to the bishops in extirpating heresy; 2. that the bishops themselves could and did exercise stringent inquisitorial powers apart from the appointment of special inquisitors.

It does not appear that Papal inquisitors were ever commissioned, eo nomine, in England. In France the Inquisition was established in pursuance of the decrees of the synod of Toulouse (1229) already referred to. Its tribunals were converted into State courts by Philip the Fair, who made use of them to condemn and ruin the Templars. In this condition they remained till the Reformation. In 1538 the Grand Inquisitor, Louis de Rochette, was convicted of Calvinism and burnt; soon afterwards the powers of these courts were transferred to the parliaments, and finally to the bishops (1560). In Germany, Conrad of Marburg, a man of a harsh and inflexible temper, the confessor of St. Elizabeth, attempted to establish an inquisition in the thirteenth century; he was assassinated, and the tribunal never gained a footing in the country. [On the Spanish Inquisition, see the next article.]

INQUISITION, SPANISH, THE. It was founded by Ferdinand and Isabella at Seville in 1481, the first judges of the tribunal being two Dominicans. The clergy and many of the laity of the Castilian kingdom had for some time pressed the adoption of some such measure in order to check the profanations and frauds which the sham conversion to Christianity of a large number of Jews and Moors had occasioned. Even the episcopal thrones of Spain are said to have been not always preserved from the intrusion of these audacious hypocrites. Torquemada, another Dominican, appointed in 1483, was Grand Inquisitor for fifteen years. Under him three new tribunals of the Holy Office were erected, at Cordova, Jaen, and Villa Real; afterwards a fifth was added at Toledo. These tribunals were always popular with the lower orders and the clergy in Spain, but terrible in the eyes of the nobles and the rich middle class, who believed that they were often used by the government as engines of political repression in order to diminish their influence. Ranke calls the Spanish Inquisition "a royal tribunal, furnished with spiritual weapons." In 1492 an edict was issued for the banishment of all Jews refusing to embrace Christianity from Spain, chiefly on account of their alleged incorrigible obstinacy in persisting in the attempt to convert Christians to their own faith and instruct them in their rites.[1] About a hundred thousand went into banishment, and an equal or greater number are supposed to have remained in Spain, where their merely nominal Christianity and secret addiction to their ancestral doctrines and usages gave employment to the Inquisition for centuries.

The history of the Spanish Inquisition was written by Llorente, who was secretary to the tribunal of Madrid from 1790 to 1792. Hence he has been supposed to have possessed great opportunities for obtaining exact information; and his statement, that during its existence of 330 years the Spanish Inquisition condemned 30,000 persons to death, has been quoted with credulous horror in every corner of the civilised world. Dr. Hefele, now bishop of Rottenburg, has examined with great care and ability[2] the worth of the above statement, and the question of the credit due to Llorente. First, there is the general fact of the greater relative severity of penal justice in all countries alike, till within quite recent times. The Carolina, or penal code in force under Charles V., condemned coiners to the flames, and burglars to the gallows. Burying alive and other barbarous punishments were sanctioned by it, none of which were allowed by the Inquisition. In England, in the sixteenth century, persons refusing to plead could be, and were, pressed to death. The last witch burned in Europe was sentenced in the canton Glarus by a Protestant tribunal as late as 1785. Secondly, Llorente omits to draw attention to the fact that the Spanish kings obliged the Inquisition to try and sentence persons charged with many other crimes besides heresy—e.g., with polygamy, seduction, unnatural crime, smuggling, witchcraft, sorcery, imposture, personation, &c. A large proportion of criminals of this kind would, down to the present century, have been sentenced to death on conviction in any secular tribunal in Europe. Thirdly, Llorente does not pretend to base the above statement as to the number executed by the Inquisition on written documents, but on calculations of his own making, in some of which he can be proved to be inexpert and inexact. Fourthly, Hefele gives a list of palpable misstatements and exaggerations which he has detected in Llorente's volumes. Fifthly, the man's career, when closely examined, does not invite confidence. At the end of the last century he was a liberal ecclesiastic, imbued with French ideas, and on intimate terms with Freemasons. In 1806, at the instigation of Godoy, he wrote a book against the fueros, or ancient privileges, of the Basque provinces. He accepted employment from the usurping government of Joseph Bonaparte. Banished from Spain on the fall of Joseph, he escaped to Paris, and published his "History of the Inquisition" in 1814. He next translated the abominable novel, "Faublas," into Spanish; and, being exiled from France in 1822, died at Madrid the next year.

"The celebrated Autos-da-Fé (i.e. Acts of the confession of the faith)," says Möhler,[1] "were as a rule bloodless. But few inquisitorial processes terminated with the death of the accused." The auto, speaking generally, was a form of reconciling culprits to the Church. Nevertheless, the severities practised by the tribunals were such that Rome frequently interfered. The Spanish Inquisition was abolished in 1813.

INSPIRATION OF SCRIPTURE. The word inspiration, like many other theological terms, comes to us from the Latin version of the Bible. Thus St. Paul's words, 2 Tim. iii. 16, πᾶσα γραφὴ θεόπνευστος, "Every Scripture breathed by God," is rendered "omnis Scriptura divinitus inspirata," and again when St. Peter, 2 Ep. i. 21, speaks of the prophets as ὑπὸ πνεύματος ἁγίου φερόμενοι, "moved by the Holy Ghost," the Latin has "spiritu sancto inspirati." Just as God is said in Genesis ii. 7, Wisdom xv. 11, to have breathed man's soul into his body; just as in Job xxxii. 8, the [1] Kirchengeschichte, ii. 655.

"inspiration of the Almighty" (inspiratio omnipotentis), is said to "give understanding," so the sacred writers are described as inspired because God breathed into them or, to drop the metaphor, suggested the thoughts which they wrote down. Inspiration, therefore, may be defined as a supernatural impulse by which God directed the authors of the canonical books to write down certain matter predetermined by Him. Inspiration is a grace gratis data—i.e. it was bestowed upon the writers for the edification of others, and like all graces it is specially attributed to God the Holy Ghost.

To a certain extent the Old Testament claims to be inspired. Thus the prophets constantly represent their own words as being in reality the oracles of God. Our Lord and his Apostles confirm this claim. Christ, for example, in Matt. xxii. 43, declares that David spoke "in the Spirit," while St. Peter, Acts i. 16, and St. Paul, Acts xxviii. 25, use similar language. Ecclesiastical writers, from the time when the New Testament canon was first recognised in the Church, speak in just the same way of the books which went to make it up. St. Irenæus regards ("Adv. Hær." iii. 14, 2) the influence of the Holy Ghost as extending to the least word in the gospels, for he maintains that the divine Spirit directed St. Matthew in i. 18 to write the "generation of Christ" instead of the "generation of Jesus." "The divine Scriptures," "the divine oracles," "the Scriptures of God," "the Scriptures of the Lord," are the usual phrases by which the Fathers express their belief in inspiration. The actual term apparently is of rare occurrence in the early ages. However, in the Acts of the Martyr Speratus (Bolland. 17 Jul. p. 214) we are told that when the proconsul asked him what the books were which Christians "read with adoration" (quos adoratis legentes), the saint replied that they were the four gospels, St. Paul's epistles, "and all the divinely inspired teaching" (omnem divinitus inspiratam doctrinam). In the "Symbol of Faith" which was approved by Leo IX., and which is still used in the consecration of bishops as a test of orthodox belief, God is affirmed to be the "one author" of the Old and New Testaments. The same words (unus auctor) are repeated in the definitions of Florence (Bull "Cantate Domino"), and of Trent (Sess. iv. Decret. de Can. Scr.). On the other hand the Vatican Council (cap. 2), comes nearer to the actual word "inspiration," for it defines that the Bible was written "Spiritu sancto inspirante."

Moreover, the same council to which we referred last made the idea of inspiration more precise and settled a question once debated among Catholics. The great Jesuit theologian Lessius,[1] a man who has many titles to respect, was charged with maintaining that a book might justly claim to be inspired, although it had been written by mere human industry, provided the Holy Ghost had afterwards declared by the mouth of the Church that the book in question was free from error. His enemies said he looked upon the second book of Machabæus as a possible instance of such a book, and Bonfrère in his "Præloquia" maintained that such a case was at least possible. The view was condemned by the chief theological faculties of the day, and surely with good reason, for how can we call a book inspired if the Holy Ghost had no special connection with its origin and merely approved it when already written? This theory is now distinctly proscribed. The Church, according to the Vatican Council (loc. cit.), does not count books canonical because they were written naturally and afterwards approved by her, or because they contain revelation without error, but because they were inspired in the first instance and as such were committed to the Church.

The common teaching of theologians helps us to understand the definitions which have just been given. They distinguish first of all between inspiration and the mere "assistentia" or assistance of the Holy Ghost, the latter conveying a merely negative, the latter a positive idea. General councils have the "assistentia" of the Holy Ghost because He protects them from error in their decrees, although the Pope in convoking the council and proposing to it the subjects, may have been guided only by the ordinary motives of faith and reason. Inspiration implies over and above this protection a special impulse of the Holy Ghost to write, and to write on particular subjects. Next, a clear line must be drawn between revelation and inspiration. God reveals to the soul truths which it did not know before, without necessarily prompting the recipient to commit the revelation to writing; an inspired author has received the impulse to write, and is directed from above in his work, but it is not necessary that any new truths should be communicated to him. There is no reason to suppose that the author of the book e.g. of Esther received any revelation.

[1] In a treatise by F. Kleutgen, appended to Schneemann's work on the Congregations de Auxiliis, it is clearly shown from the original documents in the archives of the Roman Jesuits that the doctrine of Lessius was misrepresented by his enemies at Louvain. He held that a book might be written by the impulse, but without the special assistance of the Holy Ghost, and then, if God testified that it was free from error, might have the authority of Holy Scripture. He did not suppose that the case had actually occurred. F. Kleutgen considers that there is still no definition of the Church which expressly excludes this view; at the same time he considers it erroneous, on the ground that God cannot reasonably be called the author of books, if He merely impelled the writers to compose them, and did not actually assist and direct them in doing so.

In an inspired book there are evidently two factors—the natural powers of the writer on this side, and the impulse and direction of the Holy Ghost on that. The Church has not decided where the one factor ceases and the other begins to operate. Holden, in his "Analysis Fidei" (1685), defended the extreme opinion that the Holy Ghost secured the writer from error only in matters of faith and morals. Others (and this opinion, which seems to find some support in the Fathers, found wide acceptance among the older Protestant theologians) have believed in what is known as "verbal inspiration;" they have argued as if the authors of the Biblical books were no more than scribes who wrote down the words which the Holy Ghost had dictated. If Holden's theory sins against the received teaching and tradition, most certainly that of verbal inspiration[1] as it has just been explained sins against the most patent facts. Evidently, the style and method of the sacred writers is coloured throughout by their own individuality, and the differences in thought and language between Isaias and Ezechiel are utterly inexplicable if we regard them as passive agents under a mechanical inspiration. St. Augustine in well-known words formulises the prevailing belief of the Church, without falling into the exaggerations of the theory that inspiration is mechanical. "To those books," he says, "which are already styled canonical, I have learned to pay such reverence and honour as most firmly to believe that none of their authors has committed any error in writing. If in that literature I meet with anything which seems contrary to truth, I will have no doubt that it is only the manuscript which is faulty, or the translator who has not hit the sense, or my own failure to understand." (Almost entirely from Kaulen, "Einleitung in die heilige Schrift." Part I. pp. 12 seq.).

[1] The Jesuit Kleutgen, in the treatise already referred to, cites some of the greatest theologians of the Church against the theory that the Holy Spirit dictated the material words to the sacred author. Thus he quotes Suarez, De Fide, disp. 5, § 3, n. 3, 5, who maintains it is enough to believe that the Holy Spirit "specially assisted him (the author of the inspired book, while writing) and kept him from all error and falsehood, and from all words which were not expedient." To the same effect Bellarmin's De Verbo Dei, lib. v. 15; Melchior Canus, De Loc. Theolog. lib. ii. cc 17 et 18.

INSTALLATION (Low Lat. stallum, a stall). The actual visible establishment (institutio corporalis) in the possession of an ecclesiastical dignity or benefice. In early times money often passed on such occasions; in one of the Novels Justinian forbids that any payment should be made on installation to the clergy of any church excepting only the great church at Constantinople. In another place he says that the custom, though intrinsically a bad one, is too firmly rooted to be destroyed; he therefore decrees that twenty pounds of gold may be paid on installation by the patriarch of any one of the five sees, Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, if the custom is to that effect, but no more. The sum to be paid by a metropolitan or a bishop he limits to 100 shillings for enthronisation, and 300 shillings given to notaries and other officials. In spite of his apparent zeal for purity of election, Justinian was the first emperor who exacted payment for confirming the election of the Roman pontiffs; this abuse was not removed till the time of Constantine Pogonatus.

It was afterwards settled by the canon law that the fees paid on installation, in any grade of orders, should never exceed one year's profits of the benefice conferred.

Installation, in the case of a bishop, is called enthronisation; it is the solemn entry into possession of his cathedral and episcopal residence on the part of the newly consecrated bishop, who wears all his pontifical insignia on the occasion. When a bishop is consecrated in his own church, the enthronisation becomes identified with the consecration; but when the latter rite has been performed in another diocese, then, "according to the ancient tradition, the bishop, dressed in the garb of a pilgrim, with his crosier in his hand, and the pastoral hat on his head, is received on arriving at the boundary of his diocese, by the chapter and clergy of the cathedral city and district; by them he is escorted to some neighbouring church, where, after a short prayer, he is presented with the episcopal ornaments and insignia, and then conducted in solemn procession to the sound of bells into his cathedral, where he is welcomed with the anthem Ecce sacerdos magnus and the Te Deum, while he takes his seat on his throne, from the raised dais of which he imparts to the assembled throng his episcopal benediction. After this he is escorted to his palace, the cross being borne before him." [1]

The installation of a canon is his solemn reception into a cathedral or collegiate chapter. In presence of the dignitaries and canons seated in the chapter-house the new titular, after being chorally vested, makes his profession of faith and takes the capitular oath. He is then admitted to his seat in chapter, and afterwards conducted into the church, and installed in his proper stall in the choir.

In the case of a simple parish priest the installation is usually effected by a delegate from the bishop, who admits the new incumbent both to the spiritual and temporal rights of his benefice. In some countries a commissary attends on the part of the civil government, and admits him with certain formalities into the possession of his temporals. Thomassin, "Vetus et Nova," &c., iii. 1, 56.

INSTITUTE OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN MARY. (Dames Anglaises, "English Ladies," or "English Virgins.") As this appears to be the only religious order of purely English origin founded since the Reformation, we propose to trace its history in some degree of detail, aided by a series of papers which appeared in the Catholic periodical the "Month." These papers are entitled "Passages from the Life of a Yorkshire Lady," and notify, while they partly anticipate, the publication of a forthcoming work on the saintly foundress of the "English Ladies." [1] Mary Ward, the eldest daughter of Marmaduke Ward, of Givendale, near Ripon, a gentleman of good estate and ancient lineage, was born in 1585. Her parents were steadfast Catholics, and dedicated the child to the Blessed Virgin from her cradle. Those were days in which the professors of the ancient faith were continually harassed, and in danger of death, under the operation of the penal laws; and it is not surprising to find the fervent child, who, there is reason to believe, never stained the grace of her baptism by mortal sin, growing up in the thought and with the burning desire of martyrdom. When she was about 15 or 16 years old, she began to long for the religious life. She was very beautiful, and projects were formed with a view to her marriage; many suitors sought her favour; but she resisted all solicitations, and with the assistance of Father Holtby, of the Society of Jesus, left England and her father's house in 1606, and passed over to St. Omer. We are told that "the description of the devotion of those of her sex abroad had drawn her to a foreign land." At first she entered the convent of Colettines at St. Omer, as a lay sister, and many duties of a kind for which she was little fitted were imposed upon her. In May or June 1607, with the advice of the novice-mistress, and after having experienced, while in prayer on St. Gregory's day, a strong inward impulse, prompting her to found a convent of the order for English women exclusively, Mary quitted the Colettine convent. With the help of her confessor, Father Roger Lee, and the good bishop Blaise, of St. Omer, she obtained access to the Archduke Albert and his wife Isabella, and obtained from them the grant of a vacant piece of ground at Gravelines, and permission to build a house of English Poor Clares upon it. Many English ladies (for the persecution at home at that time caused numbers of Englishwomen to seek freedom and security in Catholic countries) joined her, and the new community was begun at Christmas 1607, in a large hired house at St. Omer, pending the erection of a convent at Gravelines. Mary procured from the Duchess of Feria, a member of the English family of Dormer, a copy of the original rule of St. Clare. Against the wish of the bishop, who desired that Mary, having passed what was equivalent to a noviciate as a lay-sister among the Colettines, should be professed at once, the Superior of the new institute insisted on her commencing as a novice in the usual way. Mary readily complied, and conformed with joy to the strictest observances of the rule during the term of noviceship. However, on May 2, 1608, she received, while sitting at work, making "girdles of St. Francis," a sudden communication, as she believed it to be, the purport of which was that she "was not called to the order of St. Clare, but to another vocation and employment." Her confessor, when she made known to him what had happened within her, reproved her with some severity. Being, however, more and more convinced that she was called to another way, she left the Poor Clares in the spring of 1609, having first made a vow of perpetual chastity before her confessor, and also one of obedience to his directions. Her conduct drew upon her censure from many quarters, and she was for a long time in great perplexity, but her confidence in God never wavered. Gradually the conception of a teaching order, recruited from the ranks of her Catholic countrywomen, not cloistered, nor under obedience to any other order, but living under the rule of the Society of Jesus, and bound by terminable, not perpetual, vows, took form within her mind. She returned to England, and being joined by many postulants whom the force and purity of her character attracted to her, she founded the first community of the "English Virgins" at Spitalfields in 1611. A year or two later she returned to St. Omer, and there also succeeded in establishing a community. Before his death in 1616 Father Lee had come round to her views, and laboured effectually to procure the confirmation of her institute from Rome. A letter addressed to her by order of the Archduke in May 1613 sets forth the precise nature of her work. He says he has heard with pleasure that she and her companions are established at St. Omer, "where you receive and teach a number of young girls of your nation, in order that, after they have been well instructed in all that belongs to our holy faith, Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman, and carefully trained to virtue, they may be sent back to their parents, to be married and bring up their children in the fear of God, unless they prefer to stay in our countries and become religious." In 1616 a letter came from Rome signed by Cardinal Lancellotti, the president of the Sacred Congregation of the Council, recommending the new community to the care of Bishop Blaise, and speaking of the probability of a formal confirmation at a future day. In the years between 1613 and 1627 Mary paid several visits to England, during one of which she was arrested and imprisoned by order of Archbishop Abbott, who said that "she did more harm than six Jesuits." Details are wanting; we are only told that "sentence of death was passed upon her for religion, but that there was no execution, for fear of odium." Probably the Spanish Ambassador, Gondemar, who saved the lives of many English Catholics in this reign by menacing the despicable king with the anger of his master, interfered on her behalf; something is said also of a large bribe paid by her relations. In 1617 she opened a second house at Liège; and about the same time the Bishop of St. Omer wrote to Mary a "public letter of approval of the Institute, by which he constituted its members as religious." At Liège she was protected by Ferdinand, the Prince Bishop, who loved to hear the music in the church of the English Ladies, and sometimes said Mass for them. Pope Gregory XV. (1621–3) gave her permission to found houses of her Institute at Rome and in other Italian towns. In 1627 she established a house at Munich. Charges being brought against the purity of her faith, Urban VIII. ordered, in 1630, that she should be examined, and that her houses should be (provisionally) closed. Through the intercession of the good Maximilian, Elector of Bavaria, the nuns were still allowed to continue the common life, under certain restrictions. The result of the examination was favourable to her, and Mary succeeded in obtaining a decision from Rome that the bull of 1630 closing her houses should be regarded as tacitly abolished; but it was only in 1703, many years after her death (which happened in 1645), that the Institute was again formally confirmed by Clement XI. Since that time the succession in her community has never failed; and at this day, according to the "Month," her order is "a very flourishing religious institute, largely instrumental in the education of girls of all classes, in Bavaria, Hungary, Roumania, Italy, and other parts of the Continent," and is "commonly known as the institute of the 'English Virgins.'"

The noble and valiant foundress imprinted the seal of perpetuity even on the community which she abandoned. The English Poor Clares, after she left them, prospered greatly at Gravelines, and sent forth several filiations. In the French Revolution the nuns "had their full share of suffering, though they escaped the guillotine." Banished from France, they took refuge in England, and finally established themselves at Clare Abbey, near Darlington, "which now represents the Gravelines foundation and those of its three daughter-houses."

INTERCALARY YEAR. [See CALENDAR.]

INTERDICT. 1. The interdictum of a Roman prætor was a decree pronounced between two litigants, ordering, or (more commonly), forbidding something to be done. A banished man was also said to be interdicted from the use of fire and water in Italy (aqua et igne ei interdictum est). Something of each of these notions—e.g. the prohibition of saying Mass, and the interdiction of the guilty, and often of the innocent also, from approach to the sacraments—appears in the ecclesiastical interdict, which is defined to be "an ecclesiastical censure, by which persons are debarred from the use of certain sacraments, from all the divine offices, and from Christian burial."[1]

Interdicts are divided into local, personal, and mixed. In the first kind a place is interdicted, so that no divine office may be celebrated or heard in it, either by the inhabitants or by strangers. By the second kind persons are interdicted, so as to be debarred from using the sacraments or exercising the functions prohibited, in whatever place they may be. By the mixed kind both place and persons are directly interdicted—e.g. a city and its inhabitants. Again, each of the first two kinds may be either general or particular. A particular local interdict strikes a single locality—e.g. a church; a general one comprehends many localities, being pronounced against a kingdom, a province, or a city. A particular personal interdict strikes a single person; a general one of the same class is extended to a number of persons—e.g. to all the people in a province, all the members of a university, all the monks in a convent.

A general interdict of the clergy in a country does not touch the religious orders in that country unless it be so expressed, or unless the intention to include them can be clearly inferred from the circumstances, and the same holds good vice versâ. Nor does a general interdict of the clergy include bishops unless it be so expressed.

When a city is laid under an interdict its suburbs are understood to be included, even though they belong to a different diocese; otherwise the interdict might be rendered nugatory through the citizens being able to hear Mass, &c. in the suburban churches. In the same case the cathedral church no less than others is interdicted, and also the churches of regulars.

Interdicts are either imposed per modum pœnæ, as a punishment for a particular offence, in which case they last for a prescribed period, and then cease—or per modum censuræ, as a weapon to beat down contumacious resistance to the laws and discipline of the Church. In this last case they ordinarily last till the resistance ceases, and the offender makes amends, and are then relaxed.

Interdicts proceed either a jure, or ab homine, that is, either by operation of law or by the act of some one competent to impose them. Everyone who can excommunicate or suspend can also interdict, except the superiors of monasteries, both because their jurisdiction is not local but personal, and also because, if they had the power of interdicting, the effects of their action would extend to and damnify lay persons who are not in any sense their subjects (subditi).

The law declares persons or places interdicted in a great variety of cases. As instances may be given—hindrance of a Papal legate or nuncio from discharging his duty, in which case all the dominions of the prince or State so hindering are interdicted; the burial of a heretic, knowingly, in a church, in which case the church is interdicted; appeal from the Pope by any university chapter or college to a future general council, the result being the interdict of the offending corporation; and the illegal alienation of Church property by bishops or abbots.

In order that innocent persons might suffer as little as possible from the effects of an interdict the canon law gradually introduced mitigations. Baptism and confirmation might be administered to persons in danger of death; the sacrament of penance was opened to all but those guilty of having caused the interdict (who could not approach it before having made satisfaction); marriage might be celebrated, but without solemnities; ordinations might be made if there was a deficiency of priests; ecclesiastics who had observed the interdict might be buried in the churchyard, but in silence; one low Mass might be said every week, and High Mass might be sung on the five great festivals of Christmas, Easter, Whitsunday, Corpus Christi, and the Assumption, the persons guilty of the interdict being carefully excluded.

General interdicts are rarely mentioned in ecclesiastical history before the eleventh century, and for this three causes are assigned: 1. the comparatively stronger sense of religion in the Christian society of the earlier times, restraining a whole people from themselves falling into, or conniving at in their rulers, any notorious transgression; 2. the salutary dread of excommunication everywhere prevailing, so that that form of censure was sufficient of itself to restrain offenders; 3 the general readiness of temporal princes in those times to aid the Church in maintaining her discipline.

Non-catholic writers are prone to judge a Papal interdict according to the measure of what they deem its success. If the contumacy of the prince whom it strikes is overcome, the firmness and policy of the Pope are usually commended; but if, as has sometimes happened, it be not overcome, the inference drawn by such writers is that the increasing intelligence and civilisation of the age have deprived the "Papal thunders" of their terrors, and that the time has come for disowning and abandoning the use of them for evermore. Such language shows an ignorance of the deep foundations on which the interdict, with other Church censures, rests. Our Lord gave the power of binding, as of loosing, to his Apostles, and He has never withdrawn it. But Jesus Christ did not tell them that whatever they should "bind on earth" should also be punished on earth, but that it should be "bound also in heaven." Through the dwindling of faith and the decay of virtue a people may sink so low as to countenance its rulers in resisting the Church; the rulers themselves may be atheists and disregard ecclesiastical censures; and all this may pass with apparent impunity. What then? If the interdict or other censure be just, there is no real impunity; the sin of the offender is "retained" in heaven as the priest has retained it on earth, and if he make not amends in this life he will have to make all the more amends in the next. Nevertheless the Church has with good reason suspended for a long time past the proclamation of these general censures; lest, if the contumacious were to contemn them with impunity, and so gain an apparent triumph, the faith of the common people, already weak and assailed from many quarters, might be still more shaken and impaired

2. In canon law the term interdict is also used of a judicial order, in the sense familiar to the civil law, from which the threefold distinction into interdicts for restoring, obtaining, and retaining, and numerous other provisions are also borrowed. (Ferraris, Interdicta, Interdictum.)

INTERSTICES (interstitia). The intervals which canon-law requires between the reception of the various degrees of orders. The Council of Trent recommends that even minor orders be conferred at intervals, so that the candidate should have time to perfect himself in the theory and practice of each, before proceeding to the next; this, however, it leaves to the discretion of the bishops. After taking the last grade of minor orders, the Council requires the interval of a year before the candidate proceeds to the sub-diaconate, "unless necessity or the good of the Church should in the bishop's judgment dictate a different course." With the like salvo, it is provided that a full year must elapse between the sub-diaconate and the diaconate, and the same period between the diaconate and the priesthood. This full year need not be the solar year of 365 days, but may be the ecclesiastical year, as from one Lent to another, or from one Pentecost to another. A bishop cannot dispense with the interstices in ordaining candidates coming to him from another diocese, unless in their dimissorial letters [DIMISSORIALS] this privilege is allowed them. The members of religious orders can be ordained in many cases by virtue of special concessions obtained from the Holy See, without observing the interstices; this is notably the case with regard to the Society of Jesus. The non-observance of the interstices, on the part both of the ordinans and the ordinand, is a sin; but no penalty is affixed to it in the law. (Ferraris, Interstitia.)

INTROIT. Words said in the Mass when the priest has finished the Confiteor and has ascended the altar. Le Brun and Benedict XIV. attribute the introduction of introits to Gregory the Great. The name refers either to the fact that it is said at the beginning or "entrance" of the Mass, or else to the practice of having the introit sung by the choir as the priest "entered to" the altar.

The introit consists of an antiphon, Gloria Patri, and usually of a psalm, which it was once the custom to sing entire. But some introits, called by Durandus irregular, are taken from other parts of Scripture. Such are the Puer natus, on Christmas day, Spiritus Domini, on Pentecost, Viri Galilæi, on the Ascension. Some few in our present Missal give verses from uninspired writers. Such are the Salve Sancta Parens, Gaudeamus omnes in Domino, Benedicta sit Sancta Trinitas. On Whit Sunday the verse of the introit is taken from the fourth (apocryphal) book of Esdras. The version of Scripture used in the introits is usually the Old Latin, not the Vulgate.

The word for introit in the Ambrosian Mass is Ingressa, in the Mozarabic, Carthusian, Dominican, Carmelite Missals it is called Officium.

INVITATORIUM. (Invitatory Psalm.) The invitatory psalm, i.e. Ps. 94, "Come let us rejoice before the Lord," is said at the beginning of Matins on all days except the Epiphany and the last three days of Holy Week. The invitatorium has an antiphon, the whole of which is repeated six times, and the half three times, in the recitation of the psalm. The recital of the invitatory psalm at the beginning of the divine office is prescribed in the rule of St. Benedict. Amalarius (anno 822) tells us that in his time the invitatory was used by the Romans in the dominical but not in the ferial office, so that the present practice on the three last days of Holy Week is a relic of the ancient use. The invitatory psalm, with its antiphon, is omitted on the Feast of the Epiphany simply because Ps. 94 occurs in the third nocturn. Mystical reasons, e.g. detestation of Herod's calling together the scribes, and again because the Magi came to adore Christ without invitation, are suggested by mediæval writers.

IRISH CHURCH. In the fifth century Ireland was divided, as it was for centuries afterwards, into several small kingdoms. Some unknown preachers must have found their way into the country even before the mission of Palladius, and converted some of the natives to the faith of Christ, for St. Prosper in his chronicle (published about 434), writes that Palladius was sent by Pope Celestine in 431 "ad Scotos in Christum credentes," to the Scots believing in Christ. The terms Scotia and Scots originally belonged to Ireland and the Irish. This mission of Palladius, who was deacon of the Roman Church, did not last long, and bore little fruit. So much we learn from the Book of Armagh (written before 700), with the additional fact that Palladius died in Britain on his return from Ireland.

The general conversion of the Irish nation was reserved for St. Patrick, who was probably born at the place now called Kilpatrick on the Clyde,[1] whence he was carried as a slave into the north of Ireland while still a youth. The degradation and darkness of the inhabitants profoundly impressed his pure and generous heart, and from the time when he regained his liberty, at the age of twenty-one, he devoted himself to the divine service, and the task of spreading the doctrines of salvation. After going through a course of study at Marmoutier and Lerins, he repaired to Rome. We next hear of him as accompanying St. Germanus and St. Lupus on their anti-Pelagian mission to Britain. Being selected by St. Germanus to preach the faith in Ireland, he went first—if we may accept the testimony of Probus[2]—to Rome to obtain the apostolic blessing. Celestine dying soon after, Patrick left Rome and journeyed towards Ireland. Hearing on his way of the death of Palladius, he went to St. Amatorex, who ordained him bishop. Landing in Ireland in 432, he attended the assembly of the Irish kings and chieftains held on the hill of Tara in that year. His reception was not very encouraging; however, he converted several, and among others the father of St. Benignus, his immediate successor in the see of Armagh.

St. Patrick fixed his principal residence at Armagh, which became the primatial see of the island. In the course of his long career, extending beyond sixty years, he visited and converted the greater part of Ireland, and established bishoprics in all the provinces. Among his chief

[1] Dr. Moran, Bishop of Ossory, who formerly leant to the opinion that the place was near Boulogne in France, has lately written convincingly in favour of the Scottish site.

[2] Probus wrote a Life of St. Patrick in the tenth century; see O'Curry's Materials of Ancient Irish History.

companions and assistants were Auxilius, Isserninus, and Secundinus. The Irish people received the gospel with extraordinary readiness. St. Patrick left few writings behind him; his "Confession," a kind of autobiography, is his chief work. We have also his circular letter against Coroticus, and the canons of a synod which he held with Auxilius and Isserninus, about 453, to regulate Church discipline. In his "Confession" he does not mention the Pope or the Holy See, and Beda, in his "Ecclesiastical History," is silent about St. Patrick's mission. Hence Protestant writers have inferred that he had no mission from Rome, and preached a Christianity of his own, distinct from that of the Popes; in short, that he was a kind of Protestant. This hypothesis has been exploded by Dr. Lanigan, Bishop Moran, and others, who show that although St. Patrick, having a special object in view when he wrote the "Confession," says nothing in it about Rome, yet the history of the early Irish Church is unintelligible unless we assume a close and filial relation to the Holy See to have existed from the first. Within a century after St. Patrick, St. Columbanus, the great Irish missionary of the sixth century, said to the Pope, "The Catholic faith is held unshaken by us, as it was delivered to us by you, the successors of the holy Apostles."[1] Another theory was put forward by the learned Usher, the Protestant Archbishop of Armagh; it was that Ireland did not owe her Christianity to Rome, nor even to St. Patrick, since she already possessed a hierarchy at the time when the saint arrived. But when the names of the bishops supposed to have belonged to this hierarchy—Ailbe, Declan, Ibar, Kieran, &c.—came to be examined, Dr. Lanigan was able to prove that they were all posterior in date to St. Patrick.[2]

With respect to Beda, although it is true that he does not mention St. Patrick in his Ecclesiastical History, the circumstance—singular as it must be admitted to be—may perhaps be explained on the ground that he chose to confine himself strictly to the religious concerns of the Angles and Saxons. It is impossible to infer from it that Beda passed over the conversion of Ireland in silence, because he, a zealous adherent of Rome, disapproved of a work effected independently of Rome. Had he so felt, he would have studiously avoided speaking of St. Patrick in his other writings, as well as in his history. But the fact is that in both his "Martyrologies," Beda does give the name of St. Patrick. In the prose one, under March 17, he says, "In Scotia, the birthday of the holy Patricius, bishop and confessor, who first in that country preached the gospel of Christ." In his metrical martyrology, under the same day, he says, "Patricius, the servant of the Lord, mounted to the heavenly court."

The death of the apostle of Ireland occurred in 493. The present sketch of the history of the Church in Ireland from that time to our own day will be divided into three periods: 1, that of sanctity, learning, and missionary energy (493–800); 2, that of invasions and usurpation, (800–1530); 3, that of persecution (1530–1829). The period commencing at the last-named date will be regarded by our descendants, if present appearances may be trusted, as an era of restoration.

I. The Irish saints are divided by the national hagiographers into three classes. In the first, which consists of those of the earliest Christian age down to about 530, the principal figures are those of St. Patrick himself, St. Brigid of Kildare, St. Ibar, St. Declan, and St. Kieran. The second class, from 530 to 600, contains St. Coemgen or Kevin, the two Brendans, Jarlath of Tuam, and the great St. Columba or Columbkill. The third class, whose period is from 600 to about 660, contains St. Maidoc, the first Bishop of Ferns; St. Colman of Lindisfarne, Ultan, Fursey, &c. The first class, in the words of the ancient authority quoted by Dr. Lanigan,[1] "blazes like the sun, the second like the moon, the third like the stars . . . the first most holy, the second very holy, the third holy."

That learning, in all the branches then known, was eagerly followed by Irish students from the time of the conversion, is a fact of which there is abundant evidence. A copious literature sprang up, consisting of monastic rules, tracts on ritual and discipline, homilies, prayers, hymns, genealogies, martyrologies in prose and verse, and lives of saints. This literature, as was to be expected, was partly composed in the vernacular and partly in Latin; but the bulk of it was in the Gaelic. The extant remains are still considerable; that they are not yet more copious is explained by Professor O'Curry in a remarkable passage, which will be cited in a different connection further on.

The English Beda bears ungrudging testimony to the high character of the Irish missionaries who had laboured in Northumbria, and to the general belief in the excellence of the Irish schools. "The whole solicitude of those teachers," he says, "was to serve God, not the world; their one thought was how to train the heart, not how to satisfy the appetite."[1] The special excellence of the Irish schools was the interpretation of Scripture; thus, about 650, Agilbert, a French bishop, resided a long time in Ireland "for the sake of reading the Scriptures."[2] Some years later (664) it became a common practice with the Northumbrian thanes to visit Ireland, either with a view to greater advance in the spiritual life, or for the sake of biblical knowledge, "divinæ lectionis." These last would go from place to place, attending the cells of the different masters; and so generous were the natives, that they provided for them all "their daily food free of cost, books also to read, and gratuitous teaching."[3]

The missionary energy of the Irish Church, commencing with a little island off the coast of Mull, which it made a basis for further operations, ended by embracing France, Switzerland, and Italy within the scope of its charity. St. Columba, of whom Montalembert in his "Monks of the West" has given to the world a graphic portraiture, founded the monastery of Hy or Iona in 563, chiefly with a view to the conversion of the Picts dwelling in the north of Scotland. For more than 230 years Iona continued to flourish, and was a centre of pure religion, education, art, and literature to all the surrounding countries. Here, as in a "sacred storehouse,"[4] rest the bones of not a few Irish, Scottish, and Norwegian kings. It was devastated by the Danes in 795, and the monks were dispersed a few years later. From Iona the monk Aidan, at the invitation of king Oswald, came into Northumbria, the Angles of which were still mostly Pagans, and founded in 633 a monastery on the isle of Lindisfarne, of which he became the first bishop. To him and his successors the conversion of the northern English was chiefly due. Lindisfarne in its turn became a great school of sacred learning and art, and its bishopric ultimately grew into the palatine see of Durham. In East Anglia the Irish St. Fursey assisted Felix the Burgundian in the conversion of the natives; in Wessex the Irish Maidulf founded the great convent of Malmesbury. In the sixth and seventh centuries Irish missionaries were active in France: Fridolin restored religion at Poictiers, and recovered the relics of St. Hilary; St. Fursey founded a monastery at Lagny; St. Fiacre settled at Paris; and Columbanus founded in Burgundy the historic monastery of Luxeuil. In Switzerland the name of the town and canton of St. Gall perpetuates the memory of an Irish anchorite, who in 613 planted a cross near a spring in the heart of a dense forest, south of the lake of Constance, and by despising the world drew the world to him. Bobbio, in Italy, was the last foundation and resting-place of St. Columbanus. In Germany, the Irish Fridolin, the hero of many a tender Volkslied and wild legend, was probably the first apostle of the Alemanni in Baden and Suabia.[1]

The well-known controversy respecting the right observation of Easter, which raged in the seventh and eighth centuries between those who had received a Roman and an Irish training respectively, turned on the fact that the Irish Church, from its isolation in the far west, and the difficulties of communication with the centre of unity, had fallen somewhat behindhand in ecclesiastical science, and not adopted the improved methods of calculation which had come into force in Latin Christendom generally.[2] After there had been time for a full discussion and comparison of views, the Irish gradually came round to the better practice. At a synod held at Old Leighlin, in 630, a letter having come from Honorius I., the Roman cycle and rules for computing Easter were adopted in all the south of Ireland.[3] At Iona and in the north of Ireland the necessary change was deferred for many years. Adamnan, Abbot of Hy, laboured hard between 701 and 704 to introduce the Roman Easter, and met with considerable success. But the decisive adoption of it at Hy is said to have been due to the persuasions of St. Egbert, about 716.[1]

[2] The erroneous practice was not that of the Quartodecimans [EASTER, CYCLE], for the Irish always waited for Sunday before celebrating the feast; it consisted in keeping Easter from the fourteenth to the twentieth day of the first month, instead of from the fifteenth to the twenty-first; the consequence being that when Sunday fell on the fourteenth, Easter began to be kept on the evening of the thirteenth day, that is before the occurrence of the Paschal full moon.

II. Period of Invasions.—The Danes (called "Ostmen" by the Irish), appeared on the Irish coasts about the end of the eighth century. Wherever they came, they desecrated churches, burnt monasteries, destroyed books, pictures, and sculptures; murdered priests, monks, and poets. To the ferocity of the wild beast they joined the persevering energy of the Teuton; their arms were better than those of the Irish, and perhaps they had more skill in handling them. Confusion and lamentation were soon in every part of the island. Men, after a while, seeing the continued success of these odious Pagans, began to doubt of Providence, and to grow slack in faith. Sauve qui peut became the general feeling, and the generosity towards the Church of the converts of the age of St. Patrick underwent a selfish but not unnatural reaction in their descendants. "When foreign invasion and war had cooled down the fervid devotion of the native chiefs, and had distracted and broken up the long-established reciprocity of good offices between the Church and the State, as well as the central executive controlling power of the nation, the chief and the noble began to feel that the lands which he himself or his ancestors had offered to the Church, might now, with little impropriety, be taken back by him, to be applied to his own purposes, quieting his conscience by the necessity of the case."[2] The beautiful Glendalough, founded by St. Kevin about 549, being near the sea, was peculiarly exposed to Danish assault; but not one of the principal monasteries—Armagh, Kildare, Clonmacnoise, Slane, &c.—escaped destruction at one time or other. Dublin—of which the Irish name is "Ath-cliath"—became a Danish city. From time to time the invaders were heavily defeated—as in the battle of Clontarf (1014) when the victorious Brian Boru fell in the hour of victory. Gradually they adopted Christianity, lost their national language, and were blended with the natives, never having, as in England, succeeded in subjecting the whole island to their rule.

In the course of the twelfth century, the power of the O'Neils of Ulster, who had for a long period been over-lords of the whole of Ireland, declined, and the O'Connors of Connaught attempted to take their place. But it was a weak and wavering sovereignty, and the kings of the five petty kingdoms were continually plotting, combining, and making war one against another. A state of general insecurity and lawlessness was the natural result; and though the faith of the people remained intact, moral disorder in every form was rampant, and the discipline of the Church was often set at nought. The clergy, probably for the sake of greater stability and safety, tended to cluster together under some monastic rule; and the laity, abandoned to themselves, fell a prey to gross superstitions and excesses. The Popes, by sending legates, and writing admonitory letters from time to time, attempted to reform the state of society. In the first half of the twelfth century a powerful influence for good was exerted by the admirable sanctity of St. Malachy, who died at Clairvaux under the eyes of St. Bernard, in 1148, and whose life was written by his great friend. The state of things at Armagh, when Malachy was elected to the primacy in 1125, is a good illustration of the disorder which pervaded the Irish Church. A certain powerful family had for more than two hundred years claimed the primatial chair as a hereditary possession; for fifteen generations they had made good their claim; and of these fifteen occupants of the see only six were in holy orders, the rest being married laymen, who, though they did not presume to exercise the episcopal functions, enjoyed the title and emoluments of the bishopric.[1] Celsus, the last of the series, being a good man, procured the election of St. Malachy as his successor; but the family resented this intrusion on their "rights," and presented to the see one of themselves, Murchadh by name, upon the death of Celsus. For the sake of peace, St. Malachy waited five years before entering Armagh; on the death of Murchadh, in 1133, he was peaceably installed. In 1138 the saint visited Rome, where the Pope, Innocent II., received him with the highest honour, and appointed him his legate in Ireland. His zeal, but still more his saintly example, effected a salutary change in the northern parts of Ireland, where, having obtained leave to resign the primacy, he spent the last ten years of his life as bishop of the small see of Down.

At the beginning of his reign, Henry II. had obtained the approbation of Pope Adrian IV., an Englishman, for his project of entering Ireland, ostensibly with a view to extirpating vice and ignorance among the natives, and attaching the island more closely to the see of St. Peter. Of this bull Henry made no use for many years, and the actual invasion of Ireland by Strongbow and other Norman knights was in a manner accidental. For several generations things went on much as before; the English power was confined to the "Pale," or strip of country on the eastern coast; in the rest of Ireland the native princes, though they often recognised an ill-defined over-lordship in the English kings, reigned practically after their own fashion. Outside the Pale, Brehon, not feudal law prevailed. One benefit, at least, resulted: the Normans were great builders; and noble churches of stone soon covered the land. It is true that in this reform they were preceded by St. Malachy, who had built a church of stone at Bangor, near Carrickfergus, to the great amazement of the natives, who had, till then, seen only their own ingeniously constructed edifices of timber and wickerwork.

Three great Irish synods were held in the twelfth century. At the first, that of Kells (1152), at which a Roman cardinal presided, the metropolitan dignity of the three sees of Cashel,[1] Dublin, and Tuam was solemnly recognised; but the primacy over the whole island was still reserved to Armagh. At the second, that of Cashel (1172), held immediately after the invasion, Church property was declared to be exempt from the exactions of the chieftains, the regular payment of tithes was enjoined, and it was ordered that all matters of ritual should be arranged in future "agreeably to the observance of the Church of England"—in other words, according to Roman usage. The third synod, that of Dublin (1186), passed several canons of ritual; it is chiefly noted for a sermon, preached before it by Gerald de Barri, or Cambrensis, in which, while praising the orthodoxy and the continency of the Irish clergy, he lamented that too many of them were addicted to intemperance.

Many of the English and Normans who settled in Ireland after the invasion adopted by degrees the dress, customs, and laws of the natives, and became no less intractable than they in their attitude towards the English government. An effort was made to stop this process by the Statute of Kilkenny (1367), which made it treasonable for those of English descent to marry, or enter into the relation of fosterage, or contract spiritual affinity with the natives; and forbade to the same class, on pain of forfeiture of property, the adoption of an Irish name, or the use of the Irish language, dress, or customs. But this statute was to a great extent inoperative, and from the date of its enactment to the time of Henry VIII. there were two parties in continual opposition to the government, the "English rebels," and the "Irish enemies." The demarcation between English and Irish which the civil government thus did its utmost to maintain, was partially introduced, and with the most unhappy results, into the administration of Church affairs. In the counties of the Pale it was scarcely possible for an ecclesiastic of Irish race to obtain preferment. The invasion by the Scots under Edward Bruce in 1315, though ultimately defeated, caused great confusion, and called forth during its continuance many tokens of sympathy from the Irish clergy. This, says Mr. Malone, was made a pretext for "throwing off the mask,"[1] and under colour of disloyalty Irishmen were excluded from all the higher dignities and benefices. Yet it would appear that this exclusion could not have extended much beyond the Pale; for if we examine the lists of bishops occupying the Irish sees in 1350, we find that out of thirty-three names, eighteen are certainly Irish, thirteen English, while two may be doubtful. All through this time of confusion and disunion a strong religious feeling was abroad, animating the men of both races alike, and directing them to common objects. In the thirteenth century we hear of 170 monasteries being founded; about 55 in the fourteenth; and about 60 in the fifteenth. Two unsuccessful attempts were made to found universities: one at Dublin (1320) by Archbishop Bicknor; the other at Drogheda, by the Parliament which sat there in 1465.

III. Period of Persecution. By the aid of Brown, the Archbishop of Dublin, an Englishman, who had embraced the Lutheran opinions, Henry VIII. had some success in imposing his doctrine of the royal supremacy on the Irish clergy. Under Mary all progress in this direction was reversed. Soon after the accession of Elizabeth, in 1560, a packed Parliament was convened at Dublin which passed an Act of Uniformity, declaring the royal supremacy over the Church, and imposing the Protestant Prayer-book. By many Protestant writers[1] it has been maintained that the bishops, with the exception of two, either approved of, or acquiesced in the new order of things, and that the people for many years frequented the churches where the English service was performed. The falsehood of all such statements has been exposed by the Bishop of Ossory.[2] The real state of the case appears to have been this. The Archbishop of Dublin, Curwin, conformed to Protestantism, and O'Fihel, Bishop of Leighlin, did the same. The conduct of four bishops (Ossory, Ferns, Cork, and Clonfert) is more or less suspicious. The remainder of the Irish hierarchy, viz. the Archbishops of Cashel and Tuam (the see of Armagh was vacant), two bishops holding sees in the Pale (who were deprived by the government), and sixteen other bishops of suffragan sees, remained faithful to their canonical obligations. As these bishops died, or as, in the course of the Elizabethan wars, the government was able to consolidate its power in the remoter parts of Ireland, the cathedrals, Church lands, and other Church property were made over to Protestant bishops and ministers appointed under the Act of Uniformity. The Catholic Bishop of Kilmore, Richard Brady, was expelled from the see so late as 1585. The Holy See did all that it could to support the oppressed Church of Ireland, and animate the clergy to meet their sufferings with an unbending fortitude. A nuncio was sent to reside at Limerick, money and arms were liberally provided, the intervention of Spain solicited, and Irish ecclesiastics visiting Rome welcomed and assisted. Except in the case of Dublin, the seat of the Anglo-Irish government, where the see was left vacant for many years from the absolute impossibility of any prelate residing there in safety, the successions of bishops in all the Irish sees appear to have been regularly maintained through all the period of persecution.

[1] Cashel was already regarded as a metropolitan see as early as 1111, and its bishops exerted corresponding powers to some extent; in 1140 it was formally recognized as such by Innocent II. at the request of St. Malachy (Lanigan, iv. 20).

The cause of learning, to which the Irish Church had been ever devoted, could not but suffer in this prolonged conflict. Before the change of religion in England there had been some encouraging signs of progress in the reconciliation of the races through the influence of a common interest in intellectual pursuits. Among the distinguished Oxford students of the first thirty years of the sixteenth century, a considerable proportion were Irishmen,[1] and it is impossible to doubt that had peace and religious unity been preserved, this resort to the English universities would have gone on increasing until it bore its natural fruit in the establishment of a great university on Irish soil. The change of religion in England cut off the supply of Irish students; Catholicism became a persecuted creed; and the effect on learning—its professors, seats, implements, and productions—may be understood from the following vigorous passage. "From about the year 1530, in the reign of the English king Henry VIII., to the year 1793, the priests of Ireland were ever subject to persecution, suppression, dispersion, and expatriation, according to the English law; their churches, monasteries, convents, and private habitations were pillaged and wrested from them; and a Vandal warfare was kept up against all that was venerable and sacred of the remains of ancient literature and art which they possessed. When, therefore, we make search for the once extensive monuments of learning which the ecclesiastical libraries contained of old, we must remember that this shocking system continued for near 300 years; and that during all that long period the clergy—the natural repositories of all the documents which belonged to the history of the Church—were kept in a continual state of insecurity and transition, often compelled to resort to the continent for education, often forced to quit their homes and churches at a moment's notice, and fly for their lives, in the first instance to the thorny depths of the nearest forest or the damp shelter of some dreary cavern, until such time, if ever it should come, as they could steal away to the hospitable shores of some Christian land on the continent of Europe." [1]

Under James I. and Charles I., the Catholic clergy having been now stripped of all their property, and the laity of a considerable portion of theirs, some toleration was extended by the government to Catholic worship. The terrible rising of 1641 was the commencement of a war of eleven years, ending with the surrender of Galway in 1652. Innocent X. sent the Archbishop of Fermo (Rinuccini) as his nuncio to Ireland in the autumn of 1645, with considerable supplies of arms and money. Unfortunately dissension arose in the national ranks; a moderate section of the clergy, with most of the Catholic gentry and laity, were for aiding the King against the Parliament, and not exacting from him very stringent conditions; but the bulk of the population, supported by the nuncio and the inferior clergy, were for turning the war into a struggle for complete religious freedom and national independence. Cromwell transported his victorious army to Ireland in 1649, and by several successful sieges, followed by bloody military executions, broke the strength of the resistance. The conquest of the island was completed by his lieutenants. The sufferings of the Irish clergy during, and still more after, the war were indescribable. Bishop O'Brien of Emly was executed by Ireton's order (1651) after the fall of Limerick. Bishop Egan of Ross was murdered by Ludlow's soldiers in 1650. In the same year Bishop McMahon of Clogher, being in command of a body of Irish troops, fell into the hands of the Puritans, and, though quarter had been promised, was hanged. A letter of Dr. Burgatt, afterwards Archbishop of Cashel, written in 1667, says that in the persecution begun by Cromwell "more than 300 [clergy] were put to death by the sword or on the scaffold . . . ; more than 1000 were sent into exile, and among these all the surviving bishops," except the Bishop of Kilmore, who was too old to move.[2] The Puritan soldiers put every priest to death whom they fell in with; and yet so close a tie of affection bound the clergy to their native land and their people, that even in 1658, about the worst time of all, there were upwards of 150 priests in each province.[3] The regular clergy were no better off; the Acts of the General Chapter of the Dominican Order held at Rome in 1656, mention that out of 600 friars who were in the island in 1646 not a fourth part were left, and of forty-three convents of the order, not one remained standing.[1] All these horrors the Puritans pretended to justify, as done in retaliation for the massacre of Protestants in 1641. That a great number of persons were cruelly put to death at the time of that rising is undeniable: but, as Lingard points out, [2] the main object pursued was not the murder of Protestants, but the recovery of the confiscated lands. He significantly adds, "That they [the Irish] suffered as much as they inflicted cannot be doubted."

The exiles, both priests and laity, were cast on the French coast in a state of such utter destitution, that, but for prompt and ample relief, many must have perished. Happily, a saint was at hand to help them. St. Vincent of Paul, filled with compassion for these victims of war and fanaticism, collected money and clothing for them, and provided them all with homes and shelter; he even sent considerable supplies to Ireland.[3] The Bishop of Ossory also gives detailed proof of the unwearied solicitude of the Holy See, for many years after the Cromwellian invasion, in procuring succours of every kind for the Irish Catholics, and itself aiding them with money to the utmost of its power.[4]

The Act of Settlement (1660) legalised the Cromwellian spoliations; but the Catholic worship was tolerated all through the reign of Charles II. At the Revolution, the Irish espoused the cause of their king, who, whatever quarrel the English might have with him, had done Ireland no wrong. Neither the letter nor the spirit of the constitution enjoined that the Irish Parliament and people should change their king whenever it might suit the English people to change theirs. But, in the absence of effectual aid from abroad, the superior resources of the stronger nation crushed the resistance of the weaker; and a period commenced for the Irish

[4] About 1688, 72,000 francs a year were supplied by Rome for the support of the Irish secular clergy and laity. In 1699 the Pope sent to James II., at St. Germain's, 58,000 francs for the Irish ecclesiastics exiled that year. From about 1750 to 1800 the Popes sent the Irish bishops a hundred Roman crowns a year in aid of Catholic poor schools.

Church and people sadder than any that had preceded it. The writings of Burke, and —among recent publications—Mr. Lecky's "History of the Eighteenth Century," paint in detail the picture of Ireland ruined and outraged by the penal laws. Whatever iniquitous law and crafty administration could devise to destroy the faith of the people was tried during the gloomy century which began at the Revolution, but all to no effect. The ill-success of the American war compelled the English government to propose the first relaxation of the penal laws in 1778. From that time the Irish Church has been step by step regaining portions and fragments of the rights of which she was deprived in the sixteenth century. The Protestant Church was disestablished in 1869. The last twenty years have seen the island covered with beautiful religious edifices—cathedrals, parish churches, convents, colleges, &c. Of such a people it may be justly said, "In much experience of tribulation they have had abundance of joy, and their very deep poverty hath abounded unto the riches of their simplicity."[1]

IRISH COLLEGE. The munificent Pontiff to whom the English College owed its foundation—Gregory XIII.—contemplated a similar institution for Ireland; but on mature consideration he judged that whatever portion of the Papal revenues could be spared to aid that injured people would be better spent in sending them money and arms, at a time when they were engaged in a deadly struggle with their English oppressors, than in any other way. His original desire was, however, carried out by his nephew the Cardinal Ludovico Ludovisio, who in 1628 founded a college near the Piazza Barberini for the instruction of Irish theological students, who were afterwards to return to their own land, and do their best to keep alive the flame of religion among their persecuted countrymen. The celebrated Irish Franciscan Fr. Luke Wadding, the historian of his order, was the first rector of the college, which opened with six students, and a dotation of fifty scudi per month. Cardinal Ludovisio by his will bequeathed to it a large vineyard at Castel Gandolfo, and a thousand scudi of annual rent; he further directed that its management should be transferred to the hands of the Society of Jesus. A permanent site for the college was found near the convent of the Dominican nuns of the Annunziata. The students attended lectures at the Collegio Romano [ROMAN COLLEGE].

The college remained under Jesuit management till 1773, when the order was suppressed; from that time to the date of the French invasion—when it shared in the general ruin which fell on all the Roman colleges—it was governed by an Irish rector assisted by three or four secular priests of that nation. In 1826 it was restored by Leo XII. who placed it in a suitable building near the church of S. Lucia de' Ginnasi, with Mgr. Blake for its first rector. Soon afterwards it was arranged that the Cardinal Prefect of Propaganda pro tem. should always be the protector of the college. Card. Cappellari, afterwards Gregory XVI., who thus became their protector, conceived a singular affection for this Irish community and loaded it with favours. In 1836 he paid a formal visit to the college, while Paul Cullen, afterwards Cardinal Archbishop of Dublin, was rector; and in the same year he made over to it the monastery and church of S. Agata alla Suburra. As another proof of his regard, he granted to the students the privilege of carrying in the annual procession of Corpus Christi the staves of the baldacchino under which the Pope carries the Blessed Sacrament, from the end of the colonnade in the piazza of St. Peter's to the great gate of the Accoramboni palace.

ITE MISSA EST. The meaning of the word Missa is discussed under Mass. Here it may suffice to say, that after the Gospel the catechumens were dismissed by the deacon with the words, Ite Missa est; Go, you are dismissed, literally "a dismissal is made;" and that the same formula was repeated at the end of the whole Mass. In the liturgies of St. James, St. Basil, and St. Chrysostom, we find the form "Let us go in the peace of Christ," the people answering "In the name of the Lord." "Benedicamus Domino" is substituted in Masses of ferias and Sundays in the penitential seasons, "Requiescant in pace" in Masses of the dead, because these Masses were followed by penitential prayers, and by the absolution at the tomb, for which the people waited. (Benedict XIV., "De Miss." Hefele, "Beiträge.")

ITINERARY (Itinerarium). A form of prayer consisting of the canticle Benedictus, with an antiphon, "preces," and two collects, intended for the use of clerics when setting out on a journey, and placed for their convenience at the end of the Breviary. The collects are found in the Gregorian Sacramentary. The itinerary is not inserted in the older Breviaries. But Gavantus refers to an ancient Pontifical which contains an itinerary for prelates rather longer than ours but very similar. (Gavant. tom. 11, § 69, cap. 6).

JACOBINS. The Dominicans had before the Revolution three convents in Paris, of which the chief was that of St. James (Lat. Jacobus), in the Rue St. Jacques. This was considered the principal house of their order in France, and from it French preaching friars were called Jacobins. The second of their houses at Paris was in the Rue St. Honoré, between the church of St. Roch and the Place Vendôme; before the Revolution it had a noviciate and a library of thirty-two thousand volumes. The Club Breton, containing the ablest and most dangerous men in the National Assembly, began to hold its sittings in the library of the convent in the Rue St. Honoré in 1789; hence their name was soon changed to Club Jacobin. Later on, the church was used as a place of meeting, and many of the worst infamies and atrocities of the Revolution were there debated and decided on.

JACOBITE CHRISTIANS. A name given to the Monophysites in Mesopotamia, Syria, Kurdistan, and East India, who are subject to the heretical Patriarch of Antioch. In 1850 they were said to number about 80,000.

They call themselves Surigani, or Syrian Christians; the name Jacobite, by which they are commonly known, is derived from Jacob or James, a monk of Phasilta near Nisibis, and a disciple of the Monophysite Severus of Antioch. This monk, who was zealous in resisting the authority of the Fourth General Council held at Chalcedon, and in denying the two natures in Christ, was ordained Metropolitan of Edessa by heretical bishops, and with the consent of Severus. When Severus died, in 539, James consecrated his successor, and so the line of Monophysite Patriarchs of Antioch has been continued to this day. In 736 the Jacobites entered into communion with the Armenians, who also deny that there are two natures in Christ, but the peace between the two sects did not last long. On the other hand, the Jacobites, although a distinct and independent body, are in communion with the Monophysite Copts of Egypt.

The Jacobite clergy are divided into singers, readers, sub-deacons, deacons, archdeacons, priests, chorepiscopi, periodeutai, bishops, metropolitans, and patriarch; but of these the archdeacon, chorepiscopus, and periodeutes are merely nominated by the bishop without special ordination.

The Patriarch is chosen in the following manner. Three names are selected by the assembled bishops and placed in an urn beneath the altar. After Mass has been said, he whose name is first drawn is chosen Patriarch. He holds office for life, but may be deposed by the bishops if he falls away from the tenets of the Jacobite Church. He is enthroned with the title "Patriarch of the City of Antioch, and of the whole dominion of the Apostolic chair." He has the right to name and consecrate the other bishops and metropolitans, and the blessing of the chrism is reserved to him; but before he can exercise jurisdiction, his appointment must be confirmed by a firman of the Sultan. The ancient rule, observed down to 1222, forbade anyone already a bishop to be chosen Patriarch. Now, generally speaking, it is a bishop who is chosen, so that no further consecration is needed. Since 878 it has been the custom for the Patriarch to take a new name on election, and since 1293 that of Ignatius, the martyred Bishop of Antioch, has always been adopted. At first the Patriarch had no fixed residence; in 1166 Amida, the modern Diarbekir, became the patriarchal residence, and at the close of the fifteenth century it was transferred to the monastery of Zapharan or St. Ananias, near Mardin. The Patriarch is supported partly by the monastery, partly by a contribution of grain from all the Jacobite congregations.

Next comes the Maphrian, a dignity which arose in the seventh century, when the Jacobites gave the title of Katholikos or Primate of the East, held since Justinian's time by the Metropolitan of Seleucia and Ctesiphon, to one of their own bishops. The first Maphrian, Maruthos, appointed in 629, had twelve bishops in Arabia and Persia subject to him, and over them he had quasi-patriarchal power, though he himself was nominated by the Patriarch. At present the dignity is merely titular.

The metropolitans are distinct in name only from the other bishops. The bishops, who are usually taken from the monks, are very ignorant, rarely preach, and though they read, scarcely understand the Syriac of their ritual. The archdeacon, as syncellos, is the chief representative of the bishop in settling disputes between the clergy, &c. Formerly there were twenty metropolitans and 103 bishops. The number has fallen since to eight Metropolitans and three bishops, the Metropolitan of Jerusalem being Maphrian.

The secular priests have to recite the prayers of their Beth-gaza or Breviary daily, and to administer the sacraments, but they support themselves in part by agriculture, trade, &c. They may be married men, but cannot contract a second marriage. The Jacobite monasteries, once exceedingly numerous, are now comparatively few. The rabban or abbot is chosen by the monks of his house, but the election must be confirmed by the bishop. The religious observe perpetual abstinence from meat, and except in sickness from wine. They keep four fasts besides Lent: viz. fifty days in honour of St. Peter and St. Paul, fourteen days in honour of the Blessed Virgin's Assumption, twenty-five in honour of Christ's birth, and the Niniviticum, or fast of three days, at the beginning of the third week before Lent. In other respects their mode of life is most severe.

In a quarter of their own at Mardin, a curious community of about 100 families are loosely attached to the Jacobite church. They are descendants of the Shemsiel, or worshippers of the sun, and in 1762 the pasha inquired about their religion, and told them no toleration was granted except to those who possessed divine books—i.e., to Mohammedans, Jews, or Christians. Thereupon some embraced the faith of Islam, the rest were about to be executed, when the Jacobite bishop interceded for them, and afterwards induced them to join his church. They are baptised Christians and conform to the Jacobite rites, but they only intermarry among themselves, and have customs and ceremonies of their own. JANSENISM. It is very difficult to define Jansenism, or even to describe it in general terms, and therefore still more difficult to give a compendious history of the movement. Properly speaking, it was a heresy which consisted in denying the freedom of the will and the possibility of resisting divine grace. But from the very beginning, Jansenius and his followers had many objects in view, quite distinct from their opinions on the efficacy of grace. Perhaps the best description of Jansenism is that it was a professed attempt to restore the ancient doctrine and discipline of the Church. The Reformers professed to restore apostolic doctrine and discipline by making new churches; the Jansenists wished to remain in the Catholic Roman Church, and to reform it from within. The Reformers appealed to Scripture and made light of tradition. To the Jansenists the Fathers were all in all, though, practically, St. Augustine, and Western Fathers under his influence, were taken as the sole representatives of the Church's doctrinal tradition, and Jansenist contempt was reserved for the mediæval Schoolmen. This position of the Jansenists within the Church occasions fresh difficulty in treating of their history. They called themselves Catholics, and treated the existence of a Jansenist sect as a mere phantom, invented to trouble consciences and calumniate pious Catholics. Nobody admitted he was a Jansenist, and the Jansenist tendency displayed itself in so many ways, in attempts to correct doctrines, devotions, discipline, more or less established, that it is often no easy matter to decide where the reproach of Jansenism was deserved. Undoubtedly, some Catholics were far too ready to narrow the limits of orthodoxy, and to charge their opponents with Jansenism. Thus, the "Bibliothèque Janséniste," which appeared in 1722 and 1735, was placed on the Index in 1744, and, ten years later, the new edition, entitled, "Dictionnaire des livres jansénistes," met with the same fate. This book, ascribed to the Jesuit Colonna, stigmatises even the great Augustinian theologians, Noris and Berti, and others, as Jansenists. In this article we propose to trace the different manifestations of Jansenism in chronological order; paying special attention to the authoritative condemnations of the Church.

1. Jansenius and his Book.—Cornelius Jansen was born in 1585, at Accoy, in the Dutch province of Leerdam, studied at Utrecht, Louvain, and Paris, became connected with several disciples of Baius (e.g., James Baius and James Jansen), and, from 1604, was the intimate friend of John du Verger de Hauranne, born in 1581, and better known as the Abbé de St. Cyran. Jansenius, who taught for some time at Bayonne, till, in 1617, he became professor at Louvain, devoted himself to the study of St. Augustine, while his friend Hauranne, now Abbé of St. Cyran, near Poitiers, took on himself the task of depicting the ancient constitution of the Church. Jansen made several journeys to the Spanish Court, as representative of the Louvain University, was promoted to the see of Ypres in 1635, and died May 6, 1638. Two years after his death, Frommond published Jansen's posthumous work, "Augustinus S.: Doctrina S. Aug. de Hum. Naturæ Sanitate, Ægritudine, Medicina, adversus Pelagianos et Massilienses," Lovanii, 1640, tom. 4, Jansen had studied St. Augustine for twenty years. He submitted the book to the Pope's judgment, though he could not believe that it contained doctrinal error, but this declaration was suppressed by the editor. The work falls into three great divisions, treating (1) of the history of the Pelagian heresy; (2) of reason and authority in theological matters, the grace of Adam and the angels, of fallen nature, of mere nature (natura pura); (3) of redeeming grace, and the errors of the Semipelagians and some moderns. The following is a sketch of the doctrinal system maintained in the book.

Since the fall, man's will is entirely dominated by a double attraction, viz. the heavenly attraction, or pleasure (delectatio), which leads to good, the earthly attraction which induces to evil, and the will necessarily follows the attraction which is stronger at the moment. Jansenius did not deny the freedom of the will in express terms, but he utterly rejected the Catholic notion of freedom, viz. the power to choose at the time good or evil (libertas contradictionis), and asserted merely the existence of freedom from external constraint (libertas a coactione). He also destroyed all belief in grace merely sufficient, as Catholic theologians understand it: i.e., there was, according to him, no grace which enabled a man to perform a good action, and which failed, or could fail, to produce its effect from defect in correspondence on the part of the agent. The grace which a man did not follow might have been sufficient in other circumstances, viz. if the impulse to evil had not been so strong; but it was insufficient relatively to the force on the other side. If grace, or the impulse to good, be represented by 6, the temptation or impulse to evil, by 5½, the agent must needs sin; if the proportions were reversed, he necessarily did the good proposed to him. Hence even the just are not always able to fulfil God's commandments (see Prop. i., below); interior grace is irresistible (Prop. ii.); there is no freedom from interior necessity, but only from exterior compulsion (Prop. iii.). Further, he held that the error of the Semipelagians lay in making grace resistible (Prop. iv.), and maintaining that Christ died for all.

2. The History of Jansenism down to the Constitution of Innocent X. in 1653.—The book excited great attention in the Low Countries and in France when a second edition was issued in 1641. In the same year it was condemned by the Roman Inquisition, and, in the year following, by Urban VIII., in general terms, as renewing the errors of Baius. The authenticity of Urban's bull was disputed; Flemish bishops, headed by Boonen, archbishop of Malines, and the University of Louvain, resisted its publication for a considerable time; and, although the French king and the Sorbonne ranged themselves on the side of authority, "the disciples of St. Augustine"—as the Jansenists styled themselves—were numerous and powerful. The learned Antoine Arnauld, born in 1612, and after Richelieu's death Doctor of the Sorbonne, was especially active. He signalised himself in the early stage of the controversy by attacking Isaac Habert, a Sorbonniste, and champion of the Catholic doctrine on grace.

In 1649 Nicolas Cornet submitted Five Propositions from the "Augustinus" to the Sorbonne, and a commission was nominated to examine them. Friends of the Jansenist doctrine, among whom Dr. Louis de St. Amour was most prominent, appealed to the Parliament, of which body also many favoured Jansenism. The Parliament prohibited the Sorbonne from taking any further step, and committed the inquiry to the assembly of the clergy. On April 12, 1651, eighty-five bishops wrote to Innocent X., begging him to pronounce judgment on the Five Propositions, although eleven bishops protested against this immediate appeal to Rome, as subversive of the Gallican liberties. The Pope appointed five cardinals and thirteen theologians to decide the question, and after two years had been occupied in this task, during which the Jansenists were heard at length in their own defence, a bull appeared (May 19, 1653), in which a definitive sentence was given. Proposition I.—"Some commandments of God are impossible to just men, wishing and striving (to observe them) according to the strength which they have at the time: moreover they lack grace, which would make them (the commandments) possible." Proposition II.—"No resistance in the state of fallen nature is ever made to interior grace." Proposition III.—"For merit and demerit in the state of fallen nature, man does not need freedom from necessity, but only freedom from compulsion." Proposition IV.—"The Semipelagians admitted the need of interior prevenient grace for each act, even for the beginning of faith; and they were heretical on this account, viz. because they held that grace to be such that the human will could resist or correspond to it"—were condemned as heretical. Proposition V.—"It is Semipelagian to say that Christ died, or shed his blood for all men together," as false, rash, &c., and, if meant in the sense that Christ died only for the elect, as heretical. Shortly after it was issued, an edict of the French king commanded the reception of this bull; the French bishops, assembled at Paris, thanked the Pope for it, and it was registered by the Sorbonne and the Louvain University. The famous Franciscan Wadding, formerly an advocate of the Five Propositions, submitted to the judgment of the Church.

Meanwhile the Jansenist spirit had been active in other directions. St. Cyran ("Lettres Chrétiennes et Spirituelles," Paris, 1645), recurring, as he said, to the primitive practice, held it inadvisable to confess venial sins, or the number and circumstances altering the species, of mortal sins, while he required the utmost perfection and purity of conscience for communion, or even for assisting at Mass. Under his direction, some of the nuns belonging to the Convent of Port Royal, near Paris, actually died without the sacraments. St. Cyran also published a "Brief Explanation of the Mysteries of Faith," and an edition of "St. Augustine on Virginity," with notes inimical to vows. He was imprisoned on suspicion of false teaching by Richelieu, was liberated on that statesman's death, and died, revered as a martyr by his followers, in 1643. A large number had come under his influence—Singlin, his successor in the direction of Port Royal, Antoine Arnauld, his no less gifted sister, Angélique, &c. Of these, Antoine Arnauld published his famous book, "De la fréquente Communion" (Paris, 1643), in the year that St. Cyran died. The object of the book was to mend the relaxed discipline of the Church. It urged the duty of imposing public penance for mortal sins, even if secret, and of preparing sinners for absolution and communion by a long course of rigorous discipline. It was approved by sixteen bishops and twenty doctors of the Sorbonne, who, however, had not read the preface with which it appeared, and which gave special offence. Some ecclesiastics, e.g. Du Hamel, in the diocese of Sens, ventured to reduce the Jansenist theology to practice, and restored public penance.

3. Jansenism from the Bull of Innocent X. in 1653 to the Death of Arnauld in 1694.—The condemnation of the Five Propositions by the Pope necessitated a change in Jansenist tactics, for the Jansenists resolved to remain in external communion with the Church. Some appealed to a general council, but Arnauld was now the real leader of the party, and he hit upon a device which became the main point of contention for many years. He was willing to reject the Five Propositions, but he denied that they were to be found in Jansenius or, if so found, that they bore the sense imputed to them in the Papal Constitution. Bishops and theologians disproved Arnauld's assertion, and the Pope reprobated it September 29, 1654. This only led Arnauld to develop his views more thoroughly. The Duke of Liancourt was refused absolution in the parish of St. Sulpice, because of his connection with the Jansenists, and Arnauld addressed two letters to the peer. In his second letter ("Seconde Lettre de M. Arnauld, docteur de Sorbonne, à un Duc et Pair de France, pour servir de réponse à plusieurs écrits qui ont été publiés contre la première lettre sur ce qui est arrivé à un seigneur de la cour dans une paroisse de Paris." A Paris, 1655), he distinguished between the "question of law" (question de droit), and that of fact (question de fait); in other words between the question whether the Five Propositions as condemned by the Church were erroneous, and the question whether the book of Jansenius contained them in the sense condemned. On the former question he admitted the Church's infallibility and the duty of entire submission; the latter, he said, was a question of historical fact on which the Church might err, and it was enough if the faithful received her decision upon it with "respectful silence." We may remark in passing that nobody claims infallibility for the Church in facts merely historical, but here was a question intimately, nay indissolubly, connected with doctrine. Of what avail would the Church's infallibility be if she was liable to error in interpreting the natural sense of books and propositions submitted to her, and so of mistaking truth for error, error for truth? We say the natural sense, for again it must not be supposed that the Church professes to read the heart of an author. He may have used words in an unnatural sense, he may have suffered from some mental confusion or aberration, and on all that the judgment belongs to God alone, to God who searches the heart. But the Church can judge of the natural and obvious sense which words bear in a book, nor could she execute her divine commission to feed the flock of Christ if she had no power to distinguish between wholesome and poisonous pasture.

Generally speaking, the Jansenists accepted the means of escape which Arnauld had suggested. The nuns of Port Royal, however, did so with difficulty, and only when overpersuaded by the Abbess Angélique Arnauld. Among the distinguished men of the party who took up their abode in the Convent of Port Royal des Champs after the nuns had moved to Port Royal de Paris, Pascal utterly refused to accept the compromise. This did not hinder him, however, from accomplishing a mighty work in the Jansenist interest. In his "Provincial Letters" (Paris, 1656), published under the pseudonym Louis Montalt, he attacked the Jesuits for relaxed morals and defended the Jansenist doctrine of grace with a refinement of style and delicacy of wit which have never been surpassed in any literature. There were many members of the party more learned than Pascal, but he had no equal in genius. Nothing can be more amazing than the interest with which he invests the dry controversies on grace, and although no doubt he was often unfair to the casuists whom he held up to scorn and detestation, and although many of his charges were rebutted—e.g. by the Jesuit Father Daniel—the charm of his book led his readers captive, and the answers were read by few. No one who has read the "Provincial Letters" is likely to lose the impression which they make; it may be said without exaggeration that they touch every chord of the human heart, and the sudden transitions from logic and wit to sublime and pathetic eloquence produce an effect which can neither be resisted or effaced. Pascal's "Pensées, fragments, et lettres" are a lasting monument of deep and subtle thought, and have done good work for religion, though even these are marred here and there by Jansenist tendencies. Pascal died young, in 1662. His friend Nicole, also one of the solitaries of Port Royal, wrote chiefly on moral subjects in French which is still esteemed as a model of correct writing. It must be remembered that the work of the Jansenist writers was very far from being wholly evil. Arnauld and his friends defended many Catholic doctrines against the Calvinists, and the elaborate work, "Perpétuité de la Foi," by Arnauld and Nicole, is perhaps the very best, as it certainly is the most learned and exhaustive, defence of the Catholic doctrine on the Eucharist. Everyone knows what important contributions the Port Royal Jansenists made to the sciences of logic, grammar, and philosophy, nor is it the least among their many titles to enduring fame that the great historian Tillemont was their pupil.

The Jansenists were not left long in peace. Arnauld's thesis on the distinction between the "question de droit" and the "question de fait" was condemned by the Sorbonne, and he with sixty other doctors was expelled from that society. "To-day," he writes to his beloved sister Angélique, "they are erasing my name from the list of doctors, but I hope our Lord will not erase it from the number of his servants." In a Constitution of October 16, 1656, Alexander VII. declared that the Five Propositions were condemned "in the sense of the author," and in 1665 imposed on all ecclesiastical persons the subscription of a "formulary" consisting of a solemn profession so to accept the Papal condemnation. Four bishops—those of Alet, Angers, Beauvais, and Pamiers, refused to sign except with the evasive distinction between "droit" and "fait." After nearly two years of strife and much intrigue, Clement IX., early in 1669, restored the bishops to his favour, and this step known as "the peace of Clement" was hailed by the Jansenists as a triumph for themselves and a revocation of past censures. In reality the Pope was led to believe that the bishops had made an unqualified submission. The Jansenists were jubilant again when Innocent XI. in 1679 censured a large number of propositions extracted from the lax casuists. Nobody certainly who reads them will wonder at the scandal and the reaction which lax theology created. What, e.g., is to be said of a writer professedly Christian who held that "frequent confession and communion, even in those who live like heathen, is a mark of predestination" (Prop. 56)?

But the peace of which the Jansenists dreamed did not last. The Flemish bishops in their zeal against error had required the "formulary" to be signed with additions of their own. These additions, as well as vague accusations of Jansenism, the Pope forbade in a brief of 1694, but at the same time he did strictly require subscription to the original "formulary," and the condemnation of the Five Propositions "in the obvious sense which they bear." A few months later "the great Arnauld," as his disciples loved to call him, died in the Low Countries, and his friend Nicole followed him the year after. Arnauld's sister Angélique was gone more than thirty years before; the Society of Port Royal des Champs had been scattered, while the nuns had been forbidden to take novices and ordered to dismiss their pupils. It was during our next period, in 1709, that the nuns were all expelled; the convent itself was utterly destroyed in 1710.

4. Jansenism under Quesnel, down to the publication of the Bull Unigenitus in 1713.—Pasquier Quesnel was born at Paris in 1634, and ordained priest in 1659. At an early age he had entered the Oratory founded by Cardinal Bérulle, in which Jansenist principles had become dominant, and devoted himself to learned pursuits. In 1671 he published "Moral Reflexions on the Gospels," and in 1675 a learned edition of St. Leo, which was censured by Clement X. On account of his refusal to sign the formulary he was first banished to Orleans, then in 1684 expelled from the Oratory, and finally fled to Brussels, whither Arnauld had gone in 1679. Here he extended his Moral Reflexions on the Gospels to Reflexions on the whole of the New Testament. This enlarged work appeared in two editions more and more Jansenist than those of 1687 and 1692. It was in Quesnel's arms that Arnauld died, and to him he entrusted the care of the party. Gerberon, a Benedictine of the Congregation of St. Maur, was Quesnel's companion in prison and exile, and laboured long and zealously in the same cause

Clement XI. (Pope from 1700 to 1721) issued two bulls against Jansenism, each of which marks an epoch in the controversy. The former of these, the "Vineam Domini," was occasioned by the "Cas de Conscience." In 1701 a Jansenist consulted the Sorbonne on the lawfulness of absolving a dying ecclesiastic who was not convinced that the Five Propositions as condemned by the Church were to be found in the book of Jansenius. Forty doctors, among whom were Dupin and Natalis Alexander, signed a document affirming that absolution should be given. Bossuet's influence led nearly all these doctors (not, however, Dupin) to retract their opinion, and Noailles, archbishop of Paris, ranged himself, after some wavering, on Bossuet's side. Dupin was banished; Quesnel, who had addressed a violent letter to Noailles, was imprisoned by the Archbishop of Malines, but escaped to Amsterdam. In 1705 the Pope, at the instance of the French Court, gave a fresh decision on the matter. In the "Vineam Domini" he renewed the Constitutions of Innocent X. and Alexander VII. and the Briefs of Clement IX. and Innocent XII., and again insisted that Catholics were bound to give full and undoubting assent to the Church's decision on the matter of fact, a "respectful silence" being by no means sufficient. In 1711, after difficulties and delays occasioned chiefly by Colbert, archbishop of Rouen, the Pope was satisfied that the French episcopate had accepted the decree.

Worse troubles were in store. Quesnel's "Moral Reflexions" had been proscribed by the Pope in 1708, but the Parliament of Paris objected to any prohibition of French books except by their own authority, and Noailles, the weak-minded archbishop of Paris, was swayed by the Jansenist Renaudot (now remembered chiefly for his admirable translation and edition of the Oriental Liturgies, still the classical work on the subject), De la Tour, general of the Oratory, Le Noir, Boileau, and Duguet. The king, however, and many French bishops were waiting anxiously for the Pope to speak out more fully. Fénelon informed him of the way Jansenism spread in France and in neighbouring States. In 1713 the expected answer came from Rome. The bull "Unigenitus" condemned 101 propositions from the later editions of Quesnel's book, and furnished a more complete exhibition of the Church's mind on the controversy than any which had hitherto appeared. Forty-three of the condemned propositions concern grace and predestination; twenty-eight treat of the theological virtues; thirty deal with the Church, with discipline, and with the sacraments. The errors of the first class need not detain us here. As regards those of the second, Quesnel was condemned for holding that all love except the supernatural love of God was evil, that without this love there could be no true hope, observance of the law or religion, that every prayer made by a sinner was sinful. The errors of the third class consisted in Quesnel's assertion that the Church was made up of the elect alone, and that the chief pastors must not excommunicate except with the consent of the whole body; that all without exception should read the Bible; that the faithful at Mass should join their voice to that of the priest;[1] that sinners should not hear Mass at all; that absolution should be deferred till penance had been done. No note was affixed to the particular propositions, some of which plainly are not positively heretical, while others, apart from their context and the spirit by which they are animated, are capable of a good sense. But they are condemned in mass (in globo), as respectively false, captious, ill-sounding, scandalous, impious, &c., and even as heretical.

5. The last Struggles of the Jansenists.—Quesnel was a very old man when the "Unigenitus" appeared, and he died but a few years later, in 1719. With him the significance of Jansenism as a great theological and literary movement came to an end, for no intellectual leader arose to replace the great men who had passed away. Partly, no doubt, Jansenism lost its youthful vigour by the same law of decay which seems to affect all religious and political parties. Enthusiasm dies out, and with it, to a certain extent, self-sacrifice: men of genius leave no successors. But besides, it had become very hard for a man of sense to join the Jansenist ranks. It had grown clearer and clearer that the whole teaching authority of the Church had uttered itself against the Jansenist doctrine. Those who had already committed themselves might be content with the evasions to which the later Jansenists had recourse; they might agree that Papal decisions were worthless because a few bishops had not assented to them, or because the vast majority of the episcopate which had assented were deficient in learning, were corrupted by their belief in Papal infallibility, had forgotten to consult the clergy of the second order, &c., &c. They might require an absolute unanimity on the part of the episcopate, or make the Church's infallibility depend on an assent of the laity which could not possibly be ascertained. Scarcely anyone, we say, could accept these evasions except under stress of circumstances, and more logical minds were sure to reason more boldly and consistently, and to reject the Church's authority altogether. Jansenism in its sincere form ended in fanatical superstition. Miracles were supposed to be worked at the tomb of a

[1] This seems to be the sense of Prop. 86.

Jansenist deacon, François de Paris, who died in 1727, and was buried in the cemetery of St. Médard. Accounts of his life and miracles were printed at Utrecht, Brussels, Paris, and Cologne. Crowds made pilgrimages to his grave, and many fell into ridiculous ecstasies and horrible convulsions which gained for the Jansenists the name of "Convulsionnaires." Louis XV. closed the cemetery in 1732. A melancholy end surely for the party of Pascal and Arnauld.

But we have been anticipating. Louis XIV., always a determined foe of Jansenism, died in 1715; his great-grandson, Louis XV., was a child of five, and under the Regency freer rein was given to the opponents of the Roman decisions. In 1717 the Bishops of Mirepoix, Montpellier, Boulogne, and Séez notified to the Sorbonne their appeal against the "Unigenitus" to a future council. The "Appellants," as they were called, were supported by the Universities of Rheims and Nantes, by the Sorbonne, although it had previously accepted the Papal bull, by the Bishops of Verdun and Pamiers, by Noailles, archbishop of Paris, and practically by the Regent. In 1721 the Bishops of Senez, Boulogne, Montpellier, Pamiers, Macon, Auxerre, Tournay, addressed a letter to the new Pope, Innocent XIII., which he condemned in the following year as schismatical and full of the heretical spirit. In 1723 the assembly of the French clergy besought the king to declare the two bulls, "Vineam Domini" and "Unigenitus," binding laws of Church and State; and in 1727, Soanen, bishop of Séez, was suspended with the Pope's sanction by the provincial council of Embrun and banished. But confusion and strife still prevailed in the French Church. Twelve bishops, headed by Noailles, protested against the sentence of Embrun. However, the beginning of the end was now near, so far as episcopal opposition to the bull went. Noailles recanted in 1728, shortly before his death, and the next year the Sorbonne again accepted the "Unigenitus." These steps were followed in 1730 by a vigorous declaration on the part of the king against the Jansenists.

Here we may close the history of Jansenism as a theological system, for an account is given in separate articles of the Jansenist Church in Holland, and of the council of Pistoia. Unhappily, the spirit of opposition to the Church which Jansenism had aroused was powerful for evil long after Jansenism itself had ceased to be dangerous. From 1731 down to about 1757, the Parliaments inflicted a long series of persecutions on the clergy who, faithful to their duty, refused the sacraments to the Appellants. De Beaumont, archbishop of Paris, was banished from his see because he would not abandon Catholic principles on this point. And even at the beginning of the Revolution which swept the ancient Church and Monarchy of France away, the Jansenist Camus undertook the thankless task of justifying the notorious "Civil Constitution of the Clergy" on theological principles.

(The facts in this article are taken from Cardinal Hergenröther's "Church History," vol. ii. Vol. iii. contains a very full account of the enormous literature on the Jansenist controversies.)

JANSENIST CHURCH OF HOLLAND. The revolt of the Dutch Provinces from Spanish rule led to some measures of repression against the Dutch Catholics. The Church property was confiscated and the hierarchy overthrown. The first and last Archbishop of Utrecht died in 1580, just before even the public worship of the Catholic religion was forbidden by William of Orange; two successors nominated by Spain could not reach their see, and except at Utrecht and Haarlem, the members of the ancient chapters were nearly all dead. Accordingly, in 1583, Gregory XIII. appointed a Vicar Apostolic for the Dutch mission, and in 1597 this dignitary, who of course possessed only a delegated authority, which could be withdrawn at the mere will of the Pope, was subjected to the supervision of the nuncio at Brussels. A step which afterwards led to important results was taken by Philip Roven van Ardensal, Vicar Apostolic of Holland and Archbishop of Philippi in partibus. In 1631 he formed the remaining canons of Utrecht, along with certain parish priests and other ecclesiastics, into a collegiate body. We shall speak of this body for the sake of brevity as the Utrecht Chapter, but it must be remembered it had no just claim to the rights and privileges of a cathedral chapter. Later on in the same century, French Jansenists fled to Holland, and imbued many of the Dutch Catholics with their principles. Even a Vicar Apostolic, Peter Kodde, consecrated at Brussels in 1689, supported the Jansenist cause, and was suspended by Clement XI. in 1702. Jansenist intrigues led to the banishment of Van Kock, whom the Pope had named Pro-Vicar, from Holland.

Kodde organised a schism, and, when Rome deposed him altogether, declared that he had been elected Archbishop of Utrecht by the chapter of that see. He refused to sign the formulary of Alexander VII., and died without recantation in 1710. Fifty-two missions and eighty priests fell from Catholic communion, while Quesnel, Gerberon, Petitpied, and other French Jansenists were allowed to labour in the interests of their party by the Protestant government. The Chapter of Utrecht refused obedience to successive Vicars Apostolic, and joined the French Appellants in their resistance to the "Unigenitus." They were able to keep up a supply of schismatical priests by sending their candidates with dimissorials to French Appellant bishops.

In 1723 the Chapter of Utrecht chose Stenhoven, formerly Vicar General, Archbishop of Utrecht, and he was consecrated by Varlet, suspended Bishop of Babylon in partibus. Two years later the Pope excommunicated all who took part in this act, and the great canonist Van Espen, who defended its legality, had to leave Louvain in consequence. Altogether, Varlet consecrated no less than four Archbishops of Utrecht, all of them excommunicated by Rome, and when he himself died, Meindarts, the last archbishop whom he consecrated, established the schismatical bishopric of Haarlem in 1742, and of Deventer 1752–8. In 1763 Meindarts held a synod at Utrecht and sent the acts to Rome, where of course they were rejected. Meindart's successor was consecrated by the schismatical Bishop of Haarlem, and so the succession of bishops and priests has been maintained down to our own day. But they have been constantly diminishing, and the Bishop of Deventer is obliged to officiate as a parish priest, not having any Jansenists in his diocese. The Dutch Jansenists now number less than 5,000 souls. They protested against the definition of the Immaculate Conception in 1854, and the Papal Infallibility in 1870, and they attracted some notice when Loos, so-called Archbishop of Utrecht, consecrated Dr. Reinkens bishop for the German "Old Catholics." They are completely overshadowed by the great and flourishing Catholic Church of Holland. Since 1851, when Pius IX. restored the Dutch hierarchy, there has been a real Archbishop of Utrecht, with Bishops of Haarlem, Herzogenbusch, Breda, and Roermond.

The Dutch Jansenists are in many ways an interesting body. Unlike most other sects, they remain just where they were on their separation from Rome. They have retained valid orders, the celibacy of the clergy, the Mass and other services in Latin. They are known in Holland as old-Roman (oud-Roomsch), for they profess to be not only Catholics but Roman Catholics, and they acknowledge the Pope as the visible head of the Church, out of which there is no salvation, and one of their synods condemned the doctrine that the schismatic Greeks are part of the Church of Christ. The Blessed Sacrament is reserved in their churches. The writer of this article has carefully read recent editions of their prayer-book corresponding to our "Garden of the Soul," their popular catechism and their hymn-book, procured for him by the kindness of a friend, and has found them to be exactly, or almost exactly, like English Catholic books of the same sort, or to speak more accurately, like what our English Catholic books were some fifty years ago, before many modern devotions were introduced. Thus in a short summary of belief appended to a sort of layman's Missal, published at Utrecht in 1879, the unity of the Church under the Pope, the seven Sacraments, the duty of prayer for the souls in Purgatory, the Invocation of Saints, and especially of the Blessed Virgin, Mother of God and of all Christians, are taught just in the language familiar to us. The "Hail Mary" occurs in the morning and evening devotion, and two hymns are addressed to the Blessed Virgin in the hymn-book. The ordinary of the Mass is given in Dutch, though of course the priest recites it in Latin. We have been unable to discover any trace of heresy in these books. The Jansenists we believe, as a rule, practise their religion by hearing Mass, going to confession, &c., and are under strict discipline, absolution being sometimes deferred for a very long time. The friend already referred to was told by the Catholic Archbishop of Utrecht, that conversions of Jansenists to Catholicism are very rare. He himself had only known of one instance at Utrecht during a ministry of nearly fifty years in that city.

JANUARIUS, ST., MIRACLE OF. Januarius, Bishop of Benevento, was beheaded for the faith near Puteoli in the persecution of Diocletian, and his relics after a time were removed to Naples. In the great church there are preserved his head and some of his blood, which, as his Acts relate, was gathered up from the ground by a poor woman at the time of the martyrdom, and enclosed in two small glass phials (ampullæ) of peculiar construction. On several occasions it is recorded that his relics were carried in procession during eruptions of Vesuvius, and that danger was averted from the city. The celebrated standing miracle of the liquefaction of the blood of St. Januarius consists in this: that when the dried up, congealed blood in the phials, which is ordinarily hard and solid and in several pieces, is brought near to the head (the phials, or one of them, being placed on the altar, and prayer being made to God), the blood, after a longer or shorter interval, is usually seen to become liquid and flow, and bubbles to arise on its surface. Among many other eye-witnesses, the learned and gifted Picus of Mirandola says: "I saw that blood with my own eyes . . . when the head was brought near to it, grow red, melt, and bubble up as if it had been newly shed from the veins." (See the "Commentarius Prævius" in the Acta SS., vol. vi. of September, where the whole question is fully discussed.)

JERONYMITES. The example of St. Jerome, who spent four years in the Syrian desert, wrestling with the powers of evil and his own irregular thoughts, was followed by great numbers of holy men in the middle ages, who passed under the general name of Hermits of St. Jerome or Jeronymites. Hélyot, the historian of the Monastic Orders, distinguishes four Congregations of Jeronymites, of which the first was incomparably more important than the others. These are—

1. The Hermits of Spain. Disciples of the Blessed Thomas of Sienna, a brother of the third order of St. Francis, passing into Spain about the middle of the fourteenth century, lived at first like hermits, but afterwards deciding for the cœnobitic life, were approved in 1374 by Gregory XI., who gave them the rule of St. Austin. Ferdinand de Guadalajara was their first prior; his convent, at St. Bartholomew de Lupiana in Castile, was always regarded as the principal house of the order. Another division of these hermits from Italy settled in Valencia, adopted the life in common about the same time as their brethren in Castile, and in the course of time founded several convents, the fame of which spread through Europe. These were, 1. Our Lady of Guadaloupe in Estremadura (of which we shall speak presently); 2. that commonly called St. Just, but more accurately the convent of St. Jerome at Yuste near Placencia, to which Charles V. retired after his abdication; 3. St. Lawrence of the Escurial near Madrid, built and adorned on a majestic plan by Philip II.; and 4. Belem near Lisbon, the burial-place of the royal family of Portugal. Of the magnificent convent of Our Lady of Guadaloupe, famous for its wonder-working image, Hélyot, writing early in the eighteenth century, says:—"The house is so large and spacious that when Philip II. passed by it in 1560 on his way to the war of Granada with the Archduke Rodolph, afterwards Emperor . . . . these princes resided there for twenty days with all their court, without causing the least inconvenience to the monks, who are a hundred and twenty in number. . . . The alms received are very considerable, and serve for some portion of the maintenance of the large number of religious, of a seminary of forty clerical students, who are here taught the humanities and the exercises of a clerical life, of two hospitals for men and women adjoining the monastery, and of a great number of servants and workmen in all kinds of trades. The hospital for men is served by more than forty attendants, and that for women by an equal number of Oblates; and without counting the pilgrims, of whom as many as two thousand sometimes arrive in a day, and who are entertained during three days in the convent, the establishment feeds more than seven hundred persons daily."

In 1415, when the first chapter general was held, there were twenty-five houses of Jeronymites in Spain and Portugal.

2. The Hermits of the Observance, or of Lombardy. This branch of the Jeronymites was founded by the prior Lope de Olmedo, who, not being able to persuade his monks at Guadalajara to give up certain relaxations, went to Rome (1424), and being cordially received by Martin V., ultimately established in Lombardy and other parts of Italy a flourishing congregation of Jeronymites, whose chief house was at Ospitaletto near Lodi. In Hélyot's time this Congregation had seventeen houses in Italy.

3. The Hermits of the Blessed Peter of Pisa. Pietro Gambacorti, born in 1355 of a noble Pisan family, quitted the world about 1377, and lived as a hermit at Montebello in Umbria. Many joined him; he made his followers practise a very austere rule, and formed them into a congregation under the patronage of St. Jerome. When Hélyot wrote, there were forty houses of this order in Italy, besides a few in Tyrol and Bavaria.

4. The Hermits of Fiesole. The founder of this branch, Carlo di Montegranelli, was born about 1340. They were suppressed by Clement IX. in 1668, along with the Jesuats. So far as we can discover, no Jeronymite convents exist at the present day. (Hélyot, "Hist. des Ordres Monastiques.")

JERUSALEM, PATRIARCHATE OF. The first bishop of Jerusalem was James the Less, who was appointed by the Apostles (Euseb. "H. E." ii. 23). After his death the Apostles and disciples of Christ chose Simeon son of Clopas, a relation of our Lord, to fill the vacant see (Euseb. "H. E." iii. 11). It is a natural inference from the words of Hegesippus (Euseb. "H. E." iii. 32), that Jerusalem at that time had a prominence over all the churches in Palestine, which were, like the church of Jerusalem itself, mostly composed of Jewish Christians. Things were entirely altered when Hadrian punished the Jewish revolt by the destruction of the holy city, and replaced it (A.D. 130) by Ælia Capitolina. The old Judæo-Christian community was scattered; Hadrian made it an offence for a Jew to enter the new city built on the site, or rather part of the site, of Jerusalem, so that there was no hope of fresh converts from Judaism, and a series of gentile bishops began of whom Mark was the first (Euseb. "H. E." v. 12). The church of Ælia Capitolina was subjected to that of Cæsarea, partly because of the civil prominence which belonged to the latter, partly because it could claim a connection with the Apostles (there St. Peter had baptised Cornelius) and an antiquity to which the new church of Ælia Capitolina could not pretend. The very name of Jerusalem fell out of use till after the Nicene Council.

Still it was impossible to ignore entirely the associations connected with Jerusalem. Towards the end of the second century Eusebius ("H. E." v. 23) tells us that the bishop of Ælia presided along with (and no doubt as second in rank to) the bishop of Cæsarea at Palestinian synods, and we can see how near the two sees stood in rank from the fact that Eusebius in giving a list of bishops mentions the bishop of Ælia once before ("H. E." v. 25), and once after (ib. 22), the bishop of Cæsarea. The letter of the Synod of Antioch in 269 is subscribed first by Helenus of Tarsus next by Hymenæus of Jerusalem, while the name of Theotecnus of Cæsarea holds only the fourth place. (Euseb. "H. E." vii. 30; cf. 22.)

The interpretation of the seventh Nicene canon, which treats of the ecclesiastical rank of Jerusalem, has given rise to much discussion, and it is impossible to be certain about its meaning. These are its words: "Since a custom has prevailed and an ancient tradition that the bishop in Ælia should be honoured, let him have the next place of honour (τὴν ἀκολουθίαν τῆς τιμῆς), its proper dignity being secured to the metropolitan church (τῇ μητροπόλει)."

There can, we think, be no reasonable doubt, though a question has been raised on the point, that the metropolitan church is that of Cæsarea. But what are we to understand by the word ἐχέτω τὴν ἀκολουθίαν τῆς τιμῆς? The "next place." De Marca replies, after the three great sees of Rome, Alexandria and Antioch, mentioned in the previous canon, the precedence, however, being one of honour merely, and the bishop of Ælia remaining subject in actual jurisdiction to the metropolitan of Cæsarea. Beveridge, on the other hand, will not hear of an honorary patriarch subject to a metropolitan, and supposes the meaning to be that the bishop of Ælia is to rank next the metropolitan of Cæsarea. He is to be the first of his suffragan bishops, just as in the Anglican Church the bishop of London holds the first rank as dean of the province after his metropolitan of Canterbury.

Beveridge is probably right, and his theory is confirmed by the fact that for some time afterwards the two bishops struggled for pre-eminence with alternate success. Soon after the Nicene Council Maximus of Jerusalem held a Palestinian synod in favour of Athanasius, without reference to the authority of Cæsarea, though he was blamed for this assumption of power (Socrat. ii. 24). At the Second General Council Cyril of Jerusalem signs before Thalassius of Cæsarea. On the other hand, Eulogius of Cæsarea presided in 415 at the Synod of Diospolis, although

John of Jerusalem was present. Moreover, although Juvenal of Jerusalem took a very prominent part at Ephesus in 431, and signed immediately after the bishop of Alexandria (the bishop of Cæsarea was absent), still Cyril resisted Juvenal's attempt to obtain conciliar recognition of his authority over Palestine, and begged the Pope to interfere (Leo, Ep. 62). At the seventh session of Chalcedon (October 26, 451) Maximus of Antioch declared that after long strife with Juvenal he had at last consented to cede the three Palestinian provinces to Jerusalem—an arrangement which was approved by the council and the Papal legates.

The patriarchate of Jerusalem was severed like the other Eastern patriarchates from the unity of the Church by the Greek schism. The city was rescued from the Mohammedans by the crusaders in 1099: a Latin ecclesiastic—Dagobert, archbishop of Pisa—was appointed patriarch, and the hierarchy was reorganised. After the Christian defeat at Gaza in 1244, and the consequent capture of Jerusalem by the Sultan of Egypt, the Latin patriarchate became little more than a nominal dignity, and Nicolas de Anapis, a Dominican and Roman penitentiary, appointed by Pope Nicolas IV. in 1288, was the last Latin patriarch down to our day who resided in Palestine (Fleury, livr. lxxxviii. c. 49). In the Decree of Union (Florence, 1439), the Greek patriarchate of Jerusalem was again united to the Church and recognised as holding the fifth place after Rome, but the union only lasted a few years. Pius IX. gave Jerusalem a resident Latin patriarch, Joseph Valerga (1847–1872). He was succeeded by Vincent Bracco (Hergenröther, "K. Geschichte," ii. p. 1008). There is no Greek Catholic patriarch of Jerusalem. The United Greeks or Melchite Catholics of this patriarchate are subject to the patriarch of Antioch. He is represented by a vicar who is a bishop in partibus and resides at Jaffa.[1] (Le Quien, "Oriens Christianus," tom. 3. Hefele, "Concil." vol. i., on the 7th canon of Nicæa, and vol. ii., on Chalcedon.)

JESUATS. A congregation founded by St. John Colombini, and confirmed by Urban V. in 1367. Colombini was a native of Sienna, and had held the highest offices in that republic; but being converted entirely to God by accidentally reading the Life of St. Mary of Egypt, he, with his wife's consent, embraced a life of continence, turned his house into a hospital, preached frequently, and delighted to humble himself to the condition of the poorest and most miserable. He soon had a ring of fervent disciples around him. Proceeding to meet Urban V., who was coming from Avignon to Rome, in 1367, the new society is said to have been called the "Gesuati" by children, who noticed how, as they walked, they continually repeated "Viva Gesù!" Alexander VI. obliged them to add to the name Jesuats, "of St. Jerome." Urban V. confirmed them, in 1367, and gave them a white habit and hood, with a large brown mantle, and wooden shoes. For more than two centuries, it was a strictly lay order, but Paul V. (1606) permitted them to receive holy orders. In many of their houses they practised pharmacy and distillation, and sold the alcoholic liquor which they manufactured; hence they came to be known as the "Aquavita Fathers." For this and other reasons Clement IX., in 1668, deemed it advisable to suppress the order. (Hélyot.)

JESUITESSES. Isabel Rosella, a pious lady of Barcelona, assisted St. Ignatius greatly with her alms when he was studying at that city in preparation for a university career. She, with two companions, came to Rome, where the saint then was, in 1545, and entreated him to take the direction of them, and allow them to live by the Jesuit rule. St. Ignatius thought himself bound, in gratitude for her former kindness, not to refuse her request; but he soon found that the direction of these three women took up an unduly large proportion of his time, and he obtained from Paul III., in 1547, an order that the Company should not undertake the direction of nuns. "When certain women in Flanders and Piedmont afterwards assembled in houses under vows[1] and this rule, and called themselves Jesuitesses, their institute was abolished by Urban VIII., in 1633, the end and exercises of this society not suiting that sex." (Alban Butler, July 31.)

JESUITS. The annals of this great order, and the Life of its founder, have been so frequently written, that the general outlines of both are familiar to most persons. St. Ignatius Loyola, born in 1491, of a noble family in Biscay, and trained to the military profession, received a severe wound in the leg while defending Pampeluna against the French in 1521. During his slow recovery he called for books to amuse him; romances were brought, and also a volume of "Lives of the Saints." Reading this last, at first carelessly, but afterwards with ever-increasing interest, Ignatius recognised the heroism of the true servants of God, and saw how much their glory, being founded on the abasement of the Cross, transcended what till then he had been accustomed to call so. When he had sufficiently recovered, he broke with his former life, embraced poverty and mendicancy, confessed himself to a Benedictine of Montserrat, and passed a noviciate of sublime but terrible trial in the cave of Manresa. Gradually the thought of founding an order, which should support the Chair of Peter, menaced by the German heretics, sustain by example, preaching, and education, the cause of the Gospel and Catholic truth, and carry the light of Christ to the heathen, rose into clearness in his mind. But to carry out all this, he must become a priest; the soldier must turn himself into a clerk. With unfailing patience he laboured to obtain the necessary knowledge. After being driven from two Spanish universities, because his efforts to influence the students caused him to be esteemed a mischievous fanatic, he went to the University of Paris, and there completed his studies. Here it was that he made the acquaintance of a number of remarkable men, chiefly Spaniards, with whom being made one in heart and spirit, he understood that it was now possible to carry out the project which he had long cherished. He conducted them first through the "Spiritual Exercises," which he had composed at Manresa. On the feast of the Assumption, in 1534, Ignatius and his companions,[1] after they had all received communion from Peter Faber, who was then the only priest among them, pronounced the vow which constituted the order. Its tenor was, "to renounce the world, to go to preach the gospel in Palestine, or, if they could not go thither within a year after they had finished their studies, to offer themselves to his Holiness to be employed in the service of God in what manner he should judge best."[2] Ignatius then passed into Spain, partly on medical advice, to recruit his wasted health by breathing the air of his native hills, partly to transact some necessary business for those of his companions who were Spaniards. It was agreed that they should all meet at Venice, in January 1537. Before that time three others had joined the society—Claude le Jay of Savoy, Codure of Dauphiné, and Pasquier Brouet of Picardy. His followers travelled on foot from Paris, in the winter of 1536, and through much danger and hardship made their way to Venice at the appointed time; Ignatius had come from Barcelona by sea. While at Venice, they occupied themselves in preaching and serving in the hospitals. In the summer, after sending the others to preach and labour in various towns of North Italy, Ignatius, taking with him Faber and Laynez, set out for Rome. At La Storta, not far from the Eternal City, while praying in a wayside chapel, he fell into an ecstacy; he seemed to see the Almighty Father, who commended him to his Son; Christ at the same time said to him, "I will be favourable to you at Rome."[1] Before the parting, he had told his followers that if asked to what congregation they belonged, they should say that they were of the Company of Jesus. The Pope (Paul III.) gave Ignatius a cordial reception, and commissioned Faber and Laynez to lecture on divinity at the Sapienza, the Roman University. The Holy Father doubtless felt the full significance of the adhesion of such a band at such a crisis. The huge fabric of the German empire was in wild confusion; the king of England, saluted by his predecessor, not twenty years before, as "defensor fidei," had just destroyed six hundred monasteries, and stopped all intercourse between his kingdom and Rome; France was unquiet; Sweden lost. At this moment a company of devout combatants, disciplined alike in mind and will, serving under a leader every lineament of whose face bespoke force and majesty, but all under the strictest control, offered themselves to the Pope, to do service of whatever kind and against whatever adversary he might appoint. The encouragement which he received led Ignatius to set earnestly to work at framing the constitutions of the new order. As might be expected from the man and the times, a military and monarchical spirit pervaded them. He resolved to establish in his order "a general whom all, by their vow, should be bound to obey, who should be perpetual, and his authority absolute, subject entirely to the Pope, but not liable to be restrained by chapters."[2]

[1] Their names were: Francis Xavier, James Laynez, Alphonsus Salmeron, Nicholas Bobadilla—Spaniards; Simon Rodriguez, a Portuguese; and Peter Faber, a Savoyard.

He also determined to prescribe a fourth vow—that of going, without question or delay, wherever the Pope might think fit to send them for the salvation of souls. As to property, he resolved that the professed fathers of the society should possess no real estates or revenues, either individually or in common, but that colleges might enjoy revenues and rents, for the maintenance of students of the order and the advancement of learning. He summoned all his followers to Rome, and at last, in 1540, was able to lay the programme and constitutions of the new order before the Pope, who, after the opposition raised by some of the cardinals had been overcome, solemnly confirmed them by the bull (dated Sept. 27, 1540) "Regimini militantis ecclesiæ." The bull recites and approves the "form of life" which had been devised by the founder for those who should join his institute. Preaching, spiritual exercises, works of charity, teaching the catechism, and hearing confessions, were to be their employments. The general or prelate to be chosen was to decide on the work to be done by each individual member, and to frame any new constitutions that might be needed, with the consent of his associates. Before admission, all were to undergo a long probation.

The Society being thus confirmed, the members met for the election of a general, and Ignatius was unanimously nominated. He refused at first, but afterwards yielded, and entered upon the office in April 1541. The Constitutions, which were wholly composed by the saint, and in his native tongue, were translated into Latin by Polanco, his secretary, and first published in 1558. In them his aims and ideas, and the chief methods by which he hoped to realise them, are clearly set forth. He desired to "stand on the ancient ways," to teach men that they could not safely do otherwise, and thus prevent new defections. Novelty, curiosity, ambition, and self-indulgence, were all on the side of Protestantism; if they were to be resisted effectually, it could only be by using the same weapons of which the temper had been tried against the Cæsarism of the Romans, and the idolatry of the barbarians. This weapon was the personal sanctification of the defenders of Catholic truth. The holiness of St. Antony and the hermits won the battle for Christ in the third century. When St. Aidan began to convert the Angles of Northumbria, he established himself and his monks in a remote island, so that monastic piety might not be interrupted in its daily duties and sanctifying discipline never relax its hold on those who were preaching Christ to the heathen. Similarly St. Ignatius, instead of writing a great book, settles a round of spiritual exercises which he and his followers are to go through before attempting anything serious. His aim is to sanctify the soldiers, that by them he may sanctify the world. The rules which he prescribes are partly drawn from the contemplative life (e.g. mental prayer, examination of conscience, pious reading, frequentation of the sacraments, retreats), partly suited to form men of action. He gives no particular habit to his followers, because he designs them to live in the world and to be continually mixing with it, that they may overcome its evil, while remaining interiorly separate from it. None are to be received who have worn the habit of another order. The postulant must renounce his own will, his family, and all that men hold most dear on earth. The vows could not be taken before the age of thirty-three. A Jesuit must canvass for no office, and take no ecclesiastical dignity unless constrained by the Pope on pain of mortal sin. Six grades of membership are described: (1) novices, (2) formed temporal coadjutors, (3) approved scholastics, (4) formed spiritual coadjutors, (5) the professed of the three vows, (6) the professed of the four vows. These distinctions are observed to this day, but the professed of the three vows form only a small class; the professed of both grades and the spiritual coadjutors form not quite one half of those whom the world calls "Jesuits."

It should be observed that the name by which they are commonly known was given to them by their enemies, or by the people, not assumed by themselves. Till 1600 they never called themselves anything else but the "Company of Jesus."

Among the generals there have been Spaniards, Italians, Germans, Poles, and Belgians, but never a Frenchman.

Already in 1563 the usefulness of the new society must have been signally manifest, for the Council of Trent in that year, while laying down general rules about novices, declares that it intends not to make any change which should prevent "the religion of the clerks of the Society of Jesus from being able to serve the Lord and his Church according to their pious institute approved by the holy Apostolic See."[1]

St. Ignatius, after having founded the German College at Rome, and assisted in founding the great "Collegio Romano," having lived to see the fruit of his labours—his order being solidly established in many countries of Europe, and engaged in successful missions among the heathen in Asia, Africa, and America—passed to his reward in 1556. The following brief sketch of the subsequent history of the Society arranges events under the names of the generals down to the death of Aquaviva; and, from that point to the suppression of the Society, under the principal countries and missions in which its influence was exerted. Some of the more prominent successes and reverses which it has experienced since 1814 are all that our limits will allow us to give of its history subsequent to the re-establishment.

I. Father James Laynez, who had assisted as a theologian at the deliberations of the Tridentine Council, succeeded St. Ignatius in 1558. The chief event of his rule was his visit to Paris in 1561, on which occasion he confronted the representatives of the Huguenots at the Conference of Poissy, and did much to overcome the opposition which the Paris parliament had hitherto made to the admission of the Society. The parliament did in fact ratify in 1562 the royal edicts of Henry II. and Francis II., granting permission to the Company to erect a college in Paris. During this and the two following generalates, the progress of heresy in Germany was stopped, and much lost ground recovered, by the labours of the Jesuits, among whom the Blessed Peter Canisius was pre-eminent. This great man won the affection of the powerful archbishop of Augsburg, Otto Truchsess, who made over to the Society the University of Dillingen. They had already, in 1556, obtained a firm footing in the Bavarian university of Ingolstadt, whence they extended their efforts to other parts of Germany. The favourite calumny of the German Protestants, that the Catholic Church was hostile to learning, received an effectual practical refutation through the Jesuit colleges, in which all subjects—humanities, philosophy, the sciences, &c.—were taught according to the newest methods, and more skilfully and energetically than elsewhere.

Meantime missions to the heathen were carried on with much success. The first Jesuit mission in India had been founded by St. Francis Xavier, who landed at Goa in 1542, and by his preaching and miracles converted great numbers of the inhabitants of Travancore, the Fishery Coast, and Madura. Afterwards he carried the Gospel to Celebes and the Spice Islands, and (1549) established a flourishing church in Japan. The saint died on the island of Sancian near Macao in 1552, while endeavouring to penetrate into China. The field of the missions was tilled by many different orders, among which the Company certainly was not the least zealous. Father de Nobrega had been sent to Brazil by St. Ignatius himself, and had made a good commencement; we shall presently see by what a strong and holy hand the work was continued. By 1560 the Society had extended its activity in every direction; Melanchthon, as he lay on his deathbed in that year, is reported to have said, "Alas! What is this? I see the whole world being filled with Jesuits." Laynez died in 1565.

Under the rule of St. Francis Borgia, the third general, a relation of the emperor Charles V. (1565–1573), the advance of the Society was uninterrupted. St. Pius V. was dissatisfied with the exemption from the obligation of saying the office in choir which the order possessed under the Constitutions, and was inclined to insist on a change. But the fathers presented a memorial in which it was shown that the existing regulation was the result of profound meditation on the end and means of his institute on the part on the founder; St. Francis himself with a respectful firmness supported this view; and the Pope gave way. Affairs prospered in Germany; Austria and Bavaria, where heresy had nearly got the upper hand, remained on the whole true to the ancient faith. Canisius founded colleges at Würzburg, Olmütz, and Wilna. The Duke of Bavaria in the decree founding a Jesuit college at Landshut declared that "certainly it was to this Society that Bavaria owed the re-establishment of the faith of her ancestors, that had been shaken by the calamities of the times." The present church of the Gesù at Rome was begun in 1567. St. Charles Borromeo warmly befriended the Society in his archdiocese of Milan, founding (1572) a novitiate for them at Arona at his own expense. How dangerous the order was felt to be to the progress of Protestantism was shown by a terrible event in 1570. A Portuguese ship bound for Brazil, in which were F. Azevedo, of the Society, and thirty-nine companions, mostly novices, was attacked by a French privateer commanded by the Calvinist Jacques Sourie, of Dieppe. After a brave resistance the Portuguese vessel was overpowered, the sailors who were left alive were spared; but the Calvinists put all but one of the Jesuits to death. A somewhat similar incident happened the next year, and resulted in the murder of twelve Jesuits, of whom the chief was F. Francis de Castro, by the Huguenot captain, Capdeville, and his crew.

Under the fourth general, F. Mercurian, a Belgian (1573–1580), the genius of the great Bellarmin began to show itself; he was engaged for several years before 1577 in combating the errors of Baius, a doctor of Louvain. The members of the society, who in 1565 had numbered 3,500, distributed among 130 houses, in eighteen provinces, amounted in 1580 to upwards of 5,000, divided among twenty-one provinces.

Under the prudent but energetic rule of Aquaviva (1581–1615) the prosperity and reputation of the Society were at their height. Enterprises formerly begun developed themselves now with great rapidity and brilliancy, and new undertakings, the fame of which still resounds through the world, were commenced. The Roman College, which in 1555 had but 200 students, in 1584 had grown into a flourishing university, with more than 2,000 students, in which all the faculties but those of law and medicine were worthily represented. The ideas of St. Ignatius on the methods of instruction were worked out by Aquaviva into a systematic ratio studiorum, of which the chief feature was the thorough mastery which it aimed at giving to all their scholars over the Latin language. In the mission field, we find that extraordinary progress was made in Japan, where the Christians, who numbered but 200,000 in 1588, were 750,000 in 1612, most of these being Jesuit converts. In Brazil the work of F. de Nobrega was carried on for forty-four years by the Ven. Joseph Anchieta of the Society, who instituted native settlements much resembling the later and more celebrated Paraguayan "reductions," and has been called the Apostle of Brazil. The Jesuit missions in India, which had languished or been retarded for a time, passed into a new phase on the arrival of F. Robert de' Nobili, in 1605. Nobili thought [MISSIONS] that ideas of caste, being grounded in the very structure of Hindoo society, should be temporarily complied with, so far as was lawful, by the ambassadors of Christ. Accordingly he assumed the dress and manners of a Brahmin, and kept aloof from the inferior castes, making after a time many conversions. He died many years later (1656), and his tomb, near Madura, is still an object of popular veneration. A breach was made about this time in the heathenism of China by the success of F. Ricci and his followers. Ricci was a sound mathematician, and skilled in mechanics; and when, after twenty years' residence in China, he succeeded (1601) in making himself known to the emperor at Pekin, he soon obtained his confidence, and made the favour extended to him on account of his scientific acquirements contribute more or less to the spread and protection of Christianity. Ricci died in 1610, but was succeeded by missioners not less able and zealous—Schall, Verbiest, Gerbillon, and Bouvet. Of the differences which arose between the Jesuit and Dominican missionaries in China, something will be said in the next section. F. Valdivia carried the gospel to the Indians of Chili in 1593; a harbour, a city, and a peak of the Andes immortalise the name of the intrepid missionary. The first Paraguayan "reduction" was made in 1610, but of this great civilising enterprise a connected view must be reserved for the article on MISSIONS.

In Europe generally the progress of the order was maintained in peace; but complications arose at three principal points. The Venetian oligarchy, enraged against the fathers because they observed the interdict laid by Pope Paul V. upon the republic in 1606, banished them from Venice; and, although the rupture with the Holy See was repaired soon afterwards, would not readmit the order for fifty years. In France, where the Parliament of Paris was always hostile to the Society, the members of the latter, being charged with complicity in the attempt of Chatel to assassinate the king, Henry IV., were expelled from Paris in 1595. Henry, however, recalled them in 1601, and on that occasion administered a telling reproof to the officials of the Parliament, who had, under the influence of the jealousy which has too commonly actuated French lawyers in regard to ecclesiastics, laid before him a paper full of ridiculous calumnies against the Company. In England, where Jesuits first arrived in 1580, their pastoral work was attended by greater danger than even in Japan. The Protestant government put to death, under Elizabeth, Fathers Campion, Briant, Southwell, Walpole, &c.; and, under James, Father Oldcorne, the two Garnets, and F. Page. These martyrdoms, though unable to produce their full natural effect on account of the terrorism practised by the Government, undoubtedly led to numerous conversions, sustained the wavering faith of many, and powerfully contributed to keep alive the flame of Catholicism in the breasts of a down-trodden but unconquerable minority.

The Company numbered in its ranks at this time some of the finest and strongest minds in Europe; such were Cardinal Bellarmin, Emanuel Sa, Maldonatus, Suarez, Clavius, and Canisius. The saintly life of St. Aloysius Gonzaga, who died in 1597 at the age of twenty-three, reflects a yet purer lustre on their annals. The series of "Lettres Edifiantes et Curieuses," sent by the Jesuit missioners to Europe, commences from this period.

II. 1615–1773. In this section—after a brief survey of the Jesuit missions—the history of the order in Europe, the circumstances which led to its expulsion from various kingdoms and its suppression by Clement XIV. will be related.

In India, De' Nobili, whose method of extending the gospel was approved by a bull of Gregory XV. in 1623, was succeeded by Fathers Fernandez, De Andrada, Blessed John de Britto, Beschi, Bouchet, &c. De Britto was beheaded by the king of Marava in 1693. The question of the Malabar Rites, which arose about the beginning of the eighteenth century, caused an agitation unfavourable to the progress of the missions. Still, if Southern India and Ceylon are to a great extent Christian countries, it is to these unwearied labours of the Society that the result is chiefly due. The last provincial, Father Anthony Douarte, after the suppression of the order, did not desert his converts, but, dying at a great age in 1788, bequeathed to them a box of papers relating to the mission, which he charged them to give to the future Provincial of the Jesuits in India.

In China, the establishment of the Tartar dynasty at Pekin in 1644 threatened to injure the missions, but the new rulers were at first not unfriendly. The Dominicans had come to China in 1633; they found that the Jesuits tolerated in their converts the continued adherence to certain customs and ceremonies which appeared to savour of idolatry; a protracted controversy arose which spread from China to Europe. [For an account of these ceremonies see CHINESE RITES, in the appendix.] Clement XI. sent out De Tournon, the patriarch of Antioch, in 1703, to India and China as his legate. Soon after his landing at Goa, De Tournon issued a pastoral, in which he unconditionally condemned the Malabar rites. The Jesuits, fearing the effect of the prohibition on the native mind, resolved on appealing to the Holy See, and De Tournon gave his verbal consent to their doing so. From India the legate passed to China, and in 1706 condemned the ceremonies as unfit for Christians to use. The emperor Kang Hi, who had always maintained that they had only a civil meaning, was extremely angry, and gave up De Tournon into the hands of the Portuguese at Macao, by whom he was imprisoned and ill-treated, dying in consequence in 1710. A brief of Clement XI. in 1710, followed by the bull "Ex illa die" in 1715, confirmed the legate's condemnation, first of some, then of all the obnoxious ceremonies. The indignation of Kang Hi was extreme, and the new legate, Cardinal Mezza Barba, perceiving the great difficulty of the case, authorised the Jesuit fathers to make a fresh application to Rome, and in the meantime to suspend their obedience to the briefs. The application was vain; Clement XII. confirmed the bull "Ex illa die," and Benedict XIV. by his bull in 1742 (before which the Jesuits are said to have submitted unreservedly) confirmed the decisions of his predecessors, and finally settled the question.

Kang Hi, after a reign of sixty years, died in 1722, and was succeeded by Yung Tchin, who immediately ordered a persecution of the Christians. His son, Khian-loung, was a man of singular character; political and personal motives prevented him from embracing Christianity, but he respected and loved the Jesuit fathers, whom he drew to his Court at Pekin, and was especially gratified by the skill with which they ministered to his scientific and artistic tastes. Father Benoist constructed a fountain to please him; other Jesuits made wonderful clocks and automata, or prepared charts, or painted the halls of his palace. Yet he was afraid of allowing Christianity to become powerful in the empire, lest it should open the door to an ascendancy on the part of some European nation, similar to what was taking place before his eyes in India. While, therefore, the Jesuits at Pekin were safe and honoured, the Christian communities in many provinces were cruelly persecuted. Eight Jesuits were strangled at Nankin in 1748. The decree of suspension became known at Pekin in 1774. The fathers Amiot, Cibot, Dollières, and others, though wounded to the heart by the ruin of their beloved society, remained at their posts, and there died, Amiot not till 1794. The benevolent dispositions of the emperor towards them were never changed.

In Japan, where the prospects of Christianity had been so bright, all was suddenly overclouded. Taicosama, who seized the supreme power in 1583, commenced a persecution of the Christians, but with no great malignity or fixity of purpose. Hence at his death in 1598 the native church was more flourishing than ever. Daifusama, who succeeded him as regent, reigned till 1615. In 1612 an English merchant captain, named Adams, is said to have made the regent believe that the real designs of the Jesuits were political, and that his only safety lay in exterminating them. A terrible persecution was then begun, which Xogun, the son of Daifusama, carried on with demoniacal cruelty and persistency. Before 1640, after scores of thousands of Japanese Christians had suffered martyrdom, and great numbers had apostatised, all public profession of Christianity was stopped, and the Jesuit mission—the missioners having been killed or banished—came to an end. From that time Europeans could only land their goods at one port in Japan, and then after trampling on the cross.

The missions of the society in North America have been described by an American Protestant,[1] in a tone generally fair and almost sympathetic. Samuel de Champlain, a French naval officer, founded Quebec in 1608; in 1625 Jesuit missionaries arrived there, and after providing for the spiritual wants of the colonists, began to preach to the Red Indians. The Huron nation proved to be the most tractable: most of them became Christians, and showed considerable aptitude for agriculture and other civilising employment under the guidance of the fathers. The Iroquois from the south, instigated by the settlers in the British colonies, made war on the Hurons and nearly annihilated them. Fathers Lallemand, Daniel, and Brebeuf were put to death with every species of torture in 1649. The Abenakis, a tribe living on the Kennebec river between Canada and New England, asked for and received baptism in a body. The remnant of the Hurons was gathered round Montreal and Quebec. The treaty which in 1760 transferred the French possessions in North America to Great Britain provided for the maintenance of the Catholic religion in the ceded provinces; hence it is that the Indian and half-caste population of British America, among whose ancestors the Jesuits laboured and suffered, are to this day mainly Catholic. In the early part of the eighteenth century, the Abenakis were in the care of Father Rasles; a body of armed colonists from New England (1724) attacked their settlements on the Kennebec, dispersed the Indians, and butchered the unresisting missionary.[1] In 1673 the Jesuit Father Marquette, making his way to the south-west from Lake Michigan, discovered the Mississippi, which Frenchmen soon descended, and founded the colony of Louisiana at its mouth. The French nation, which first opened the valleys of the St. Lawrence and the Mississippi, long ago wrested from them by their rivals, realised to the full—history can show no more striking instance—the bitter truth of the adage, Sic vos non vobis.

Jesuits assisted Sir George Calvert in founding the Catholic colony of Maryland in 1633.

St. Peter Claver († 1654), a Spanish Jesuit, called the Apostle of the Negroes, spent more than forty years in New Granada, assisting corporally and spiritually the poor Africans whom the Spaniards were bringing over in great numbers at that time to work on the plantations.

Of the Jesuit mission in Paraguay—the most remarkable example of a whole people transformed and exalted through Christianity that has been known since the middle ages—an account will be found under MISSIONS. The first "Reduction," or colony, was founded in 1610; in 1717 the Christian Indians in all the Reductions numbered 120,000. A transaction between Spain and Portugal in 1758 caused the transfer of the territory on which the Reductions stood to the latter power; Pombal dispersed the Jesuit teachers; the white settlers, with their selfish greed and indifference to native rights, had everything their own way, and the fair experiment was ruined.

Returning now to Europe, we find that the history of the Society in Italy and Spain in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries was marked by few striking events. In Germany the fathers devoted themselves with great ardour to the mitigation of the miseries caused by the Thirty Years' War. The emperor Ferdinand III., and also his general, Count Tilly, had received their education in Jesuit colleges; both of them loved and valued the society. In Poland a Jesuit ascended the throne in 1648 in the person of John Casimir. In Belgium arose in the seventeenth century the great modern school of hagiographers [Bollandists], Bollandus publishing the first volume of the "Acta Sanctorum" at Antwerp in 1643. He and all his coadjutors, Henschen, Papebroch, Stilting, &c., were Jesuits, and the resumed work is still in the hands of the Society.

In England the penal laws forbade any freedom of action to Jesuits even more than to seculars; yet in 1634 two hundred and fifty members of the Company are said to have been in the kingdom. Father Arrowsmith suffered in Lancashire in 1628; under Charles II. five Jesuits were executed during the panic at the time of the Popish Plot. The favour of James II. inspired them with false hope, and led to an extension of operations; colleges began to rise, but these buds were nipped by the "killing frost" of the Revolution. Yet, the laws being now more mildly executed, the fathers in England in 1700 numbered 131; and this number probably did not vary much down to the suppression.

In Ireland, the barbarous tyranny of the government under Elizabeth and James I. was replaced in the next reign by a somewhat easier state of things. The Jesuits on the mission, who had before 1620 been attached to the houses of the Catholic nobility, after that date were able to live in a more regular way, and in a short time they had eight colleges and residences. But, as the Vandal heretics extinguished civilisation in Roman Africa, so the renascent well-being and culture of Ireland were uprooted by the Puritan invaders under Cromwell. Amidst an infinite number of other calamities which then fell on the country, the Jesuit colleges were destroyed, and the mission broken up. In 1713 there were but eleven Jesuits in all Ireland, with Father Knowles as their superior; and these could only exercise their ministry in secret. A few continued to labour there till 1773.

The fortunes of the order in France, Spain, and Portugal have still to be noticed. In France the success of the fathers in education was remarkable. The Collège de Clermont, founded in 1562, changed its name to "Collège de Louis le Grand," and towards the end of the seventeenth century numbered 2,500 scholars. In the confessional, the fathers were charged with letting off too easily such of their penitents as desired to conciliate the claims of the world and the flesh with those of the Gospel. They were said to be lax casuists; and on this ground Pascal attacked them (1656) in his celebrated "Lettres Provinciales." On the struggle between them and the Jansenists, see the article Jansenism, and, on the Quesnel controversy, the article Unigenitus, Bull of. With the declaration of the French clergy in 1682 [Gallicanism] the French Jesuits had nothing to do; but they incurred the displeasure of Innocent XI. by refusing or neglecting to publish the bull against Louis XIV. on the question of the Regalia, and the Pope forbade them to receive novices. The great preacher Bourdaloue († 1704), and F. de la Colombière, the director of St. Margaret Mary Alacoque, flourished at this time. In the middle of the eighteenth century, a league of many parties and persons was formed for the destruction of the order. The Marquise de Pompadour hated them because they would not countenance in any shape the immoral relation subsisting between her and the king, Louis XV. Voltaire, himself one of their pupils, and not averse to doing them justice on occasion, as many passages in his works prove, desired their extinction as the defenders of revealed religion and the upholders of the purity of private morals. The whole party of the Encyclopædists and freethinkers were naturally their enemies; the remains of the Jansenist party longed to be revenged on them; the Parliament and university were hostile to them, as they had ever been. Lastly, the Minister, the Duc de Choiseul—who by his blundering had just lost Canada for France—being in sympathy with the freethinkers, was disposed to yield to the clamour which the many ill-wishers of the Company raised, and to induce the king also to yield. In April and August 1762 edicts of the Parliament of Paris closed the Jesuit colleges and declared their order to be inadmissible in any civilised State. The archbishop of Paris, Christopher de Beaumont, put himself courageously on their side, and the secular clergy generally took the same line. Nevertheless, Louis XV. confirmed (November 1764) the edict of the Parliament, and about four thousand Jesuits, their colleges having been closed and their property plundered, were compelled to depart from France.

The fall of the order in Spain was a mysterious event. It was the work of the irresponsible despotism which ruled the country, and which, as it had been swift and stern for ages in repressing whatever was against the Church, so now, being itself perverted, dealt sudden blows that none could parry on the great Company—the creation of Spanish genius—which existed only for the Church's defence and glory. D'Aranda, the Minister of Charles III., is said to have induced him to believe that the Jesuit general, Ricci, had boasted of possessing documents showing that the king was an illegitimate child. The wrathful Charles immediately caused a despatch to be written to all the government authorities in Spain and the colonies, requiring that all the Jesuit fathers should be forthwith conducted to the nearest port, and compelled to take ship for some foreign country. Six thousand Spanish Jesuits were ruined and exiled at a blow, by what can only be regarded as the act of a lunatic.

Previously to this, the order had been despoiled and banished from Portugal by the famous Carvalho, Count de Pombal. Pombal was a man of iron determination, and unscrupulous in the choice of means. In 1750 he had been made Secretary of State to Joseph I., and set himself actively and ably to work to revive the languishing trade and industry of Portugal. He had been Portuguese minister in England for several years from 1739. A mind so observant must have been struck by the docility of the Anglican clergy, and the ease with which, being isolated from the rest of Christendom, they were managed by the Government of the day, and it was probably this experience which led him to form plans for a similar national church in Portugal, separated from the Holy See and the hierarchy. The Jesuits, the sworn defenders of Papal rights, stood in his way; they must therefore be suppressed. Into the intricate history of the plot to assassinate the king, and the manner in which Pombal used it against the Jesuits, besides attacking them in other ways, it is impossible here to enter. In the end, their property was sequestrated, the University of Coimbra taken out of their hands, and the fathers themselves (1759) to the number of two hundred and fifty-five, banished from Portugal. Clement XIII. vainly pleaded that they might be treated with ordinary justice. On the death of Joseph I. in 1777 Pombal was disgraced, declared a criminal, and forbidden to live within twenty leagues of Lisbon. A new inquiry being ordered into the alleged conspiracy of 1758, those who by Pombal's management had been condemned to death or imprisonment were exonerated from all criminality. From some of these had been extorted by torture the statement that the Jesuits were concerned in the plot; this statement, of course, if the revising tribunal may be trusted, falls to the ground.

The order had been expelled from France, Spain, Portugal and Naples, but it was still protected in Austria by Maria Theresa. Her son, afterwards Joseph II., used all his influence against them; he was said to covet their estates. Diplomatic pressure was used by all the Courts which had expelled the order to induce Clement XIII. to decree their suppression, but the aged Pope stood firm. On his death in 1769, the Bourbon sovereigns used every effort to secure the election of a Pontiff who would comply with their views. Cardinal Ganganelli was elected and took the name of Clement XIV. He hesitated long before taking the decisive step to which he was urged. At length (1773) he signed the Constitution "Dominus ac Redemptor noster," by which, on the ground of the numerous complaints and accusations of which the Society was the object, without declaring them to be either guilty or innocent, he suppressed the order in every part of the world, and directed that those of its members who were priests should fall into the ranks of the secular clergy.

In 1626 the Society had possessed 15,000 members. At the time of the suppression the total number was about 20,000.

Lalande, the astronomer, said of the suppression, "Carvalho and Choiseul have irretrievably destroyed the finest work of man, unrivalled by any human institution. . . . The human race has lost that wonderful and invaluable assembly of 20,000 men, disinterestedly and unceasingly occupied with functions most important and most useful to man."

III. Frederic the Great, King of Prussia, refused to have anything to do with the suppression; he retained the Jesuits in his dominions, and desired them to exercise their teaching and other functions, so far as was possible, as if nothing had happened. Catherine II., Empress of Russia, supported them with so much zeal that the Pope ultimately exempted Russia from the operation of the bull of suppression; novices were received in that country without interruption during the interregnum. Other attempts were made to keep the order alive (see BACCANARISTS). In 1814 Pius VII., by the constitution "Solicitudo omnium Ecclesiarum," derogated from the brief of suppression, and appointed Francis Karen, who was then provincial in Russia, general of the whole order. Since the restoration the fortunes of the Society have varied with the varying strength of the infidel and revolutionary forces which from time to time have been opposed to it. In France, where their colleges had been brilliantly successful, an envious agitation was set on foot against them by the University, to which the government of Charles X. weakly yielded and closed their colleges (1828). Under the Second Empire they enjoyed freedom; the Republican Government has again (1880) closed their colleges, and denied them the right of corporate and regular existence. In Switzerland they had a noble university at Fribourg, and their influence was great in the Forest Cantons and the Valais. The anarchic and infidel elements in Swiss society, combining with the Protestants and encouraged by Lord Palmerston, raised in 1846 the war of the Sonderbund; the Catholic cantons were crushed by superior numbers, and the Jesuits banished from the Confederacy.

At the present day the total number of members of the Society is believed to be about ten thousand.

JESUS (Ἰησοῦς, יֵשׁוּעַ). Name and Feast of the Name.—The name means, not, as is often said, "Saviour" or "God the Saviour," but "the Lord [i.e. Jehova] is help or salvation." It is simply a shortened form of Josue (יְהוֹשֻׁעַ), which in the LXX appears as "Jesus," and, according to Delitzsch ("History of Redemption," p. 182), was a common name in post-exilic times. In our Lord's case, it had, however, a pre-eminent fitness because in Him, through the perfect example of his life and through his death, the salvation of God came to the children of men. This name was announced to the Blessed Virgin by the angel, and actually imposed on our Lord at his circumcision. It was his personal, whereas "Christ" was his official, name.

In all ages of course Christians have spoken with devotion of this holy name, and St. Paul's words in the epistle to the Philippians will occur to everyone. The devotion received a new impulse and took a tangible form in the fifteenth century. The Franciscan friar St. Bernardine of Sienna (d. 1440) used to exhibit before the people to whom he preached a board with the holy name painted on it in the midst of rays, and he persuaded a poor man who used to paint cards and had been ruined by the saint's sermons against gambling to make a living in another way—viz. by painting the holy name. The new devotion was examined before Martin V., prohibited for a time, defended by St. John Capistran, and finally approved by the Holy See. A third Franciscan, Bernardine de Bustis, composed an office of the Holy Name, which he offered for approval to Sixtus IV. and Innocent VIII., but without success. At last Clement VII. approved the office for use in the Franciscan order; permission to use it was extended by subsequent Popes to other churches, and at last Innocent XIII., yielding to the prayers of the Emperor Charles VI., on November 29, 1721, ordered the feast to be celebrated throughout the Church on the second Sunday after Epiphany.

JEWS, CHURCH LAWS RESPECTING. When Christianity became supreme, we find Constantine publishing restrictive edicts against the Jews, in which it was declared penal for them to insult or injure converts to Christianity, and the adoption of Judaism by those not born to it was forbidden. The Theodosian Code brands the desertion of Christianity for Judaism as apostasy, and the blending together the rites and doctrines of the two as heresy. In Spain, where Jews were numerous, a long series of canons regulating the relations between them and Christians may be quoted from the Acts of the early councils. These were severe in their tenor, for, indeed, the Talmudic Jew, with his intense pride of race, and scorn and hatred of other nations, was a difficult person to deal with. The Fourth Council of Toledo (633), over which St. Isidore of Seville presided, ordered that Jews should be no longer coerced to become Christians, but that those who had been so coerced in the reign of king Sisebut, should not, since they had received Christian sacraments, be allowed to return to Judaism. This council also ordered that the children of Jews should be separated from them and placed in monasteries, or in pious Christian families, to be instructed in Christianity. This sweeping measure can only have been partially carried out; for at the Eighth Council of Toledo (653) we find the king undertaking to protect the Catholic faith against Jews and heretics, and it is ordered that the decrees of the fourth council respecting Jews should be observed. Again, a canon of the ninth council (655) directs that baptised Jews be obliged to repair to the cities on the principal festivals, in order that the bishops might be able to judge of the sincerity of their conversion. The Jews in Spain, being through Talmudic influences more in sympathy with Islam than the religion of Christ, assisted the Moors in the eighth century to master the country and destroy the kingdom of the Visigoths.

The Third Council of Orleans (538) made some important canons. It allowed that Christians should be in servitude to Jewish masters; if, however, a Christian slave took sanctuary because his master was tampering with his religion, he was not to be returned to bondage but redeemed at a fair valuation. Jews were not to appear in the streets nor hold intercourse with Christians on the three last days of Holy Week and Easter Sunday.

In the later legislation, a constitution of Clement XI. ("Propagandæ per universum"), another of Benedict XIV. ("Postremo mense"), and an epistle of the last-named Pontiff, are prominently cited. By the first it is provided that if a Jew become a Christian, the portion of his father's goods falling to him shall not be withheld by the family on account of his conversion. But he is not allowed to disinherit his other brothers, as in the case of that infamous law of the Irish Parliament, according to which, if the younger son of a Catholic landowner became a Protestant, he could take the whole estate, and reduce the rest of the family to beggary.

The following were some of the prescriptions of the ancient law. The Jews in Rome were bound to observe Church holidays so far as their public occupations were concerned. They were required to live together in a particular quarter (the Ghetto). Some distinction of dress, sufficient to show that they were not Christians, was required from both sexes. The word of God was to be preached to them once a week by a master in theology —if possible, one who was versed in Hebrew. The tribunals of the Inquisition were allowed to proceed against Jews only in case of their having made themselves amenable to their jurisdiction by certain definite overt acts. It was lawful for Christian princes to tolerate Jews, their rites and synagogues, within their dominions; and having been once so received and assured of protection, they could not, except for some just and weighty cause, be expelled.

The children of Jews, not having the use of free-will, ought not to be baptised against the will of their parents. A Jewish boy who asks to be baptised, not having attained to the use of reason, is to be given back to his parents; but not otherwise. Infant children of Jews, baptised validly, though illicitly, by a nurse or some other person, must be educated by Christians, and when they have come to the use of reason must be compelled to perseverance in the Catholic faith. Under the operation of this rule arose the celebrated Mortara case, about eighteen years ago. Copies of the Talmud are to be searched for and burnt. In justification of this and other severities the canonists are wont to make copious extracts from that extraordinary compilation, which, with much that is grave and noble, contains also so many puerilities, immoral precepts, and anti-social maxims, that Christian courts may well have deemed it right to resort to stringent measures to prevent Christians from being seduced into adhesion to a system so preposterous. For illustrations—not to speak of those given by Ferraris,[1] which may not be entirely trustworthy—the reader is referred to the Abbé Chiarini's translation,[1] and to a recent work by Oort.[2] It must not be supposed that the modern Jews are free to reject any part of the Talmud that may displease them. If the Old Testament is the written, the Talmud contains the oral, law of Jehovah; a consistent Jew believes that God speaks to him through the Rabbins as much as through the prophets.[3] Even the legendary part, the "Haggadah," according to the Jewish editor of "Selections from the Talmud" published in the "Chandos Classics," does not stagger them. "The majority of the [Jewish] people," he says, "clung to it, and regarded the Talmud as a complete whole worthy of their reverence."

"The Talmud," says the Abbé Chiarini,[4] "explains the written law by the oral in the name of the Eternal," and the Jews, he declares, have ever valued it highly as "a wall raised between Jews and non-Jews always and everywhere."

JOHN OF GOD, ST., ORDER OF. St. John of God established his Order of Charity for serving the sick at Granada in 1540. It spread so rapidly that at the close of the last century, before the Jacobins had shut the doors of its hospitals in France, and the "Liberals" in Spain, the two generalates of Spain and Italy, into which the order was divided, numbered 2,914 religious, with 281 hospitals under their care, in which there were more than 10,000 beds, and an average of 85,000 patients were received and attended to yearly. The brothers of this order are said to have been the first to establish the rule in hospitals that every patient should have a bed to himself. From a minute statement of their system of hospital management, printed by the continuator of Hélyot, it would appear that they practised all the regulations which the régime of the best modern hospitals prescribes for the comfort and medical treatment of their patients, and in addition were tenderly solicitous for their souls, urging those to confession who had long discontinued or were disinclined to it, and facilitating the return to God of all the sufferers who passed through their hands. (Hélyot, continuation [Migne], iv. 612.)

JOHN, ST., OF JERUSALEM, ORDER OF. [See HOSPITALLERS.]

JOSEPH, ST. St. Joseph occupies a place of his own in the devotion of modern Catholics, such as is given to no other saint. This and the fact that the history of the devotion is peculiarly instructive on the one hand, specially liable to misunderstanding on the other, are the reasons for inserting this article in a work which does not profess to give Lives of the Saints. The devotion to St. Joseph is a striking instance of Catholic usage, modern in itself and yet based on most ancient and Scriptural principles.

The facts of the gospel history concerning St. Joseph need not be repeated except so far as they exhibit his dignity. He was the true husband of Mary, and as such her head. Moreover, Christ Himself (Luc. ii. 51), was "subject" to him. In consequence of his authority and his provident care, he is honoured with the title of the "Father" of Christ (Luc. ii. 48), although of course Christ had no man for his father in the proper sense of the word. To have been chosen by God Himself as the husband of the Virgin Mother and the foster-father of our Lord—these surely are solid grounds for a singular devotion to St. Joseph. We may notice here that, as he is never mentioned after our Lord's public life began, he is supposed to have died before our Blessed Lord, and is therefore reckoned among Old Testament saints.

The Catholic work of Rohling, "Der Talmudjude" (1877), is severely handled by Delitzsch, "Rohling's Talmudjude beleuchtet" (1881). A really scientific account of Jewish theology will be found in Weber's excellent work, "System der Altsynagogalen Palästinischen Theologie" (Leipzig, 1880). Wagenseil ("Tela ignea Satanæ," 1681), Eisenmenger ("Entdecktes Judenthum," 1777), are marred by controversial bias. From them anti-Semitic writers draw their "facts."

[3] The post-Talmudic treatise Sopherim compares the Bible to water, the Mishna to wine, the Gemara to spiced wine. But it would be quite wrong to judge the more educated Jews by the Talmud. A reform was inaugurated by Moses Mendelssohn (d. 1786). A reformed synagogue was founded at Berlin in 1814, in London about 1840, at New York in 1843. The Reformed Jews who reject the divine authority of the Talmud, though they differ much among themselves, many of them being mere Deists, are very numerous in Germany and America. Moreover, the Reform has had great influence on educated Jews who have not openly abandoned the orthodox synagogues. For a history of the Reform, see The Jews, their Customs and Ceremonies, by the American Rabbi Myers (New York, 1877).

[4] Op. cit. p. 59.

At the same time, it was long before there was any general manifestation of this devotion. The Monophysite Christians of Egypt are said first to have assigned a festival to St. Joseph, viz. on July 20, which is thus inscribed in a Coptic almanac: "The rest of the holy old man, the just Joseph, the carpenter, husband of the Virgin Mary, Mother of God, who merited to be called the Father of Christ" (quoted in Smith's "Bible Dictionary" sub voc.). In Western martyrologies of the ninth century the name of Joseph is found, and from the same time the Greeks commemorated him along with the other saints of the Old Testament on the Sunday before Christmas, and along with Mary, David, and James the Less, on the Sunday in the octave of Christmas (Bolland. 19 Martii, in "Comment. prævv. ad S. Joseph," § 2). In the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries several orders in the West celebrated the feast of St. Joseph on March 19. Still "the feast of St. Joseph," Thomassin says ("Traité des Festes," p. 439), was unknown (i.e. as a feast of the whole Church) in the time of Gerson, who wrote different letters to cause it to be celebrated—one to the Duke of Berry in 1413, another to the cantor of the church of Chartres, another to all the churches. Gemecius, who has written the Life of Cardinal Ximenes, testifies that that cardinal "instituted in his church the feast of St. Joseph." St. Teresa and St. Francis of Sales in modern times were zealous in propagating the devotion, and Gregory XV., in 1621, as well as Urban VIII., in 1642, made St. Joseph's day (i.e. March 19) a holiday of obligation. Benedict XIII., in 1726, ordered his name to be inserted in the Litany of the Saints and in the Litany used in the "Commendation of the Soul," after that of St. John the Baptist (Gavant. tom. ii. p. 310). In 1871 Pius IX., confirming a decree of the Congregation of Rites, put the whole Church under the patronage of St. Joseph, chose him as the Church's protector, and made his feast a double of the first class. It was fitting that Christians should appeal to him who once protected the human life of our Saviour, and ask his intercession in behalf of Christ's mystical body. The same Pope had in September 1847 extended the feast and office of St. Joseph's Patronage to the whole Church. The Pope required it to be celebrated on the third Sunday after Easter as a double of the second class ("Manuale Decret. S. Rit. Cong." No. 2168). In other ways the Church has marked her approval of the growing devotion to St. Joseph. The Creed is now said in the Mass of both his feasts; his name is inserted after that of the Blessed Virgin in the prayer "A cunctis;" he is commemorated after her in the Suffrages of the Saints; and his name comes before that of any other patron except the Angels and St. John Baptist. ("Manuale," 3709.)

JOSEPH, ST., ORDERS OF.

1. Josephites. Two communities bear, or have borne, this name. The first was founded by Jacques Cretenet at Lyons about 1640, with the designation of "Priests of the Mission of St. Joseph;" it was governed by a director-general; its members did not take vows; and it devoted itself chiefly to the foreign missions. At the Revolution it was suppressed. The second is a teaching institute, founded in 1817 at Grammont in Belgium by the Canon Van Crombrugghe, for giving a good education to the sons of persons in the commercial and industrial classes. Several houses of the institute, which is understood to be in a flourishing condition, have since been founded at various places in Belgium.

2. Lay Hospitallers, Daughters of St. Joseph. This society, the chief employment of which was the education of orphan girls, was founded at Bordeaux in 1638 under the auspices of the archbishop Henri de Sourdis, by Marie Delpech, who afterwards established a great house of her order at Paris, called "De la Providence." These daughters of St. Joseph were introduced into many large towns in France, but Hélyot's continuator does not mention whether they survived the Revolution.

3. Nuns Hospitallers of St. Joseph. Founded in 1643 at La Flêche in Anjou by Mademoiselle de la Ferre. Besides the three vows of religion, these nuns took a fourth vow, to serve the poor. Before the Revolution they had five or six houses, one of which was at Montreal in Canada.

4. Nuns of St. Joseph of the Good Shepherd. This congregation was founded by the bishop of Puy, Henri de Maupas, at the suggestion of the Jesuit Father Médaille, in 1650. Though dispersed at the Revolution, the religious retained the spirit and the love of their institute, and in 1811 they were reorganised under an imperial decree, the mother house being settled at Clermont in Auvergne. This congregation is actively at work, maintaining boarding-schools and free schools.

5. Sisters of Charity of St. Joseph. The original name of the community of Sisters established by Mrs. Seton at Emmittsburg, Md., in 1809. In 1850, with its dependencies, it assumed the habit and the vows of the French Sisters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul, of which the Emmittsburg house and its dependencies now form a province. But these Sisters in the diocese of New York, whose mother-house is at Mt. St. Vincent's on the Hudson, were in 1846 made independent of Emmittsburg. [SISTERS OF CHARITY, Supplement.]

6. Sisters of St. Joseph of Cluny. The first efforts of this community, founded by Anne Marie Javouhey, may be traced back to 1807, but it was first formally authorised in 1819, being then established at Autun. The reverend mother Javouhey was superior till her death in 1851. She visited all the French colonies in Asia, Africa, and America, besides several of those belonging to England, and resided for a considerable time in some of them. A burning desire to labour in the conversion and civilisation of the negro and other aboriginal races took possession of her in consequence of these visits. She established her sisters in nearly all the French colonies; they never spared themselves when teaching, or nursing, or any other good work was required of them, and they have happily paved the way for the eventual reception of Christianity by many an African nation and American tribe. The congregation was confirmed by the Holy See in 1854. In 1859 it had 135 houses with 1323 members, including lay sisters. The establishments abroad (at the Senegal, French Guiana, Madagascar, Tahiti, &c.) employed 439 sisters, all natives of France, with the exception of a few who came from Reunion, Martinique, and Trinidad.

7. Sisters of St. Joseph of Bourg. This institute, founded in 1828 by Mgr. Devie, bishop of Belley, in concert with the reverend mother Saint Benoît, at Bourg in the department of Ain, and devoting itself to teaching and works of charity, has spread itself in many parts of France, Switzerland, and America. In 1859 an average of two hundred candidates yearly presented themselves for the noviciate.

8. Sisters of St. Joseph of the Apparition. Of this congregation, founded in the south of France by Madame de Vialard in 1833, there were thirty houses in 1859, chiefly in Algeria and Australia. The mother house is at Marseilles; teaching and nursing the sick are their chief employments.

9. Sisters or Daughters of St. Joseph. This offshoot of the nuns of St. Joseph (No. 4 above) was in 1836 introduced into the diocese of St. Louis by Bishop Rosati. The Sisters of St. Joseph have since been introduced into many other dioceses of the United States as well as Canada.

JUBILEE. The year of jubilee (שְׁנַת הַיּוֹבֵל) was an institution of the Levitical law (Levit. xxv. 8 ad fin.). The Jews were to number seven sabbaths of years—i.e. forty-nine years, and the fiftieth (not the forty-ninth, as Petavius and many others have maintained against the plain words of the text v. 10, and Jewish tradition attested by Philo, Josephus, and the Talmud, was the year of jubilee. The blast of the trumpet proclaimed the jubilee throughout the land on the tenth day of the seventh month—i.e. on the day of atonement. The land was to rest, as in sabbatical years; land and houses in the open country or in villages, without walls, reverted to their original owners or their heirs; all Hebrew slaves were to go free. The law as a whole has no parallel in any other code, and it had a distinctly theocratic character. The Hebrews were the servants of God and could not, therefore, be the servants of men; the land belonged to God, and was only lent to the Hebrew tribes and families, who could not, therefore, be driven out by any human arrangement. The original position of affairs was to be restored after the sacred sabbatical period of years and on the day of atonement, when Israel's sins were purged and his communion with God renewed. Various explanations are given of the word jubilee, which is the English form of יוֹבֵל. Some (e.g. Gesenius and Knobel) suppose that the word means "joyful sound" (from יָבַל); others make it refer to the lengthened blast of the trumpet or the streaming crowds of people (from יָבַל, to flow. See Hitzig on Jer. xxxiv. 8.) Probably it is an old word for a horn or trumpet (Ewald, "Alterthüm," pp. 417 seq.; Dillmann on Levit., p. 609; cf. Exod. xix. 13, Jos. vi. 4–13). Most likely the "year of setting free;" Ezek. xlvi. 16–18, is the year of jubilee. (So Dillmann, against Kuenen, "Godsd." i. 96; Wellhausen, "Geschichte des Volkes Israel," i. pp. 122 seq.; Smend on Ezek. pp. 382 seq., who take it to mean the sabbatical year.)

The Church of Christ has adopted the term jubilee from the Jewish Church, and proclaims from time to time a "year of remission"—from the penal consequences of sin: she offers to her children, if they repent and make their peace with God and perform certain pious works, a plenary indulgence, and during this year she empowers even ordinary confessors to absolve from many reserved cases and censures, from vows, &c., &c. An ordinary jubilee occurs at Rome every twenty-fifth year, lasts from Christmas to Christmas, and is extended in the following year to the rest of the Church. An extraordinary jubilee is granted at any time, either to the whole Church or to particular countries or cities, and not necessarily, or even usually, for a whole year. If the jubilee, whether ordinary or extraordinary, be granted to the faithful generally, the conditions for gaining it usually are to fast for three days—viz. on a Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday; to visit certain churches, and pray according to the intention of the Pope, to give alms, to confess and communicate.

It was in 1300 that the first jubilee was given. An impression prevailed at that time that a great indulgence was granted in Rome at the beginning of each century, and with this belief many pilgrims flocked to the city. No document in the Papal archives was found to confirm the tradition, but Boniface VIII. granted on February 22, "and for each hundredth year to come, not only a full and more ample, but rather a most full pardon of all sins" to those who repented and confessed, and visited the churches of St. Peter and St. Paul thirty times if Romans, fifteen times if strangers. The contemporary historian Giovanni Villani reckons the number of pilgrims to Rome that year at 200,000. Clement VI. in a bull of 1343 made the jubilee recur every fiftieth year, adding to the previous conditions a visit to the Lateran church. This year the number of pilgrims is said to have reached a million. Urban VI., in 1389, reduced the cycle of the jubilee to thirty-three; Paul II., in 1470, to twenty-five years. (The chief works on the subject are "Istoria degli Anni Santi," scritta da Alfani, Napoli, 1725; "Tractatus historico-theologicus de Jubilæo, auctore Fr. Theodoro a Sp. S.," Romæ, 1750; the Bull of Benedict XIV., "Inter præteritos," Dec. 3, 1749.)

JUDGMENT, GENERAL. The fact that Christ will judge all men and angels together at the last day is taught with such clearness and iteration in the New Testament and in all the Creeds that we need not set about proving it here. It will be more to the purpose if we attempt to give a summary of the common theological teaching and popular belief on the matter, endeavouring to distinguish what is doubtful from that which is certain. We may remark by way of preface that the general judgment is intended to manifest before all intelligent creatures the justice of God, to exhibit Christ in his majesty before their eyes, to glorify the just, and to put the wicked to open shame.

1. The Circumstances of the Judgment.—"As to the way in which that judgment will take place, and in which men are to be assembled, much cannot be known for certain." So St. Thomas writes ("Suppl." lxxxviii. 4) and no sober-minded person will hesitate to agree with him. But he goes on to say that there is a probability in the inference from Scripture that as Christ ascended from Mount Olivet to heaven, so He will descend upon it to judge the world. This probability will not be rated high by those who believe that our Lord did not ascend from the summit of the mountain, but from Bethany, on its eastern slopes.[1] It was most natural that He should bid his disciples farewell in a retired place, endeared by many sacred memories, but such a spot offers no striking fitness for his re-appearance to judge the world. At the "sound of a trumpet"—i.e. according to St. Thomas ("Suppl." lxxvi. 2), either the voice or the mere apparition of Christ—the dead will wake. "The sign of the Son of Man will appear in heaven" (Matt. xxiv. 30). There is nothing in the context to indicate the precise nature of this sign, but as the previous verse speaks of the darkening of the heavenly bodies, the "sign" seems to consist in some luminous appearance following the darkness and ushering in the Messianic glory. The common opinion of the Fathers since Cyril of Jerusalem ("Cat." 15), and of the schoolmen, is that the "sign" is the sign of the cross, conspicuous in the sky, and this opinion developed in the minds of some into the notion that the fragments of the wooden cross on which Christ died would be united miraculously and exhibited in the sky. Scripture tells us that Christ will appear in his majesty "in the clouds" (Matth. xxvi. 64), "with the angels of his might, in a flame of fire" (1 Cor. iii. 13, 2 Thess. i. 7)—fire which, according to Suarez ("In III. P." disp. 57, quoted by Jungmann), "will precede the judge on his way to judgment, in order to strike the damned with instant terror and to be the beginning of their torment. Christ will take his seat on his throne, and the just will be placed on the right, the wicked on the left, of Christ (Matth. xxv. 31–33). It is impossible to say how far these expressions are to be taken strictly, and great Catholic authorities have leant, some to a literal, some to a metaphorical explanation (see e.g. the authors quoted by Maldonatus on the passage in Matthew). Lastly, it has been a popular belief among Christians, as well as among Jews and Moslems, that the judgment will take place in the valley of Josaphat, which has been identified with the narrow ravine of the Kidron on the eastern side of Jerusalem. This belief arose from the words of Joel (iv. 1; cf. v. 12), "For behold in those days, and in that time, when I will turn again the captivity of Judah and Jerusalem, I will gather together all the nations and bring them down to the valley of Jehoshaphat, and will contend with them there because of my people and my inheritance Israel." It is very doubtful whether the valley of Josaphat was a real place at all; in verse 14 it is called the "valley of decision," and the name Jehoshaphat means "the Lord has judged." If the prophet had a real place in view he may possibly have had the valley in the wilderness of Tekoa (2 Paralip. xx.), where Josaphat won a signal victory over three heathen nations. Anyhow, no valley of Josaphat near Jerusalem is mentioned in the Scriptures or in Josephus, or in any document older than the "Onomasticon" of Eusebius. Remigius, on the strength of Joel's words, asserted, in the middle of the ninth century, that the wicked would be placed for trial in the valley of Josaphat, while the just were caught up in the air to meet their judge. This, says Merx, in his recent commentary on Joel (p. 199), is the earliest place in a Christian commentary on Joel, "where the final judgment is fixed geographically and topographically at Jerusalem in the valley of Jehosaphat." In the commentary to which we have just referred an elaborate account of Christian and Jewish opinion on the matter will be found.

[1] See Luc. xxiv. 50. The Empress Helena built, in memory of the Ascension, a church on the top of Mount Olivet, close to a cave in which our Lord was said to have taught (Euseb. Vit. Constant. iii. 43). The position of the church probably occasioned the belief, of which no traces appear till a much later date, that Christ ascended from the summit.

2. "The man Christ is the judge, but [He exercises this office] with a power and authority which is not human but divine" (Petav. "De Incarnat." xii. 16). The saints (1 Cor. vi. 2) act with Him in his judicial functions; though probably this only means that they approve the justice of the sentence. It seems plain from Matth. xix. 28, that the Apostles are to judge the world in a stricter sense, though it is hard to imagine what this sense can be. St. Thomas conjectures ("Suppl." lxxxix. 1) that the Apostles and "perfect" men will notify the sentence to others. It is certain that all men will be judged (see the Athanasian Creed), and it is commonly held that the word "all" is to be taken quite literally so as to include unbaptised infants, while it is at least the more approved opinion among theologians that angels also will then be tried. The books will be opened (Apoc. xx. 12)—the books, perhaps, of conscience and of God's remembrance. The examination made will consist in this, that God will enlighten the mind of each concerning his own thoughts, words, and deeds, and those of all others. Nearly all theologians hold (though the Master of the Sentences was of a different mind) that the sins even of the just will be openly declared, in order that the judgment may be complete, and that God's justice and mercy may shine forth. In each individual case sentence will be pronounced. St. Thomas ("Suppl." lxxxviii. 2), deems it more likely that no oral words will be used in the sentence. Many, however, who are at one with him in thinking that no oral words will be used to individuals, still believe that the words in Matth. xxv. "Come, ye blessed of my Father," &c., "Depart, ye cursed," &c., will be orally addressed to the multitude of the saved and of the lost.

JUDGMENT, PARTICULAR. The doctrine of the Church on this point is clearly explained in the following words of the Roman Catechism (P. I. a. 7 of the Creed). There are "two occasions on which each and every man must appear before God, and render an account of every thought, action and word, undergoing finally the immediate sentence of the judge. Of these occasions the first happens when a man departs this life; for straightway he is set before the judgment-seat of God, and there a most just inquiry is made into all that he has ever done, said, or thought, this being called the private" (or, as we usually say in English, the particular) "judgment." The essence of the doctrine lies in the belief that the eternal lot of the soul is determined by the judgment of God immediately after its separation from the body, and so much as this must be considered an article of faith, although there has been no formal and explicit definition on the point. The doctrine, however, is clearly implied in the statement of the Council of Florence, that souls which quit their bodies in a state of grace, but in need of purification, are cleansed in purgatory, whereas souls which are perfectly pure "are at once (mox) received into heaven," and those which depart "in actual mortal, or merely with original, sin," "at once descend into hell"[1] ("Decretum Unionis"). The Fathers of Florence follow in this part of their decree the Constitution "Benedictus Deus," issued by Benedict XII. in the year 1336.

It cannot be said that many testimonies can be produced from Scripture to prove the doctrine as it has just been propounded. Nor need we wonder at this. The books of the Hebrew Bible for the most part speak obscurely of the life beyond the grave, while those of the New Testament are chiefly occupied with the great truths that Christ had risen and that He would come again to judge the world. Still at least one passage from the gospel of St. Luke, xvi. 29 seq., justifies the belief of the Church and excludes reasonable doubt on the matter. Our Lord represents Lazarus and Dives as receiving their respective rewards immediately after death. The former goes to the "bosom of Abraham;" the latter lifts up "his eyes in Hades, being in torments." He must of course have been sentenced before the general judgment, because the rich man's brethren are spoken of as still alive. It is true that we cannot draw dogmatic inferences from all the details of this or any other parable, and it is often hard to determine how much belongs to the clothing of the narrative, how much is meant to teach a moral or doctrinal lesson. Still we may confidently regard the truth, that judgment follows hard on death, as part of the main teaching which the story conveys, and so, as we shall presently see, St. Augustine understood the passage.

Several other places of Scripture are quoted in proof, but some, as we cannot help thinking, are irrelevant, none cogent. Eccli. xi. 27 seq. may refer to the judgment which God brings on the wicked by the very act of cutting them off in the midst of their prosperity. Eccles. xi. 9, xii. 1, is far too vague to serve the purpose for which it is alleged. Our English Catechism urges the verse in the Epistle to the Hebrews (ix. 27), "It is appointed unto all men once to die, and after that the judgment." The whole passage scarcely encourages us to understand the judgment as the particular one. "As it is appointed unto all men once to die, and after this the judgment, so also Christ, being once offered to bear away the sins of many, will be manifested a second time without sin to those who wait for him unto salvation." The natural meaning seems to be that as men have to die once only and afterwards to be judged, so Christ had to die once only and afterwards will come, no longer laden with the sins of the world, to judge mankind. At all events, St. Thomas and Estius both think that the writer of the Epistle had the general, not the particular, judgment in his mind.[1]

The tradition of the Church on the particular judgment was for a long time obscured by the Millennarian errors which were held in early times even by many Catholics, otherwise orthodox, and by the uncertainty which long prevailed on the state of souls in the period between death and the general resurrection. St. Augustine, however, speaks clearly and emphatically, and that, not for himself only, but for the Church of his time. He is speaking of books on the soul written by Vincentius Victor, and he insists that there is nothing in them except what is vain or erroneous or else mere commonplace familiar to all Catholics. As an instance of the last, he gives Victor's teaching on the meaning of the parable from St. Luke about which we have already spoken. "For with respect to [1] "Infernum." Hell must be taken here in a large sense to include the Limbo of infants.

[1] Protestant commentators are also divided on the meaning of the word "judgment." See Lünemann, ad loc. Lünemann himself considers that the μετὰ τοῦτο leaves the time at which the judgment is to follow quite indefinite.

that," says St. Augustine ("De Anima et ejus Origine," lib. ii. n. 8), "which he [Victor] most rightly and very soundly believes, viz. that souls are judged when they quit the body, before they come to that judgment which must be passed upon them when reunited to the body, and are tormented or glorified in that very flesh which they inhabited here—was this, then, a matter of which you were actually unaware? Who is there with a mind so encrusted with obstinacy against the Gospel as not to hear, or hearing not to believe, these things, in the story of the poor man, taken after his death to Abraham's bosom, and of the rich man, whose torment in hell is set before us?"

Theologians adduce various arguments to show the reasonableness of belief in the particular judgment. "The time," says Suarez, "for merit and demerit ends with death; that, therefore, is the most suitable time for judging each man's acts, no reason existing for further delay" (Suarez, "In III. P." disp. 52, § 2, quoted by Jungmann, "De Noviss." cap. i. art. 2). St. Thomas meets the obvious objection that there is no need of two judgments, by pointing out that it befits each to be judged both as an individual and as a member of the whole human race; that God's justice must be publicly as well as privately manifested; and that the sentence passed in the particular judgment cannot be completely executed till the body is reunited to the soul ("Suppl." lxxxviii. 1).

The common opinion is that souls are judged at the moment and in the place of death. God manifests to the soul by some interior illumination its state and its future lot, whereupon the soul, to borrow the illustration of St. Thomas ("Suppl." lxix. 2), finds the place which belongs to it in heaven or purgatory, or hell, just as bodies find their place according to the law of gravity. Popular representations which describe the soul as borne by angels before the tribunal of God, there to be accused by devils and defended by the guardian angels, are innocent in themselves, and are, indeed, sanctioned by Scripture. Still they are popular representations, after all, not intended as accurate statements of the literal truth.

JUDICA PSALM. Ps. xlii. is said—preceded and followed by the versicle "Introibo" ("I will enter to the altar of God," &c.)—at the beginning of all Masses except those for the dead and those said during the time of the Passion. On these occasions the psalm is omitted because of its joyful character. St. Ambrose tells us the verse of the psalm already referred to, "I will enter to the altar of God: of God who maketh glad my youth," was recited by the neophytes as they walked after baptism and confirmation from the font to the altar in order to receive communion. Since the ninth century, at least, this psalm has been said at the beginning of the Mass, and this use was common to the churches of Spain, France, Germany, and England from about the same time. Le Brun, i. p. 111, gives minute details on the history of the psalm as used at Mass.

JUDICATUM. [See THREE CHAPTERS.]

JUDICES SYNODALES. The judges to whom the Roman Curia commits the trial of causes in different countries are so called. They must hold some dignity in a cathedral church, and must be nominated by the bishop in the diocesan synod. There should be not less than four for each diocese. If a judex synodalis die in the interval between two synods, the bishop nominates some one to take his place until the next synod meets. All nominations, whether in or out of synod, must be reported to the Pontifical Secretary of Petitions (supplicum libellorum). (Ferraris, Judex, § 66.)

JUDICIUM DEI (ordeal, jugement de Dieu). The proof of facts by testimony being attended with many difficulties in an unsettled state of society, it has been commonly believed in many countries that for the protection of innocence and the detection of guilt, the case being doubtful, if the divine justice were solemnly appealed to, the necessary proof would be supplied by a direct exhibition of divine power.[1] All the early barbarian codes, the Salic, Ripuarian, Burgundian law, &c., allow the appeal to the "judgment of God." The modes were various: among them were walking over red-hot ploughshares or live coals, handling red-hot iron, eating blessed bread [EULOGIÆ], the trial by hot water, and the trial by cold water. It was believed that a perjurer could not swallow blessed bread. In the trial by hot water the person whose innocence was in question had to plunge his arm into a caldron of boiling water. In that by cold water, he was bound hand and foot and thrown into a pond, a cord being fastened to him; if he floated, it was held that the water rejected him and that he was guilty; if he sank, that he was innocent. Lastly, there was the trial by combat; it being devoutly believed that the man whose cause was just would not be permitted by heaven to be vanquished by his adversary. To give a few instances —the Empress Cunegunde (about A.D. 1010) is said to have walked unhurt over red-hot ploughshares, when she appealed to the judgment of God in disproof of her alleged unchastity; the champion of the Empress Theutburga (860) passed victoriously through the trial of hot water; a monk, Petrus Igneus, in the eleventh century, to establish the truth of his testimony against the Bishop of Florence, walked between two great fires placed close together, and was not scorched. See the curious article by Kober in Wetzer and Welte, in which the view is taken that the Church permitted these ordeals, the issue of paganism, but without approving of them, and gradually, through the decisions of Popes and the treatises of doctors, assisted to put them down. Most of the ordeals were abandoned in the course of the twelfth century. The trial by combat was abolished by St. Louis (about 1250) within his own dominions; in England it was nominally legal down to a much later period.

JURISDICTION. (Jus dicere, to administer justice, was one of the "tria verba" which denoted the functions of a Roman prætor.) Jurisdiction is defined as "the power of anyone who has public authority and pre-eminence over others for their rule and government."

Jurisdiction is first divided into ecclesiastical and civil. The former is that which is concerned with causes relating to the worship of God and the spiritual salvation of souls; it is exercised either in the forum externum or in the forum internum. Civil or political jurisdiction is conversant with secular causes, and has in view the temporal government of the commonwealth. It is exercised only in the forum externum.

Jurisdiction is again divided into voluntary and contentious. The first is exercised over persons who voluntarily submit themselves to its operation, as in the case of manumissions and adoptions in the civil order, and ordinations, benedictions, absolutions, &c., in the ecclesiastical order. It must not be supposed that the validity of such acts depends upon the willingness of the parties interested to submit to them; as when a club empowers a president whom it has elected to frame bylaws for them, the validity of which depends upon the voluntary accession of the members. The acts are valid, firstly and chiefly, because done by a power which had the right to do them—i.e. which had jurisdiction. Contentious jurisdiction is that which is exercised over persons even against their will; it implies a dispute, contending parties, and a tribunal. Thirdly, jurisdiction may be either ordinary or delegated. Ordinary jurisdiction is that which belongs to anyone of his own right, or by reason of his office, in virtue of some law, canon, or custom. Delegated jurisdiction is that which a man has, not of his own right, but by the commission of another, in whose place he officiates. [DELEGATION.]

Ordinary jurisdiction may be acquired in three ways: (1) by commission from the supreme ruler, conceded either to the dignity or to the individual; (2) by law or canon; (3) by custom or prescription. Thus, by the Supreme Pontiff are constituted as ordinary judges, legates, patriarchs, primates, archbishops, bishops, the officials of the Curia, &c. By the supreme lay power are constituted, in the civil order, viceroys, governors, prefects, magistrates, &c., who all enjoy ordinary jurisdiction. By law or canon those are constituted ordinary judges who are elected to office by public bodies according to the statutes of their foundation, and by public functionaries according to law. This is the case with the rectors of universities, the superiors of convents, the provosts of chapters, and the vicars-general of bishops. The third way is by custom; a jurisdiction which has been exercised without challenge for forty years is held to be validated by prescription, and is considered ordinary.

All the Apostles received their jurisdiction, which (except in the case of St. Peter) was personal and extraordinary, immediately from Christ. This jurisdiction they did not transmit; the bishops and their successors receive their jurisdiction from Christ, but through Peter. Such at least is the view now generally held; but even if the bishops be deemed to derive their jurisdiction immediately from Christ, all Catholics agree that it is in such manner subject to the supreme pastorate of the Pope, that "it can be restrained by his authority and sovereignty, and, for a lawful cause, altogether taken away."[1] orders have jurisdiction from the Pope over the faithful generally in the tribunal of penance, the approbation of the bishop having been obtained.

Confessors belonging to the regular

Every confessor must have jurisdiction in foro interno, otherwise he cannot validly absolve. An absolution given by a priest without jurisdiction is void. Nevertheless, if the penitent be in articulo mortis, or sincerely believed to be so, he may be validly absolved, not only from sins, venial and mortal, which have been before confessed, but from all ecclesiastical censures, even in reserved cases, by any simple priest, even though he be degraded, or an apostate, or irregular [IRREGULARITY], or a heretic.

The jurisdiction of the priest is of ecclesiastical right, so far as its bestowal, enlargement, and restriction are concerned, for it is the Church which confers it, and in such a manner as she deems to be expedient in the Lord; but it is of divine right inasmuch as the faculty of remitting sin, for the sake of which it exists, is "conferred on the priest in ordination through the power of the Holy Ghost."[1] (Ferraris, Jurisdictio.)

JUS SPOLII (lit. "right of spoil"). By "spolium" is meant the property belonging to a beneficed ecclesiastic at the time of his death which he could not legally dispose of by will. According to the canons a bishop or other ecclesiastic has only a right to such a portion of the diocesan revenues as is sufficient to maintain him and enable him to discharge his functions efficiently. Whatever exceeds this is the property of the Church. If therefore an ecclesiastic at his death be found to be possessed of property, the result of savings from his share of Church emoluments, that property ought to return to the Church; his natural heirs have no right to it. It is recorded of a great number of saints that, penetrated by this feeling, they took care to dispose of their ecclesiastical revenues to the last farthing in almsdeeds and other good works, so that, when death came, they might depart naked out of this world as they had come naked into it. St. Thomas of Villanova on his deathbed, "having commanded all the money then in his possession (which amounted to four thousand ducats) to be distributed among the poor in all the parishes of the city, then ordered all his goods to be given to the rector of his college, except the bed on which he lay. Being desirous to go naked out of the world, he gave this bed also to the jailer for the use of prisoners, but borrowed it of him till such time as he should expire."[1] Warham, the last Catholic archbishop of Canterbury, rejoiced to hear as he was dying that only thirty pounds were left in his coffers. St. Francis stripped himself of the very clothes that he wore and gave them back to his father, that neither he nor the world might henceforth have any claim upon one another. Such examples might be indefinitely multiplied. A dim feeling in the popular mind, that such was the more perfect way for the ministers of Christ, may have had something to do with the rise of this singular jus spolii (or, as it was also called, rapite capite, "seize and take"), in virtue of which, in the rude ages following the fall of the Western Empire, anyone who was present when a beneficed ecclesiastic expired thought himself at liberty to seize and carry off whatever property belonging to the deceased he could lay his hands on. Naturally the bulk of this spoil fell to laymen, who were more rapacious and less scrupulous than clerks. The scandalous abuses to which the custom led may be conceived; for ages councils denounced them and legislated against them, but in vain. If, however, we consider the extreme opposite to the jus spolii—what we may call the jus hæreditatis et legationis—the right claimed by beneficiaries in non-Catholic communions to transmit and bequeath the savings of their ecclesiastical revenues to their children, we must admit that, while preserving the outward semblance of decorum, this practice is intrinsically far more scandalous than its opposite.

As the power of sovereigns increased in Europe, they began to restrain the indiscriminate plunder just described, and in the case of bishops, to draw the jus spolii to themselves. Innocent III. complained (1207) that the servants of Philip II. had stripped the house and lands of a deceased bishop of Auxerre of property of every description, leaving only the bare walls. The inferior feudal lords claimed the same right over the property of deceased ecclesiastics on their domains. The incessant efforts of councils gradually obtained the renunciation of the right on the part of sovereigns and lay lords. In the thirteenth century it began to be claimed, in a modified form, by the Church herself; and many Constitutions of later Popes confirmed and defined the claim. Thus it came to be a principle of law that the "spoils" of beneficiaries dying without the faculty of devising, or in a foreign country, or which were acquired by illicit trading, belonged of right to the Camera Apostolica or Papal treasury. This right, admitted in Italy for all orders of clergy, and in Castile in the case of bishops, was not allowed in France, Germany, Belgium, or Portugal.

It need hardly be said that this jus spolii does not extend to the patrimonial property of ecclesiastics, nor to personal gifts and other acquisitions lawfully derived to them during life from non-ecclesiastical sources. The law lays down various rules for distinguishing as equitably as possible between the two classes of property, if an ecclesiastic has died possessed of both. From the end of the sixteenth century the right of spoil was compromised in the kingdom of Naples for an annual payment to the Camera. (Ferraris, Spolium; art. by Kober in Wetzer and Welte.)

JUSTICE, in the widest sense, the sense which concerns us here, is not a special virtue, because it includes all the supernatural virtues. According to St. Thomas (1 2ndæ, qu. cxiii. a. 1), it "implies a certain rectitude of order, even in the interior disposition of a man, inasmuch, namely, as the highest part of man is subjected to God and the inferior powers of the soul are subjected to that which is supreme, viz. to reason." Justice in this sense involves subjection to God and therefore the absence of mortal sin, which is rebellion against Him; while perfect justice is identical with the perfection of every virtue. Scripture constantly uses justice (צְדָקָה צֶדֶק, δικαιοσύνη) in this large acceptation—e.g. "Abraham believed God, and he reckoned it to him as justice" (Gen. xv. 6; cf. Galat. iii. 6, James ii. 23, and innumerable other passages). The "authorised version" renders the Greek and Hebrew words in these cases "righteousness," and this has become the familiar name among English Protestants. The change of word does not seem to mark any difference of principle, though, of course, the older Protestants held that the justice of Christ is imputed to us—i.e. reckoned to our account—whereas the Catholic doctrine is that justice or righteousness does indeed come from the grace of God, but that it inheres in the soul and consists in a real change of the moral character. "He who doeth justice is just" (John, 1 Ep. iii. 7).

It is this general sense of the word justice which is important in theology, and the plan of this Dictionary does not require that we should treat at length of justice as a particular virtue. As such, it is commonly defined in words adopted by theologians from Ulpian as the "firm and abiding resolve (voluntas) to give each his own right." It is subdivided into legal justice—which orders a man's actions to the common good, in which, of course, he himself shares—and particular justice, which orders the duties of man to man. This latter again is subdivided into distributive justice—which inclines superiors to a just distribution of burdens and advantages among their subjects—and commutative justice, which consists in giving to each his strict rights—e.g. paying debts, taxes, &c. Commutative, unlike legal, justice lies solely in the performance of duties to others, whereas the agent's own good is part of the common good; unlike distributive justice, it deals only with strict rights and is for these reasons justice in the most proper sense of the word.

JUSTIFICATION. The difference of belief on the way by which sinners are justified before God, formed the main subject of contention between Catholics and Protestants at the time of the Reformation. "If this doctrine" (i.e. the doctrine of justification by faith alone) "falls," says Luther in his "Table Talk," "it is all over with us." On this account the Council of Trent was at pains to define most clearly and explicitly the Catholic tradition on the matter, placing it in sharp opposition to the contrary tenets of the Reformers. We confine ourselves here to the process by which adults are elevated from a state of death and sin to the favour and friendship of God; for with regard to infants the Church of course teaches that they are justified in baptism without any act of their own.

Justification, then, according to the council (Sess. vi. 5, 6), begins with the grace of God which touches a sinner's heart and calls him to repentance. This grace cannot be merited; it proceeds solely from the love and mercy of God. It is, however, in man's power to reject or to receive the inspiration from above; it is in his power to turn to God and to virtue or to persevere in sin. And grace does not constrain but assist the free-will of the creature. So assisted, the sinner is disposed or prepared and adapted for justification; he believes in the revelation and promises of God, especially in the truth "that a sinner is justified by God's grace, through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus;" he fears the justice, hopes in the mercy, of God, trusts that God will be merciful to him for Christ's sake, begins "to love God as the fountain of all justice, hates and detests his sins." "This disposition or preparation is followed by justification itself, which justification consists, not in the mere remission of sins, but in the sanctification and renewal of the inner man by the voluntary reception of [God's] grace and gifts, whence a man becomes just instead of unjust, a friend instead of a foe, and so an heir according to hope of eternal life." . . . "By the merit of the most holy Passion through the Holy Spirit the charity of God is shed abroad in the hearts of those who are justified," &c.

We may turn to the views of Lutherans and Calvinists, as they are to be found in their authoritative Confessions. They are at one with Catholics in attributing the beginning of justification to the mere grace of God, and in excluding all merit or title on the part of the sinner. But Lutherans maintained that man "could contribute absolutely nothing to his own conversion," that "faith in Christ, regeneration, renewal," are to be ascribed "solely to the working of God and to the Holy Spirit" ("Solid. Declar. de Lib. Arbitr." § 20, p. 635, quoted in Möhler's "Symbol." p. 108). Here the Lutherans follow their master, who compared man under the action of grace to "a trunk or a stone" ("In Gen." xix.; Möhler, p. 107). The Calvinists, on the other hand, did admit that man was active as well as passive under the influence of grace ("Confess. Helvet." cap. ix. p. 21; Möhler, p. 118); but as they held grace to be irresistible they could not, of course, allow the Tridentine doctrine that man is free to accept or reject the invitation of God. Both the Lutheran and Calvinist errors with regard to human co-operation are excluded and condemned (Sess. vi. De Justif. can. 4, 5, 6). Secondly, whereas Catholics understand by justification the renewal of man's moral nature by divine grace, the reformers took it to mean "the remission of sins and the imputation of the justice of Christ" (Calvin. "Instit." cap. xi. § 2; Möhler, p. 136; and so "Solid. Declar." iii. De Fid. Justif. § 11; Möhler, p. 135), faith being the condition on which these benefits are given. Here is the hinge on which the whole controversy turns. Catholics regard justification as an act by which a man is really made just; Protestants, as one in which he is merely declared and reputed just, the merits of another—viz. Christ—being made over to his account. With Catholics justification is effected by grace inherent in the soul; with Protestants it is something external to the soul altogether—a sentence which is pronounced by the divine judge. True (and we are bound in fairness to lay great stress on this), Protestants hold that real and interior sanctification follows upon justification, so that change in heart and life is the sure and only test that a man really has been justified by faith, or, in other words, that the merits of Christ have been imputed to him. Still a very important difference between the Catholic and Protestant views remains. To the Catholic, sanctification and justification are the same thing, or at most two aspects of the same thing—viz. of the act by which God makes a soul just and holy in his sight. To the Lutheran or Calvinist, they are distinct, both in themselves and in the order of time at which they take place. For it was the contention of Protestant theologians that a soul is first justified—i.e. accepted as just for the merits of Christ apprehended through faith and then, as a necessary consequence, sanctified—i.e. really made holy. Lastly, as Protestants believed that concupiscence—i.e. the mere interior temptation to sin, unaccompanied by wilful consent—constituted sin in the strict sense, and since all are liable to such temptations, they held very inadequate notions of sanctification. "God," Calvin writes, "begins this work of interior renewal in his elect, and proceeds with it throughout the whole course of their lives, and that sometimes slowly, so that they always remain subject to the sentence of death before his tribunal" ("Instit." iii. 11; Möhler, p. 144). Very different is the Catholic belief, according to which justification excludes all mortal sin from the soul and makes the love of God and man sovereign within it, so that the just man is in no way liable to the sentence of death at God's judgment seat. Sin, no doubt, remains, more in some, less in others, but it is venial sin, which does not incur the sentence of eternal woe or forfeit God's friendship.

The Protestant doctrine has only an apparent foundation in Scripture. Undoubtedly, the Hebrew word צדיק, the Greek δικαιόω in the Sept. and N.T., often mean, not to make, but to pronounce just by a legal sentence. The judge may in this sense "justify" a man because his cause is good, or from corrupt motives although his cause is bad. Thus in Deut. xxv. 1, the judges are directed to justify (וְהִצְדִּיקוּ, LXX δικαιώσωσι) the just (i.e. to pronounce him just) and to make the wicked wicked—i.e. to pronounce him to be so. Here the Vulgate has "justitiæ palmam dabunt"—but in Prov. xvii. 15, "he who justifies the wicked and condemns" (lit. "makes wicked," or as we might say "makes out to be wicked") "the just—an abomination to the Lord are both the one and the other," it represents צדיק by "justifico." We do not therefore, for a moment, dream of bringing any philological objection to the Protestant view, nor do we deny that the Scriptural idea of justification does imply legal acquittal. But why does God pronounce the sinner just? Not because he comes to trial with clean hands, for by the hypothesis he comes laden with guilt. Not because, being actually unjust, he is pronounced just on the ground of a legal fiction by which the merits of another are made over to his account, for such a procedure would be unworthy of a human, much more of divine, justice. The true answer surely is that God purifies the soul by turning it from love of self to divine love, and that thus He at the same moment renders and pronounces the sinner just.

Scripture abundantly confirms the reasonableness of the inference. It describes God as "destroying" and taking away iniquity; it speaks of the blood of Christ, which "cleanses us from all sin." If in Ps. xxxi. (Heb. xxxii.) we read that the man is blessed "whose iniquity is taken away, whose sin is covered, to whom the Lord doth not reckon or impute sin," this blessedness does not consist in mere forgiveness, for the verse ends, "in whose spirit there is no guile." Two passages in St. Paul show that he knew nothing of the spurious distinction between justification and sanctification. After telling the Corinthians that great sinners, thieves, profligates, slanderers, &c., will not inherit the "kingdom of God," he continues "And such were some of you, but you washed yourselves" (Vulg., "you were washed"), "but you were sanctified, but you were justified, in the name of the Lord Jesus," &c. (1 Cor. vi. 11). Here sanctification is put before justification, and if the Protestant theory were correct, the whole matter would have been thrown into obscurity and confusion. Again in Ephes. iv. 24, "Put on the new man, who has been created according to God in justice and holiness of truth."

K

KINGS AND QUEENS, EMPERORS, ETC., PRAYERS FOR. St. Paul (1 Tim. ii. 1) commands prayers to be made for kings and all in authority, and there is abundance of proof that the early Christians faithfully observed this duty, even if their rulers were heathen or heretical. Two instances out of many will suffice. "We sacrifice," says Tertullian ("Ad Scap." 2), "for the health of the Emperor, but to our God and his." So Athanasius prayed publicly for the heretical Emperor Constantine, as we know from his own words. ("Apol. ad Constant." c. 11): "I did but say, 'Let us pray for the most pious Emperor (Αὐγούστου) Constantius,' and straightway all the people shouted with one voice, 'Christ, help Constantius!' and kept on praying thus." At a later date, however, the names of emperors who formally separated themselves from the Church were left out in the diptychs.

When the diptychs fell out of use the name of the king or emperor was put in the Canon of the Mass, and it is wanting in very few mediæval missals. Not only did the ancient English liturgies put the names of the sovereigns in the Canon, but many editions of the Sarum Missal have a votive Mass "pro Rege" (Maskell, "Ancient Liturgy of the Church of England," p. 275). The name of the sovereign, however, is left out in the modern Roman Missal, and Gavantus ("Thesaur." P. II. tit. viii.), says that it cannot be added except in virtue of an Apostolic privilege such as that granted to Philip II. of Spain by Pius V.[1] Merati in his note modifies the statement so far as to allow that the name of the sovereign may be inserted by "old and lawful custom," such as prevailed in France and Venice, when the names of the king and the doge were inserted. In the U. S. all lawful authorities are remembered privately in the prayers of the faithful, though no mention is made of them in the liturgy. (Le Brun, tom. ii.; Hefele, "Beiträge," vol. ii. pp. 299 seq.)

KISS. (A) Kiss of Peace.—(1) Among Jews (Gen. xxxiii. 4, 2 Kings xiv. 33, Job xxi. 27) and heathen the kiss was used much more frequently than among ourselves as a mere sign of good will and charity. Among the Romans, indeed, the use of the osculum was regulated by custom and law. The custom was naturally adopted and raised to a higher significance among Christians. Thus St. Paul tells those to whom he wrote that they are to salute each other in "a holy kiss" (ἐν φιλήματι ἁγίῳ, Rom. xvi. 16, 1 Cor. xvi. 20, 1 Thess. v. 26), while St. Peter (1 Ep. v. 14) speaks of a "kiss of charity" (ἐν φιλήματι ἀγάπης). Φίλημα ἅγιον, φίλημα ἀγάπης, ἀσπασμὸς, φίλημα μυστικὸν—and in liturgical language εἰρήνη—are the Greek words most used by Christian writers for the holy kiss; the Latins employ osculum sanctum, osculum pacis, pacem dare, offerre, &c. Tertullian ("De Orat." 18) speaks of the "kiss of peace which is the seal of prayer," and Clement of Alexandria ("Pædagog." iii. 11, p. 301, ed. Potter) says the kiss "should be mystical," and enlarges on the purity of intention with which it should be given.

(a) At Mass.—The kiss of peace was given at Mass from the earliest times, as appears from Justin, "Apol." i. 65. To avoid the dangers of abuse to which Athenagoras Legat. 32 (quoting apparently an earlier writer) refers, the "Apostolic Constitutions" (viii. 11) order a rigid separation of the sexes.

In two striking ways the Roman practice with regard to the kiss of peace at Mass differs from that of other churches. In all the Eastern, as well as in the Mozarabic and Ambrosian liturgies, the kiss is given before the offertory and consecration. This is the order recognised by Justin (loc. cit.), and probably arises partly from a desire to begin the sacred action in peace, partly because the exhortation of the Apostle, at the close of some of his epistles, led Christians to salute each other at the end of the lections, which came in the Mass of the Catechumens (i.e. in the earlier part of the service). In the Roman Mass, on the other hand, the kiss of peace follows the consecration, and is closely connected with the communion; an order which Innocent I. defends in his celebrated letter to Decentius, on the ground that the kiss of peace is set as a "seal" on the whole of the sacred action. Again, among the Orientals (see Concil. Laodic. can. 19) the priests gave the kiss of peace to the bishop, then the laity to each other; and so, e.g., in the liturgy of St. James, and in that of St. Chrysostom as used at this day in the Greek Church, the celebrant simply wishes "peace to all," whereupon the deacon says, "Let us kiss each other (ἀγαπήσωμεν ἀλλήλους) that we may agree in oneness of mind." In the Roman Mass the kiss of peace, as it were, passes down from the bishop to the priests.

It is plain from the decrees of the Councils of Frankfort (794, can. 50) and Mayence (813, can. 44), that the kiss of peace long continued to be given in the West. It was only at the end of the thirteenth century that it gave way to the use of the "osculatorium"—called also "instrumentum" or "tabella pacis," "pax," "pacificale," "freda" (from Friede), &c.—a plate with a figure of Christ on the cross stamped upon it, kissed first by the priest, then by the clerics and congregation. It was introduced into England by Archbishop Walter of York, in 1250. Usually now the Pax is not given at all in low Masses, and in high Mass an embrace is substituted for the old kiss and given only to those in the sanctuary. The Pax is not given on the three last days of Holy Week. (Cf. Tertull. "De Orat." 14.)

(β) At other Sacraments.—The kiss of peace was also given at baptism (Cyprian, Ep. 64, § 4, "Ad Fidum"), of which custom the "Pax tecum" in our ritual is a relic; and at absolution of penitents (see Euseb. "H.E." iii. 23, and Martene, "Ord." 13). The kiss given by the other bishops present to a bishop just consecrated is mentioned "Constit. Apost." viii. 5. This custom is still prescribed in the Roman Pontifical. So, too, is another ancient rite, according to which the bishop gives the kiss of peace to a priest at his ordination. In the Greek Ordinal (Goar, "Euchol." p. 298) it is the new priest who kisses the bishop and other priests.

(γ) The kiss at betrothal, in the Roman law, gave the betrothed woman certain rights of inheritance and made her a quasi-uxor. This rite is mentioned by Tertullian ("De Veland. Virg." 6 and 11) and by Greek canonists.

(δ) The habit of giving communion and the kiss of peace to the dead was forbidden by the Council of Auxerre (anno 585, alias 578), canon 12, but the Greeks still give the kiss to the dead.

(B) The Kiss as a Mark of Honour.—The "woman who was a sinner" kissed (κατεφίλει) Christ's feet (Luke. vii. 38), and the same mark of affectionate reverence is in common use among Catholics.

(α) In early times the Christians used to kiss the altar as a mark of reverence to the place on which the Eucharist is offered. The priest still does so repeatedly in the Roman Mass, out of reverence for the altar and for the relics of saints enclosed there. So the celebrant at Mass signifies his love for the teaching of Christ by kissing the gospel. This practice is also ancient, being mentioned in the first of the Roman Ordines. Jonas, bishop of Orleans, in the ninth century recognises the antiquity of the custom. (Le Brun, i. p. 231; and see under GOSPEL.)

(β) The Pope's feet are kissed as a mark of homage immediately after he has accepted office; by Cardinals newly created; by those to whom audiences are granted; &c., &c. The kiss is given on the golden cross of the sandal which the Pope wears on his right foot.

It must be remembered that this mark of honour was not originally reserved to the Pope. It was given, as Oriental customs spread throughout the empire, to the emperors, as well as to patriarchs and bishops. "In the Liturgy," says Kraus (art. Fusskuss, in the "Encyclopædia of Archæology"), "the ritual ascribed to Gelasius directs the deacon before reading the Gospel to kiss the Pope's feet. The same mark of honour was given occasionally to the Popes even by the highest personages on earth—e.g. by the emperors Justin and Justinian, by the kings Luitprand, Pepin, by Charlemagne, &c.; but it is also to be observed that the Popes, on the other side, also gave the act of adoration to the emperors. Only late in the middle ages the adoration by kissing the feet of sovereigns and bishops fell more and more into disuse, and was confined to the Vicar of Christ, and then a cross was worked on the slipper to show that this honour was done not to the mortal, but to the Son of God." Charles V. is said to have been the last royal personage who did obeisance in this way, for although Benedict XIV. received it from the King of Naples, this is explained by the peculiar relations of the Neapolitan crown to the Pope.

According to present custom, the Pope immediately after his election is divested of his cardinal's dress, puts on the house-dress of the Pope and is led to the altar, whereupon the cardinals kiss his foot and right hand, receiving the kiss of peace in return. Next, when the Pope's name has been proclaimed to the people, his foot is kissed by the Governatore of Rome and by all the "Conclavists" who have accompanied the cardinals. Both of these "adorations" take place in the conclave itself. The third "adoration" is made by the cardinals in the Sixtine chapel, on the altar of which the Pope is placed in Pontifical vestments. The Pope is then carried on a litter to St. Peter's, placed on the high altar, and again receives solemn "adoration." A newly-created cardinal kisses the Pope's foot and then his hand. Patriarchs, archbishops, and bishops kiss the Pope's foot and then his knee. Other ecclesiastics and laymen (except sovereigns) merely kiss the foot.

(A full account of the literature on the "kiss of peace" will be found in Kraus, art. Friedenskuss. There is a modern book on the subject by Kahle, "De Osculo Sancto," Regimont. 1867. On the kissing of the Pope's foot there are treatises by Valentini, "De Osculatione Pedum Romani Pontificis," Romæ, 1588; by Pougard, "Del Bacio de' Piedi de' Sommi Pontefici," Roma, 1807.)

KYRIE ELEISON, CHRISTE ELEISON, etc. Greek words, meaning "Lord, have mercy on us," "Christ, have mercy on us," &c., retained by the Latin Church, and used in the breviary offices, the prayers of the Rituale, the Litany of the Saints, &c., and in the Mass. Immediately after the introit, the celebrating priest and the server say alternately "Kyrie Eleison" three times, "Christe Eleison" three times, and then once more "Kyrie Eleison" three times. Martene ("De Antiq. Eccles. Rit.") and Mabillon (in "Ord. Rom.") show that the number of Kyries to be sung by the choir used to be left to the discretion of the celebrant, and also that the Kyrie was left out altogether in Masses which were to be followed by the Litanies. St. Thomas (III. ix. 83, a. 4) supposes that the first triplet (Kyrie Eleison, &c.) is addressed to the Father; the second (Christe Eleison, &c.), to the Son; the third (Kyrie Eleison, &c.), to the Holy Ghost.

The use of the words at Mass is undoubtedly very ancient. Κύριε ἐλέησον occurs in the Clementine liturgy as part of the prayer for the Catechumens ("Constit. Apost." viii. 6), and also as a part of the Mass of Catechumens in the ancient liturgy of St. James. It is certain also that these Greek words have been kept from ancient times in the Latin liturgy. The Second Council of Vaison, in the province of Arles, which met in 529, ordered the Kyrie Eleison to be said at Mass and other services, appealing to the custom of the "Apostolic See, and of all the Italian and Eastern provinces." (Le Brun, "Explication de la Messe," tom. ii.; Benedict XIV. "De Missa.")

LABARUM (derivation uncertain). The banner of the cross, used by Constantine in his campaigns. Eusebius, a contemporary writer, in his "Life of Constantine," gives the following account of it: "He [Constantine] kept invoking God in his prayers, beseeching and imploring that He would declare Himself to him, who He was, and stretch forth his right hand over events. While the king was thus praying and perseveringly entreating, a most extraordinary sign from Heaven appears to him, which perhaps it were not easy to receive on the report of anyone else, but since the victorious king himself, a long time afterwards, when we were honoured with his acquaintance and friendly intercourse, repeated the story to us who are compiling the record, and confirmed it with an oath, who would hesitate to believe the recital? especially as the ensuing period furnished unerring testimony to the tale. About midday, when the day was now on the turn, he said that he saw with his own eyes in the sky, above the sun, the trophy-like figure of a cross (σταυροῦ τρόπαιον) composed of light, and that a writing was attached to it, which said, 'By this conquer.' That astonishment at the sight seized upon both himself and all the troops whom he was then leading on some expedition, and who became spectators of the portent." That same night, Constantine went on to say, "the Christ of God" appeared to him in a dream with the same sign which he had seen in the sky, and bade him have an imitation of it made, and use it in war. Constantine sent for goldworkers and jewellers, and had a costly banner made [see BANNER], surmounted by a crown, on which was the monogram formed of the first two letters of the name of Christ. With this borne at the head of his army, he crossed into Italy, defeated Maxentius in several battles, and became master of Rome. Fifty men of his guards were selected to have charge of the Labarum, and victory was the unfailing attendant of its display.[1]

LACTICINIA. A late Latin word meaning milk, or food made of milk. St. Thomas (II. 2ndæ, cxlvii. a. 8) distinguishes lacticinia from flesh and from eggs. The Greek Church (Council in Trullo, can. 56) forbade the use of eggs and lacticinia on all fast days, even at the one permitted meal. The Latin Church forbade their use on the fasting days of Lent; and Alexander VII. condemned the proposition that the obligation of abstaining from eggs and lacticinia in Lent was doubtful. With regard to other fasts, St. Thomas (loc. cit.) says the obligation of abstaining from eggs and lacticinia varies in different places, and that individuals are bound to conform to the custom of the country. St. Liguori ("Theol. Moral." iv. 1009) lays down the same principle. Even in Lent the use of eggs and lacticinia has been allowed, especially in Northern countries, by Papal dispensation, or else by custom, which the Popes have tolerated till in course of time it became a perpetual privilege. Moreover, the bishops in their quinquennial faculties receive power to dispense on this point. In the United States, as elsewhere, the extent to which lacticinia may be used in Lent is determined by the indult published in each year. A recent Papal dispensation made it lawful to take lacticinia on most fasting days, even at collation.

LÆTARE SUNDAY. The fourth Sunday in Lent, so called from the first word in the antiphon of the introit, "Rejoice, O Jerusalem, and gather together, all ye who love her," &c. This day is also known as Mid-Lent or Refreshment Sunday. On that one Sunday in Lent the altar is decked with flowers, the organ is played, and at the principal Mass rose-coloured vestments are worn instead of violet ones.

[1] Eusebius, Vit. Const. i. 28–37, ii. 7–9.

LAMPS have been from very early times used in Christian churches, and have had a sacred character attributed to them. Thus the fourth Apostolic Canon forbids anything to be offered at the altar except "oil for the lamp, and incense at the time of the holy oblation." The controversy of Jerome with Vigilantius, who objected to the practice, shows that lamps were not only used to give light, but were burned before the tombs of the martyrs in their honour. Again, Cyril of Jerusalem (referred to in Wetzer and Welte, Art. Lampe) notices the practice, which still continues among us, of re-lighting the lamps on Holy Saturday in token of joy. The Cærimoniale Episcoporum favours (suadet) the practice of burning a lamp before each altar, several before the high altar. (Gavant. Par. I., tit. xx.)

Universal custom requires that a lamp should be kept burning before the Blessed Sacrament, wherever it is reserved. The oil in the lamp must be made of olives, or if it cannot be had, the bishop may permit the use of other oils, not, however, of mineral oils, except in case of absolute necessity (Decret. S. R. C. 9 Julii, 1864). Authors speak of the practice of burning a perpetual light before the tabernacle as very ancient, but do not, so far as we can find, furnish early evidence of it.

LANCE, THE HOLY. In 1098, when the Christian army, after having taken Antioch and driven the Turks into the citadel, were besieged in the city by a great host of infidels under Kerboga, a Provençal clerk (named by some writers Peter Bartholomew, by others Peter Abraham) came to Raymond Count of Toulouse, his liege lord, and to the Bishop of Puy, the Papal legate, and declared that St. Andrew had revealed to him in a vision the existence in the Church of St. Peter, in Antioch, near the altar, of the head of the spear with which our Saviour's side was pierced during the Passion. Search was made, and the earth excavated to a great depth without result; Peter then went down himself, and found, or professed to find, the head of a lance. The Christians, who had been reduced to great straits now took courage to attack the Moslems, and defeated them, the holy lance being carried before them in the battle. But Bohemond and others threw doubt upon Peter's good faith, and it was arranged that he should undergo the ordeal of walking through a fire; he did so, but died shortly afterwards, apparently from the injuries that he received. The lance was taken by Count Raymond to Constantinople, and remained there till Bajazet II. (1492) made a present of it to Innocent VIII.; it is now in the Vatican basilica.

LANCE (ἁγία λογχη). A small knife used in the Prothesis or early part of the present Greek liturgy to divide the Host from the holy loaf. The action commemorates the piercing of our Lord's side. The priest makes four cuts in the loaf and stabs it more than once, accompanying each action with texts of Scripture—"He was led as a lamb to the slaughter," &c.

The rite is probably not a very ancient one. It is wanting, not only in the Oriental liturgies of other families, but also in that of St. James, and is not mentioned by St. Germanus. It is observed, however, in the monastery of Mount Sinai, where all the new rites of the present Greek Church have not been admitted. Martigny gives a drawing of a "Culter Eucharisticus," said to have belonged to St. Thomas of Canterbury, and to have been used for a similar purpose. (See Goar, who gives a drawing of the liturgical lance; and Le Brun, Tom. III. vi. 4.)

LANGUAGE OF THE CHURCH. This title is used for want of a better to denote the Church's practice of celebrating Mass, administering the sacraments, and generally of performing her more solemn services in dead languages. For the Church cannot be said to use, or even to prefer, any one language. She requires some of her clergy to use Greek, Syriac, Coptic, Armenian, Slavonic, in Mass, just as strictly as she requires others to employ Latin. Latin no doubt is far more widely used than other ancient languages in the offices of the Church, but this has arisen chiefly from the fact that those who would naturally use Greek, &c., in their offices have fallen away from Catholic communion. We will begin with an historical account of the discipline observed, and then give the principal reasons adduced to justify it.

Benedict XIV. ("De Missa," lib. ii. cap. 2) mentions the opinion of those who held that the Apostles said Mass in Hebrew, or that originally Mass was said only in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, the three languages on the title of the cross; and he continues, "Those who are skilled in ecclesiastical history have shown sufficiently that the Apostles and their successors did, not only preach, but also celebrate the divine offices in the vulgar tongue of the people in whose land they preached the Gospel." He quotes Bona, Le Brun, and Martene in support of his own statement, which surely does not need support. Mass, then, and the other offices, were said originally in the vernacular, because it was the vernacular, but the Church, so far as we know, has never once allowed a change in the language of the liturgy when the language in which it had been originally written had become unintelligible to the people. Nor at present is Mass ever said in a tongue still generally spoken and understood. Latin, Coptic, and Æthiopic, are, and have long been, dead languages, while the ancient Greek, Syriac, Armenian, and Slavonic, used in the liturgies, are quite distinct from the modern languages which bear the same names. Even schismatical and heretical bodies which have preserved the true priesthood, and therefore the true Mass, have not ventured to substitute translations into the vulgar tongue for the ancient language of their liturgies. Indeed, Mass said in such a language as Coptic is much less understood than Mass in Latin, not only because Coptic has no affinity with the Arabic spoken by the people, but also because many of the Coptic priests can hardly read the Coptic words of their church books, and do not understand the meaning of a single sentence. One exception may here be mentioned, the only one with which we are acquainted, to the general rule, that all schismatical and heretical bodies preserve the ancient language of their liturgies, and clearly it is an exception which proves the rule. Le Brun (Tom. III. diss. vi. a. 6) notices that the Melchites—i.e. schismatic Greeks in the Patriarchates of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, who are in communion with the "orthodox" Greek Church of Constantiople—sometimes say Mass in Arabic, because it is often hard to find deacons and other assistants who can even read Greek. A friend versed in liturgical science and in the Oriental languages informs us that this exceptional usage still occurs, e.g. at Jerusalem.

On the other hand, the Church has not pursued the same uniform policy in dealing with nations newly converted to the Christian religion, and therefore destitute of a liturgy. In the middle of the ninth century the Oriental monks St. Cyril and St. Methodius introduced, not a Latin or Greek, but a Slavonic or vernacular liturgy among their Moravian converts. This measure of theirs was approved by Pope Hadrian II., and tolerated by John VIII. on condition that the translation was faithful, and the Gospel read first in Latin, then in Slavonic. But in 1061 the legate of Alexander II. in a council of Croatian and Dalmatian bishops prohibited the use of the Slavonic liturgy—which must not be confounded with the Slavonic versions of the Greek liturgies still used—and the prohibition was repeated by Gregory VII. in a letter of the year 1080 to Ladislaus, King of Bohemia. However, even as late as 1248 Innocent IV. allowed a Slav bishop to use it by special dispensation. In 1615 Paul V. gave the Jesuit missionaries leave to celebrate Mass and the divine offices in Chinese, but the brief never reached those to whom it was addressed. The Jesuits renewed their petition, and a Chinese version of the Missal was presented to Innocent XI,[1] but nothing came of the negotiation. In the "Propylæum" of the Bollandist Lives for May a summary is given of the reasons urged for a vernacular Chinese liturgy by Father Couplet, Procurator-General of the Jesuit missions.

Such, then, is the rule of the Church. She never allows an ancient liturgy to be altered because the language in which it is written has been altered or displaced by a modern one, and she is unwilling, though she does not always absolutely refuse, to allow the use of vernacular liturgies among nations newly converted. The Council of Trent declares (Sess. xxii. cap. 8, De Sacrific. Missæ) that the Fathers of the council thought it inexpedient to have Mass "celebrated everywhere in the vulgar tongue," and condemns those who affirm "that Mass ought only to be celebrated in the vulgar tongue (ib. can. 9). We must beware, however, of pressing these statements too far. Benedict XIV. defends Colbert, bishop of Rouen, who taught in a pastoral that the ancient mode of celebrating Mass in the language of the people was the fittest means to prepare the minds of the congregation for participation in the sacrifice; or at least argues that this conviction is not condemned by the Council of Trent. The Church may have had good and weighty grounds for foregoing a usage which in itself would tend to the greatest spiritual edification.

[1] So Benedict XIV. in the edition before us; but he says this was done in 1631, long before Innocent XI. began to reign. Possibly 1631 is a misprint for 1681.

These reasons seem to consist, first of all, in the jealousy with which the Church guards her ancient rites, and her unwillingness to face the danger of constant change in them to meet the changes in modern languages. Such changes might seriously endanger the purity of doctrine, or at least the reverence of the faithful for the rites of the Church. Let the reader only consider how much of the reverence which Protestants feel for the Book of Common Prayer is due to the fact that its pure and noble language has been preserved unchanged for centuries. A new edition in modern English would certainly be better understood, but how much of its power to soothe the heart and to inspire a sober and rational devotion would be lost in the process? Again, the preservation of the ancient forms enables priests to celebrate and the faithful to follow Mass in all lands, and thus impresses upon us, in a way which no one who has experienced it can forget, the unity of the Church. Lastly, the words of the Missal, admirably fitted as they are for the use of the priest, are by no means fitted for the use of uneducated persons, and this difficulty would not be met by a translation.

Protestant objections arise to some extent from misunderstanding the nature of Catholic worship. The Mass is a great action in which Christ's sacrifice is continued and applied. Those who are present bow their heads at the consecration, and unite themselves in spirit, if they do not actually communicate, with the communion of the priest. Christ crucified is set forth in their midst, and they know that they, on their part, must offer their souls and bodies in constant sacrifice to God by a life of purity, labour, and self-denial. It is the expressed wish of the Tridentine Fathers that the meaning of the Mass and its rites should be constantly explained to the people by their pastors; and surely the most ignorant person who follows Mass in the way just described, and accompanies the priest's action with prayers which come from his own heart, offers to God a reasonable service. A life of self-sacrifice and devotion—that is the great lesson taught by the sacrifice of the Mass, and it is a lesson independent of the language in which Mass is said.

The texts quoted from 1 Cor. xiv. against the Catholic usage are not to the point. "I would rather," says St. Paul, "speak five words in the church through my intelligence, that I may instruct others, than ten thousand words in a tongue." We believe St. Paul is referring to ecstatic utterances—sighs, exclamations, broken sentences which were unintelligible to others, and in which the tongue of the speaker was not controlled even by his own intelligence. Be this as it may, no parallel can be drawn between "speaking in tongues" and the use of Latin in the Mass. Strangers would not think a priest "mad" (v. 23) if they heard him reading the Latin Missal. The priest prays with "his understanding" (v. 14), for he knows Latin; others are "edified" (v. 17); and no extraordinary gift of interpretation (v. 13) is needed, for our English prayer-books give translations of the Mass. Moreover, St. Paul was familiar with a custom closely analogous to ours, and with this neither he nor any other Apostle finds fault. The services of the temple and the synagogue, like those of the synagogue at this day, were in a dead language, with the difference only that more pains are taken to diffuse the knowledge of Hebrew among poor Jews than of Latin among poor Catholics.

LAPSED (LAPSI). A name given to those who fell away from the faith under heathen persecution. The name comes into special prominence in the persecution of Decius (249–251), which exceeded all previous ones in method and severity. Some Christians fell away by actually offering sacrifice to the false gods (thurificati, sacrificati); others bought a certificate that they had sacrificed (libellatici); others allowed their names to be enrolled on the official lists as having obeyed the imperial edict (acta facientes). Dr. Benson (in Smith and Cheetham) argues that the "libellus," or certificate, was of two kinds—either a document coming from the Christian himself to the effect that he had recanted his religion, or from the magistrate, who certified that the Christian had recanted, the Christian himself remaining passive and merely accepting this means of escape.

The "Lapsi" were subjected to long—sometimes life-long—penance, varying according to the degree of their guilt, and, if priests, were reduced to lay communion. But great weight was given to the "libelli pacis"—i.e. documents from confessors or martyrs in prison, begging the restoration, of those who had fallen and repented, to the peace of the Church. (See under INDULGENCES. Cyprian's "Letters" and his treatise "De Lapsis" are the chief authorities on the subject.)

LAST DAY. We have already had to speak of the Last Day, under the articles ANTICHRIST and JUDGMENT, GENERAL AND PARTICULAR. In this place we proceed to note certain points in ordinary Catholic belief not included under these previous articles.

(1) Scripture tells us of certain signs which will precede the Last Day. The Gospel will first be preached all over the world (Matt. xxiv. 14), which, as St. Augustine warns us (Ep. 99), does not mean that all men will be converted, but that the Church will exist in all nations. When the fulness of the Gentiles has come in, then—for the words need not imply more than this (see Estius, ad loc.)—the great mass of the Jews will embrace the Christian belief (Rom. xi. 25). Enoch and Elias, according to the common belief, will appear to preach penance. This idea has an interesting history, which deserves more special mention, but we will begin by introducing the current belief itself in the words of St. Augustine: "Enoch and Elias" (Serm. 299), he says, "live; they have been translated; wherever they are, they live. And if a certain conjecture of faith made from the Scripture of God is not wrong, they will die. For the Apocalypse relates that at a future time two wonderful prophets will both die and rise again, in the sight of men, and go up to the Lord; and they are understood to be Enoch and Elias, although in that passage their names are not given." Let us trace the origin of that belief. Genesis and the Book of Kings tell us that Enoch and Elias were removed from the earth in an extraordinary way. From Malachias iv. 5, and from Matt. xvii. 11—though the inference is precarious—it was inferred that Elias, not only in spirit and power, but in his proper person, would reappear before the end of the world. From the words of Ecclus. xliv. 16, "Enoch pleased God, and was translated into Paradise, that he may give penance to the nations," the same conclusion was drawn with regard to Enoch, though in the Greek the words simply are, "Enoch pleased God, and was translated, [being] an example of repentance to the nations." This belief in the reappearance of Enoch and Elias was connected with, and, as it was thought, supported by, that remarkable section of the Apocalypse, xi. 1-13. The holy city—i.e. Jerusalem (see v. 8)—with the exception of the ναὸς, or temple in the strict sense of the word, is to be trodden under foot by the heathen. Two witnesses of Christ, who are compared with the lamps and olive-trees in Zacharias, are to prophesy for about three years and a half, and to show miraculous power, but at last they are to be killed by "the beast." However, after three days and a half, they are to live again and go up "to heaven in the cloud." The fate of Jerusalem here depicted was taken as an allegory of the fortunes of the Christian Church, and it was commonly supposed that Enoch and Elias were the two witnesses. This belief is expressed clearly by Tertullian ("De An." 50), and was undoubtedly the prevalent and, indeed, all but universal opinion of the ancients. Thilo, on the "Evangelium Nicodemi," c. 25, has treated the whole question elaborately. Bede, however, is said (by Düsterdieck, on the Apocalypse, ad loc.) to have rejected this interpretation; and we are able to quote Maldonatus (on Matt. xvii. 11) for what is, as we venture to think, a far more likely interpretation—viz. that St. John refers to Moses and Elias, who represented the law and the prophets, and had already witnessed to Christ in his transfiguration.

Another sign of the nearness of the last day is "the Apostasy" of 2 Thess. ii. 3, which St. Thomas and Estius, against many other interpreters, take to mean "a defection from the Catholic faith, and that a universal one, by which not only persons, however many (a thing that has often happened in former ages), but also the kingdoms and all, or all but all, provinces will withdraw from the Catholic Church." Signs, too, are the natural portents, famine, pestilence, earthquakes, darkening of the sun, &c., mentioned in Matt. xxiv. and Luc. xxi. But, after all, "concerning that day or hour no man knoweth, not even the angels in heaven, nor the Son, but the Father" (Mark xiii. 32). The mistakes which even able and pious men have made on this point are well known. "Even some of the Fathers," Jungmann writes ("De Noviss." p. 208), 'as St. Cyprian, St. Ambrose, St. Basil, St. Gregory, St. Bernard, and distinguished preachers of the divine word, like St. Norbert and St. Vincent Ferrer, have sometimes expressed the opinion that the day of the Lord was at hand, because of the signs which seemed to them to be present." The persons who have been led away after this fashion in our own time have been of very different intellectual and spiritual calibre, and their warnings have occasioned some amusement but very little panic.

The order of events on the last day is quite uncertain. St. Augustine conjectures ("De Civit. Dei," xx. 30), but merely conjectures, that the appearance of Elias will come first, then the conversion of the Jews, the persecution of Antichrist, Christ's advent, the resurrection, the separation of the good and the wicked, the conflagration and finally the renovation of the world. On the other hand, St. Thomas ("In Sentent. IV." dist. xlvii. qu. 2. a. 3), whose opinion is most commonly followed, argues that the action of fire will begin before the judgment. It will, he thinks, kill and destroy the bodies of all upon the earth, torturing the evil, serving as purgatorial torment to the imperfect, and inflicting God's vengeance on the wicked. Further, it will cleanse and renew the earth, not after the judgment, as St. Augustine thought, but before it. This St. Thomas gathers from Rom. viii. 21, which, as he considers, makes the renovation of the world synchronous with the resurrection of the just.

LAST THINGS. The four last things are generally said to be Death, Judgment, Heaven, Hell. These are not all, but the most important, things which happen to men as they leave and after they leave this world. The Germans speak of Eschatology (ὁ τῶν ἐσχάτων λόγος) as a special department of theology, and the name has been adopted by some English writers. It includes the consideration of purgatory, the resurrection, the eternal reign of Christ, the destruction and renovation of the world. A very useful treatise "De Novissimis" has been published by Jungmann (Ratisbonæ, 1874). Most of the subjects which fall under this head are discussed in separate articles.

LATERAN CHURCH AND COUNCILS. The family of the Plautii Laterani had a magnificent house on the Coelian hill—"egregiæ Lateranorum ædes," as Juvenal calls it. This house, or a house on the same site, was known as the Lateran palace, and belonged to the Empress Fausta (Fleury, "H. E." x. 11). Her husband, Constantine, built close to it the Church of "the Saviour." known as the Basilica Constantiniana, and also—because the Emperor built a Baptistery there, and Baptisteries are associated with St. John Baptist—as the Church of St. John Lateran. It is the chief or Cathedral Church of Rome, and there the "Stations" are held on many solemn days (ib. xi. 36).[1] Bulls of Gregory XI., in 1372, and of Pius V., in 1569, have confirmed its pre-eminence over all other churches, even St. Peter's, and justified the proud inscription which meets the eye at the entrance, "Omnium urbis et orbis ecclesiarum mater et caput." In this church, besides an important council in 649 against the Monothelites, five general councils have been held.

(1) Under Calixtus II., in 1123. More than 300 bishops and 600 abbots were present. This was the Ninth General Council, and the first ever held in the West. The chief object was to end the strife on Investiture between the Emperor Henry V. and the Holy See. The arrangement made at the Concordat of Worms was confirmed. Henry agreed to leave the choice and consecration of prelates free, to resign all claims to invest with ring and staff, and to restore Church goods, while the Pope allowed the elections to take place in the Emperor's presence, gave him the right to decide in contested elections after taking counsel from the metropolitans and provincial bishops, and to confer the regalia with the sceptre.

(2) The Second Lateran Council (Tenth General Council), held in 1139 under Innocent II., and attended by about 1,000 prelates, excommunicated Roger of Sicily (champion of Anacletus II., the Antipope), suspended clerics promoted by Anacletus, and imposed silence on Arnold of Brescia, the great ecclesiastical demagogue of the day. Thirty canons were passed on simony, incontinence, clerical dress, breaking the "Peace of God," and contests dangerous to life.

(3) The Third Lateran and Eleventh General Council was convoked in 1179, by Alexander III., was attended by more than 300 bishops, and numbered about a thousand members in all. It ordered that future Popes should be elected by a majority of two thirds, and passed sentence of excommunication on anyone who accepted the Papacy on other conditions, as well as upon those who supported him. Disciplinary enactments were also made against simony, clerical incontinence, intercourse with Saracens and Jews.

(4) Innocent III. opened the Fourth Lateran and Twelfth General Synod, the most imposing probably of all councils ever held, in 1215, for the recovery of the Holy Land and the reform of the Church. The representatives of Frederic II., of Henry, Emperor of Constantinople, of the Kings of England, France, Aragon, Hungary, Cyprus, Jerusalem, and of other princes, 412 bishops, 800 abbots, many representatives of absent bishops and chapters, were present. The seventy decrees of the council concern most important points of discipline and doctrine. The Bishop of Constantinople was made the first of the Eastern patriarchs; the Greek rites, the jurisdiction of the other patriarchs, were fully acknowledged; while at the same time the Greek practice of rebaptising children already baptised by Latins, and of washing altars to mark their defilement if they had been used by Latin priests, was reprobated, and the supremacy of Rome insisted on. Regulations were made and indulgences offered for the coming crusade. The duty of annual confession "proprio sacerdoti" was enforced. Definitions were issued on the absolute unity of God. Abbot Joachim had maintained that the three divine Persons were one God only in the same sense as many human persons are all men or Christians one with each other and with Christ. In other words he substituted a specific or moral for that numerical unity in which, with the real distinction of the three Persons, the mystery of the Trinity consists. The council, on the contrary, defined that each of the three Persons is identical with the one divine substance. It also defined the Catholic doctrine on the sacraments, &c., against the Albigenses, and in particular that the bread and wine in the Mass are "transubstantiated" into Christ's body and blood.

(5) The Fifth Lateran Council (Eighteenth General) was opened by Julius II., in 1512, and closed by Leo X., in 1517. The Church was distracted at the time by the schismatic Council of Pisa. The Fifth Lateran was attended by 15 cardinals and 79 (afterwards 120) bishops, mostly Italian. The decrees of Pisa were declared null, the "Pragmatic Sanction" condemned, and the French Concordat was approved, canons passed on preaching, exemption of regulars, monts de piété, &c., &c. Two decrees of the council are of wider interest. It defined (Bull "Pastor æternus") the Pope's "authority over all councils" and (Bull "Apostolici regiminis") condemned those who held that the intellectual soul is mortal, or only one in all men, or that these propositions were true at least philosophically. For the French objections to the œcumenical character of the council, see Hefele, "Concil." i. p. 68, and the article COUNCILS.

LATIN. [See LANGUAGE OF THE CHURCH.]

LATRIA (λατρεία) in itself simply means "service," whether rendered to God or man; but the usage of the Church has made it a technical term for that supreme worship which can lawfully be offered to God alone. The word is so used by the Greek Fathers and the Seventh General Council; and St. Augustine ("Contr. Faust." xx. 21) adopts it on the ground that no one Latin word will do instead. It was probably St. Augustine's influence which made it a familiar term in Latin theology. The sacrifice of the Mass is the principal act of latria, hence it is called in patristic literature λατρεία τῆς οἰκονομίας (Petavius, "De Incarnat." xv. 2).

LATROCINIUM (σύνοδος ληστρική: "Council of Bandits"). A name given by Pope Leo (and current ever since) to the heretical council which met at Ephesus in 449. Dioscorus, Patriarch of Alexandria, had come forward in defence of the doctrine that there is but one nature of the Incarnate Word, and being discontented with the decision of the bishops who met at Constantinople and affirmed that Christ was one Person in two natures, he used his influence with the Empress Eudocia to have a general council convoked at Ephesus. Pope Leo did not oppose the meeting of the council, although he had clearly laid down the doctrine of the two natures in his letter to Flavian, bishop of Constantinople. Dioscorus presided at the council, the Papal legates, Juvenal of Jerusalem, Domnus of Antioch, and Flavian of Constantinople, being present. Dioscorus tore their papers from all notaries except his own, and is accused of having falsified the Acts; he called in soldiers and fanatical monks, armed with cudgels, Flavian was trodden under foot and imprisoned, and the other bishops, with few exceptions, were forced by violence and starvation to sign a blank paper on which Dioscorus afterwards set the condemnation of Flavian. The Papal legates, however, protested at once. Flavian died shortly afterwards on his way to exile. Theodosius confirmed the decrees of this synod, but it was rejected by the churches of Syria, Asia Minor, Pontus, and the West. Pope Leo of course absolutely refused to acknowledge it. [See CHALCEDON, COUNCIL OF.]

LAUDA, SION. [See HYMNS.]

LAUDS. [See BREVIARY.]

LAURA (Gr. λαύρα, properly, an alley or lane). An aggregation of separate cells, tenanted by monks, "under the not very strongly defined control of a superior."[1] Usually each monk had a cell to himself, but in the laura of Pachomius one cell was assigned to three monks. For five days in the week the tenants of the laura remained in their cells, living on bread and water, and working at basket-making, or some similar employment; on the Saturday and Sunday they took their meals together in the common refectory, and worshipped God in the common church. The discipline of the laura was a kind of intermediate stage between the eremitical life of St. Antony and the monasticism founded by St. Basil and St. Benedict. It flourished in the fourth and fifth centuries in the desert country near the Jordan; St. Euthymius, St. Sabbas, and the abbot Gerasimus were its chief types and promoters. St. Euthymius lived to be ninety-six years old; just before he died he told the person whom the monks had designated as his successor, that it was the will of God that the laura should be turned into a monastery, as if foreseeing that this was the discipline of the future for the more perfect souls. (Fleury, livr. xxviii., xxix., xxx.; Smith and Cheetham.)

LAUS TIBI, CHRISTE. [See GOSPEL.]

LAVABO. The first word of Ps. xxv., which the priest recites while the acolytes pour water on his hands shortly before he begins the Canon of the Mass. The rite indicates the perfect purity of heart with which the priest should celebrate those holy mysteries. This washing of the hands (by the deacon, however) is mentioned by St. Cyril of Jerusalem. The psalm is also recited during the washing of the hands in the liturgies of St. Chrysostom and St. Basil. It is not said in the Ambrosian Mass, in which the priest purifies his hands silently just before the consecration. There is great variety on this point in the old English rites. In that of York the washing is accompanied by a verse of Ps. xxv., the "Veni, Creator," and a prayer; in that of Hereford, by the "Veni, Creator," and a prayer; in those of Sarum and Bangor (?), simply by a prayer. (Le Brun, Benedict. XIV., Maskell.)

LAW. The word is used in two widely different senses. When we speak of the "law of gravitation," we mean an observed invariable uniformity of coexistence and succession connecting certain effects with certain conditions or causes, so that when the conditions are present the effect invariably follows. The necessity which links the cause to the effect we do not understand, nor can account for; we only know by an unfailing experience that it exists; and as it forms an element in the phenomenal system of motions and changes in the midst of which we live, we call it a physical necessity, and the resulting uniformity we term a law of nature. But when we speak of the law of the Twelve Tables, or of the laws of Lycurgus, or the Mosaic, or the Gospel law, we mean a uniformity which ought to be imposed (assuming the law to be just) on the actions of those subject to it, but which is not always imposed in fact, because the subjects of the law are free agents and can refuse to obey it. The necessity which should, but does not always, make the conduct conformable to the precept, we call a moral necessity, or obligation; and the precepts which, being addressed to free agents, enjoin but do not compel their own fulfilment, we term moral laws, and divide into civil, criminal, natural, positive, &c. Of laws in this second sense, the first is the natural law, which we must carefully distinguish from "laws of nature" or physical laws. This natural law is implanted by God in the mind of every one of his reasonable creatures, distinguishing for them good from evil, and bidding them follow the one and shun the other. But since the will of man has been weakened by the fall, he is not able to obey the dictates of this natural law without some kind of assistance or reinforcement. This assistance is given, partly by human ordinances, directing, forbidding, rewarding, and punishing, partly by the revealed law of God; through the operation of which it appears to have been his will, first, to educate a single people to a more perfect knowledge and obedience; next, gradually to leaven and transform all the tribes of mankind, as they become one by one incorporated in the Catholic Church. Accordingly the revealed law is divided, historically, into the law of the Old and that of the New covenant. The law of the Old covenant, given on Mount Sinai, prepared the way for the kingdom of Christ, and—except as to that portion of it which was a restoration of the natural law and is perpetually binding—lost its divine authority on the establishment of the Church. The law of the New covenant is that which Christ the king proposes through the Church [see CHURCH OF CHRIST, GRACE, SACRAMENTS] to the human race. Thus every man, besides being subject to the internal or natural law seated in the conscience, is under two external laws. He is first—if not actually and de facto, yet potentially and de jure—under the divine law as interpreted and administered by the Catholic Church. Secondly, he is under the lex loci, the system of human law belonging to the country of his birth or domicile. If a conflict arise between the two external laws—as when the law of the land enjoins idolatry, or forbids the frequentation of the sacraments—it is manifest that the lower law ought to yield to the higher, and that individual Christians are bound, whatever may be the consequences, to "hear the Church," and disobey any contrary injunction. (Wetzer and Welte, art. by Aberlé.)

LAX. [See MORAL THEOLOGY.]

LAY BROTHERS AND SISTERS. Persons who take the habit and vows of religion, but are employed mostly in manual labour, and are exempt therefore from the duties of choir, when they exist, or from the studies, &c., incumbent on the other members of religious orders, where there is no choir.

The first instance of a distinction between lay brothers (fratres conversi, frères convers) occurred in the monastery of Vallombrosa, founded in the earlier part of the eleventh century by St. John Gualbert. Afterwards we find lay brothers among the monks of Hirsauge, and the Abbot William is said in his Life to have instituted this kind of religious. The Carthusians adopted the new practice, and now lay brothers and sisters are to be found in most religious orders, even among the Benedictines, who knew nothing of such a distinction at first.

Two causes, according to Fleury, contributed to the change. The greater part of the monks (contrary to the old usage) in the eleventh century were ecclesiastics, and it was necessary to provide for those who had the religious but no ecclesiastical vocation. Next, in the eleventh century, Latin was no longer a vulgar tongue, and hence many of the religious, ignorant of Latin and often unable to read, were unfit for the duties of the choir. (Fleury, "H. E." lxi. 4, lxiii. 58; Discours viii. a. 5.)

LAY COMMUNION is a phrase scarcely used at present among Catholics. But in the language of the early Church it often occurs to describe the state to which a cleric was reduced by forfeiting the right to exercise his functions without being excommunicated and losing the ordinary privileges of a Christian. Thus the Council of Agde (anno 506), canon 50, orders that bishops, priests, and deacons, guilty of certain great crimes, should for the rest of their lives only receive lay communion (communionem laicam).

A cleric may be reduced to lay communion in three ways. (α) A cleric in minor orders may lawfully marry, but in this case the canon law deprives him of office, benefice, and the privileges of his state. The Council of Trent, however (Sess. xxiii. c. 17, De Reform.) allows the promotion of men already married to minor orders, provided they are not "bigami" and there is a lack of other candidates. They have the privileges canonis et fori if they wear tonsure and cassock. (β). A cleric in holy orders may be dispensed from his obligations—e.g., of wearing the clerical dress, reciting his breviary, of celibacy, &c.—by the Pope. In that case the cleric in question is usually prohibited from exercising the functions of his office. (γ). The old law of the Church reduced to lay communion clerics who were deposed or removed from their office. But, according to the more modern canon law, the loss of clerical privileges is only entailed by degradation.

LAYMAN. One of the people (λαὸς), as distinguished from the clergy. The Septuagint (Exodus xix. 24, Isai. xxiv. 2) used the word λαὸς in contradistinction to the priests. The other Greek versions have the words λαικὸς, "laic," and λαικοῦν "to profane;" and so the Vulgate (1 Reg. xxi. 4) has the expression "laicos panes."

Clem. Rom., Ep. i. 40, uses laic or layman (λαικὸς) for the first time in Christian literature, but he means by it a Jewish and not a Christian layman. But in the Clementine Homilies, Epist. Cl. §. 5; in Clem. Al. "Strom." iii. 12, p. 552, ed. Potter; in Tertullian "Præscr." 41, we find the modern use of λαικὸς and laicus for Christian layman.

LAZARISTS. This is the popular name for the "Congregation of the Priests of the Mission," founded by St. Vincent of Paul in 1625, and established a few years later in the College of St. Lazare at Paris. St. Vincent, being engaged as a tutor in the family of the Countess de Joigny, was summoned one day to the sick bed of one of her vassals, a well-to-do peasant held in general esteem, who desired to make his confession to him. Pressing the inquiry firmly into the state of the man's soul, St. Vincent discovered with consternation that he had the burden of several unconfessed mortal sins on his conscience, in spite of which he had been going on for many years making sacrilegious confessions and communicating. Being brought by the saint to a proper sense of the enormity of his conduct the man was very grateful, and declared without scruple his conviction that he owed more than his life to St. Vincent. The countess, hearing what had happened, entreated the holy man to preach in the church of Tolleville (near Amiens), where most of the congregation were her vassals, on the sin and danger incurred by making bad confessions. The consciences of the hearers were aroused, and numbers crowded to the confessional who had hitherto made no use, or a bad use, of it. The countess now conceived the idea of founding and endowing an institute for the purpose of preaching missions in country districts. She desired Vincent to obtain if possible the services of Jesuits or French Oratorians; but neither society was able to undertake the work at the time. Finally it was arranged that Vincent, aided by several pious secular priests who had for some years been associated with him in his various works of mercy and instruction, should commence the missions; that the institute should be established in the Collège des Bons Enfans, offered for the purpose by the Archbishop of Paris; that the countess should endow it with forty thousand livres; but that Vincent should not leave her house while she lived. Thus was the institute founded in the March of 1624; the countess died the same year. The congregation (which was confirmed by a bull of Urban VIII. in 1632) had a threefold end—the sanctification of its own members, the work of the missions, and the training of an exemplary clergy. As a rule, eight months in the year were devoted to missions, which were conducted nearly on the same plan on which Redemptorist and Passionist missions are conducted at the present day. St. Vincent, having lived to see twenty-five houses of the new institute established—in France, Italy, and Poland—died in 1660, being eighty-five years old. It has been already stated that the congregation removed to the College of St. Lazare (which had belonged to the regular canons of St. Victor) in 1632. It was a spacious site, and the third superior-general, Edmond Joly, erected on it the vast range of buildings still seen there. St. Vincent of Paul was beatified in 1729, and canonised in 1737. In the time of Hélyot—that is, early in the last century—there were eighty-four houses of the institute in nine provinces, whereof six were in France, two in Italy, and one in Poland. Some of the fathers showed an inclination towards Jansenism and refused to accept the bull "Unigenitus;" but the firm and prudent government of the general of that day, M. Bonnet, checked in time the evil tendency. At the Revolution St. Lazare was twice plundered by the mob; several of the fathers were massacred in September 1792; and those who would not take the condemned oath were driven out of France, their property being confiscated. The maison St. Lazare was turned into, and still remains, a prison for women. Under the first Napoleon the congregation was allowed to re-enter France, and under the Restoration the grant was made to it of a house in the Rue de Sévres in lieu of St. Lazare. The missions left vacant in China and the Levant on the suppression of the Jesuits in 1773 were transferred to the Lazarists.

In 1816 a colony of Lazarists arrived in St. Louis from Rome. They opened a seminary there, and have since made foundations and opened seminaries in other dioceses, especially in the Northern States, from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

LECTION OR LESSON (Lectio, ἀνάγνωσις). Some details on this subject have been given under EPISTLE, GOSPEL, BREVIARY. But something remains to be said now on the history of lections in general, and on the variety of practice which separates the ancient from the modern, and again the Eastern from the Western Church.

There was a far more extensive and continuous use of Scripture in the public services of the early Church than there is among us. Usually speaking, our people only hear the Gospel and Epistle read in the Mass, with the psalms and the little chapter (scarcely more than a verse or two), usually from the Epistle, at vespers and compline on Sundays or great feasts. In the primitive Church it was very different. Thus St. Augustine ("Praef. Exposit. in 1 Joann.") says that he "was accustomed to handle (tractare) the Gospel according to John in the order of the lessons;" and that, although this order had been necessarily interrupted by lessons for special solemnities, the continuous reading had only been "intermitted, not omitted." In this way Genesis was read in Lent, Job in Holy Week, Acts between Easter and Pentecost, &c., &c. Our Breviary lessons for the first nocturn are no doubt a relic of this custom. But they are only a relic, partly because they are very incomplete, partly because the multiplication of festivals causes many even of the portions given in the office to be left out altogether; above all because the laity, as a rule, cannot assist at those Breviary offices. Chrysostom, says Mr. Scrivener referring to "Hom. x. in Joann." exhorts his hearers to peruse and mark the passages (περικοπαὶ) of the Gospels which were to be publicly read to them the ensuing Saturday and Sunday. (See his "Introduction to the Criticism of the New Testament," 2nd ed. p. 69 seq.). These sections, still preserved with little alteration in the modern Greek Church, are very different from our Gospels and Epistles. They contain the whole text of the Gospels, and at least nearly the whole text of the Acts and St. Paul's Epistles. On the other hand, while the Greeks read the Gospel on Sunday mornings in the office as well as in the liturgy, their daily offices contain no lessons from Scripture.

It is certain, however, that the custom of introducing lections in the Breviary office, still maintained in the West, was at one time familiar to the Eastern churches. The Council of Laodicea, canon 17, requires a lesson to be read after each psalm, and Cassian ("Cœnob. Inst." ii. 4) mentions that the Egyptian monks read two lections, one from the New, one from the Old, Testament, after each series of twelve psalms. This practice was already very ancient even in his time. At the end of the sixth century at latest, as appears from Gregory the Great (Epist. xii. 24) and from the Rule of St. Benedict, not only Scripture but also homilies upon it by Fathers and Doctors of the Church were read in the office. Charlemagne, in a "Constitutio de Emendatione Librorum et Officiorum," of 788, caused these lections from the Fathers to be revised and altered by Paul the Deacon. We have earlier evidence for the custom of reading the Acts of the Martyrs, which had begun before St. Augustine's time (Serm. cccxv. c. 1).

LECTIONARY. The oldest Latin Lectionary was known as the "Comes" (i.e. the cleric's "companion") — the "Comes Major" if it contained the Epistles and Gospels for the year in full, the "Comes Minor" if it merely noted the beginning and end of the portions read. The authorship was attributed to St. Jerome, and although there is no sufficient evidence for this belief, the Comes must have been compiled about St. Jerome's time, for it is mentioned by name in a document dated 471 (Mabillon, "De Re Diplomat." l. vi. 482 seq., edit. 3, Neapoli). It has, however, undergone serious alterations. A Gallican Lectionary containing sections from the Prophets, Epistles, and Gospels, was discovered by Mabillon, and edited by him ("De Liturg. Gall." tom. ii.). It is written in Merovingian characters, recognises among the few feasts which it names that of St. Genevieve, and usually assigns three lections to each Mass, after the manner of the ancient Gallican Liturgy.

In the Greek church the Lectionaries consist of lessons from the Gospels (εὐαγγελιστάρια); from the Acts and Epistles (πραξαπόστολοι); while a few books known as ἀποστολοευαγγέλια have lessons taken both from the Gospels and Apostolic writings. Traces of Church lessons occur in MSS. of the fifth and sixth centuries—viz. in the Alexandrine MS. and and in the Codex Bezæ. Of Greek Lectionaries in separate volumes, none perhaps are older than the eighth century. The general name for tables of lessons, corresponding to the "Comes Minor" in Latin, is συναξάριον; for tables of week-day lessons ἑκλογάδια (τῶν δ' εὐαγγελιστῶν or τοῦ ἀποστόλου) while tables of lessons for Saints' days are called μηνολόγια. The oldest known Synaxarion is prefixed to the Codex Cyprius (K), of the eighth or ninth century; another is found in the Codex Campensis (M), which is perhaps a little later. An elaborate account of the Greek lessons will be found in Scrivener ("Plain Introduction to the Criticism of the N.T."), from whom the latter part of this article has been taken.

LECTOR (ἀναγνώστης). A cleric, in minor orders, whose duty originally consisted in reading the Church lessons. The great antiquity of the order—the second of the minor orders among the Latins, the first among the Greeks—is proved by the facts that it is mentioned by Cornelius, Bishop of Rome, in the middle of the third century (apud Euseb. "H. E." vi. 43), and that it is common to sects who differ from each other, and who separated from the Catholic Church in the fifth century—viz. Copts, Syrian Jacobites and Nestorians, not to speak of the schismatic Greeks. The Ethiopians, indeed, ignore this order, but it is mentioned in their ancient canons and councils. (Denzinger, "Ritus Orientalium," tom. i. p. 118.)

The very form of ordination, as it still exists with very slight alteration among us at the present day, is given in canon 8 of the so-called Fourth Council of Carthage, at the close of the fourth century. The bishop is to give the book (codicem) from which the Lector is to read, with the words "Take it, and be a reader of the word of God, to have, if thou fulfil thy office faithfully and usefully, part with those who have ministered the word of God."

The Greeks, according to Chardon ("Histoire des Sacrements," tom. iv. ch. 2), have from ancient times ordained their Readers by imposition of hands, the handing of the book after ordination being among them comparatively modern. As to the other Oriental rites, the Jacobites, Copts and Syrians do not, the Nestorians do, confer this order by laying on of hands: all of them hand the book at the end of the ordination rite, but without any form of words. (Denzinger, tom. i. p. 134.)

Besides reading in church, the Lectors were also employed as secretaries to bishops and priests. They were often younger than the Ostiarii or Porters, for the Lectorate was the first order conferred on young clerics (Chardon, loc. cit.) The Roman Pontifical also assigns to them the office of blessing bread and the new fruits, a duty first mentioned in Pontificals of the years 600 and 700. (Art. Lector in Wetzer and Welte) At present this order is regarded chiefly as a step to the priesthood, and it is only in the office of Good Friday that the Missal recognises their functions.

Altogether distinct from the Lectors just described are the "Lector Mensae," or reader at table in religious houses; the "Lector dignitarius," who regulated the reading of the lessons in some cathedral churches; and the Lectores—i.e. lecturers or professors—in monasteries and universities.

LEGATE. Among the Romans legati were either ambassadors, or officers of high rank appointed with the sanction of the senate to assist a dictator, consul, or proconsul in the performance of his duties, military or civil. In modern acceptation the term is confined to ecclesiastics representing the Holy See and armed with its authority. Legates are of three kinds—legates a latere, emissaries or nuncios (legati missi, nuntii, internuntii), and legates by virtue of their office (legati nati). The dignity of a legate a latere is, and has long been, confined to cardinals, though in former times it was not so: e.g. Pandulf, the legate sent by Innocent III. to receive the submission of King John, was only a sub-deacon. Legates a latere are either ordinary or extraordinary: the first govern provinces belonging to the Ecclesiastical State—such as were (before 1860) the Romagna and the March of Ancona—in the Pope's name; the second class are deputed to visit foreign Courts on extraordinary occasions, such as a negotiation for a peace, or arrangements for a general council, &c. Legati missi correspond to the ambassadors and ministers maintained by secular States at foreign capitals. Formerly they were called apocrisiarii [APOCRISIARIUS]: now, nuncios or internuncios—the latter being of inferior rank. Legati nati are, or were, archbishops to whose sees by an ancient Papal concession the legatine authority was permanently attached: as was the case with Canterbury in England, and Salzburg and Prague in Germany.

All three classes of legates above mentioned formerly enjoyed an ample, and even an immediate, jurisdiction, as representing the Holy See, in the provinces where they resided. Hence frequent collisions with episcopal authority arose. To put an end to these conflicts, the Council of Trent[1] decreed that legates, even those de latere, nuncios, ecclesiastical governors, or others, were not to presume, on the strength of any faculties whatsoever, to impede the bishops in matrimonial causes or in those of criminous clerks, nor in any way to curtail or disturb their jurisdiction; nor, on the other hand, were they to take proceedings against clerks or other ecclesiastical persons, unless after recourse had been had to the bishop and he had neglected to act. The jurisdiction of legates is now, therefore, chiefly appellate. (Ferraris, Legatus; article by Phillips in Wetzer and Welte.)

[1] Sess. xxiv. cap. 20, De Ref.

LEGEND, THE GOLDEN. By this name is known the earliest collection made in the West of the Lives of Saints, as the work of Metaphrastes was the earliest Greek collection of the same kind. The compiler was Jacobus de Voragine (so named from his birthplace, Varaggia, near Genoa), archbishop of Genoa in the thirteenth century. The "Legenda" contains 177 chapters, each of which treats of a saint or a festival, according to the order of the ecclesiastical calendar. There is an entire absence of critical discrimination in the use of materials. The work became very popular, was translated into several languages, and is said to have passed through more than a hundred editions. Capgrave's "Legenda Angliæ," a work of the fifteenth century, printed by Caxton, was doubtless modelled upon the "Golden Legend," the success of which must have encouraged Lipomani and Surius in their labours, and prepared the ground for the great compilation of the Bollandists.

LEGITIMATION BY SUBSEQUENT MARRIAGE. The Civil Law and the Law of the Church agree in ascribing so great efficacy to the marriage tie that it is held to spread itself over, reach back to, and legitimate the birth of children to the same parties before the marriage. The Civil Law recognised this principle somewhat less unreservedly than the Canon, inasmuch as it ascribed a certain measure of relative lawfulness to the relation of concubinage. Against this the Church set its face, refusing to allow that there could be any lawful union between persons of opposite sex except by the way of marriage, and treating the child of a concubine as in no superior position, legally, to the child of a courtesan. However long a time may have passed, even though the father may have had a lawful wife and children in the interval, nevertheless, the first wife being dead, marriage with the mother of his natural children, even although he may be no longer capable of being a father, or be on the bed of death, legitimates the children of the illicit union, and makes them as capable of inheriting as if they had been born in wedlock. The reason is that the Church, like Christ, whom she represents in the world, yearns over her erring children, and desires to leave open for them a locus pœnitentiæ; and this all the more because the temporal interests and natural feelings of the innocent children are promoted and consulted by such lenity.

All that has been said, however, proceeds upon the assumption that at the time when the natural children were conceived or born the parties were free to marry. It is only in that case that the efficacy of the subsequent marriage can be held to reach back to the illicit union. If either the father or the mother was married at the time of the birth of the child, it is the offspring of adultery, and no subsequent marriage can legitimate it. It has been strenuously maintained by many canonists that if one of the parties was not free to marry at the time of the conception of the child, even though such freedom existed at the date of birth, the child is adulterine, and cannot be legitimated by subsequent marriage. The tendency of opinion, however, has for a long time past been towards the doctrine that the question should be decided simply by the date of birth; and that if at that time either party were so circumstanced that he or she could not possibly, even with the aid of a dispensation, have married the other, the child cannot be afterwards legitimated; but not otherwise.

A letter addressed by Benedict XIV., writing as a private doctor, to the Archbishop of St. Domingo, in 1744, discusses this important subject in all its bearings with the utmost lucidity and force.

The Common Law of England, following, it may be supposed, some ancient Teutonic custom, does not allow that children born out of wedlock can be legitimated, or can inherit, through a subsequent marriage between the parties. This was decided so far back as 1236. At a council of the great men of the kingdom held at Merton, the bishops, who had found that collisions were of frequent occurrence between the spiritual and secular jurisdictions on account of their different views on this question—persons being bastardised by the one who were legitimated and held capable of inheriting by the other—"requested that the king's writs should no longer direct them to inquire specially whether the individual in question were born before or after marriage, but generally whether he were legitimate or not. They objected to the practice of the other courts: (1) that it was contrary to the Roman and Canon Law; (2) that it was unjust, because it deprived of the right of inheritance the issue of clandestine marriages, though such marriages were not annulled by any law; and (3) that it was inconsistent with itself, because, while it bastardised the child born, it legitimated the child that was only conceived before marriage, though in both cases the moral guilt of the parents was exactly the same. But their arguments were fruitless. The earls and barons unanimously returned the answer [1] which has been so often repeated and applauded: 'We will not change the old and approved laws of England.'"[2]

This difference continues to exist in England, but in the U. S. the Common Law has, in nearly all the States, been modified by statute so that, in conformity with Roman Law and Canon Law, and with the law of all the countries of Continental Europe, children born out of wedlock are rendered legitimate by the marriage of their parents, and cease to suffer from the slur of bastardy, from which in England nothing can ever deliver them. (Ferraris, Legitimatio.)

LENT. A fast of forty days preceding Easter, kept, after the example of Moses, Elias, and, above all, of Christ Himself, in order to prepare the faithful for the Easter feast, and also of course on account of the general advantages to be derived from a long period of penance. The Greek and Latin names for the fast (τεσσαρακοστή, Quadragesima) indicate the number of days. The Italian Quaresima and the French Carême come from the Latin; the German Fastenzeit and the Dutch Vasten denote the fast by pre-eminence, like ἡ νήστεια in the Greek calendar; our own word Lent comes from the Anglo-Saxon Lencten, i.e. spring (cf. German Lenz, Dutch Lente, spring).

There is no mention in Scripture of the observance of Lent, or, indeed, of any determined time for fasting among Christians. In Acts xxvii. 9, St. Paul and his companions are said to have put to sea at a dangerous time, viz. "when the fast was already over." But the fast in view was evidently the one Jewish fast commanded in the law, that on the Day of Atonement, the tenth of Tisri. At that time the autumnal equinox was past, and, as a rule, no more voyages were undertaken for the season.

There is, however, proof that Lent, in the general sense of a fast preceding Easter, has been known from, or nearly from, Apostolic times. Thus Tertullian, in his Montanist treatise on fasting, tells us that according to his Catholic adversaries those days were set apart for fasting "under the Gospel dispensation (in Evangelio) in which the Spouse was taken away" ("De Jejun." 2; cf. 13), whereas the Montanists kept additional fasts. An earlier writer, Irenæus (apud Euseb. "H. E." v 24), speaks of the fast before Easter, and the different modes of observance which prevailed in different places. The words occur in a letter to Victor, who was Bishop of Rome from about 190 till 202; and it is important to notice that Irenæus says the difference of observance was no new thing, but had arisen "even long before, in a past generation" (καὶ πολὺ πρότερον ἐπὶ τῶν πρὸ ἡμῶν). It is plain also that from very early times the Lenten fast, whatever its duration may have been, was considered obligatory. This is clearly implied in the language of Tertullian in the passages quoted above: "dies jejuniis determinatos;" "constituta esse solemnia huic fidei scripturis vel traditione majorum." Passages to the same effect abound in the later literature of the Church. The Council of Gangra, in the middle of the fourth century, anathematises (Can. 19) those who neglected to keep the fasts "observed by the Church." Jerome, Ep. 41, lays down the strict obligation of keeping the Lenten fast (see also Ambrose: e.g. "De Noe et Arca," 13). A number of similar statements may be seen in Thomassin, "Traité des Jeûnes," Part I. ch. v. A famous incident, mentioned by Sozomen ("H. E." i. 11), and often alleged against the Catholic practice, is really an exception which proves the rule. There the story is told of a Bishop Spyridon, who, having no other food, not even bread or flour, in the house, gave an exhausted traveller swine's flesh at the beginning of Lent, and bade him eat it without scruple. But the stranger at first refused to eat it, on the ground that he was a Christian; and the bishop before furnishing this food "prayed and begged pardon" of Heaven. All things, as the bishop argued, are pure to the pure, and then, as now, the Lenten rule yielded to charity and necessity.

We have taken Lent hitherto in its widest acceptation, as meaning a fast of some sort before Easter, and in Ante-Nicene Fathers, so far as we are aware, no clear notice occurs of a fast consisting even approximately of forty days. In a very obscure and possibly corrupt passage of Irenæus (apud Euseb. v. 24) the Benedictine editor Massuet (Diss. ii. 23 seq.) sees an allusion to the forty days with which we are now familiar. He understands the saint to say that some kept the fast of extraordinary strictness known as xerophagy for one day, others for two or more, others for all the forty days of Lent. This is a possible and even plausible explanation, but it cannot be considered certain, and many scholars, Catholic and Protestant, believe that Irenæus refers to an absolute fast from all food during two or more days, or for forty hours. However, from the early part of the fourth century onwards, there are many references to Lent as a period of about forty days. The word τεσσαρακοστή is found in Can. 5 of the Nicene, and Can. 50 of the Laodicean, Council, the latter being held, according to Hefele, somewhere between 343 and 381. Even if the word was originally connected with the forty hours during which Christ lay in the tomb, it was taken in the fourth century at least to mean a period of forty days. St. Gregory Nyssen (tom. ii. p. 253) reckons Lent as a time of rather less than two months; while, in the West, St. Augustine (Ep. lv. c. 15, "Ad Januar.") connects the fast of Quadragesima with the forty days' fast of Moses and Elias. Still in this century, and the next also, the duration of Lent varied very considerably in different churches. Socrates ("H. E." v. 22) expresses his surprise that all used the same name τεσσαρακοστή to describe a fast which lasted in different places for seven, six, or only three weeks. There are no doubt inaccuracies in the statement as Socrates makes it, but we see no ground for questioning its correctness as to the main fact. From Sozomen, also a writer of the fifth century, we get more trustworthy information. All Africa, Egypt, Palestine and the Westerns generally, he says ("H. E." vii. 19), kept Lent for six weeks, the church of Constantinople and the neighbouring provinces for seven. Cassian ("Collat." xxi. c. 24–27) says in general terms that some fasted seven, others six, weeks, but he gives the reason —viz. that some excepted Sundays and Saturdays, others Sundays only, from the fast. St. Ambrose ("De Elia et Jejunio," c. 10) recognises the exemption from fasting on both days. The practice, however, of the Roman Church and of most Latins was to fast six weeks excepting Sundays—i.e. for thirty-six days. The usage of Constantinople, on the other hand, prevailed in the East, and the Council in Trullo, in 692, ordered (Can. 55) that there should be no fasting on Saturdays in Lent, and no Mass said except on Saturdays, Sundays, and the feast of the Annunciation (Can. 52). Mass and fasting are in the minds of the Greeks incompatible, so that they observed seven weeks or thirty-five days of fasting—all Saturdays except Holy Saturday, the feast of the Annunciation, and all Sundays, being deducted.

However, more than a century before the Council in Trullo the Greeks could fairly claim to count forty days in their Lent. True, it is only on the Monday in Quinquagesima week that they enter on the strict abstinence both from flesh meat and lacticinia, and so Quinquagesima is called by them τῆς τυροφάγου, because, according to their way of calculating, it ends the week in which cheese, &c, may be eaten. But after Sexagesima Sunday (hence named τῆς ἀποκρέω) no meat is eaten, and this their present custom was already in force under the Emperor Justinian in 546 (see Fleury, "Hist." livr. xxxiii. No. 23, and cf. Thomassin, Part II. ch. i).

Various attempts were made in the West to complete the number of forty days. St. Ambrose (Serm. 34) blames the custom of those who began the fast in Quinquagesima week, and the Fourth Council of Orleans (anno 541; Can. 2) likewise enforces uniformity and censures those who began Lent with Sexagesima or Quinquagesima. The Eighth Council of Toledo (Canon 9; anno 653) expresses a feeling then and earlier very common in the Church, when it describes the thirty six days of Lent as a tithe of the year which Christians dedicated to God. But the monks aimed at greater strictness, for the "Regula Magistri" which Thomassin places at the beginning of the seventh century, enjoins religious to fast three days in Sexagesima and three in Quinquagesima week, in order to supply for the six Sundays of Lent which were not fast-days.

At last the Latin Church added the four days of fasting before the first Sunday in Lent, which now began with Ash Wednesday. This new discipline is recognised in Canon 76 of the Council of Meaux (anno 846), and it appears from the words of the monk Ratramnus, who wrote about the same time, that these additional days were observed by the Roman Church and in the West generally. Still in the eleventh century St. Margaret of Scotland (Surius, Junii die 10) had to introduce the habit of beginning Lent with Ash Wednesday among her subjects; and St. Charles Borromeo, in the first council which he held, fully acknowledged the right by which the churches in the city of Milan and in other parts of the diocese which had retained the Ambrosian rite began Lent with the first Sunday and thus maintained their ancient usage.

We can only touch lightly on the other acts of piety by which Lent has been sanctified from early times. It was a season in which the faithful begged God's mercy for themselves, and were therefore expected to show mercy to others. The money spared by fasting was given in alms; the Imperial laws (see the references in Thomassin, Part I. ch. xxviii.) forbade criminal processes, and while the Church reconciled penitents at the altar, the emperors released prisoners, masters pardoned their slaves, and enemies became friends. It was a season of mourning, and hence the Church has always strongly discountenanced festivities of all kinds during Lent. Lastly, the body is mortified, in order that the soul may be invigorated, and so from early times communions, sermons and spiritual exercises generally have been multiplied in Lent. (Thomassin, "Traité des Jeûnes," Paris, 1685. Liemke, "Die Quadragesimalfasten der Kirche," München, 1853.)

LIBELLI PACIS. [See LAPSED and INDULGENCES.]

LIBER DIURNUS. An ancient collection of formularies used in the Roman church. The learned Jesuit Garnier supposes that it was compiled shortly after 714. It has been divided by Garnier into seven chapters, which are subdivided into "titles." The seven chapters treat of the following subjects: (1) formularies used by the Pope in writing to the Emperor, Exarch, Consul, Patriarchs, Archbishop of Ravenna, &c.; (2) formularies for the election and consecration of the Pope, with the accompanying notice to the Emperor, Exarch, &c.: (3) for the election and consecration of the episcopi suburbicarii; (4) four formularies for giving the Pallium; (5) twenty-one formularies for despatch of business with Italian bishops consecrated by the Pope; (6) on the administration and alienation of the property of the Roman church; (7) on privileges granted by the Popes to monasteries and other ecclesiastical institutes.

Fragments of the "Liber Diurnus" occur in the mediæval canonists, but the book in its entirety was long unknown. An edition was prepared at Rome in 1660 by Lucas Holstenius, but prohibited by the Roman censors; and the first edition which actually appeared was that of Garnier (Paris, 1680), with learned introduction, notes, and dissertations. Additions were made by Mabillon in his "Museum Italicum." These additions and various readings were used by Hoffmann for the edition in his "Nova Collectio," tom. ii. Garnier's edition with Mabillon's additions has been reprinted by Migne in his "Patrologia."

LIBER PONTIFICALIS. [See CHURCH HISTORY.]

LIBER SEPTIMUS. By this name are known two different collections, neither of which is of authority. 1. Pierre Matthieu, of Lyons, made a collection of Decretals from the pontificate of Gregory XI. to that of Sixtus V., arranged them in five books and a certain number of titles, according to the classification prevailing in the "Corpus Juris," and printed them in 1590. They have been included in two or three editions of the "Corpus," but are generally held to have no validity as a collection; the separate Decretals have whatever authority they may possess apart from their inclusion in this "Liber Septimus." 2. It was under contemplation in the time of Clement VIII. (1592–1605) to publish under this name a collection of recent Papal Constitutions and conciliar decrees, including those of the Council of Trent. The book was actually printed in 1598, but was suppressed through the well-grounded fear that as soon as it appeared it would be glossed and commented for use in the courts, and that in this way the order of Pius IV. (1564), reserving to the Holy See the interpretation of the Tridentine decrees, would be nullified. (Wetzer and Welte, art. by Kober.)

LIBER SEXTUS. The Sext ("Liber Sextus Decretalium;" see art. on CANON LAW) was compiled by order of Boniface VIII. and published in 1298. It received its name with reference to the five books of Decretals published by order of Gregory IX., but is itself divided, like that earlier collection, into five books and a certain number of titles.

LIBERA NOS, &c. A responsory sung by the choir after the Mass of the dead and before the absolution of the corpse. [See ABSOLUTION and FUNERALS.]

LIBERA NOS, &c. The embolismus or continuation of the Lord's Prayer in the Roman Mass. The prayer with slight variation is found in the Gelasian and Gregorian Canons. The principal changes that have been made are in the mention of the saints. At present only the Blessed Virgin, St. Peter and St. Paul (the founders of the Roman church), and St. Andrew, who was first called to the Apostolate, are mentioned by name. But other names occur in the Gregorian canon —viz. Dionysius with Rusticus and Eleutherius and Chlodoaldus. Even in the middle ages, as appears from the "Micrologus," the officiating priest could add names of saints here at discretion.

All the Western liturgies have a prayer, not only corresponding to, but resembling our "Libera nos. The prayer in the Ambrosian Mass is merely a form of our prayer with slight variations. The Mozarabic prayer "Liberati a malo" has at least a general resemblance. The old Gallican liturgy is furthest removed from the Roman standard. There the continuation of the Lord's Prayer varies with the Mass. That for Christmas begins "Libera nos, omnipotens Deus, ab omni malo," &c. (Benedict XIV. "De Missa." Hammond's "Liturgies, Eastern and Western.") LIBERIUS was Bishop of Rome from 352 to 366. Because of the firm support he gave to the Nicene faith, and to Athanasius, its champion, he was banished to Berœa by the Arian Emperor Constantius, some time after the Synod of Milan in 355, the Arian Felix being put in his place at Rome. Liberius was separated even from his companions in exile in order to increase the rigour of his punishment and break his constancy. In 357 Constantius was in Rome, and found that scarcely anyone communicated with the usurper Felix, and that the populace were clamouring for the recall of Liberius. At last, nearly a year later, the Emperor consented to restore Liberius to his see. But on what conditions? Many ancient documents (we shall have to examine their real value further on) testify that Liberius bought his pardon dear—viz. by condemning Athanasius, communicating with heretical bishops, and subscribing a formula which denied, or at least betrayed, the Nicene faith. This is the view, not only of Protestant, but also of many Catholic historians. It is held, e.g., by Baronius; Petavius, "De Trin." i. 9; Bossuet, "Def. Cler. Gall." p. iii. lib. ix. c. 33; Fleury, "Hist." livr. xiii. 46; Döllinger, "Papst-Fabeln"; Hefele, "Concil." (i. 681 seq.); and many others. On the other hand, the Bollandist Stilting, "Acta SS." tom. vi. Sept.; Zaccaria, "De Commentitio Liberii Lapsu"; Palma, "Prælect." tom. i. par. 2; and recently Reinerding, "Beiträge zur Honorius- und Liberiusfrage," 1865; and Cardinal Hergenröther, "Kirchengeschichte," vol. iii., 1880, p. 106 seq.), treat the "fall of Liberius" as an Arian fiction. The question has naturally assumed great prominence from its bearing on the Papal infallibility. In this article we treat of the historical fact and of its dogmatic import separately.

Theodoret, Socrates, and Sulpicius Severus are altogether silent on the fall of Liberius, and we may fairly take their silence as proof either that they had not heard of or else did not believe it. But we have, on the other hand, the distinct and contemporary evidence of Athanasius twice repeated: "Liberius, being exiled, later on, after a period of two years, gave way (ὤκλασε) and, in fear of the death with which he was threatened, subscribed (φοβηθεὶς τὸν ἀπειλούμενον θάνατον ὑπέγραψεν). But even this shows their violence and the hatred of Liberius against the heresy and his decision (ψῆφον) for Athanasius when his will was free. For things done through torments contrary to the original judgment—these are not acts of will on the part of those who have been put to fear, but of those who inflict the torture" ("Epist. ad Monach. et Hist. Arian." 41). He speaks to much the same effect in the "Apol. contr. Arian." 89. "O wretched man that you are," says another contemporary, St. Hilary, addressing Constantius ("Contr. Constant. Imper." c. 11); "I know not whether there was greater wickedness in your banishing him [Liberius] than in your sending him back" ("nescio utrum majore impietate relegaveris quam remiseris"). This looks like an allusion to the price Liberius had to pay for his recall. Sozomen ("H. E." iv. 15) gives us the details. "Constantius," he says, "united the delegates from the bishops of the East [i.e. from the Semi-Arian Council of Ancyra] to the prelates who happened to be present with him in the Court at Sirmium. They combined the definitions of the Antiochene Council in 269 against Paul of Samosata and those of Sirmium against Photinus with the symbol of the Antiochene Council of 341" (probably Sozomen refers to the fourth of their symbols), "and persuaded Liberius to subscribe the new formula or collection of old formulas in which the word 'consubstantial' was abandoned. They brought him to take this step by telling him that the ὁμοούσιος was a mere cloak for Sabellianism. Liberius, however, insisted that he who did not confess the Son to be in essence and in all things like the Father was to be excommunicate." Lastly, Jerome, in his Chronicle, says of Liberius, "overcome by the weariness of exile, setting his name to heretical error, he entered Rome as a conqueror." And again, "Catal. Script." 97, he charges Fortunatius of Aquileia with compelling Liberius to subscribe heresy.

This surely is a fourfold cord of evidence not easily broken. All the witnesses are of great, two (Athanasius and Hilary) of the greatest conceivable weight. And all the accounts are at once independent of and consistent with each other. Liberius would make no terms with the Anomœans, or extreme Arians, but he did communicate with the Semi-Arians, who condemned Athanasius, and abandoned the touch-stone of orthodoxy—viz. the Nicene term ὁμοούσιος. He subscribed the Semi-Arian formula which was compiled from older documents and is known as the third formula of Sirmium.[1] But he did all this under fear, consented to omit the ὁμοούσιος only when persuaded that it was understood in an heretical (i.e. Sabellian) sense, and he accompanied his subscription with a protest against pronounced Arianism. We can easily understand why Athanasius speaks with such touching gentleness of Liberius in the moment of his infirmity.

[1] This is given as highly probable, for historians differ much as to the particular formula signed by Liberius. See Newman's Arians, 2nd ed. p. 332, and Bossuet, loc. cit.

Moreover, Liberius soon recovered himself from his fall, for we find him confirming the orthodox Council of Alexandria in 362.

Stilting and his numerous followers, who exculpate Liberius altogether, are driven to expedients which we cannot help regarding as desperate. They explain away the words of Hilary, regard Jerome and Sozomen as deceived by Arian rumours, and try to show that the decisive words of Athanasius are interpolations. "Hilary's words," says Cardinal Hergenröther, "may only mean that on this occasion also [i.e. in the recall of Liberius] Constantius displayed his impiety." But how could he display in recalling Liberius impiety greater or equal to that which he had shown in driving him from his see if he allowed him to return to it without dishonourable conditions? Next, as to the places in St. Athanasius. Undoubtedly it is true that the passage in the "Hist. Ar. ad Mon." did not belong to the original draft sent to the monks, for it was written before the supposed fall of Liberius; but then Athanasius begged them (see the introductory epistle, c. 3) to send the letter back, and afterwards ("Epist. ad Serap." i. 1) he forwarded it to his friend the Bishop Serapion, and there is not the least difficulty in supposing that Athanasius completed his history by adding to it the account of an event which had happened in the interval. The same chronological objection is made to the second passage from Athanasius, and is disposed of by Hefele just in the same way. Besides, it is hard even to imagine what could have led to the interpolation of the passages. Certainly they were not forged in the interests of Arianism. In style and tone they are every way worthy of St. Athanasius, while the statement they make explains, and at the same time is confirmed by, the words of Hilary.

We should have to think much more severely of Liberius if certain Fragments attributed to Hilary (particularly Fragments iv.–vi.) and the letter of the Pope incorporated in Fragment vi. were genuine. In Fragment vi. Liberius is called an "apostate" and a "traitor" (prævaricator) and anathematised three times; while Liberius himself makes a formal and deliberate confession of Arian belief. The Fragment containing these letters was supposed by the Benedictine editor Coustant to belong to a lost work of Hilary against Ursacius and Valens. There is nothing to allege in favour of this supposition except a note in the margin of the MS., "Sanctus Hilarius illi [sc. Liberio] anathema dicit." And there are the strongest reasons for rejecting the fragment as none of Hilary's, and regarding the letters of Liberius as supposititious. We must refer the reader for the arguments drawn from chronological errors, the barbarism of the style, the clumsiness and unnaturalness of the forgery, to Hefele. He thinks the letters were forged in the name of Liberius and in the Anomœan interest by a "Græculus" who had but a very slight knowledge of Latin. Even Mr. Renouf, though opposed to Hefele's view, and much more hostile to Liberius, is obliged to give up part at least of Fragment vi. as spurious.[1]

It is amazing that anyone after an impartial consideration of the facts should have pressed them into the service of Gallicanism. Liberius, at the time of his fall, taught nothing and imposed no belief. Besides, if the Pope is to teach ex cathedra, common sense requires that he should be free. Liberius, on the contrary, subscribed the Semi-Arian formula separated from his friends and counsellors and in terror of death. It is as if, to borrow an illustration of Cardinal Newman, an English Chief Justice were hurried away by bandits, kept without notes, books, or counsel, and forced under terror of death to decide a legal case in one particular way. Nobody, save from prejudice, would pretend that such a decision was valid. What the case does prove is the extreme importance attached to the judgment of Liberius. They knew his zeal and energy, and "the impious," writes Athanasius, "said to themselves, 'If we persuade Liberius, we shall quickly master all'" ("Hist. Ar. ad Mon." c. 35).

(The literature has been given with tolerable fulness in the body of the article. We ought to add that Cardinal Newman, even in the second edition of his "Arians" (1871), assumes the authenticity of "Hilary" Frag. iv. and vi. and consequently of the letters attributed to Liberius, but he seems not to have seen Hefele's counter-arguments. See "Arians," p. 332.)

LIBRARIES. The two captures of Rome in the fifth century, first by Alaric and afterwards by Genseric, must have been fatal to any large accumulation of books in the Eternal City; but mention is made of a Vatican library in the time of Pope Vigilius (†555), and under Leo IV. (†855), the Cardinal Bishop of Ostia was its librarian. (Thomassin, II. i. 95). Gregory the Great had certainly the command of a large library. The famous Alexandrian library—a monument at once of the enlightenment of the Ptolemaic dynasty, and of the high grade of culture which the confluence of the Semitic with the Aryan intellect at that city rendered possible—perished, if we accept the common story, through the bigotry of Omar;[1] but a few years later new libraries began to be formed on northern shores and islands, where barbarism had hitherto reigned supreme. Beda[2] tells us that the abbot Benedict Biscop conveyed to his monastery of Wearmouth, on returning from his numerous Roman journeys, a large and splendid library (bibliothecam nobilissimam copiosissimamque), which, "as necessary for a completely furnished church, he ordered should be kept entire, and neither damaged through neglect, nor dispersed" in the hands of borrowers. This was about A.D. 680. Archbishop Egbert founded at York a "nobilissima bibliotheca" about 750; the fact is mentioned in one of Alcuin's letters.[3] The library of Glastonbury, for some time after St. Dunstan had been abbot there, was the best in England. William of Malmesbury, to whose sterling literary qualities the student of English history is under such deep obligation, himself actively aided abbot Godfrey in forming a large and well-chosen library at Malmesbury Abbey.[4] That every large Anglo-Saxon monastery had its library there can be no doubt. In Ireland, at all the great monastic centres, such as Armagh, Clonmacnoise, Inisfallen, Boyle, Kells, &c., there were large collections of books; a fact which the number of Irish MSS. still surviving, in spite of the havoc made by war and rapine, and the effects of a damp climate, amply attests. Generally it is true of Europe that all through the mediæval period a threefold process, of accumulation, loss or dispersion, and re-accumulation of books was going on.

[1] The writer of this article, though he has read Mr. Renouf's pamphlets, has not a copy at his command, and takes the reference (Condemnation of Pope Honorius, p. 41) from Hergenröther.

[1] But, as Gibbon says (ch. li.), the common story is more than doubtful; it rests on the sole authority of Abulpharagius, a writer of the thirteenth century.

Barbarians from Scandinavia ruined most of the libraries of Anglo-Saxon monasteries, and a large number of those in Ireland. Under St. Dunstan books were again copied and collected; a second dark period ensued till about 1050; after the Conquest a long era of comparative peace and progress began. A glance at the "Philobiblon" of Richard of Bury (†1345), the learned and politic bishop of Durham, shows that the collection, binding, conservation, and utilisation of books, everything in short that appertains to the office of a librarian, was already well understood in the fourteenth century. The Kings of France began from about 1370 to form the library of the Louvre. In the fifteenth century, the printing-press having come into use, and ancient learning, especially Greek learning, being held in greater esteem than ever before, new books and editions were multiplied and libraries extended. In this work Italy took the lead. The Vatican library, founded by Nicholas V. (1447–1455) and enriched by later gifts and collections, soon became the best library in Europe. Even at this day, although in the department of printed books it is probably surpassed by many, there can be few, if any, that can point to so superb a collection of MSS. The Medici family founded the Laurentian library at Florence, which could also boast of the public library of St. Mark, established in 1437. Venice and Ferrara laboured in the same field. Out of Italy, Matthias Corvinus founded, about 1480, a celebrated library at Buda, and stored up in it a large number of Greek MSS. which he had rescued from the Turkish conquerors of Constantinople. Unfortunately, his capital was too near to the still expanding power of the Ottoman, and his literary treasures were in great part dispersed or lost. Heidelberg, Vienna, and Leyden, all founded libraries in the fifteenth century. The great Cardinal Ximenes added a well-stocked library to the university which he founded (about 1500) at Alcala. In England the views of the early Reformers were not favourable to the interests of learning. It is well known that the commissioners of Edward VI. ordered a large collection of MSS., which had been given to the University of Oxford by the good Duke Humphrey, to be burnt, on the suspicion that they contained matter of Papistry. Sir Thomas Bodley, about the end of Elizabeth's reign, repaired this havoc, built a large portion of the present library, brought into it a fine collection both of books and MSS., and endowed it with ample estates. The library of the British Museum, originating in the purchase from Sir Hans Sloane in 1753, lavishly aided ever since by public money, and enriched by the grant of the library of the Kings of England, and the purchase of George III.'s collections from George IV., takes the lead of all similar institutions in England in the number both of books and MSS. The Bodleian, with its 200,000 volumes and 25,000 MSS. occupies the next place. (Hallam's "Literature of Europe.")

LIGHT OF GLORY. [See Beatific Vision.]

LIGUORI. [See Moral Theology.]

LIMBO. The Latin word Limbus (or "fringe") was used in the middle ages for that place on the fringe or outskirts of hell in which the just who died before Christ were detained till our Lord's resurrection from the dead. It likewise signifies a place (also supposed to be beneath the earth and on the outskirts of hell) inhabited by infants who die in original sin.

(A) The Limbus Patrum is the Paradise of Luc. xxiii. 43, so called because it was a place of rest and joy, though the joy was imperfect. In Luc. xvi. 23, it is called by the Rabbinical name "Abraham's bosom" (בְּחֵיקוֹ שֶׁל אַבְרָהָם), because there the just remained in loving intercourse with Abraham, the father of the faithful. Estius thinks it was to the spirits in the Limbo of the Fathers as well as to those in Purgatory that Christ is said to have preached (1 Pet. iii. 19, 20). The passage, however, is very difficult, and very different interpretations are given by Fathers and other Catholic commentators.

(B) Limbus Infantium.—It is an article of faith that those who die without baptism, and in whose case the want of baptism has not been supplied in some other way, cannot enter heaven. This is plainly stated, e.g., by the Council of Florence in the Decree of Union. But there was a natural repugnance to the belief that those who had committed no sin should be tortured in hell, and this difficulty led theologians to adopt various theories as by way of escape.

1. Some few theologians thought that God might be pleased to supply the want of baptism in infants by other means. Thus St. Bernard ("De Baptismo," c. i.

n. 4, c. ii. n. 1) thought that possibly such infants might be saved by the faith of their parents. A similar opinion is attributed to Gerson, Cardinal Cajetan and others—viz. that the lack of baptism might be supplied by the wish for the sacrament on the part of their parents or others; Cajetan requiring in addition the use of some external sign with the invocation of the Trinity. (See Billuart, "De Baptism." diss. iii. a. 1.)

Another theologian, Albertus a Balsano ("Compend. Theol." vol. ii. § 325, quoted by Jungmann, "De Noviss."), believed that God might commission angels to confer baptism on infants who might otherwise perish without it.

2. The theologians of the Augustinian order (e.g. Cardinal Noris and Berti) held an opinion at the opposite pole—viz. that the infants in question were punished both by exclusion from heaven and by positive pain, though much less pain than is inflicted on those who die in actual mortal sin. This undoubtedly is the opinion of St. Augustine (Serm. 294, where he teaches that unbaptised infants were consigned to eternal fire), though their damnation will be "the lightest of all" ("De Peccat. Meritis et Remiss." i. 20).

3. The great majority of theologians—the Master of the Sentences, St. Buonaventure, St. Thomas, Scotus, &c.—teach that infants dying in original sin suffer no "pain of sense," but are simply excluded from heaven. This opinion is no modern invention, for it is found in St. Gregory Nazianzen ("Or. in Sanct. Baptism." 23).[1] But do they grieve because they are shut out of Heaven? Bellarmin ("De Amiss. Gratiæ," vi. 6, apud Jungmann) answers Yes. St. Thomas answers that they do not, because pain of punishment is proportioned to personal guilt, which does not exist here. He says they do not grieve because they cannot see God, any more than a bird is grieved because it cannot be emperor or king: "nay, they rejoice, because they share in God's goodness and in many natural perfections." The opinion of St. Thomas is the common one in the Church. It is believed that unbaptised infants in Limbo know and love God by the use of their natural powers, and have full natural happiness.

The existence of the Limbo of Infants has never been defined by the Church, although the Jansenist Council of Pistoia was censured by Pius VI. for scoffing at it as a Pelagian fable. The doctrine of the Pelagians was widely different. They denied original sin and obliterated the distinction between grace and nature, and when pressed to explain the need of baptism replied that it was necessary to secure admittance to the kingdom of heaven, but not to obtain eternal life. "Eternal life," to which the Pelagians admitted unbaptised infants, was of the same order as the Kingdom of Heaven. The happiness obtained in the Limbo of Infants is of wholly different order, being natural instead of supernatural.

[1] He thinks that infants who die unbaptised "will neither be glorified nor punished by the just judge, as being without the seal [i.e. baptism] indeed, but without wickedness."

LITANIES (λιτανία, earnest supplication). A form of united prayer by alternate sentences, in which the clergy lead and the people respond: usually of a penitential character. A litany may thus be distinguished from other modern devotions, such as that of the Stations, in which, with much that is alternate, there is also much that is not. There are three forms of litany recognised by the Church as suitable for use in public worship: viz., the Litany of the Saints, that of the Blessed Virgin) usually called the Litany of Loreto), and that of the Most Holy Name of Jesus. The Litany o the Saints is chanted on the feast of St. Mark (April 25), and on the three Rogation days; on the former occasion it is called the Greater (litaniæ majores), and on the Rogation days the Lesser (litaniæ minores). During the devotion of the Forty Hours, the Litany of the Saints is sung with the addition of certain verses; on the other hand, when it is sung on Holy Saturday and Whitsun Eve, a number of verses are omitted. The Litany of the Blessed Virgin—in which titles expressive of the transcendent dignity and privilege of the Mother of God, as well as of the love, trust and veneration of her children towards her, are woven into a chain of animated supplication—is now usually sung at Benediction. It came into general use from having been observed to be sung on Saturdays and festivals of Our Lady in the Santa Casa of Loreto, whence pilgrims carried it into all Christian lands; but a large portion of it is far older than the foundation of the sanctuary, which of course only dates from the thirteenth century. The bull "Sanctissimus" of Clement VIII. directs that, whereas a number of unauthorised litanies had lately been published, no one should for the future presume to publish, or to use in public worship, any litany but those in Breviaries, Missals, Pontificals, and Rituals (i.e. the Litany of the Saints in its various forms), and the Litany of Loreto. But it is universally held that the use of the Litany of the Most Holy Name, having been already sanctioned by the Holy See before the date of the bull "Sanctissimus," is in no way affected by its prohibitions.

If the Greater Litanies fall on Easter Day they are transferred to the Tuesday following. Priests are bound sub mortali to recite the Litanies both on St. Mark's day and on the three Rogation days. No new names of saints can be inserted without the special permission of the S.C.R.

The earliest and simplest form of litany is the "Kyrie eleison," which was recited in various ways in primitive times, but in the twelfth century settled down to the form still in use. The first litanies were embedded in the liturgy; later on they were developed independently, chiefly through being used in processions. Under the heading "Litania Romana" there is extant in a Sacramentary of the age of Gregory the Great a Litany of the Saints, evidently intended for use in some Gaulish church;[1] it contains 101 names. There is a manifest connection between such a litany and collections of short metrical Lives of saints—such, e.g., as that in a Bodleian MS (No. 779), which contains 104 Lives.

The practice of singing the Litany of the Saints on St. Mark's day is said to have been instituted by St. Gregory. Seven processions, starting simultaneously from seven Roman churches, and singing litanies as they went, all met in the church of St. Mary Major.[2] Their use on the Rogation days was begun by St. Mamertus, archbishop of Vienne, in the year 447, the special intention being the deliverance of the people from wolves, which in that year were more than usually ravenous.

LITERÆ FORMATÆ. [See EPISTOLÆ ECCLESIASTICÆ.]

LITERÆ PATENTES. Certain public documents were so called from the form in which the notaries commenced them: e.g. "Per præsens publicum instrumentum cunctis pateat evidenter;'[3] "Let it be clearly made known to all by the present public instrument." Canonists speak of the Letters Patent of Louis XI. in 1475, as the earliest instance in France of the application of the doctrine of the royal pareatis ("ye may obey") or placitum regium[1] to the reception of bulls, briefs, &c., from Rome. Pithou, in his work on the Gallican liberties, sets forth this doctrine in its full tyrannous absurdity. "Bulls or Apostolic letters of citation, executional, fulminatory, or other, are not executed in France without the pareatis of the king or his officers." "All bulls and despatches from the Court of Rome must be carefully examined, to ascertain if there be anything in them likely to operate to the prejudice, in any manner whatever, of the rights and liberties of the Gallican church, and of the king's authority."[2]

LITTLE OFFICE OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN. The authorship has often been attributed to Peter Damian, but Cardinal Bona ("Divin. Psalm." c. 12, quoted by Probst, "Brevier." p. 299) holds that it existed at the beginning of the eighth century, and that Peter Damian only restored its use.

It consists of psalms, lessons, and hymns in honour of the Blessed Virgin, arranged in seven hours like the Breviary office, but much shorter. It is not influenced by the course of the Church year, except that the Alleluia is omitted in Lent, and that a change is made in the office from Advent to the Purification. Even the Alleluia is not added to the invitatory, antiphons, responsories and versicles in Easter time (Dec., S. R. C., 28 Martii, 1626).

The Council of Clermont, under Urban II., in 1096, made the recitation of the Little Office obligatory on the clergy, but secular priests who are not bound to recite the office in choir are now free from all obligation of reciting the Little Office, as has been clearly stated by Pius V. in his bull "Quod a nobis postulat" prefixed to the Breviary (see Maskell, "Mon. Rit." vol. iii. p. lxii). Where there is a custom of reciting it, the obligation continues. Even in that case, however, it need not be said on feasts of nine lections (if, however, there is a custom of saying it on Sundays and semidoubles the custom is to be maintained), on the vigil of Christmas, in Holy Week, in the octaves of Easter and Pentecost, and on Saturdays when the larger Office of the Blessed Virgin is said (Gavant. tom. II. § 9, cap. i. n. 2–8).

The matins and vespers are said before, the other hours after, the corresponding hours of the divine office (Gavant. loc. cit. n. 13). In many religious orders, and in rules for persons in the world—(e.g. the tertiaries of St. Francis), the Little Office is prescribed instead of the Breviary hours.

LITURGIES. I. Meaning of the Word.—The word λειτουργία means a public service, and specially at Athens a public service which the richer citizens discharged at their own expense. The theocratic constitution of the Jewish commonwealth naturally led the Septuagint translators to use λειτουργία and the kindred forms chiefly of the service of God in the sanctuary. It answers to various words in the original Hebrew (see e.g. Exod. xxviii. 21, Num. xxxviii., 25, 2 Paralip. xxxi. 4). In Luc. i. 23 it denotes the service of a Jewish priest, and it is used in the New Testament of any service rendered to God (see, e.g., Philipp. ii. 17). There is no clear instance in the New Testament of λειτουργία or λειτουργεῖν signifying a service performed by the Christian clergy, though in Acts xiii. 2 the words, "As they ministered to the Lord (λειτουργούντων αὐτῶν) and fasted," may possibly refer to the action of the "prophets and teachers" in preaching and guiding the devotions of the congregation. Clem. Rom. 1 Ep. 44, does use λειτουργία for the functions of the Christian presbyters. In the fourth century the use of the word for priestly ministrations was fully recognised (see, e.g., the Council of Ancyra, canon 1; anno 314), and from that date down at least to the sixth century it was used for any solemn service (e.g. evening prayer, baptism, &c.), but especially for the Eucharistic service. In this sense it has been adopted by the Greek church, which speaks of "divine liturgy" where Latins would say "holy Mass." It is in this, its narrowest signification, that we take the word here. Under "liturgies" we include all forms and services in any language and in any part of the church for the celebration of the Eucharist. We may add here that σύναξις (assembly) is another word used by the Greeks for the Mass, and that dominica solemnia (Tertull. "De Fug." 14), dominicum celebrare (Cyprian, "De Op. et Eleem." 15, Ep. 63), officium (Tertull. "De Orat." 18), besides "sacrifice," "offering," "bloodless and rational sacrifice," are names common among the Fathers. The word "Mass" first appears in St. Ambrose. [For its meaning see the article MASS.]

II. Liturgical Notices to the Middle of the Fifth Century.—Scripture tells us little or nothing of the way in which the Apostles celebrated the Eucharist, but from the year 150 onwards we have abundant proof that the Church in all parts of the world had a fixed order and, to a certain extent at least, fixed words for this the greatest of all her services. This section of our article is taken from Le Brun, vol. iii. diss. i. a. 5, from whom we borrow the patristic references.

The Mass was said by the bishop, or in his absence by priests assisted by at least one deacon (Cyprian, Ep. 5).

It began with lections from the prophets, Apostles and Evangelists. These lessons from the Old or New Testament are mentioned by Justin in his first Apology, written in 138 or 139. And it was the custom of the East, as attested by St. Chrysostom ("Hom. 19 in Act. Ap."), of Gaul (Sulpic. Sever. "Vit. Martin." 7), Milan and Spain, to read the prophets as well as the Epistles and Gospels. On the other hand, in the Roman and African churches there were usually only two lections—one from the Epistles, another from the Gospels, with a psalm between them (August. "Serm." 176 al. 170). These lections were not, as now in our Mass, preceded by an introit.

Then followed a sermon, after which certain prayers were said over the catechumens, and they were dismissed (Ambrose, Ep. 14). Here we have the first great division of the Mass into the "Missa catechumenorum" and "Missa fidelium." The Council of Laodicea, canon 19, mentions a prayer for the penitents who were dismissed after the catechumens, but in 390 Nectarius of Constantinople abolished public penance in the East.

The altar was then covered with cloths (Optat. lib. vi.) and the celebrating bishop's hands were washed by a deacon (Cyril. "Mystagog." 5), and in all the East (Justin, "Apol." 2; Concil. Laod. can. 19; Chrysost. "De Compunct. Cordis"), in Spain and Gaul, the faithful gave each other the Kiss of Peace; whereas in Rome and Africa the Pax immediately preceded the Communion. The bread and the mixed chalice (of which latter even Justin speaks) were presented, and in Carthage from St. Cyprian's time verses of the psalms were sung at this part of the Mass.

The "Sursum corda" is mentioned by Cyprian, and Augustine says the Church over all the world answered, "that they lifted up their hearts to the Lord" ("De Vera Relig." 3). The Preface, according to St. Chrysostom and St. Cyril, was followed by the Sanctus. We know very little from the Fathers about the words of the Canon. They tell us generally that the words of institution were accompanied by prayer, the faithful answering "Amen" at the end; and St. Augustine ("In Symb.") says the sign of the cross was made at the consecration. The fraction of the host in Africa, and, before the time of St. Gregory the Great, at Rome, took place, as it still does in the Ambrosian Mass, before the Pater Noster. In the ancient use of the Roman and African churches the Pax was given after the Pater Noster. At Jerusalem the celebrant, in other Eastern churches the deacon, said, "Holy things for holy persons." The veil of the sanctuary, as St. Chrysostom and St. Cyril of Alexandria mention, was partially drawn aside and the faithful received communion under the form of bread in their hands from the bishop or priest, while the deacons gave them the chalice. In the church of Carthage from the fourth century verses of the psalms were sung, and we know from St. Cyril that they used to sing the verse "Taste and see that the Lord is good" in the church of Jerusalem. The faithful were taught to say "Lord, I am not worthy," &c., as they went to communicate. All ended with thanksgiving and the salutation or blessing from the bishop, "Grace be with you and peace" (Chrys. "Hom. iii. ad Coloss."). These extracts from the Fathers are not, of course, meant to convey the impression that one liturgy or even that all the forms just given were used throughout the Church. What they do prove is that the Church everywhere had certain forms, and with regard to some of these forms the date and the character of the incidental notices which survive show that their origin may be traced almost to Apostolic times and that their reception was universal.

III. When were Liturgies first written?—Very different answers have been given to this question, which would not arise at all if we could assume that the Liturgies of St. James, St. Mark, and St. Clement were rightly named. It is, however, absolutely impossible to suppose that these liturgies, as we have them, came from those whose names they bear. The Clementine Liturgy comes to us under the most suspicious circumstances in the latest book of a notorious forgery, and there is no reason to believe that it ever was actually used in any church. The Liturgy of St. James contains insertions from that of Constantinople which must have been made as late as the fifth—one (the hymn οἱ τὰ χερουβὶμ) as late as the seventh century; words of controversial theology abound in it (see Hammond, "Ancient Liturgies," xliv); and the very fact that no extant liturgies (except the Clementine) have any form of dismissing penitents points to a time later at least than the abolition of public penance in the East by Nectarius in 390. Doubtless these liturgies contain older elements, but we can only know or conjecture what they are by collecting information from extraneous sources.

These sources are of course the writings of the Fathers and the decrees of councils, and from these it may, we think, be safely inferred that there was no entire written liturgy during the first three centuries of the Church. Tertullian ("De Corona," 3) assumes that various most important liturgical usages (e.g. celebration of the Eucharist early in the morning, oblations for the dead on the feasts of martyrs (pro natalitiis), reception of the Eucharist from the hand of the "president") rest simply on "custom" and "tradition." He makes no allusion to a written liturgy. Cyprian (Ep. 63) argues against those who used water only, instead of wine mixed with water, in the Eucharist. He argues at length, and is evidently anxious to adduce every possible reason against the novelty; but he, again, appeals simply to "the tradition of the Lord," without the remotest reference to liturgical documents. These, it may be said, are, after all, only arguments from silence. But if we contrast Cyprian's argument with that of the Council in Trullo, between four and five hundred years later, we shall see how strong this argument becomes. The council (canon 32) strictly forbids the Armenian custom of consecrating wine unmixed with water, and in proof that this was wrong appeals to the three Liturgies of St. James, St. Basil, and Chrysostom—i.e. to the three liturgies then as now used in the Patriarchate of Constantinople (Le Brun, tom. iii. p. 9).

Further, notwithstanding the full information we have about the sacred books which the Christians were required to surrender in the Diocletian persecution, we hear nothing of their liturgies.

We assert, then, with confidence, that there was no written liturgy in the first three centuries, and this though Probst ("Liturgie der drei ersten Jahrhunderte," ad init.) has tried hard to show that such liturgies existed from 150. Probst's learning and accuracy deserve all respect, but we cannot think equally well of his logical power, and we confess that we are utterly unable to discover anything which approaches proof in his laborious argument. We are disposed, however, to go further and follow Le Brun to the full extent of his thesis—viz., that written liturgies did not exist for the first four centuries. He relies on Basil "De Sp. Sancto," c. 27: "Which of the Saints has left us in writing the words of invocation at the exhibition of the bread of the Eucharist and the chalice of benediction? For we are not content with those mentioned by the Apostle or the Gospel, but we also say other words before and after, as having great force with respect to the mystery, receiving them from unwritten tradition." The reader must judge for himself as to the import of these words. So excellent an authority as Mr. Maskell ("Ancient Liturgy of the Church of England," ed. 3, xxvii) believes that St. Basil only means to deny that the liturgical words were contained in Scripture. Early in the fifth century Pope Innocent I. writing to the Bishop Decentius, who had applied to him for the Roman Use, reminds him that he had often come to Rome and witnessed the customs observed "in consecrating the mysteries and in the performance of other secret rites" ("in cæteris agendis arcanis"), and that this sufficed. He tells him, however, that the Pax should be given, not (as in the East) before the consecration, but "after all the things which I ought not to disclose." This does not look as if the Canon of the Mass had even then been committed to writing in the Roman church. Long before this, however, there may have been a fixed, even if there was not a written, Canon of the Mass. The memory of the ancients, who were obliged, before the invention of printing, to use the faculty much more than we are, must not be measured by our modern standard. It was a common thing in the ancient Church for persons to know the Psalter by heart, and priests learned to repeat the Canon without book (even now no surprising feat) long after it had been written.

IV. Families of Liturgies.—The most superficial observer cannot fail to be struck by the difference between the Eastern and Western liturgies. Each of the former can be printed in very narrow space, because it is only in the lessons and subordinate hymns that any variation occurs. It is very different, e.g., with our Roman Mass, with its wealth of collects, Prefaces, &c. Moreover, in the Roman Mass there were at one time a much larger number of variable Prefaces. There is the same variety in the liturgies of Gaul and Spain, and in these last even a great part of the prayers corresponding to the Roman Canon vary also. Thus it comes that a separate volume is needed for each Western liturgy, while all the chief Eastern ones, with slight omissions, can be printed in one manual.

We are able, however, to divide the liturgies on a more exact and thorough system. "It is now thoroughly recognised," says Mr. Hammond ("Ancient Liturgies"), "that there are five main groups or families of liturgies, which are distinguished from each other chiefly, though not solely, by the different arrangement of their parts." Three of these are Oriental, two Western—one purely so, the other Western in respect of the countries where it was used and many of its characteristics, but presenting at the same time certain Oriental peculiarities.

(a) The West Syrian Family places the great intercession for the living and the dead (which is common to all liturgies and which is familiar to us as the Mementoes for the living and for the dead) after the invocation of the Holy Spirit—which in Oriental liturgies follows the consecration. The oldest member of this family is the Liturgy of St. James, but this again is, "without doubt, a direct modification of a liturgy nearly if not quite identical with the so-called Clementine." St. Basil's Liturgy is a recast from that of St. James, and St. Chrysostom's an abbreviation of St. Basil's. In its chief characteristics, and even in part of its wording, the Armenian liturgy follows St. Basil's. The Liturgies, then, of St. James, St. Basil, St. Chrysostom, of Armenia, are the members of this family. Palestine, Armenia, the whole territories of the Greek and Russian churches, are, as we shall see, the countries where it prevails.

The Clementine Liturgy never seems to have been actually used in any church. Le Brun places its composition at the end of the fourth century. Mr. Hammond thinks it may represent liturgical use in the middle of the third century, at a time when the worship of the Church, though not uniform, still had not been broken up into the separate and developed forms of the later liturgies. It bears unmistakeable marks of great antiquity. Such are the exact agreement with the order of the parts of the liturgy mentioned by Justin; the prayers over catechumens, the possessed, penitents; the prayer for persecuting emperors, &c. Again, the great length of the Preface points to a time when there was no elaborate cycle of feasts to fix the mind on particular grounds of thanksgiving. The eighth book of the Apostolic Constitutions as it stands is probably not older than the fifth century. But the compiler would not have ventured to put an entirely new liturgy into the mouths of the Apostles. The puzzling feature of this liturgy is the absence of the Lord's Prayer.

Liturgy of St. James.—Its antiquity is proved by its correspondence with the description of the Liturgy by St. Cyril of Jerusalem. It was once current throughout the Patriarchates of Jerusalem and Antioch. It exists in two recensions, Greek and Syriac, of which, as Renaudot has shown, the Greek is the original. In its Greek form it is now used only by the Schismatic Greeks at Jerusalem on St. James's day, October 23. It is also said to be used in some islands of the Archipelago. (See Article Liturgy in Smith and Cheetham.) In its Syriac form, it is the chief and prototype of the many liturgies used by the Jacobites or Monophysite Syrians and by the Maronites who are Catholics. The Maronites, however, have changed the words of consecration to the Roman form and reduced the invocation of the Holy Spirit to a prayer for the spiritual benefit of the communicants, who now receive only under one kind.

The Liturgies of Constantinople—viz., those of St. Basil and St. Chrysostom—are now used far more widely than any other Eastern liturgies. The Liturgy of St. Basil may very likely be his in substance, and since the Council in Trullo (i.e. from the close of the seventh century) the "Liturgy of St. Chrysostom" (an abbreviation of St. Basil's) has borne its present name. The Liturgy of St. Basil is said on Sundays in Lent except Palm Sunday, on Holy Thursday and Saturday, the Vigils of Christmas and Epiphany, and on St. Basil's day. In Lent, except on Sundays and Saturdays the Liturgy of the Presanctified (of uncertain date and authorship) is used; on all other days of the year the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom. The Liturgies of Constantinople are used, not only by all Greeks subject to Constantinople, or again (in Slavonic) throughout the Russian church, by the Bulgarians, Georgians, &c., but also by the Melchites or Oriental "Orthodox" in communion with Constantinople, and by the United or Catholic Greeks in Italy and other parts of the world. A letter of Balsamon shows that Constantinople in the twelfth century had already imposed her liturgies on a remnant in the other Eastern Patriarchates which had not become Nestorian or Monophysite. She had thus secured a barren uniformity at a heavy price. If it had not been for the vitality of Nestorian, Monophysite, and Monothelite heresy, the liturgies of Constantinople might have obtained exclusive possession, and rites no less Catholic and venerable than those of Constantinople might have perished altogether under the influence of bigotry and ambition.

The Armenians use only one liturgy, founded on the Greek one of St. Basil. The United Armenians use the same rite with some modifications. Bartholomew of Bologna, a Dominican missionary, had the Roman Missal (Dominican edition) translated into Armenian, and introduced it in the middle of the fourteenth century among the "United Brethren,' an order for converted Armenians. The two most striking peculiarities in the true Armenian rite—the use of unleavened bread and wine without water—are shewn by Le Brun (tom. IV. diss. x. a. 10) to have been introduced by an Armenian council about 640, in order to symbolise the Monophysite doctrine that Christ had only one nature.

(β) The Second or Alexandrian Family is characterised by the occurrence of the "Great Intercession" for living and dead in the midst of the Preface, and by the prominent part assigned to the deacon. The original Church language of the Alexandrian church was Greek, and we possess three Greek liturgies belonging to it: viz. those of St. Mark, St. Basil, and St. Gregory. Originally there were twelve Coptic liturgies, and these are still preserved in Ethiopic by the Abyssinians, who depend on Alexandria; but Gabriel, 70th Patriarch of the Copts, who lived in the twelfth century, limited the Copts to three liturgies—viz., those of St. Cyril, St. Basil, and St. Gregory, all in Coptic. Of course the Alexandrian Liturgy of St. Basil, whether Greek or Coptic, must be carefully distinguished from that of Constantinople.

The Greek Liturgy of St. Mark is in its main features very ancient, for it contains references to persecution as still likely, though it has been altered under the influence of Constantinople. The Coptic Liturgy of St. Cyril, exhibits close and often verbal agreement with that of St. Mark, and has the true Alexandrian arrangement of parts throughout. The Coptic St. Basil, on the other hand, is identical with that of St. Cyril up to the Anaphora, but in the Anaphora—i.e. from the "Sursum corda" to the end it conforms to the Constantinopolitan or West Syrian model. Mr. Hammond supposes on very plausible grounds that, the Alexandrian St. Basil, whether Greek or Coptic, arose from uniting the Anaphora of St. Basil used by the Greek church to the proanaphoral portion of the original Alexandrian liturgy. Finally, the Liturgy of St. Gregory follows the type of the Coptic St. Basil. The chief Ethiopic liturgy, the "canon universalis," closely follows the Greek St. Mark and the Coptic St. Cyril. It is unique, as Mr. Hammond points out, in omitting the "Sursum corda," with its response. Of their three existing liturgies, the Copts ordinarily use that of St. Basil. St. Gregory's is only used in the midnight Masses of Christmas and Epiphany; St. Cyril's, which, as we have seen, is the purest representative of the old national liturgy, only on the Friday before Palm Sunday. (Marquis of Bute, "Coptic Morning Service for the Lord's Day," Introduction.) The Catholic or United Copts have imitated the Latins in several points—viz., communion under one kind, the use (mostly) of unleavened bread, and kneeling at communion. (Marquis of Bute, ib.)

(γ) The East Syrian Family places the general intercession between the words of institution and the invocation of the Holy Ghost. It includes the liturgies in the Syriac tongue used by the Nestorians and Chaldeans, &c., descendants of Nestorians who abjured heresy and returned to the Church, preserving, however, their ancient rites.

The Nestorians have three liturgies. The most ancient, and also that in ordinary use, is "The Liturgy of the Blessed Apostles, composed by Lord Addæus [prob. Thaddeus] and Maris, Doctors of the Children of the East." It omits in its present form the words of institution, though Bickell has proved that it originally contained them (see Hammond, lix). The other two liturgies are called after Theodore (of Mopsuestia) and Nestorius, though there are reasons for believing even this last to be older than the Nestorian schism in 431. The liturgy of Nestorius is the only one of the three which has been corrupted in the interest of heresy (Le Brun, diss. xi. a. 10). Le Brun (ib. a. 11) asserts that the Chaldeans or Nestorian converts of Diarbekir have adopted a Syriac translation of the Roman Missal, using, however, leavened bread. He seems to have been misinformed; at all events this is not the case now. Dr. Badger, the learned author of the "Nestorians and their Ritual," whose authority is decisive on such a point, says the Catholics of the Chaldean rite use the same three liturgies as the Nestorians. They have, however, introduced the words of institution in the liturgy of the Apostles, and placed them after the invocation in the other two liturgies. They elevate the Host and chalice, and they give the laity at communion the Host dipped in the Precious Blood. Moreover, the priest reserves the particles over after the communion of the people, instead of consuming them like the Nestorians; priests say Mass daily, and even, if there are several priests in one church, have more than one Mass on the same altar (Badger, vol. ii. p. 241 seq.).

(δ) The Kindred but Independent Liturgies of Gaul and Spain.—Here the Great Intercession comes just after the offertory, though the Mozarabic Mass has also a Memento of the living before the Pater Noster. Not only collects, lections, &c., but also the greater part of the prayers which correspond to the Canon are variable. It has been supposed that these liturgies are partly due to the church of Asia Minor, with which the ancient church of Lyons was connected. However that may be, certain it is that this Western family of liturgies has some Eastern peculiarities: such are "Sancta sanctis" in the Mozarabic Liturgy, and, in both the Gallican and Mozarabic rites, the regular reading of a lection from the Old Testament, the various proclamations by the deacon, the "Preces" (i.e. probably a series of intercessions like the ectene, or deacon's litany in Eastern liturgies), and the giving of the Pax early in the service, whereas in the Roman Mass it has always been given, according to the earliest notice extant, after the consecration.

The word "Mozarabic" is from Mozzarab, the participle of an Arabic verb meaning "to adopt the Arab mode of life." It must have been applied to Christians living under the Moors, but the liturgy is much older than its name, for it is substantially the same as that known to Isidore of Seville in the sixth century. It was, indeed, this Saint and his brother, St. Leander, who had the principal share in compiling the Spanish Missal, and St. Isidore presided over a Council of Toledo which imposed it on all Spain and on Narbonne, which did not belong to the Franks till 759. In Charlemagne's time the Mozarabic or Gothic rite fell into some disrepute because of expressions in it supposed to favour the Adoptionist heresy. Early in the ninth century, after much discussion between Rome and Spain, the Missal, from which the incriminated phrases had been removed, was declared orthodox; the Spaniards, however, being required to conform the words of consecration to those in the Roman Missal. But in the next century, Alexander II., Gregory VII., and Urban II., made great efforts to substitute the Roman Missal In the thirteenth century, the Mozarabic rite had disappeared from every cathedral church, and at the end of the fifteenth it had disappeared altogether. In 1500, Cardinal Ximenes published the Mozarabic Missal with some few assimilations to Roman use, and built a collegiate church in which this Missal and the Mozarabic Breviary (printed 1502) were to be used. Dr. Neale (quoted by Hammond, p. lxv) tells us that at present the Mozarabic rite is followed, not only in this church, but in two parish churches in Toledo and one at Salamanca. The most remarkable feature in the Mass to an ordinary observer is the elaborate symbolism of the Fraction. The Host is divided first into two, then into nine parts, each with a separate name, taken from the mysteries of Christ's life.

Gallican Liturgy.—This venerable liturgy does not exist in a complete form, since no Gallican "Antiphonarium" (the book containing introits, offertories, &c.) has yet been found. But we have three Sacramentaries printed by Cardinal Thomasi in 1680, and again by Mabillon in his "De Liturgia Gallicana," in 1685. The first is called by Mabillon "Gallico-Gallicanum," and was probably used in South Gaul; the second, "Missale Francorum," used in North-Western Gaul, contains a large admixture of Roman elements —the prayers are Gelasian, the Preface, though retaining its Gallican name, "Contestatio," ends like the Preface in the Roman Mass; the third, "Gallicanum Vetus," seems free from Roman admixtures, except in the office for Good Friday. Besides, we have a Gallican Lectionary edited by Mabillon in his work cited above, and a "Sacramentarium Gallicanum," found by Mabillon in the monastery at Bobbio, and printed by him in his "Museum Italicum." But this last has the Gregorian or Roman Canon. Further, we have a most detailed and valuable exposition of the old Gallican Mass, in an extract from two letters of St. Germanus of Paris, written in the middle of the sixth century. Additional fragments of eleven Gallican Masses have been published by Mone ("Griechische und lateinische Missen," Frankfort, 1850), and a few more by Bunsen ("Analecta Ante-Nicen.") and Mai ("Script. Vet. Vaticana Collect." tom. ii.). From the materials at his command, Le Brun has been able to give a very full and trustworthy account of the Gallican Liturgy, which in the order (though not in the name) of its various parts is almost identical with the Mozarabic Liturgy, which we possess entire. Want of space compels us to refer our readers to Le Brun's clear and interesting account in tom. iii. It was under the influence of Pepin and Charlemagne that the Gallican gave way to the Roman rite. The Caroline books, composed in 790, certify that the Roman was already received in "the provinces of all the Gauls," in Germany and Italy, as well as among the Saxons and "certain nations of the North." It is needless to say that the revision of the Roman Missal made for the use of their dioceses by French bishops in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and now at last entirely abandoned, must not be confounded with the ancient Gallican Missals. Rome never approved these modern revisions by episcopal authority, while, on the other hand, the ancient Gallican rite, if it had been retained, would have been in no way affected by the decree of Pius V. forbidding any deviation from the Roman Missal as approved by him, except in churches where a prescription of two hundred years could be claimed for the liturgy in use.[1]

The Roman Missal and its Derivatives are characterised by the position of the Pax just before communion, and the division of the Great Intercession into a Memento of the living before, and of the dead after, the consecration. The early history of the Roman Liturgy is unknown. Writers of great name, Milman, De Rossi, Lightfoot, Westcott, &c., have contended, with great probability, that the original Roman church was composed mainly of persons who spoke Greek. A large proportion of the names in the salutations of the Epistle to the Romans, and nearly all the names of the Roman bishops for the first two centuries, are Greek. So is all the early literature of the Roman church. And it is held by Westcott ("Canon," p. 269) and many others that the early Latin versions of the New Testament, were made for Africa, not for Rome. Again, St. Paul wrote to the Roman Church in Greek; for few now will adopt the unfortunate suggestion of the scholiast in the Peshito, that the original of the Epistle was in Latin. If we adopt this view, we shall also be led to the supposition that the liturgy was in Greek. When Justin wrote his "Apology" to the Emperor Pius, he was living in Rome. If in describing the celebration of the Eucharist he draws his picture (as would be most natural) from the Roman church, then, undoubtedly, the Roman Liturgy was Oriental in character. The liturgical order in Justin differs in marked features from the Latin Mass of Rome, as it was when we first hear of it and as it is now, and agrees with the Oriental liturgies of Family I.

The oldest authentic notice of the Roman Mass is in Innocent's letter to Decentius (anno 416). He mentions two characteristics which distinguish the Roman Mass from all other liturgies—viz. the giving of the Pax towards the end of the Mass, and the Memento of the living after the oblation and in the Canon ("Prius ergo orationes sunt commendandæ ac tunc eorum nomina quorum sunt, edicenda, ut inter sacra mysteria nominentur"). The Roman order was already ancient, for Innocent attributes it to St. Peter. The Canon of the Roman Mass must have been fixed in every detail in St. Leo's time (440–461); for, according to the ancient author of the "Lives of the Popes," he added the words "Sanctum sacrificium, immaculatam hostiam." We have a Leonine Sacramentary, published by Muratori in his "Liturgia Romana Vetus," but unfortunately it contains merely collects and Prefaces without Ordinary or Canon. The "Lives of the Popes" attributes a more important work of revision to Gelasius (492–496), who, it is there said, composed prayers and Prefaces. Walafrid Strabo adds that Gelasius set in order the prayers composed by himself and others. The Gelasian Sacramentary was edited at Rome from a MS. "copied before the year 700" (so Le Brun, tom. III. diss. ii. a. 2.; Mr. Hammond, on the contrary, says "from an early ninth century MS."), and afterwards from other MSS. by Gerbertus, in his work on the old German Liturgy (1776-79). It agrees closely, and has perhaps been altered into conformity with the Gregorian Ordo and Canon. Pope Vigilius (elected 538) sent the Roman Canon ("Canonicæ precis textum") to Profuturus, bishop of Braga, in Spain. He tells him that this Canon was invariable the whole year through (and here let the reader note a distinguishing mark of the Roman as contrasted with all other Western liturgies), except that on the solemnities of Easter, Ascension, Pentecost, Epiphany, and of the Saints, certain "Capitula" appropriate to the day were added. These "Capitula" were most likely, as Le Brun conjectures, short additions similar to those now made in the "Communicantes" and "Hanc igitur." The finishing stroke was put to the work by Gregory the Great (590–604), whose Sacramentary was edited by Pamelius in the second volume of his "Liturgicon Latinum" (Cologne, 1571), by Rocca (Rome, 1597), and by the Benedictine Ménard (in 1642) with learned notes. Gregory made a slight change in the Canon—viz. by adding the words "diesque nostros," &c. (see article CANON), and another of far greater moment, by placing the Fraction after, whereas till then it had occurred before, the Lord's Prayer. He abbreviated the rest of the Mass. Thus he substituted verses for entire psalms, and whereas the Gelasian Mass had two or three prayers before the Epistle, one Secret, two Post-communions—of which one was said over the people ("super populum")—Gregory reduced the ordinary number of these prayers to three: Collect, Secret, Post-communion: and of the Prefaces—very numerous in ancient times—kept only those few which we still have (Muratori, "De Rebus Liturg." p. 14; and Mabillon, "De Lit. Gallican." i. cap. 2, iv. apud Maskell). Since Gregory's day, rubrics have been multiplied, Masses added for new feasts, &c. &c., "but there has been," says a learned Protestant, "no change of importance in the Roman Liturgy. That is to say, the number of prayers composing the Mass, the order in which they occur, and the names of them, have remained unaltered" (Hammond, p. lxxiii).

[1] But certain genuine Gallican rites were preserved down to the Revolution in many French churches, notably the episcopal benediction between the Pater Noster and the "Pax Domini" (preserved at Sens, Paris, Auxerre, Troies, Meaux, &c.), and the lection from the Old Testament in the Masses of Christmas Day. Le Brun, tom. III. iv. 4.

The Ambrosian Mass is not a daughter, but a sister of the Roman or Gregorian Liturgy. In the crucial tests, the position of the Pax and of the Great Intercession, it differs from the Mozarabic and Gallican, and exactly agrees with the Roman Mass. But like the Roman Liturgy before Gregory, it is rich in Prefaces, and has the Fraction before the Pater Noster. It has, however, adopted the "diesque nostros," &c., from the Gregorian Canon; and several introits, and the arrangement of the three Masses on Christmas, have been borrowed from Rome. It has been thought that Greek influence may be traced in the prayers over the corporal ("super sindonem"), the litanies said on Sundays in Lent, the proclamation by the deacon before the Epistle, &c.

We pass over the Liturgy of the Patriarchate of Aquileia, which seems to have been a mere variety of the Roman Use, but of which little is known; and we pass on to a subject of far greater interest to us—viz. the Liturgical Use of the Ancient Church of England down to the Reformation. We take as our guide the admirable works of Mr. Maskell—one entitled the "Ancient Liturgy of the Church of England," and the other, "Monumenta Ritualia." It is probable, from St. Augustine's question to Pope Gregory, that the ancient British churches used a liturgy akin to those of Gaul and Spain. But the influence of St. Augustine led to a wide adoption of the Roman Liturgy in its main features. In 747 the Council of Cloveshoo, which may fairly be taken as representing south and middle England—for the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of Rochester, three bishops from Mercia, two from Wessex, one from Lincoln, and one from Sussex, were present (see Hefele, "Concil. iii. p. 562)—decreed that "the holy feasts of our Lord's dispensation in the flesh, in all things duly pertaining to them—i.e. in the office of Baptism, in the celebration of Masses, in the manner of the chant—should be celebrated according to the copy which we have in writing from the Roman Church." These words are clear and express, nor is there room for doubt that as Christianity spread among the Saxons, the Roman replaced the Gallican Canon, and that gradually the whole Missal, in its main features, was modelled after the Roman prototype.

It is true then, in a general way, that the English used the Roman Liturgy. But only in a general way: first, because before the invention of printing, the uniformity which has prevailed since Pius V. issued his authoritative edition of the Roman Missal was a matter of impossibility; and, next, because the power of bishops to regulate public worship in their dioceses was not restrained, as at present, and they used this power in introducing minor differences, though they preserved all the main character of the Roman Mass. Thus different Uses arose. About 1085 Osmund, bishop of Salisbury, promulgated a form for his diocese, which became accepted in the South of England and spread into Ireland and Scotland. Then there were the Uses of York and Hereford, and (in fewer dioceses) those of Lincoln and Bangor. Many of the ancient books were destroyed at the Reformation, and only a fragment of the Lincoln Use remains. It is not certain that we know the Use of Bangor, though Mr. Maskell believes that a MS. from which he has printed the Ordinary and Canon contains the Use of that church. Besides, there was a Use of St. Paul's in London (where the Sarum books were not received till 1414), of which we know nothing. And no doubt there were varieties in the Sarum rite which might be, and were, to a certain extent, regarded as separate Uses.

Mr. Maskell has placed the Ordinary and Canon of the Mass according to the Sarum, (supposed) Bangor, York, Hereford, and Roman Uses, in parallel columns. To this we must refer the reader, for a complete enumeration of the points in which these Uses differ from each other would be long and tedious, and would, after all, convey a much less vivid impression than any reader familiar with the Roman Mass can gain for himself with little pains by reading the texts. Wecontent ourselves, therefore, with a few general remarks.

There is—we will not say no difference of doctrine: between the old and the present rites of the English church there is, with one exception, no point of difference from which any theological argument could be deduced. This exception occurs in a single prayer. After the priest has put a fragment of the Host in the chalice, he prays, in the four English Uses, that this mixture of Christ's body and blood may be to himself and to all who partake of it ("omnibusque sumentibus," "et omnibus sumentibus") health of mind and body. The words italicised are a relic of the time when the faithful communicated under both kinds, retained long after they had ceased to do so. They, of course, are no evidence of change of doctrine, though they do prove change of discipline; but Archbishop Cranmer, in his answer to the Devonshire rebels, availed himself of them as an argument for communion in both kinds.

The first impression upon a modern Catholic reader made by the reading of these old English Uses will be, we think, one of surprise that he finds himself so much at home in them. They are utterly unlike the "Communion Service" of the church now established, while we are convinced that if they were re-introduced in England, the English people would scarcely feel any difference. In the Ordinary of the Mass, the old English and modern Roman rites agree part for part and, as a rule, word for word. In the Canon, almost every word is the same down to the end of the "Libera nos"—i.e. to the end of the Canon proper. After that, many of the prayers are different. This difference is easily explained, for the prayers which follow the "Libera nos" are later than St. Augustine's time; nay, with the exception of the "Agnus Dei" (added by Pope Sergius, and adopted in all the English Uses), they are later—some of them much later—than the Council of Cloveshoo, which imposed the Roman Missal on England. Indeed, the prayer which the priest says before the Pax ("Domine Jesu Christe") was not to be found in the Roman Missal even in 1090, after St. Osmund's time. We need not wonder, then, that there is in this part considerable divergence between the English Uses and the Missal of Pius V.

What the English had, was, not a national Liturgy like that of the Copts or Chaldeans, or even a Liturgy so distinct from the Roman as that of Milan, but English editions or recensions of the Roman Liturgy. Nor must it be supposed that Rome deprived the English of their ancient usages. Rome in no way interfered, or would, so far as can be conjectured, ever have interfered. She has not only tolerated, but enforced, the ancient Liturgies of the East. She allows the Dominican variety of the Roman Mass, &c., &c. The bull of Pius V., as he expressly stated, did not impose the new edition of the Missal on any church which had rites of its own with a prescription of two hundred years. The Reformers set themselves energetically to destroy the Sarum books; copies became extremely rare, and the clergy, forced to get their education abroad, naturally preferred to say Mass and office from the modern Roman books which were so much more easily procured.

(A full account of the literature will be found in Smith and Cheetham, article Liturgies. Some of the most important works have been noticed in the course of this article. Le Brun, "Explication de la Messe," is a most accurate and convenient repertory of all the results obtained by Renaudot, Mabillon, Ménard, &c. It abounds besides in original research, and gives full accounts of the chief Liturgies, with learned notes. But no student should be without Mr. Hammond's reprint of the texts of the Ancient Liturgies, accompanied by an excellent Introduction. Mr. Hammond puts the student in possession of a rational classification of the liturgies, and teaches him to fix his attention on the cardinal points in reading larger books.)

LOCI THEOLOGICI. The sources from which theological arguments are drawn. The name has become familiar through the celebrated work of Melchior Canus (1523-1560), a Spanish Dominican, Professor of Theology at Salamanca, employed at the Council of Trent under Paul III., and finally Bishop of the Canaries. In this work, which is written in most elegant and classical Latin, Canus uses the word loci or τόποι exactly as Aristotle and Cicero had done—i.e. in the sense of sedes e quibus argumenta promuntur. It discusses the use to be made by the theologian of Scripture, Councils, Fathers, Philosophy, &c., and forms a scientific introduction to Dogmatic Theology. Canus complains that theologians argued little from the Councils, not frequently enough from Scripture, scarcely at all from History, and he sets himself to guide them into a fuller and more discriminating use of the material which the revival of letters was opening up. Both in style and in method Canus marks a new era. He had a most powerful influence in inaugurating the critical and historical as distinct from the merely scholastic theology. (From the work of Canus itself, and from Kuhn, "Dogmatik," i. p. 486 seq.)

LOGOTHETE (λογοθέτης, properly, an accountant). Besides a number of officers in the civil service who bore this title at the Byzantine Court,[1] it was given to the chief official of the Patriarch of Constantinople, the logotheta ecclesiasticus, whose functions closely resembled those of an episcopal chancellor in the Western Church. LORETO. In the Ecclesiastical State, a few miles south of Ancona, on a hill three miles distant from the sea, there is a stately domed church, the work of Bramante, rising among the houses of the little city of Loreto. On entering the church, the pilgrim or traveller observes under the dome "a singular rectangular edifice, of no great height, constructed apparently of white marble, and richly adorned with statues and sculpture." This is the famous Santa Casa, or Holy House, which tradition asserts to be the very same building in which the Blessed Virgin Mary dwelt at Nazareth, where she heard the message of the archangel, and where the Holy Family resided during the childhood and hidden life of our Lord. Its internal length is about 31 feet; its breadth, 13 feet. The roof is modern. Externally, the original walls cannot be seen; but within the building the coarse stonework of the original masonry is exposed to view. The material is a dark reddish-coloured stone. It was once thought to be brick, in which case this could not have been the house which once stood at Nazareth, where brick houses are unknown. But on this question of the stone of which the Santa Casa is built, more will have to be said further on, when the current objections to the legend come under consideration. Towards the eastern end of the house stands an altar, and behind the altar is an image, said to be of olive wood, now blackened by the smoke of the lamps; this is the famous image of our Lady of Loreto.

The legend of the Holy House in its main features runs as follows. The Christian power having been finally expelled from Palestine,[1] the house in which God's Mother dwelt for many years with her Divine Son and St. Joseph was completely at the mercy of the infidels. That it might be removed to a place of safety, and be for the future in Christian hands, angels lifted it from its foundations, and bore it through the air, in the first place to Illyria, where it rested on the top of a hill at Tersatz or Tersatto, near Fiume, in the night of May 10, 1291. In the morning the inhabitants wondered to see a house standing where none had been before; they approached it, noticed that it was without foundations, and upon entering saw an altar and an image of the Virgin and Child. But the Holy House of Nazareth, for such it was, did not long remain at Tersatz. After three years and a half, on December 10, 1294, it was removed to the opposite side of the Adriatic. Shepherds near Recanati are said to have seen it borne through the air,[2] and deposited in a wood near the sea called Lauretum, either from the laurels which grew there or because it belonged to a rich lady of Recanati named Laureta. Soon pilgrims visited it in great numbers, but, the place being remote, brigands also made their appearance, and to approach the house became a work of danger. In less than a year (August 1295) there was a third removal, to a hill three or four miles from the wood, along which passed a public road. The spot where the Holy House alighted belonged to two brothers, who quarrelled as to their respective rights of property in the site. Again, in December 1295, the house was removed from its place, but only for a very short distance, and was set down in the middle of the public road above mentioned, where it has remained to the present day. The Blessed Virgin, appearing in a vision to a holy hermit who dwelt near Recanati, soon after the final translation, unfolded to him the true character of the house. After a time the people of Tersatz heard

[1] By the capture of Acre, 1291.

[2] The accounts vary; Baptista says that the great-great-grandfather of a certain Paul of Recanati saw the house "gliding over the waves of the sea like a ship;" Tursellinus, though his narrative is otherwise consistent with this view, adds that, "there was one among them [the shepherds] who affirmed that he saw it when it was being borne in mid air over the sea;" Jerome Angelita (who wrote about 1530, and before Tursellinus) simply says that it was "miraculously carried over the sea."

where it was, and numbers of them crossed the sea to visit it. These simple pilgrims are said to have solemnly entreated our Lady to return to them, exclaiming, "Torna, torna a noi, bella Signora, con la tua Casa."

Such being the legend, it remains to inquire by what kind of testimony it is supported, and to consider objections which have been advanced against various portions of it. The evidence producible, whatever may be its value, is not so strong and conclusive as of itself to exclude the possibility of doubt. No contemporary book or record, with the exception of two documents which will be considered further on, can be appealed to as noticing the translation. No extant writing of the fourteenth century directly [1] mentions it. The archives of Tersatz and Recanati, which are said to have contained statements confirmatory of different parts of the above narrative, have perished. The earliest account of the translation which can be distinctly traced was drawn up by Peter George Teremanus, or Teramano, guardian of the Santa Casa, in 1460; on this the accounts given by Baptista and Angelita were evidently based. Teremanus examined witnesses and took down their evidence; one of these, named Francis, deposed that his grandfather, who lived to be 120 years old, had told him that he had seen the House while it was still in the wood, and often gone in and prayed there. Teremanus put together a narrative which he inscribed on a tablet and hung up in the Santa Casa; this tablet was seen and read by Baptista and Angelita. Two bulls of Paul II., dated 1464 and 1471, speak of the "Domus et Imago" of the Blessed Virgin Mary at Loreto; the later of the two refers in general terms to the translation.

The first writer who, in works still extant, speaks of the translation, seems to have been Baptista Mantuanus, an Italian poet of some note who joined the Carmelite order (to which the custody of the sanctuary of Loreto was committed by Sixtus IV.) and wrote a history of the church about 1480.[1] He derived his information chiefly from the tablet of Teremanus, whom he calls Neronianus. In his "Agelarii," a poem in Latin hexameters,[2] Baptista enlarges in a florid style on the marvellous translation. After Baptista came the Jerome Angelita already mentioned, who dedicated his circumstantial history of the Santa Casa to Clement VII.; he was followed by the Jesuits Torsellino and Riera, and many others.

There is, however, evidence of earlier date that Loreto was, and had long been, a celebrated shrine of our Lady; and the question suggests itself, on what did that celebrity rest? Flavius Blondus, born in 1388, in his work "Italia Illustrata," of which we may place the date between 1430 and 1440,[3] speaks of the "sacellum" of the Blessed Virgin at Loreto as of a shrine of great celebrity, and notices the number of costly ex-votos, testifying to the gratitude of the offerers, which were hung on the walls of the church. It can hardly be doubted that this "sacellum" was identical with the Santa Casa now at Loreto. The same word is frequently used by Baptista in his history already mentioned, and there it evidently refers to the Santa Casa, the migrations of which he describes nearly in the same manner as in the legend given above. Therefore, if Flavius did not mean the Santa Casa by the "sacellum" of the Virgin (which he distinguishes from the "basilica" to which it was attached), he must have meant some building which in the interval between 1430 and 1480 totally disappeared and was replaced by a house built of stone brought from Palestine for the purpose,[4] to represent our Lord's abode at Nazareth. To adopt such a view without a particle of evidence would be uncritical. Flavius, therefore, when he mentions the "sacellum celeberrimum" of Loreto, is speaking of the present Santa Casa, the antiquity of which is thus traced to within 150 years of the time at which the legend says it was brought to Loreto. But surely his words authorise us to go further; he speaks of this as the most famous shrine of the Virgin "in the whole of Italy;" but the growth of such a fame must have been an affair of many years; we should naturally suppose that the commencement of the devotion could not have been later than the middle of the fourteenth century. Hence by a process of legitimate inference we are led to the conclusion that the present Santa Casa must have been at Loreto within some fifty years of the time which the legend fixes for its arrival.

[1] The expression "directly" is used because Jerome Angelita, who was perpetual chancellor of the commune of Recanati, and wrote on Loreto early in the sixteenth century, declares that he had found among the town records a brief of Benedict XIII. (for XII.) dated in 1341, which he understood as indirectly referring to the image contained in the Santa Casa. The brief indulgenced a picture in a church at Recanati, which, being a copy of the said image, was visited by aged persons who could not walk out as far as Loreto.

A further question arises—Can the existence of the Santa Casa be traced before its alleged removal to Loreto? A remarkable passage in a description of the Holy Land by a Greek writer named Phocas, of which a translation [1] is given in the article on Loreto by Mr. Meyrick, in the "Christian Remembrancer" for April 1854, throws light on this point. Phocas visited Nazareth in 1185, and says that he found two churches there, one of which contained the house of Joseph in which the Annunciation and Conception were said to have taken place. He says in one place that this house was "transformed into a most beautiful church"; but a few lines further on we come to a passage which shows what his meaning was. For after saying that in this church, on the left side, near the altar, there was a cave, he adds: "Proceeding from the mouth within the cave, you come down a few steps and thus gain a view of that which was anciently the house of Joseph, in which, after her return from the fountain, . . . the angel thus saluted the Virgin. Now on the spot where the salutation took place, there is a cross of black stone, graven in relief on white marble, and on the right side of the said altar was a small cot (μικρὸς δικίσκος), in which the ever Virgin Mother of God had her chamber." It is contended that either the whole house here mentioned, or else the "cot" on the right side of the altar,[2] was the Santa Casa now at Loreto. This much, at any rate, is clear, that about 100 years before the date assigned to the first removal of the house to Tersatz, there was a building within a church at Nazareth which tradition named "the house of Joseph." Nothing seems to have been changed at a period nearly seventy years later (1253), when St. Louis visited Nazareth. About 1262 this church, as is mentioned in a letter from Urban IV. to St. Louis, dated in the following year,[1] was "levelled to the ground" by the Sultan of Babylon. But it does not necessarily follow that the house was destroyed, for the Christians would be likely to block up and conceal the entrance of the cave. For a specimen of the way in which travellers spoke of the state of things at Nazareth after 1291, we may take the passage cited by Mr. Meyrick from Sir John Maundevile, who visited Palestine about 1350. "It [the church] is now all downe; and men have made a litylle resceyt, besyde a pilere of that chirche, for to resceyve the offrynges of pilgrymes." There is no mention here of anything like what Phocas saw. Gradually a new subterranean chapel was fashioned, smaller than the Santa Casa, but partly on the same area; this is now called the "Chapel of the Angel." The original foundations of the "house of Joseph" were explored in the seventeenth century by the Franciscan guardians of the shrine at Nazareth; and they testified that they exactly tallied with the dimensions of the house at Loreto.[2]

Adamnan of Iona, a writer of the eighth century, also speaks of the two churches at Nazareth, and his language has been supposed to imply that the house of Joseph had existed on the site of one of them, but was in existence no longer. But the words need not necessarily be so understood; they are perfectly compatible with the actual existence of the house at the time when Arculfus, Adamnan's informant, visited Nazareth.

Respecting many other points of interest relating to the Santa Casa, such as the frequency of the miracles wrought there, the visions of our Lady at Tersatz and Loreto, the bulls of Pontiffs, and the alterations made by Papal order in the house itself, the reader is referred to one or more of the works mentioned at the end of the article, particularly to those of the Abbè Caillau, Archbishop Kenrick, and Father Hutchison.

A few of the common objections to the authenticity of the Holy House call for some remark. The late Dean Stanley, who gives a glowing and really beautiful description of the environs of the Lake of Gennesareth in his "Sinai and Palestine," was led to treat of the history of the Santa Casa in connection with his visit to Nazareth. No one can be surprised that a man so prepossessed in favour of a non-miraculous and non-clerical Christianity rejected the Loreto legend, though he cannot have been insensible to its beauty. He thought he could show that if the Santa Casa was ever connected with a grotto in the side of the hill at Nazareth, according to the received view, either the house had no door, or there was a dead wall between it and the grotto, and no way of passing from one to the other. His argument is met and shown to be fallacious in the work of Father Hutchison. The Dean thought that the house must have been built of set purpose by some devout person or persons in the middle ages, to keep alive devotion to the mystery of the Incarnation, just as the chapels of the Sacro Monte at Varallo were built, and with the feeling that prompted the Pisans to bring home earth from Palestine in their galleys and cover their Campo Santo with it. It is enough to say that this is pure conjecture, and that if such a work had ever been undertaken at Loreto, some record of it could hardly fail to have been preserved.

It was for a long time a common Protestant objection that the Santa Casa could not have been the house at Nazareth, because it was of brick, and brick buildings were unknown at Nazareth. It is now well known that the house is built of stone; but it has been maintained that this stone is the common red volcanic stone of the neighbourhood, and "wholly unlike anything in Palestine." The contradictory of this assertion appears to have been established through the exertions of Mgr. (now Cardinal) Bartolini, who sent to an eminent professor of chemistry at Rome four samples of stone—two brought from Nazareth, and two taken (with the Pope's permission) from the walls of the Santa Casa—with a request that he would analyse and report on them. The professor reported that the chemical composition of the four samples was absolutely identical, although in appearance and mechanical characteristics they differed considerably.[1] Father Hutchison concludes that "the stone of which the Holy House is composed is limestone, identical with that of Nazareth, the stone about Loreto being of a totally different character."

Mr. Meyrick, perhaps the ablest of all the assailants of the legend, has fallen into several inaccuracies. Endeavouring to show that the views taken by different Pontiffs have not been in agreement with one another, he says (p. 368), "The bull of . . . . Julius II. . . . . makes the house pass at once from Nazareth to Recanati." It is true that Torsellino says so, but the fact is otherwise; the bull of Julius, of which Archbishop Kenrick (p. 145) prints the text, distinctly states that the house was first removed "ad partes Sclavoniæ et locum Flumen nuncupatum." Again, Mr. Meyrick, when endeavouring to throw discredit on Jerome Angelita's statement that Nicolas Frangipani, lord of Tersatz, was absent at the time of the first translation, having gone to the war with the Emperor Rodolph, states that that emperor died "on the 15th July, 1291," only some two months after the date assigned to the translation. But in fact Rodolph died on September 30, 1291. An error of more importance is the assertion that there is an absolute lack of contemporary evidence for the legend. Mr. Meyrick must surely have seen the large work of Martorelli; in this (vol. ii. p. 49) the text is given of a letter of instructions, dated September 9, 1295, and addressed by the priors of the commune of Recanati to their emissary, one Alexander de Servannis, in which they state that the "Sancta Domus" has wonderfully been removed from its resting-place in the wood to the land of two brothers of the Antici family, and that he is to confer with the town's agent at Rome with a view to obtaining from the Pope a brief authorising the transfer of the new site to the town of Recanati. Cinelli, a Florentine, author of a work on Loreto never printed, but in the possession of a Roman canon at the time when Martorelli wrote, is said to state in it that he had copied this letter from the original in the possession of the Marchesi Antici. Cinelli wrote about 1705. In his unprinted history is also said (by Martorelli) to be contained a letter from Paul of the Wood, written in 1297 to Charles Duke of Sicily, and informing him of various particulars respecting the translation. It is plain that these statements of Martorelli require more investigation than they have yet received. If the original letter of the priors existed in his time, there seems no reason why it should not be still preserved in some Italian library, and if it were found, and declared by palæographers to be really of the date assigned to it by Cinelli, the question of the truth of the legend would be nearly settled. On the other hand, if the letters can be proved to be fabrications, or if the credit of Cinelli can be shown to be nil, the question would remain where it was before.

LOW SUNDAY. The first Sunday after Easter. The name given to it in the Missal and Breviary is "Dominica in Albis," because then the newly-baptised wore their white robes for the last time. St. Augustine mentions this custom in a sermon for the day, and it is alluded to in the noble Breviary hymn still used in the vespers of Low Sunday, "Ad regias Agni dapes."

The name Low Sunday, like the Greek ἀντιπάσχα, emphasises the contrast between the great Easter solemnity and the Sunday which ends the octave. Another Latin name "Pascha clausum" is preserved in the Dutch name, "Beloken Paschen," i.e. "close of Easter." The name "Quasimodo" is taken from the first word of the introit in the Mass, and is the common name for this Sunday in France and Germany.

LUTHER AND LUTHERANISM. Martin Luther was born at Eisleben, Saxony, November 10, 1483, and died there February 18, 1546. His father was a peasant who afterwards became a miner. Soon after Martin's birth the family removed to Mansfeld, and there the lad received his early education. The public or elementary schools at this time were very numerous in Germany. Martin's gifts were marked from the beginning. He had a fine voice, was admitted to the choir, and, following the custom of the time, sang before the houses of the rich to gain money enough to enable him to prosecute his studies in a higher school. At fourteen he was sent to the school of the Franciscans at Magdeburg, where he remained a year. From Magdeburg he went to Eisenach, where his voice attracted the attention and favour of Dame Ursula Cotta, a wealthy lady, who received him into her house and supported him until he entered the university of Erfurt (1501). Martin's father was now a master-miner and in a position to advance his son. He sent him to Erfurt to study law. There he remained until 1505, when he took his degree of Master of Arts and began a course of lectures on Aristotle. He was of an ardent and impulsive temperament and had strong religious leanings. The sudden death of a friend, who was struck by lightning at his side, seems to have determined his vocation. In spite of the opposition of his father and friends, he entered the Augustinian Convent at Erfurt to dedicate himself to God (July 17, 1505). There he went through the customary discipline, and in 1507, his father objecting to the last, he was ordained priest. Luther's earnestness and application won the favor of Dr. John Staupitz, the Augustinian provincial of Meissen and Thuringia. Frederick the Wise, elector of Saxony, had opened a university at Wittenberg and was looking for capable professors. At the recommendation of Staupitz, Luther was offered the chair of dialectics (1508) and afterwards lectured in theology. Urged by Staupitz, he undertook, though at first with extreme reluctance, to preach. His abilities were so marked and his zeal so apparent, that in 1510 he, with a brother friar, was chosen to visit Rome on business of the order. The sight of Rome and the memories it called up moved the impressionable young man so deeply that he fell on his knees and cried: "Hail, Rome, holy city, thrice sanctified by the blood of martyrs!"

From his coming to man's estate Luther's mind seems never to have been wholly at rest, nor were his convictions wholly clear on certain doctrinal points. At Rome, the Rome of Leo X., he was scandalised to hear that many priests were unbelievers. Returning to his university, he resumed his lectures and his studies, was made Doctor of Theology (1512), and studied closely Greek and Hebrew in order to enable him better to expound the Scriptures. About this time Pope Leo X. proclaimed indulgences in Germany, for those who contributed to the completion of St. Peter's basilica in Rome. Albert of Brandenburg, elector and archbishop of Mentz and Magdeburg, was ordered to publish the indulgences, and John Tetzel, of Leipzig, a learned and eloquent Dominican, was appointed by Albert to preach the indulgences among the people.

The proclamation of indulgences was not new in Germany, nor was opposition to it on the part of the people and of both civil and ecclesiastical authorities new. [See INDULGENCES.]

When Tetzel began to preach the indulgences, opposition at once broke out, and Luther took the lead in the opposition. He drew up his objections in the shape of ninety-five propositions, which he fastened to the door of the castle church at Wittenberg on All Saints' eve (October 31, 1517). In these he attacked the abuse, not the doctrine, of indulgences, pronouncing anathema on whosoever spoke against the truth of Papal indulgences (Prop. 71). He stated, furthermore, that he had no purpose to speak against Holy Writ or the doctrines of the Popes and Fathers of the Church. Nevertheless the propositions contained the germ of his future heresy.

In assailing the abuse of indulgences Luther only gave voice to a widespread feeling in Germany. He at once gained a number of adherents, among them men of influence both in Church and State. The Bishop of Wurzburg wrote to the Elector Frederick to protect Luther. A heated controversy arose. There were various replies to Luther, one of the ablest being by Tetzel. A more famous and learned opponent still was Dr. John Eck, vice-chancellor of the University of Ingoldstadt. Luther, now wholly roused, replied with heat and haste to his adversaries, and in a style and manner not at all in accord with modern ideas of controversial courtesy. His opponents were asses, pigs, dolts, &c., and were assailed with still viler epithets. Where he failed in argument he took refuge in invective, often of the coarsest kind. As the controversy deepened he struck farther away from the doctrinal truths he had hitherto preached and taught. Yet he claimed to be in perfect accord and sympathy with the centre of Catholic doctrine, and in the letter to Pope Leo X. which accompanied his propositions and their defence he wrote: "Most Holy Father, I cast myself at thy feet with all that I have and am. Give life or take it; call, recall, approve, reprove; your voice is that of Christ, who presides and speaks in you."

Probably none of the parties engaged in the controversy had any idea at this time whither it was drifting. The Pope took the matter easily. Nevertheless he appointed a court to try the case and summoned (August 7, 1518) Luther to Rome to defend himself. At the request of the Elector Frederick, the Diet of Augsburg was substituted for Rome as the place of trial, and Cardinal Cajetan, Papal legate, was appointed to represent the Pope at the Diet. Luther appeared (October, 1518). The cardinal's instructions were to enter into no controversy, but demand an absolute retractation on Luther's part. Luther claimed that he had said naught against the Scriptures, the doctrine of the Church, the decrees of Popes, or reason. He consented to declare formally his reverence and obedience to "the Roman Church in every word and deed, whether in time past, present, or future," and if he had said aught contrary to this declaration he wished it to be considered as having been never spoken. He fled from Augsburg angry at heart.

The Pope issued a bull explaining clearly the true teaching of the Church on indulgences (November 9, 1518), and sent Charles of Miltitz, himself a Saxon, as nuncio into Germany with a view to reconciling all parties and bringing about peace. Miltitz seemed to side with Luther as against Tetzel. He prevailed upon Luther to write another letter (March 3, 1519) of complete submission to the Pope and to the authority of the Church; but the nuncio was deceived in imagining his mission accomplished.

While the German bishops were preparing to meet and confer on the points of dispute a public discussion took place at Leipzig between Luther and his friends and their opponents. George, duke of Saxony, presided, and a large and cultivated audience assembled. With Luther were his friend Carlstadt and the Wittenberg professors. Opposed to them was the learned Eck, and the professors of Cologne, Louvain, and Leipzig. The chief matters of discussion were the condition of man after the fall; free-will and grace; penance and indulgences; and the primacy of the Church of Rome, which primacy, Luther maintained, rested only on human authority, claiming that the Pope had no more jurisdiction than the Archbishop of Magdeburg or the Bishop of Paris. Here also Luther gave open expression to his doctrine that faith alone, with or without good works, secures salvation. He furthermore denied free-will in man and the infallibility of the œcumenical councils. Duke George, seeing the danger of these propositions, stopped the discussion.

The universities of Paris, Louvain, and Cologne condemned Luther's propositions (1519). Luther retaliated with abuse of the faculties of those establishments, and on October 11, 1520, wrote to the Pope, sending him his pamphlet on "Christian Liberty," and assailing in virulent terms the whole office and dignity of the Papacy. Meantime he was incessant in defence of his theories, and between 1520 and 1521 he launched out pamphlet after pamphlet, that were eagerly caught up by the German people and spread abroad, creating discussion and tumult everywhere. In these he taught that the Bible was the only source of faith; that human nature was wholly corrupted by original sin; that consequently man was not free, and whatever he did, whether good or ill, was the work of God; that faith alone saves; that the hierarchy and priesthood are unnecessary, and exterior worship is useless; that the sacraments were profitless (a doctrine that he afterwards modified), and that Christian priesthood is universal.

These doctrines, especially the last, caught the hearts of multitudes, the gist of them being an absolute freedom from all restraint and a practical sanctification of sin. Luther appealed strongly to the spirit of nationality and greed. He addressed the emperor, the nobles, and the peoples. He urged the emperor to overthrow the power of the Pope, confiscate the wealth of the Church, abolish feasts and holidays and Masses for the dead. He substituted German for the Latin, which was the literary language of the time, and by this means his teachings spread the more readily among his countrymen, while he made use of vile illustrations to caricature the Pope, the monks, and the teachings of the Church.

On June 15, 1520, the Pope issued a bull specifically condemning Luther's teachings and excommunicating him if he refused to retract within sixty days. Luther retorted with a pamphlet in which he held the author of the bull to be Antichrist. He succeeded in winning over the elector of Saxony, who used his good offices in Luther's behalf with the emperor Charles V. Luther appealed (November 17, 1520) from the authority of the Pope to a general council, and on December 10, 1520, publicly burned the Pope's bull at Wittenberg, consigning the Pope himself to "fire eternal." The emperor, seeing the flame that was being kindled over the land, convoked the German Diet at Worms (1521). Luther appeared before the Diet to answer the charges against him, and refused to retract unless "convicted of error by Scripture proof or by plain reason," he relying absolutely on his own interpretation of Scripture. All efforts to change him being unavailing, he was ordered to quit Worms, and left under a safe-conduct. He was taken to Wartburg, near Eisenach, and there remained from May 1521 to March, 1522, living under the name of "Master George" and dressing as a knight. The Diet of Worms placed him under the ban of the empire as a heretic. But the circumstances of the time and the opposition of the German States rendered the edict ineffective.

At Wartburg, which he called his "Patmos," Luther employed much of his time in translating the Bible into German and in issuing more pamphlets. Leo X. died December 1, 1521, and was succeeded by Adrian VI., who took up with great earnestness the subject of reform within the Church. He urged the Diet of Nürnberg (November 1522) to take active and vigorous steps against Luther, for "the revolt now directed against the spiritual authority will shortly deal a blow at the temporal also." The Diet confessed that it was impossible to enforce the edict against Luther for fear of a popular uprising. Adrian died in 1523 and was succeeded by Clement VII.

Clement sent Cardinal Campeggio to the Diet at Nürnberg, but he was as unsuccessful as his predecessors. Most of the princes seemed to favour a break with Rome, and Frederick, the elector of Saxony, made himself the chief protector of Luther and those who followed him. The States divided: Mecklenburg, Anhalt, Mansfeld, Prussia, and the cities of Brunswick and Magdeburg declared for Luther, under the leadership of John, the new elector of Saxony, and Philip, landgrave of Hesse, an alliance being concluded at Torgau (May 4, 1526). The other side made an alliance at Dessau, and thus began the division between the Catholic and Protestant States of Germany.

Luther's teachings had already taken effect among the people. Many religious renounced their orders and their vows. Carlstadt, Luther's friend, raised a mob at Wittenberg and destroyed the altars and images of Christ and the saints. The same was done elsewhere. Infant baptism was rejected at Zwickau, where Nicholas Storch organised a society that developed into the Anabaptists. These attracted Carlstadt and other prominent Lutherans, and great excesses were committed by them at Wittenberg. Luther took alarm, and leaving Wartburg reached Wittenberg on Good Friday, 1522. All through Easter week he harangued his followers and condemned their violence. More monks left their convents, took wives, and recruited the Lutheran ranks. The teaching of human irresponsibility for sin and disregard of all authority took effect among the masses. The peasants rose in rebellion against their lords, burned convents, and stormed the castles of the nobles. Thomas Münzer took the lead, preaching human equality. Luther himself was compelled to preach against those whom his doctrines had aroused, and he urged the nobles to slay without mercy these "children of the devil." His advice was taken and it is estimated that a hundred thousand peasants were slain in the "Peasants' War."

Luther called Henry VIII. the "crowned ass, liar, varlet, idiot, snivelling sophist, and swine of the Thomist herd." The learned Erasmus was also drawn into the controversy against Luther, and was answered in similar strain. Luther had now thrown off his monk's habit, and on June 13, 1525, he married Katharina von Bora, an ex-nun of Nimptschen, in Saxony. He had been already famed for his free life even among his own followers, and this final step brought great ridicule on the Reformer. "It was thought," wrote Erasmus, "that Luther was the hero of a tragedy; but for my part I regard him as playing the chief part in a comedy that has ended, like all comedies, in a marriage."

Luther's adherents had become so numerous that he found it necessary to systematise a form of faith and of ecclesiastical government for them in lieu of that which he had taught them to reject. A synod was called at Homburg by Philip of Hesse (October 1526). It was there agreed to adopt a synodal constitution which gave each congregation complete control over its own ecclesiastical discipline. This plan, with some modifications to secure outward uniformity, was adopted in the Lutheran States. Preachers were appointed by a commission of ecclesiastics and laymen. The established ecclesiastical foundations were abolished, and the head of the State was made the supreme authority within the State on matters of Church government. To educate the rising generation in his doctrines Luther published a larger and a smaller catechism to be used in the schools (1529). These measures brought the Lutherans closer together, and at the Diet of Spires, held in 1526, the Lutheran States presented a bold and organised front in the persons of their princes. The emperor was at war and consequently not in a position to enforce any demands. The Diet, accordingly, at the dictate of the Lutherans, recognised, until the meeting of an œcumenical council, the right of each State to act for itself in regard to religious matters. The Diet assembled again at Spires in 1529 to determine religious difficulties and take measures against the Turks. The conditions proposed by the Catholic princes were moderate enough, but the Lutherans solemnly protested against them, whence the name of Protestants (April 19, 1529). They claimed to be the exclusive heirs of the true religion, the only members of the one saving Church of Jesus Christ, and pronounced the Mass an idolatrous act of worship which should not be tolerated.

Disputes arose among the Lutherans themselves concerning the Eucharist. Luther denied the Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation, and denied also Zwingli's figurative interpretation of the words "This is my body." He invented the theory of consubstantiation. A conference was held at Marburg (October 1, 1529) to settle the dispute, but it only served to widen the dissension, and manifest the absurdity of Luther's claim to free interpretation of the Scriptures.

A Diet was held at Augsburg (June 1530), at which the emperor Charles V. presided. The Emperor demanded a written confession of faith from the Protestant princes and a list of the practices of which they complained. Hence originated what is known as the Augsburg Confession, or Symbol of Faith, which was drawn up by Melanchthon and suffered subsequent changes. Luther fully approved of it. The Confession was an embodiment of Luther's teachings in a partially disguised form, and among the pretended abuses were Communion under one kind, private Masses, clerical celibacy, confession, and the ecclesiastical hierarchy. The Catholic theologians drew up a Confutation of the Confession, which met the approval of the emperor and of the Catholic princes, and the Protestants were ordered to renounce their errors and return to the ancient faith. A hopeless attempt to bring about unity was made, but frustrated by Luther and his more resolute followers. The Zwinglian cities drew up a Confession of their own, and Zwingli himself another of his own. The emperor put an end to the profitless discussion, giving the Protestants till the 15th of the following April to determine on their course.

The Protestant princes met at Smalkald on Christmas Day, 1530, and there entered on an offensive and defensive alliance, known as the League of Smalkald (March 29, 1531), to bind them for seven years. Both Luther and Melanchthon now authorised the use of arms for the maintenance of Protestantism. The emperor, needing the Protestant alliance, entered into negotiations with them, conceding at Nürnberg (July 23, 1532) that until the assembly of a general council no action should be taken against the Protestants, but that everything should remain as it was. This is known as the Peace of Nürnberg.

Clement VII. died in 1534, and was succeeded by Paul III., who was anxious to convene a council, that the Protestants might attend. But they rejected all overtures. The League of Smalkald was renewed (1535) for ten years. In 1534 Luther completed his translation of the whole Bible, and in 1537 issued the Articles of Smalkald, which were accepted by the League, and which embodied a spirit of deep hostility to the Catholic Church. "May God fill you with hatred of the Pope!" was his parting benediction to the League, and thenceforth the League refused to attend any council of the Church.

The Swiss joined the Protestant League in 1538, and the elector of Brandendurg in 1539. The duchy of Saxony also joined, and Luther continued to inflame the minds of princes and people against the Catholic Church and the council. The emperor summoned another religious conference, which finally met at Worms (January 14, 1541). It resulted in nothing. A Diet was next called at Ratisbon (April 5), which proved equally ineffectual.

The Anabaptists, supposed to have been crushed in the Peasants' War, now rose up again and appeared in Münster under John of Leyden and others. Polygamy was introduced, and riot of every kind reigned, until the city, after a siege of eighteen months, was taken by storm (June 25, 1535) and the leaders executed with extreme cruelty. Philip of Hesse, who had been married sixteen years, and, with his wife living, was a notorious freeliver, asked Luther to authorise him to marry a second wife. After much hesitation the Reformer, fearful of losing Philip's assistance, granted the requisite authorisation "in order to provide for the welfare of his body and soul, and to bring greater glory to God."

Lutheranism now began to be intruded into various places by force of arms. Luther saw the seeds of religious dissolution already at work. His health was broken and his spirit, save as against Rome. He entertained grave doubts about the efficacy of his work. The reform he saw to be a reform downwards. Public morals were at a lower grade than they had been before. "Since we began to preach our doctrine," he said in his pulpit at Wittenberg in 1532, "the world has grown daily worse, more impious, and more shameless. Men are now beset by legions of devils, and, while enjoying the full light of the Gospel, are more avaricious, more impure and repulsive, than of old under the Papacy. Peasants, burghers, and nobles—men of all degrees, the highest as well as the lowest—are all alike slaves to avarice, drunkenness, gluttony, and impurity, and given over to shameful excesses and abominable passions." "Let us go from this Sodom," he wrote to Catharine in 1545, and quitted Wittenberg in disgust, only returning at the demand of the elector and of the university. At Eisleben he died shortly after delivering a most violent sermon against the Jews.

Owing to the wars, scandals, and disturbances of the time Lutheranism spread rapidly over many of the German States and cities, being imposed upon some by force of arms. Albert of Brandenburg introduced it into Prussia, and at his death in 1568 Lutheranism was the predominant religion in his domain of West Prussia. It readily made its way into Silesia, where the Lutherans soon quarrelled among themselves on doctrinal matters. It entered more slowly into Poland, and after a severe struggle its progress was stayed by the exertions of some holy and zealous prelates and the coming of the Jesuits. It made more rapid advances in Livonia, Courland, Esthonia, Hungary, and Transylvania, though in Hungary it was supplanted by Calvinism. In Sweden it was established by Gustavus Vasa, and soon passed into Denmark, Norway, and Iceland. The same causes were at work everywhere to favour its progress: corruption of public morals, wealth of the Church, scandals among the clergy, greed of gain on the part of the princes, nobles, and people. After the first flush of conquest Lutheranism never made any advance in territory.

In 1834 Frederick William III., King of Prussia, by a royal edict, united the Lutherans, Zwinglians, and Calvinists in his dominions into what he was pleased to call the "Evangelical Church," much to the disgust of many of them. A number of Lutherans, rather than submit to this interference of the state in their religious affairs, emigrated to the U. S., where the first colony of Lutherans, composed of Swedes, had been made about 1630. It ought to be noted that the Danish, Swedish, and Norwegian Lutherans have preserved much more of Catholic doctrine and tradition than have the German Lutherans. [See THE REFORMATION.] The masses of the Lutheran population in Germany no longer attend church. It is estimated that there are about 40,000,000 Lutherans in the world, 20,000,000 of these being Germans. To-day Lutherans rank about fourth in numerical order among the Protestant denominations of the United States. The number of their communicants is rated at 738,302 for the year 1882. This would represent a Lutheran population of from three to four millions.

LYONS, COUNCILS OF. I. The first General Council of Lyons ended the long strife between the emperor Frederic II. and the Church. The emperor, who was educated under Innocent III., was a man of extraordinary abilities and of a wide culture, most unusual in that age. He was a great statesman, he fostered the schools of Palermo and Naples, encouraged the study of Arabic, philosophy and mathematics, and set in his own person an example of taste in Italian literature. Unhappily, he had a superstitious belief in astrology, he was charged with grave immorality, his temper was cruel and despotic, and his word could not be trusted. He had been crowned emperor in 1220, and his differences with the Church, which had begun under the gentle Pope Honorius III., broke out into open war under Gregory IX., in whom Frederic met an antagonist as determined as himself. In 1227, the Pope excommunicated the emperor for constantly deferring a crusade which he had promised to undertake. The latter replied by seizing Rome and driving out the Pope. When he did go to Jerusalem, he was still excommunicate; he showed that he had undertaken the crusade purely from political motives; stories were circulated of his contemptuous speeches in the Holy City, which gained for him the reputation of an unbeliever; and it was not till 1230 that he was absolved from excommunication. In 1239 he again incurred excommunication for his attack on the Lombards, and for setting his natural son Enzio on the throne of Sardinia, a fief of the Church. He seized the States of the Church, and in the midst of the strife Gregory IX. died. Celestine IV. reigned only for a few days, and the Holy See was vacant for two years. In 1243, Innocent IV., a former friend of Frederic's, was elected Pope. The new Pope refused to absolve Frederic except on conditions which the emperor would not accept. Frederic promoted sedition and tumult in Rome, and by occupying all roads, bridges, and harbours, cut the Pope off from intercourse with the rest of the world. In this extremity, the Pope fled from Sutri by Cività Vecchia and Genoa to Lyons, whither, on January 3, 1245, he summoned all kings, princes and prelates to a general council.

The Byzantine emperor, Baldwin II., the Latin Patriarchs of Constantinople, Antioch, and Aquileia, and 140 bishops, besides cardinals, were present at the consultation previous to the council, while the famous jurist Taddeo di Suessa, defended the cause of his master, Frederic. At the first session (June 28, 1245), in the cathedral church of St. John, the Pope, in a long speech, enlarged on the five wounds of Christendom—viz. the sins of the higher and lower clergy, the supremacy of the infidels in the Holy Land, the straits of the Latin emperor in Constantinople, the excesses of the Tartars in Hungary and the neighbouring countries, the oppression of the Church by the emperor Frederic. He accused the emperor of perjury, sacrilege, and heresy; of immorality; of maintaining an understanding with the Saracens; of friendship with the Sultan of Babylon. In the third session various decrees were passed on elections to benefices, contributions to be levied for the Holy Land and the Latin Empire in the East, and for help against the Tartars; on the abuse of Church censures, &c. &c. Again Taddeo sought to exculpate his master, and, failing in this, he protested against the proceedings of the council, denied that it was œcumenical, though there were now 250 bishops present, and appealed to a future Pope and true general council. The Pope, at the council's request, solemnly renewed the sentence of excommunication against Frederic, deposed him from his office, and absolved his subjects from allegiance, authorised a new election to the empire, excommunicated all who should serve him, whether as emperor or king, and promised that the Holy See would provide for Sicily. The bishops dashed their candles to the ground, in token of assent, and set their seals to the instrument of excommunication.

In 1246, the electors who took the ecclesiastical side raised Henry Respi of Thüringen, and after his death, in 1247, William of Holland, nephew of the Duke of Brabant, to the royal dignity. Frederic had still a considerable following, but his son Conrad had been defeated at Frankfort in 1246, and he himself met with a decided reverse before Parma, in 1248. In 1250, he died in Apulia, 56 years of age. He had made his confession to his friend the archbishop of Palermo, and been reconciled to the Church.

II. Pope Gregory X., who was eager for a new crusade, opened the Second Council of Lyons (the Fourteenth General Council) in May 1274. James I. of Arragon, the Latin Patriarchs of Constantinople and Antioch, ambassadors from England, France, Germany, and Sicily, 500 bishops, besides other prelates, met in the cathedral church. St. Thomas of Aquin died on his way to the council; St. Buonaventure was actually present, and died before it was over. A tax was imposed on ecclesiastical benefices in favour of the East. On June 24 the Greek ambassadors arrived, and in the Mass on the feast of St. Peter and St. Paul the Gospel and Creed were sung in Greek as well as in Latin, the clause "Filioque" being repeated three times. In the fourth session, July 6, the documents from the Greek emperor, Michael Palæologus, from the heir to his throne and from their prelates were publicly read, the emperor's representative swore that his master renounced the schism and returned to the obedience of the Pope. The union thus effected was scarcely more than nominal, and certainly was of short duration, but it led to an important definition by the council—viz. that "the Holy Ghost proceeds eternally from the Father and the Son," "as from one principle" and "by a single spiration." An important measure was passed to regulate and accelerate Papal elections. The cardinals were to assemble in the town where the last Pope died, ten days after his decease; they were to be strictly secluded "in conclave" from the outer world; their rations were to be diminished after the first three days and diminished yet further after eight days, if their business still remained to be done. Other decretals (collected in the "Sextus Decretalium") were published by the Pope, partly during, partly after, the council. (Hefele, "Concilien.")

MACABEES, FEAST OF. [See SAINTS.]

MACEDONIANS (called also Pneumatomachi). Heretics who denied that the Holy Ghost was God, equal to and consubstantial with Father and Son. Macedonius was a Semiarian and bishop of Constantinople till his deposition by the Acacians, who were pronounced Arians in 360. After his deposition, his influence brought the Trinitarian controversy into a new stage. Confessing that the Son was like the Father in substance, he held that the Holy Ghost was a creature, like the angels, and a servant of the Father and the Son. He was joined by several of the Semiarian leaders, Eustathius of Sebaste, Eleusius of Cyzicus, and Marathonius of Nicomedia. This last was a chief support of the party, and from him they were sometimes called Marathonians. The doctrine, owing partly to the strict life of its apostles, was widely accepted, not only in Constantinople, but also in all Thrace, Bithynia, and the neighbouring provinces. Under Julian, the Macedonians held synods especially at Zele in Pontus. They were condemned in a Roman synod under Pope Damasus in 374, at a great Illyrian synod in 375, and finally in the Second General Council in 381. In 383, Theodosius prohibited all exercise of their religion. (Hefele, "Concil." vols. i. ii.)

MAGISTERIUM OF THE CHURCH. [See CHURCH OF CHRIST.]

MAJOR ORDERS. The superior ranks of the sacred ministry—bishops, priests, deacons, and subdeacons—are said to have major orders. Before the thirteenth century the subdiaconate was one of the minor orders.

MANICHEES. Mani or Manes, the founder of this sect, was born at Babylon about the beginning of the third century. From the religion of the Persians he derived the doctrine of the two principles, and from Gnostic sects the notion of the hatefulness of matter. He and his followers must not be regarded as Christians lapsed into heresy, but as heathens who adopted so much of Christian ideas as suited their purpose. Mani was an Oriental philosopher; the notion of a moral fall, and a personal conviction of sin, on which Christianity is built up, were repugnant to him. In his view the soul of man suffered, not from a weak and corrupt will, but from contact with matter. Whatever evils the soul allows itself to commit are on this view physical, not moral—miseries, not sins. Again, the restorative energy must be looked for, not in a religion which reforms the will, and after it the whole nature, but in an enlightening philosophy, which reduces the contaminating contact with matter to a minimum. According to Mani, "two systems stood eternally opposed—God with the kingdom of light and the æons [see GNOSTICS], and Satan with his kingdom of darkness and the demons."[1] Light is the animating principle in all nature; and all beings are higher or lower according to the measure of their participation in the light. Woman is the gift of the demons, who impel men to propagate their kind in order that emancipation from matter and darkness may never come to them. The ideal light-clad soul is the Redeemer, or Christ, who descended from heaven in what was a body only in appearance, to teach men to bridle and extirpate their desires, so that they may return to their true home, the kingdom of light. The sect observed three seals (signacula)—the seal of the mouth, the seal of the hands, and the seal of the bosom. By the first they were forbidden to eat meat or eggs, or to drink wine or milk; by the second, to kill any animal or tear in pieces any plant; by the third, to marry, or at least to have offspring. The members were divided into the "elect" and the "hearers;" the former were expected to observe the Manichæan doctrine strictly; from the latter less was required. They could gather plants and prepare them for food, and when so prepared, the "elect" took them from their hands. The Manichees rejected the Old Testament altogether, and while accepting the New Testament put aside such passages as did not suit them on the pretence that they were interpolated. They regarded Mani as the Paraclete promised by Christ, and had a hierarchy imitated from that of the Catholic Church. The sect became numerous in the East, flourished in North Africa, and even spread to several countries of Southern Europe. The promises of light, wisdom, and enfranchisement which they held out to their disciples seduced for a time the powerful mind of St. Augustine. Everyone knows how he shook himself free from them, and wrote eloquent treatises against them. Several Christian emperors, down to and including Justinian, published edicts against them, and little is heard of Manicheeism after the sixth century, although the distinctive doctrines of the sect reappear among the Paulicians, the Cathari, the Albigenses, the Bogomiles, and other mediæval heretics. (Möhler, "Kirchengeschichte.")

MANIPLE. An ornamental vestment worn by subdeacons and by clergy of higher orders at Mass. It hangs from the left arm below the elbow (Gavantus says above the elbow, but he is corrected by Meratus), and is fastened by strings or pins. It is of the same colour and material as the chasuble. Priests put it on before Mass after the girdle. Bishops do not take it till they have said the Confiteor at the foot of the altar. It is supposed to symbolise penance and sorrow, and the prayer which the priest is directed in the Missal to say as he puts it on alludes to this signification. "Be it mine, O Lord, to bear the maniple of weeping and sorrow, that I may receive with joy the reward of toil." And the prayer said by the bishop is much the same. Liturgical writers also see in the maniple a symbol of the cords with which Christ was bound on his capture.

Many writers, following Cardinal Bona, have thought that they could trace the mention of the maniple to Gregory the Great, who wrote to John of Ravenna because the clergy of that see had begun to use mappulæ, which, up to that time, had been peculiar to Roman ecclesiastics. It has been shown, however, by Binterein that the mappulæ were not maniples but portable baldacchini. The mosaic of St. Vitalis at Ravenna (sixth century) represents the bishop and clergy without maniples, and it is not till the eighth and ninth centuries that any trace of the maniple is found. It was originally a handkerchief (hence the name manipulus) used for removing perspiration and the moisture of the eyes. Mabillon quotes from a document of the year 781, in which "five maniples" are named along with other vestments. In 889, Bishop Riculf, of Soissons, required each church to have at least two girdles and as many clean maniples ("totidem nitidas manipulas"). In the tenth century, Bishop Ratherius forbade anyone to say Mass without amice, alb, stole, "fanone et planeta." The planeta is the chasuble; the fano (Goth. fana, allied to the Greek πῆνος and the Latin pannus, and the same word as the modern German Fahne) is the maniple; hantfan or hantvan being the translation of manipulus or manipula in mediæval vocabularies.

The following are the principal changes which have occurred in the form and use of the maniple. Originally, as has been said, it was a mere handkerchief, used indeed at Mass, but then for ordinary purposes. But it was richly ornamented. Thus in 908, Adalbero, bishop of Augsburg, offered a maniple worked with gold at the shrine of St. Gallus. In the Basilica of St. Ambrose at Milan there are four figures of saints, constructed in 835, with ornamental maniples on their left arms, much like Gothic maniples of a much later date. Hefele gives a figure (belonging to the ninth century) of a priest with little bells on his maniple, in imitation doubtless of the bells on the coat of the Jewish High Priest. But even as late as 1100 Ivo of Chartres mentions the use of the maniple for wiping the eyes, and it was only gradually that the maniple became entirely of stiff material. The prayer in the Missal, as we have seen, still alludes to the old and simple use.

Again, in 1100 a Council of Poitiers restricted the use of the maniple to subdeacons, and such is the present custom. But only a little before the council Lanfranc speaks of the maniple as commonly worn by monks, even if laymen. A statute of the Church of Liège (1287) directs that the maniple should be two feet long, which is much more than its present length. Moreover, since the chasuble used to cover the entire body, the priest did not put on the maniple till the chasuble was raised after the Confiteor and his arm left free. A memory of the old state of things is preserved by bishops at their Mass. (Gavantus, with Merati's notes. Hefele, "Beiträge.")

MANSUS. In the Capitularies of Charlemagne respecting Saxony (Baluze, i. 183, quoted by Stubbs in "Const. Hist.," i. 228) it is ordered that for every church a house with enclosed yard (curtis) and two mansi of land shall be provided. Here and in many other places the word seems to signify merely a measure of land, and is probably equivalent to bovata or ox-gang, the quantity of land—usually about twelve acres—which could be tilled with one ox. Gradually the meaning of the word changed, till it came to signify "a house with land attached to it," a residence. Thus in an agreement made in 1219 between the bishop of Lincoln and the abbot of St. Albans,[1] it is stipulated that the vicar of Leighton shall have a "mansus competens" along with the small tithes and other advantages. As used by Matthew Paris in his Life of Abbot Paul, who lived soon after the Conquest, ("terra trium mansuum cum totidem hortis"), the expression seems to be passing from its earlier into its later meaning.[2] In the Chronicle of Brompton (fl. 1200) the term is used simply for mansion or residence.[3]

MANTELLETTA. A vestment made of silk or woollen stuff, open but fastened in front, reaching almost to the knees, without sleeves but with openings for the arms and with a low collar round the neck. It is worn by cardinals, bishops, abbots, and the "prelati" of the Roman Court, as well as by others to whom the privilege is granted by the Pope. It is used to cover the rochet, so that bishops wear it only when they are out of their dioceses, the uncovered rochet being the sign of jurisdiction. The mantellette of cardinals are of three colours—viz., red, violet, and rose-coloured (rosaceo); those of a bishop are always of the same hue. (Moroni, "Dizionario istorico.")

MARONITES. There has been much dispute on the origin of the name, but the following is probably the true account. Maro, a Syrian monk, contemporary with St. Chrysostom, settled on Mount Lebanon, and after his death a monastery, called after him the monastery of St. Maro, was founded between Apamea and Emesa, on the Orontes. A monk belonging to this house, and known as John Maro, was named bishop of Botrys in 676 by Macarius, Patriarch of Antioch, who was afterwards deposed as a Monothelite by the Sixth General Council. John Maro thus became the spiritual and temporal head of the Christian population on Mount Lebanon, and contended successfully both against Saracens and Melchites. On the destruction of the old monastery of St. Maro by the Imperialists, another was founded at Kefr-Nay, in the district of Botrys, and thither the head of St. Maro was brought. Partly from the John Maro who died in 707, partly from St. Maro, the patron of the monastery, the Monothelite Christians on Mount Lebanon were called Maronites.

In 1182 a Latin Patriarch of Antioch united them to the Catholic Church. A schism was caused through Greek influence, and a Maronite Patriarch fell away. But the rent was healed in 1216, and ever since the Maronites have been stedfast Catholics. Originally the Maronites acknowledged their Patriarch as civil ruler, but after a brief space they were governed on a feudal system by an Emir chosen by the aristocratic families, and he in turn nominated the Sheiks. In 1842 an arrangement was made by which the government of the Lebanon was divided between two Emirs, one chosen by the Maronites, another by the Druses, the former having a Druse, the latter a Maronite, assessor. The terrible massacres of Maronites by the Druses in 1860 (16,000 Maronites were slain, 100,000 were driven from their homes) led to fresh changes. The Lebanon was placed under one governor nominated by the Turks; feudal rights were abolished, but each nation has its own Sheiks. In 1865 the number of Maronites was about 150,000.

The Patriarch is chosen by the bishops, the Pope confirming and sending the pallium. He is subject to Propaganda. He appoints and consecrates the bishops. He alone consecrates the holy oils and chrism. No translation from Syriac into Arabic can be made without his approval. Every three years he must summon the bishops to a synod. His title (conferred by Alexander IV. in 1254) is Patriarch of Antioch, and he always adds the name of Peter to his own. His income consists of 100,000 piastres derived from three monasteries, with about 100,000 more from a poll-tax levied on all adult Maronites, a tax of five piastres each levied from the priests, tithes, and a subsidy from bishops and religious houses.

Metropolitan is a mere title of honour. Formerly the faithful of each diocese recommended a candidate for a vacant bishopric. Since 1736 the Patriarch has nominated with the advice of his bishops and also of the clergy and nobles of the vacant diocese. The bishops alone give the sacrament of Confirmation. There are also titular bishops, two of whom are the Patriarch's vicars, another administers his diocese, another is his agent at Rome, &c. The diocesan bishops are supported by lands belonging to the diocese, reserves in the taxes and tithes collected for the Patriarch, and stole fees. Since 1736 there have been only nine bishoprics, counting that of the Patriarch, of which Beyrout, Tripolis, Aleppo, Damascus, Baalbek, Sidon, Cyprus are archiepiscopal, Byblus (the Patriarch's bishopric), and Eden episcopal sees. The archdeacon, œconomus, periodeutes or bardut, archpriest and chorepiscopus are the officials of the diocese.

The parish-priests, usually married, are chosen by the people. There are 300 parishes, 500 secular priests. The parish-priest is allowed to till land, and his income consists in offerings of corn, oil, silk, &c., and stole fees. There are three lower or minor orders—viz., psaltist, reader and subdeacon, three greater or higher, deacon, priest, bishop. The tonsure is given before the minor orders. There are three general and several diocesan seminaries, the latter of recent origin. There is also a Maronite college at Rome. Education is given in Arabic, the vulgar, and in Syriac, the liturgical, language, and also of course in the theological sciences.

The Maronite religious follow the rule of St. Antony. Down to 1757 there were only two congregations, one of St. Isaias, another of St. Antony or St. Elisæus. The statutes of both congregations were approved by Clement XII. But in 1770 Clement XIV. approved the subdivision of the latter congregation into that of Aleppo and that of the Baladites or "natives" belonging to Mount Lebanon. These Baladites are chiefly laymen. Each of the three congregations has a general superior, chosen for three years and independent of the Patriarch, and a procurator at Rome. There are (or were in 1865) about 1,000 lay brothers and 600 Fathers. Fourteen monasteries belong to the congregation of St. Isaias, four to that of Aleppo, nineteen to that of the Baladites. There are seven nunneries of the strict observance. There are also many irregular monasteries and nunneries where the rule is less strict, and the superior must belong to the founder's family. In one convent of Maronite nuns, a Western rule, that of the Visitation, is observed.

MARRIAGE. I. The Nature of Marriage as such.—Marriage is a natural contract between man and woman, which Christ has raised to the dignity of a sacrament. Heathen may be, and are, united in true marriage, and their union is of course a lawful one, sanctioned and blessed by God Himself, who is the author of nature as well as of grace. But it is only among baptised persons that the contract of marriage is blessed and sanctified in such a manner as to become a means of conferring grace, so that we must distinguish between marriage in itself or according to the natural law on the one hand and the sacrament of marriage on the other. Theologians commonly give the following definition of marriage taken from the Master of the Sentences. It is "viri mulierisque conjunctio maritalis inter legitimas personas individuam vitæ societatem retinens." It is "conjunctio viri et mulieris"—i.e. the union of man and woman, the persons between whom the contract is formed; it is "maritalis"—i.e. it implies the giving to each power over the person of the other, and so is distinct from the union of friend with friend, man with man in business, and the like; it is "inter legitimas personas"—i.e. between those who are not absolutely prevented by lawful impediment from contracting such an union; "individuam vitæ societatem retinens;" it binds them to an undivided and indissoluble partnership during life, and so is distinct from such unhallowed unions as are contracted for a time or may be ended at will. If we add, "gratiam conjugibus conferendam significans"—i.e. being an (efficacious) sign of grace to be bestowed on the persons contracting—we have the full definition of marriage as a sacrament. Of course, the definition gives the bare essentials of marriage, for it ought to include the most perfect union of heart and soul, sympathy and interest.

Two points in the above definition may cause some difficulty, since it assumes that even in the law of nature a man can only have one wife (and of course a woman only one husband), and further that by the same law the marriage tie lasts till death.

With regard to the former point, polygamy, according to St. Thomas ("Suppl." lxv. 1), does not absolutely destroy the end of marriage, for it is possible that a man with several wives should protect them and provide for the education of his children. And therefore (as many theologians suppose, from the time of the Deluge) God allowed the Patriarchs and others, whether Jews or heathen, to have more wives than one. But polygamy cruelly injures the perfect union of marriage; it degrades man by sensuality and exposes woman to the miseries of jealousy and neglect; it endangers the welfare of the children, and so may be justly stigmatised as contrary to the law of nature. Moreover, monogamy alone is contemplated in the institution of marriage: Gen. i. 24, "Therefore a man will leave his father and his mother and will cleave to his wife, and they shall be one flesh." The legislation in Deut. xxv. 5 seq. appears to assume that monogamy was the rule among the Hebrews; so does the book of Proverbs throughout, and particularly the beautiful description of the good wife in ch. xxxi.,[1] and the same idea pervades the noble poetry of Ps. cxxviii. (see also in the Deutero-canonical books, Tob. i. 11; Ecclus. xxvi. 1). It was not till A.D. 1020 that a law of Rabbi Gershon ben

[1] The estimate of women is high throughout the Old Testament. We need only remind the reader of Mary the sister of Moses, Deborah, Anna. See also Prov. xiv. 1; xviii. 22; xix. 14 (even xxi. 9, 19, are not really different in spirit). The most unfavourable judgment is that of Eccles. vii. 28.

Judah in the Synod of Worms absolutely prohibited polygamy among the Western Jews. It was practised by the Jews of Castile even in the fourteenth century, and still survives among the Jews of the East (Kalisch on Exodus, p. 370; on Levit. p. 374). But our Lord Himself expounded and enforced the natural law of marriage, and recalled men to the idea of marriage given in Genesis. It is worth noticing that He quotes the Septuagint text, which is more express in favour of monogamy than the Hebrew: "And the two shall be one flesh." (So also the Samaritan והיה מישניהם, "and there shall be from the two of them one flesh"; the New Testament invariably, Mark x. 8; 1 Cor. vi. 16; Ephes. v. 31; and the Vulgate. The Targum of Onkelos, on the other hand, exactly follows the Hebrew.) Again, since Christ spoke generally of all mankind and not simply of those who were to be members of his Church, theologians hold that He withdrew the former dispensation, and consequently that polygamy is unlawful and a violation of natural law even in heathen. (Billuart, "De Matrimon." diss. v. a. 1.)

The same principles apply to the second point of difficulty. Moses, our Lord declares, permitted divorce because of the hardness of men's hearts, i.e. to prevent greater evils; and in consequence of this dispensation it was perhaps lawful for the heathen to imitate the example of the Jews in this respect also. But here, too, Christ has recalled all mankind to the primitive institution. The apparent exception which our Lord makes will be considered below, and certain cases in which marriage may be really dissolved have been explained in the article on DIVORCE.

II. (a) The Sacrament of Marriage.—A sacrament is an outward sign, and nobody doubts that in marriage, as in all other contracts, some outward sign on the part of the contracting parties is necessary. They must signify their consent to the solemn obligation of living together as man and wife. It is plain, too, that marriage may be called a sacred sign, for it typifies, as St. Paul (ad Ephes. v.) assures us, the mysterious union between Christ and the Church, which is his bride. But is it an efficacious sign of grace? That is, is the contract of marriage accompanied by signs which not only betoken but necessarily, in consequence of Christ's institution, convey grace to all baptised persons who do not wilfully impede the entrance of the grace into their hearts? This is a question on which Catholics are divided from Protestants, and which was agitated among Catholics themselves late even in the middle ages. St. Thomas ("Supp." xlii. a. 3), though he assumes that marriage is a sacrament of the new law, inquires whether it "confers grace," and mentions three opinions: first, that it does not do so at all, and this opinion he dismisses at once; next, that it confers grace only in the sense that it makes acts lawful that would otherwise be sins (this opinion he also rejects, but in a less summary way); and thirdly, that when "contracted in the faith of Christ," it confers grace to fulfil the duties of the married state, and this opinion he accepts as "more probable." It is plain that all which the second opinion attributes to marriage may be truly said of marriage as a natural contract, and does not by any means amount to a confession that marriage is a Christian sacrament in the sense of the Council of Trent. What St. Thomas gives as the more probable opinion is now an article of faith, for the council (Sess. xxiv. De Sacram. Matr.), after stating that Christ Himself merited for us a grace which perfects the natural love of marriage and strengthens its indissoluble unity, solemnly defines (Can. 1) that marriage is "truly and properly one of the seven sacraments of the evangelical law instituted by Christ."

The same council speaks of Scripture as insinuating (innuit) this truth, and more can scarcely be said. One text, indeed, as translated in our Douay Bible, would certainly seem to settle the question—viz. Ephes. v. 31, 32, "For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall adhere to his wife; and they shall be two in one flesh. This is a great sacrament, but I speak in Christ and in the Church." But we venture to think that this is not the true sense of the Vulgate, "Sacramentum hoc magnum est; ego autem dico in Christo et in ecclesia," which exactly answers to the original Greek, except that "in Christo et in ecclesia" would be better rendered as in the old Latin of Tertullian ("Contr. Marc." v. 18; "De Anima," 11), "in Christum et in ecclesiam." "Sacramentum" need not mean a "sacrament" any more than the Greek μυστήριον which it represents, and to prove this we need not go beyond the text of the Vulgate itself, which speaks of the "sacramentum" of godliness, 1 Tim. iii. 16; the "sacra-mentum" of the seven stars; the "sacramentum" of the woman and the beast, Apoc. i. 20; xvii. 7. Indeed, though the word "sacramentum" occurs in fifteen other places of the Vulgate, it cannot possibly mean a sacrament in any one of them. We translate, accordingly, "This mystery is great, but I speak with reference to Christ and the Church"—that is, the words, "For this cause shall a man leave," &c., contain a hidden or mysterious sense,[1] in virtue of which St. Paul regards Adam's words about the union between man and wife as a type or prophecy of the union between Christ and his Church. We have the authority of Estius for this interpretation, which is that generally adopted by modern scholars, and he denies that the ancients appealed to this text to prove marriage a sacrament.

On the other hand, St. Cyril ("Lib. ii. in Joann.") says that Christ was present at the wedding in Cana of Galilee that He might sanctify the principle of man's generation, "drive away the old sadness of child-bearing," "give grace to those also who were to be born;" and he quotes the words of St. Paul, "If any man is in Christ, he is a new creature; old things have passed away."

St. Augustine ("Tract. 9 in Joann." cap. 2) holds similar language. This theory, however credible in itself, certainly does not lie on the surface of St. John's narrative.

More may be made of 1 Tim. ii. 11 seq. "Let a woman learn in quietness, in all subjection. But teaching I do not permit to a woman, nor to have authority over a man, but to be in quietness. For man was first formed, then Eve, and Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived hath fallen into transgression; but she shall be saved through her child-bearing,[2] if they continue in faith and love and sanctification with temperance." St. Paul excludes women from the public ministry of the Church, and reserves that for men. But he assigns them another ministry instead. They are to save their own souls by the faithful discharge of their duties as wives, and to be the source of the Church's increase, for it cannot subsist without marriage any more than without the sacrament of order. Women are to be the mothers of children, whom they are to tend and train for the service of Christ. And just as a special grace is given to those whom God calls to the priestly state, so is "the state of marriage placed under the protection and blessing of a special grace, as being dedicated to the Church and subserving its continual growth and expansion." Thus the intercourse of the sexes, which is apt to become a source of fearful corruption, is blessed and sanctified, more even than in its primitive institution, and directed to a still higher end, that of carrying on the Church's life on earth. The natural union is holy and beautiful: Christ perfects the union of heart and soul and makes it still more holy and beautiful by sacramental grace; and, hallowed by a sacrament, marriage becomes the perfect antitype of Christ's union with his Church. He cleansed his Church that He might unite it to Himself. He sanctifies Christian man and woman in their union that it may be "a hallowed copy of his own union with his Church" (see the eloquent passage in Döllinger, in "First Age of the Church," Engl. Transl. p. 361, 362).

The reader must remember that we do not allege this last passage as in any way conclusive from a controversial point of view, though we do think it fits in well with the Catholic doctrine. Many authorities are alleged from tradition, one or two of which we have already given in speaking of the marriage at Cana. St. Ambrose, "De Abraham," i. 7, says that he who is unfaithful to the marriage bond "undoes grace, and because he sins against God, therefore loses the share in a heavenly mystery (sacramenti cœlestis consortium amittit)." St. Augustine, "De Bono Conjugali," cap. 24, writes: "The advantage of marriage among all nations and men lies in its being a cause of generation and a bond of chastity, but as concerns the people of God, also in the holiness of a sacrament (in sanctitate sacramenti)." Here the distinction drawn between natural and Christian marriage, and still more the comparison made between the "sacramenta" of marriage and order,[1] seem to warrant our rendering of "sanctitate sacramenti."

[1] The formula, "This is a great mystery," is a common Rabbinical one, רזא יקירא. See Schoettgen, Horæ, p. 783 seq., and the same Chaldee word for "mystery" is preserved in the Peshito rendering of the verse.

[2] Bishop Ellicott, ad loc., translates "through the child-bearing"—i. e. through the birth of Christ. It seems to us incredible that St. Paul, if he really meant this, should have expressed it by an allusion so obscure and abrupt.

[1] He says the "sacramentum ordinationis" remains in a cleric deposed for crime, and that

(β) The Nature of the Sacramental Grace, &c.—Marriage, then, is a sacrament of the new law, and as such confers grace. The sacrament can only be received by those who have already received baptism, the gate of all the other sacraments; and marriage is not, like baptism and penance, instituted for the cleansing of sin, so that grace is conferred on those, and those only, who are at peace with God. Christians who are in mortal sin may contract a valid marriage, but they receive no grace, though they do receive the sacrament and therefore have a claim and title to the sacramental grace when they have amended their lives by sincere repentance. Christians, on the other hand, who contract marriage with due dispositions receive an increase of sanctifying grace, and, besides, special graces which enable them to live in mutual and enduring affection, to bear with each other's infirmities, to be faithful to each other in every thought, and to bring up the children whom God may give them in his fear and love. They may go confidently to God for every help they need in that holy state to which He has deigned to call them, for He Himself has sealed their union by a great sacrament of the Gospel. Theologians are not agreed about the time when Christ instituted the sacrament. Some say at the wedding in Cana; others when He abrogated the liberty of divorce (Matt. xix.); others in the great Forty Days after Easter.

(γ) If we ask, further, how this grace is conferred, or in other words who are the Ministers of the Sacrament, what are the words and other signs through which it is given, the answer is far from easy. It is evident that there must be a real consent to the marriage on both sides, otherwise there can be no contract and therefore no sacrament. But is the expression of mutual consent enough? The great majority of mediæval theologians, though William of Paris is quoted on the other side, answered yes. They held that wherever baptised persons contracted marriage, they necessarily received the sacrament of marriage also. On this theory, the parties themselves are the ministers of the sacrament; the matter consists in the words or other signs by which each gives him or herself over to the other; the form, which gives a determinate character to the matter, consists in the acceptation of this surrender by each of the contracting parties. Hence (apart from the positive enactments of Trent, for which see Clandestinity, under IMPEDIMENTS OF MARRIAGE), wherever Christians bind themselves by outward signs to live as man and wife, they receive the sacrament of marriage. No priest or religious ceremony of any kind is needed. A very different view was put forward in the sixteenth century by Melchior Canus ("Loci Theol." viii. 5). He held that the priest was the minister of the sacrament; the expressed consent to live as man and wife the matter; the words of the priest, "I join you in marriage," or the like, the necessary form. A marriage not contracted in the face of the Church would, on this theory, be a true and valid marriage but not a sacrament. Theologians and scholars of the greatest learning and highest reputation, Sylvius, Estius, Tournely, Juenin, Renaudot, &c. (see Billuart, "De Matrim." diss i. a. 6) embraced this opinion. In its defence an appeal might be made with great plausibility to the constant usage of Christians from the earliest times, for they have always been required to celebrate marriage before the priest. But it is to be observed that Tertullian ("De Pudic." 4), strong as his language is against marriages not contracted before the Church, says that such unions "are in danger" (periclitantur) of being regarded as no better than concubinage, which implies that they were not really so. Nor does he make any distinction between the contract of marriage in Christians and the sacrament, though it would have been much to his purpose could he have done so. Besides, the language of the Fathers quoted above points to a belief that Christ elevated the contract of marriage to a sacrament, not that He superadded the sacrament to marriage. Moreover, Denzinger ("Ritus Orientales," tom. i. p. 152 seq.) shows that the Nestorians, who have retained the nuptial benediction from the Church and believe in the obligation of securing it, still consider that marriage, even as a sacred rite, may be performed by the parties themselves if the priest cannot be had; and he quotes from Gregorius Datheviensis this dictum, "Marriage is effected through consent expressed in words, but perfected and consummated by the priest's so the bond of marriage is only loosed by death. However, cap. 18 proves that St. Augustine did not use the word "sacramentum" in its precise modern sense, for he calls the polygamy of the Jews "sacramentum pluralium nuptiarum," as typifying the multitude of converts to the Church.

blessing and by cohabitation." Now, at all events, the former of the two opinions given is the only tenable one in the Church. Pius IX. in an allocution, September 27, 1852, laid down the principle that there "can be no marriage among the faithful which is not at one and the same time a sacrament;" and among the condemned propositions of the Syllabus appended to the Encyclical "Quanta Cura" of 1864, the sixty-fourth runs thus:—"The sacrament of marriage is something accessory to and separable from the contract, and the sacrament itself depends simply on the nuptial benediction." Whether, supposing a Christian (having obtained a dispensation to that effect) were to marry a person who is not baptised, the Christian party would receive the sacrament as well as enter into the contract of marriage, is a matter on which theologians differ. Analogy seems to favour the affirmative opinion.

(δ) The Conditions for the Validity of Marriage are mostly identical with the conditions which determine the validity of contracts in general. The consent to the union must be mutual, voluntary, deliberate, and manifested by external signs. The signs of consent need not be verbal in order to make the marriage valid, though the rubric of the Ritual requires the consent to be expressed in that manner. The consent must be to actual marriage then and there, not at some future time; for in the latter case we should have engagement to marry or betrothal, not marriage itself. Consent to marry if a certain condition in the past or present be realised (e.g. "I take you N. for my wife, if you are the daughter of M. and N.") suffices, supposing that the condition be fulfilled. Nay, it is generally held that if a condition be added dependent on future contingencies (e.g. "I take you N. for my wife, if your father will give you such and such a dowry") the marriage becomes a valid one without any renewal of the contract, whenever the condition becomes a reality. The condition appended, however, must not be contrary to the essence of marriage—e.g. a man cannot take a woman for his wife to have and hold just as long as he pleases. (See Gury, "Theol. Moral." De Matrimon. cap. iii.)

III. Indissolubility of Marriage.—The law of Israel (Deut. xxiv. 1) allowed a man to divorce his wife if she did not find grace in his eyes, because he found in her some shameful thing (ערות דבר, literally the "nakedness or shame of a thing;" LXX, ἄσχημον πρᾶγμα; Vulg. aliquam fœditatem), and the woman was free at once to marry another man. The school of Shammai kept to the simple meaning of the text. Hillel thought any cause of offence sufficient for divorce—e.g. "if a woman let the broth burn;" while R. Akiva held that a man might divorce his wife if he found another woman handsomer. (See the quotation from "Arbah Turim Nilchoth Gittin," i. in McCaul, "Old Paths," p. 189). The Pharisees tried to entangle Christ in these Rabbinical disputes when they asked Him if a man might put away his wife "for any cause." In Athens and in Rome under the Empire the liberty of divorce reached the furthest limits of Rabbinical licence. (For details see Döllinger, "Gentile and Jew," Engl. Transl. vol. ii. p. 236 seq. p. 254 seq.) Our Lord, as we have already seen, condemned the Pharisaic immorality, annulled the Mosaic dispensation, and declared, "Whosoever shall put away his wife, except for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery, and he who marrieth her when she is put away committeth adultery" (Matt. xix. 9). The Catholic understands our Lord to mean that the bond of marriage is always, even when one of the wedded parties has proved unfaithful, indissoluble, and from the first Christ's declaration made the practice of Christians with regard to divorce essentially and conspicuously different from those of their heathen and Jewish neighbours. Still it was only by degrees that the strict practice, or even the strict theory just stated, was accepted in the Church. And before we enter on the interpretation of Christ's words, we will give a sketch of the history of practice and opinion on the matter.

Christian princes had of course to deal with the subject of divorce, but they did not at once recast the old laws on Christian principles. Constantine, Theodosius the Younger, and Valentinian III., forbade divorce except on certain specified grounds; other emperors, like Anastasius (in 497) and Justin (whose law was in force till 900), permitted divorce by mutual consent, but no one emperor limited divorce to the single case of adultery. Chardon says that divorce (of course a vinculo) was allowed among the Ostrogoths in Spain till the thirteenth century, in France under the first and second dynasties, in Germany till the seventh century, in Britain till the tenth. (Chardon, "Hist. des Sacrements," tom. v. Mariage, ch. v.)

It would be waste of labour to accumulate quotations from the Fathers in proof of their belief that divorce was unlawful except in the case of adultery. But it is very important to notice that the oldest tradition, both of the Greek and Latin Churches, regarded marriage as absolutely indissoluble. Thus the "Pastor Hermæ" (lib. ii. Mand. iv. c. 1), Athenagoras, "Legat." 33 (whose testimony, however, does not count for much, since he objected to second marriages altogether), and Tertullian ("De Monog." 9), who speaks in this place, as the context shows, for the Catholic Church, teach this clearly and unequivocally. The principle is recognised in the Apostolic Canons (Canon 48, al. 47), by the Council of Elvira held at the beginning of the fourth century, Canon 9 (which, however, only speaks of a woman who has left an unfaithful husband), and by other early authorities.

However, the Eastern Christians, though not, as we have seen, in the earliest times, came to understand our Lord's words as permitting a second marriage in the case of adultery, which was supposed to dissolve the marriage bond altogether. Such is the view and practice of the Greeks and Oriental sects at the present day. And even in certain parts of the West similar views prevailed for a time. Many French synods (e.g. those of Vannes in 465 and of Compiègne in 756) allow the husband of a wife who has been unfaithful to marry again in her life-time. Nay, the latter council permitted remarriage in other cases: if a woman had a husband struck by leprosy and got leave from him to marry another, or if a man had given his wife leave to go into a convent (Canons 16 and 19). Pope Gregory II., in a letter to St. Boniface in the year 726, recommended that the husband of a wife seized by sickness which prevented cohabitation should not marry again, but left him free to do so provided he maintained his first wife. (Quoted by Hefele, "Beiträge," vol. ii. p. 376.) At Florence the question of divorce was discussed between the Latins and Greeks, but after the Decree of Union; and we do not know what answers the Greeks gave on the matter. The Council of Trent confirmed the present doctrine and discipline which had long prevailed in the West in the following words "If any man say that the Church is in error because it has taught and teaches, following the doctrine of the Gospels and the Apostles, that the bond of marriage cannot be dissolved because of the adultery of one or both parties, let him be anathema." (Sess. xxiv. De Matrim. can. 5). The studious moderation of language here is obvious, for the canon does not directly require any doctrine to be accepted; it only anathematises those who condemn a certain doctrine, and implies that this doctrine is taught by the Church and derived from Christ. It was the Venetian ambassadors who prevailed on the Fathers to draw up the canon in this indirect form, so as to avoid needless offence to the Greek subjects of Venice in Cyprus, Candia, Corfu, Zante, and Cephalonia. The canon was no doubt chiefly meant to stem the erroneous views of Lutherans and Calvinists on divorce.

Our Lord's utterances on the subject of divorce present some difficulty. In Mark x. 11, 12; Luke xvi. 18, He absolutely prohibits divorce: "Whosoever shall put away his wife and marry another, committeth adultery against her; and if a woman put away her husband and be married to another, she committeth adultery." But in Matt. xix. 9, 10, there is a marked difference: "Whosoever shall put away his wife, except for fornication, and marry another, committeth adultery; and he who marrieth a woman put away, committeth adultery." So also Matt. v. 32. Protestant commentators understand our Lord to prohibit divorce except in the case of adultery, when the innocent party at least may marry again. Maldonatus, who acknowledges the difficulty of the text, takes the sense to be—"Whoever puts away his wife except for infidelity commits adultery, because of the danger of falling into licentiousness to which he unjustly exposes her, and so does he who in any case, even if his wife has proved unfaithful, marries another." He takes St. Mark and St. Luke as explanatory of the obscure passage in St. Matthew. Subsequent scholars, we venture to think, have by no means improved on Maldonatus. Hug, who is never to be mentioned without respect, suggested that Christ first (in Matt. v. 32) forbade divorce except in case of adultery; then Matt. xix. 9, 10, forbade it altogether, the words "except for fornication" in the latter place being an interpolation—a suggestion perfectly arbitary and followed by nobody. A well-known Catholic commentator, Schegg, interprets the words "for fornication" (ἐπὶ πορνείᾳ) to mean, "because the man has found his marriage to be null because of some impediment, and so no marriage at all, but mere concubinage." In this event there would be no occasion for or possibility of divorce. On Matt. v. 32 (παρεκτὸς λόγου πορνείας, save where fornication is the motive reason of the divorce) he thinks Christ took for granted that the adulteress would be put to death (according to Levit. xx. 10) and so leave her husband free, an hypothesis which is contradicted by the "pericope of the adulteress." (John viii. 3 seq.). Döllinger's elaborate theory given in the Appendix to his "First Age of the Church" is less ingenious than that of Hug, but scarcely less arbitrary. He urges that πορνεύειν can only refer to "fornication," and cannot be used of sin committed after marriage; but πορνεία and πορνεύειν are used of adultery (1 Cor. 1; Amos vii. 17; Sir. xxiii. 33), so that we need not linger over Döllinger's contention (which has no historical basis, and is objectionable in every way) that antenuptial sin on the woman's part annulled the union and left the man free, if he was unaware of it when he meant to contract marriage.[1]

IV. The Unity of Marriage.—The unlawfulness of polygamy in the common sense of the word follows from the declaration of Christ Himself, and there was no room for further question on the matter. With regard to reiteration of marriage, St. Paul (1 Cor. vii. 39, 40) distinctly asserts that a woman is free to marry on her husband's death. Still there is a natural feeling against a second marriage, which Virgil expresses in the beautiful words he puts into Dido's mouth—

Ille meos, primus qui me sibi junxit, amores
Abstulit; ille habeat secum servetque sepulcro.

And this feeling, of which there are many traces among the heathen, was yet more natural in Christians, who might well look to a continuance in a better world of the love which had begun and grown stronger year by year on earth. Moreover, the Apostle puts those who had married again at a certain disadvantage, for he excludes them (1 Tim. iii. 2; Titus i. 6) from the episcopate and priesthood. And the Church, though she held fast the lawfulness of second marriage and condemned the error of the Montanists (see Tertullian, "De Monog." "Exhortat. Castitatis"), and of some Novatians (Concil. Nic. i. Canon 8), treated such unions with a certain disfavour. This aversion was much more strongly manifested in the East than in the West.

Athenagoras ("Legat." 33) says Christians marry not at all, or only once, since they look on second marriage as a "specious adultery" (εὐπρεπὴς ἐστι μοιχεία). Clement of Alexandria ("Strom." iii. 1, p. 551, ed. Potter) simply repeats the apostolic injunction, "But as to second marriage, if thou art on fire, says the Apostle, marry." (In iii. 12, p. 551, he is referring to simultaneous bigamy.) Early in the fourth century we find Eastern councils showing strong disapproval of second marriage. Thus the Council of Neocæsarea (Canon 7) forbids priests to take part in the feasts of those who married a second time, and assumes that the latter must do penance. The Council of Ancyra (Canon 19) also takes this for granted, and the Council of Laodicea (Canon 1) only admits those who have married again to communion after prayer and fasting. Basil treats this branch of Church discipline in great detail. For those who married a second time he prescribes, following ancient precedent, a penance of one year, and of several years for those who marry more than once. (See the references in Hefele, "Concil." i. p. 339; "Beiträge," i. p. 50 seq.) Basil's rigorism had a decided influence on the later Greek church. A Council of Constantinople, in 920, discouraged second, imposed penance for third, and excommunication for fourth marriage. Such is the discipline of the modern Greek church. At a second marriage the "benediction of the crowns" is omitted, and "propitiatory prayers" are said; and although some concessions have been made with regard to the former ceremony, Leo Allatius testifies that it was still omitted in some parts of the Greek church as late as the seventeenth century. A fourth marriage is still absolutely prohibited.[1]

[1] Döllinger objects to the instance from 1 Cor. v 1, because he says there is no Greek word for "incest," so that the Apostle was obliged to use πορνεία. Why πορνεία rather than μοιχεία? As to Amos vii. 17, "Thy wife will commit fornication in the city," he urges that this defilement was not to be voluntary on the woman's part, and therefore was not adultery. This argument proves too much. If it was not adultery because not wilful, no more was it "fornication."

[1] The Oriental sects (Copts, Jacobites, Armenians) are even stricter than the Greeks.

The Latin Church has always been milder and more consistent. The "Pastor Hermæ" (lib. ii. Mandat. iv. 4) emphatically maintains that there is no sin in second marriage. St. Ambrose ("De Viduis," c. 11) contents himself with saying, "We do not prohibit second marriages, but we do not approve marriages frequently reiterated." Jerome's words are, "I do not condemn those who marry twice, three times, nay, if such a thing can be said, eight times (non damno digamos, imo et trigamos, et, si dici potest, octogamos)," but he shows his dislike for repeated marriage (Ep. lxvii. "Apol. pro libris adv. Jovin."). Gregory III. advises Boniface, the Apostle of Germany, to prevent, if he can, people marrying more than twice, but he does not call such unions sinful. Nor did the Latin Church impose any penance for reiterated marriage. We do, indeed, find penance imposed on those who married again in the penitential books of Theodore, who became archbishop of Canterbury in 668. But Theodore's view came from his Greek nationality; and if Herardus, archbishop of Tours, speaks of third marriage, &c., as "adultery," this is probably to be explained by the Greek influence which had spread from England to France. Anyhow, this is the earliest trace of such rigorism in the West.

The Latin Church, however, did exhibit one definite mark of disfavour for reiterated marriage. The "Corpus Juris" contains two decretals of Alexander III. and Urban III., forbidding priests to give the nuptial benediction in such cases. Durandus (died 1296) speaks of the custom in his time as different in different places. The "Rituale Romanum" of Paul V. (1605–1621) forbids the nuptial benediction, only tolerating the custom of giving it, when it already existed, if it was the man only who was being married again. The present Rubric permits the nuptial benediction except when the woman has been married before.

V. Ceremonies of Marriage.—From the earliest times and in all times Christians have been wont to celebrate their marriages in church, and to have them blessed by the priest; nor can they celebrate them otherwise without sin, except in case of necessity. "It is fitting," Ignatius writes ("Ad Polycarp." 5), "for men and women who marry to form this union with the approval of the bishop, that their union may be according to God." "What words can suffice," Tertullian says ("Ad Uxor." ii. 9), "to tell the happiness of that marriage which the Church unites, the oblation confirms, and the blessing seals, the angels announce, the Father acknowledges!"

In the form approved for the U. S. the priest in surplice and white stole questions the man and woman as to their consent. Then each party expresses this consent at length and in the vulgar tongue, with joined hands:—"I, N. N., take thee, N. N., for my lawful wife (husband), to have and to hold from this day forward, for better for worse, for richer for poorer, in sickness and in health, till death do us part." Then the priest says in Latin: "I join you in marriage in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen." Then the marriage-ring is blessed, and the bridegroom, taking it from the priest, puts it on the ring-finger of the bride, saying: "With this ring I thee wed, and I plight unto thee my truth." Then the priest says in Latin: "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen." Then come a few versicles and responses, and he concludes with a prayer begging God to bless and strengthen the union.

This is the form used even when there is no Nuptial Mass celebrated. It is the earnest desire of the Church that all Catholics should be married in the morning with a Mass. In her liturgy she has a special Mass for bridegroom and bride. She shows the importance of this when she, as it were, breaks through her ordinary customs by allowing the married couple to come into the sanctuary, and by interrupting the canon of the Mass and inserting special prayers for the bridegroom and bride.

Many of these ceremonies belonged originally to the betrothal. [See Espousals.] The ring, or annulus pronubus, was used to plight troth before Christian time by the Romans. So again, espousing with gold and silver, called arrhæ, certainly existed among the Franks previous to their embracing Christianity, also among the Jews, whence it may have passed into the Greek ritual. The joining of hands (once accompanied by a kiss) is alluded to by Tertullian ("De Virg. Veland." 11). St. Isidore of Seville, quoted by Chardon, says the ring was put on the fourth finger of the left hand, because it contains a vein immediately connected with the heart. This sage reason was the current one in the middle ages.

The words of the priest, "Ego jungo" ("I join you into marriage"), are of comparatively recent origin. "Anyone," says Chardon (tom. v. "Mariage," ch. 2), "may convince himself of this by looking through the extracts from ancient Sacramentaries and Missals published by Father Martene." They are omitted, the same author continues, in a Pontifical of Sens (only) 300 years old, and they are wanting in the "Ordo ad faciendum sponsalia" reprinted by Mr. Maskell from a Sarum "Manuale" of 1543. On the other hand, two striking ceremonies mentioned by Nicolas I. in his answer to the Bulgarians, and both older than Christianity itself, are now unknown among us. These are the solemn veiling of the bride and the wearing of crowns by the married couple. The Greeks have kept this latter rite: indeed, "crowning" among them is a common word for the nuptial benediction. The marriage service according to the old English use of Sarum is substantially the same as the modern Roman one, but more elaborate. The couple stood at the church door till the man had placed the ring on the woman's hand (the right hand, by the way), and certain prayers had been said over them. Additional prayers were said over them at the altar steps: then, before Mass began, they were placed in the presbytery—"that is to say, between the choir and the altar" (rubric of Sarum Manual). The rubric of the Hereford Missal directs them to hold lights in their hands. The Nuptial Mass was "of the Trinity," with prayers for the occasion. After the Sanctus, four clerics in surplices held a veil (pallium) over them while they lay prostrate, and the special benediction was given after the Fraction of the Host. At the "Agnus Dei," the pallium was removed, both rose, the bridegroom received the pax from the priest and kissed his wife. There is nothing in the Sarum Manual which answers to our nuptial prayer before the "Ite Missa est," though the Hereford Missal gives a special form of benediction with the chalice. After Mass, bread and wine, or some other liquor, were blessed and tasted by the newly-married couple. At night the priest blessed the nuptial couch.

It must not be thought that these rites, even so far as they differ from those now in use, were in any way peculiarly English. They occur almost exactly in the same order and form in a Ritual of Rennes and a Pontifical from the monastery of Leri, from which Chardon (loc. cit.) gives copious extracts. But we can find no parallel for the placing of the ring on the bride's right hand.

In the Greek church the marriage service is known as ἀκολουθία τοῦ στεφανώματος, the office of crowning. After the espousals, in which two rings, one of gold and another of silver, are placed on the altar and given by the priest to bridegroom and bride respectively, the persons to be married enter the church, preceded by the priest with the incense. After Psalm xxxi. and various prayers the priest puts a crown on the head of each with the words, "The servant of God N. crowns the servant of God N. in the name," &c. There is no mention of Nuptial Mass in the modern Greek Euchologies, and Greeks are usually married in the evening. From more ancient MSS., however, Goar found that the bridegroom and bride used to receive Communion from a particle of a Host previously consecrated and placed in a chalice with ordinary wine. The offices of marriage among the other Orientals are given by Denzinger.

MARTYR (μάρτυς, then μάρτυρ, which was originally the Æolic form). A witness for Christ. In early times this title was given generally to those who were distinguished witnesses for Christ, then to those who suffered for Him;[1] lastly, after the middle of the third century, the title was restricted to those who actually died for Him. The very first records of the Church which we possess tell us of the honours done to the martyrs. It was the martyrs who, first of all, were regarded as saints; the relics of the martyrs which were first revered; to the martyrs that the first churches were dedicated. The name "martyrium" (μαρτύριον), which at first meant the church built over a martyr's remains, was given to churches generally, even if dedicated to saints who were not martyred, though this usage was partly justified by the fact that a church was not consecrated till the relics of some martyr had been placed in it.

[1] Μάρτυς and the cognate words begin to assume their later technical sense in Acts xxii.; Apoc. ii. 13. This technical sense is probably intended in Clem. Rom. 1, Ad. Cor. 5; certainly in Ignat. Ad Ephes. 1; Mart. Polyc. 19; Melito (apud Euseb. H. E. iv. 26); Dionys. Corinth. (ib. ii. 25); Hegesippus (ib. ii. 23, iv. 22); Epist. Gall. (ib. v. 1, 2); Anon. Adv. Cataph. (ib. v. 16); Iren. i. 28, 1, &c.; though at the same time the words were also used of testimony which was not sealed by death. The epistle of the Martyrs of Vienne and Lyons just quoted distinguishes between confessors (ὁμόλογοι) and martyrs, but in Clement Alex. (Strom. iv. 9, p. 596) and even in Cyprian the distinction is not observed. The Decian persecution tended to fix it.

Benedict XIV., in his work on "Canonisation" (lib. iii. cap. 11 seq.), gives the modern law of the Church on the recognition of martyrdom with great fulness. He defines martyrdom as the "voluntary endurance of death for the faith or some other act of virtue relating to God." A martyr, he says, may die not only for the faith directly, but also to preserve some virtue—e.g. justice, obedience, or the like, enjoined or counselled by the faith. He mentions the dispute among theologians whether a person who died for confessing the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin, which in his time had not been defined, would be a martyr. He gives no decided opinion on the point, but says that "in other cases the safe rule is that one who dies for a question not yet defined by the Church dies in a cause insufficient for martyrdom." Further, he explains that to be a martyr a man must actually die of his sufferings or else have endured pains which would have been his death but for miraculous intervention.

MARTYROLOGY. A list of martyrs and other saints, and the mysteries commemorated on each day of the year, with brief notices of the life and death of the former. It is these brief notices which distinguish a Martyrology from a mere calendar. It is read in monastic orders at Prime after the prayer "Deus, qui ad principium." It is followed by the versicle "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints," and by a petition for the intercession of the heavenly court; and these words are retained even in the secular office when the Martyrology is not actually recited. Mr. Maskell has collected many proofs that in England the Martyrology used to be said in the monastic chapter, not, like the office, in the choir. This custom, however, was in no way peculiar to England, as may be seen from the notes of Meratus on the subject (Pars. II. sect. v. cap. xxi.). After Prime, or sometimes after Tierce, the monks adjourned to the chapter, heard the Martyrology and said the prayers which now form part of Prime, "Deus, in adjutorium meum"; Dignare, Domine, die ista," &c., before setting out to their daily labour.

Gregory the Great speaks of a Martyrology used by the Roman Church in his day, but we do not know for certain what it was. A Martyrology attributed to Jerome is printed, e.g., in Vallarsi's edition of his works. It has undergone many revisions and later editions. It is quite possible that Jerome may have collected a Martyrology from the various calendars of the Church, and that the Martyrology which goes by his name, as we have it, is the corruption of a book used in St. Gregory's time at Rome. The lesser Roman Martyrology was found at Ravenna by Ado, archbishop of Vienne, about 850. A third Martyrology is attributed (erroneously, Hefele says) to Bede, and the foundation of the work may probably come from him. All Western Martyrologies are based on these three. We have Martyrologies from Florus, Ado, Usuard, in France; from Rabanus and Notker of St. Gall, in Germany.

The Roman Martyrology mentioned, as we have seen, by Gregory the Great is mentioned again at the English Council of Cloveshoo. Such a work is of course subject to constant alterations from the addition of new feasts, &c. A revision of the Roman Martyrology was made by Baronius and other scholars in 1584. It was revised again under Urban VIII. (See Laemmer, "De Mart. Rom." Ratisbonæ,[1] 1878.)

MARY (Μαριάμ,[2] מִרְיָם). The object

[1] This scholar classifies Martyrologies thus: (1) that attributed to Jerome; (2) Martyr. Rom. Parv. published by Rosweyd in 1613, and written in Rome about 740; (3) a genuine Martyrology of Bede, with interpolations from Florus of Lyons; (4) that of Usuard, dedicated to Charles the Bald, used from the ninth century, not only in Benedictine houses, but throughout the West. In the fifteenth century no other was in use except in St. Peter's, and even there the Martyrology was but a translation of Usuard.

[2] The nominative and vocative of Mary, the Mother of our Lord, is always Μαριάμ (Matt. xiii. 55; Luc. i. 27, 30, 34, 38, 39, 46, 56; ii. 34; Acts i. 14), the only exception being i. 19, where the reading is doubtful. Sometimes the genitive is Μαριάς; sometimes it is indeclinable, as in Luc. ii. 5, 16. The word Μαριάμ, or Mary, is of course identical with Miriam, the name of the sister of Moses. The meanings, "bitterness" (from Heb. מָר), "lady" (from Chaldee and Syriac, מָרָא, סָכְיָן. the same word which is familiar to all in Maranatha, "our Lord cometh," 1 Cor. xvi. 22), must certainly be abandoned on philological grounds. There can scarcely be a doubt that the deriva-of this article is to sum up and justify the teaching and practice of the Catholic Church in her devotion to the Blessed Virgin. Catholics do not stand alone in this devotion, for the schismatic Greeks, and most of the ancient Oriental sects agree with Catholics in magnifying Mary's dignity and seeking her intercession. Protestants, on the other hand, are all but unanimous in condemning the Church's devotion, and have often denounced it as idolatrous. Some points which concern us here will be passed lightly over, because we have considered them elsewhere. The IMMACULATE CONCEPTION is discussed in a special article. We have endeavoured to show (see BEATIFIC VISION) that Mary and the other saints already see God face to face; we assume further that she and they are able to hear our prayers, reserving the treatment of that question to the article SAINTS.

I. Mary in Scripture.—It may be fairly alleged that the Bible begins with Mary. When God cursed the serpent, He said, "I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed." Of course those who think the serpent was only a serpent will see no prophecy or anything more than a prediction of the strife in Eastern lands between man and the serpent, his deadly and insidious foe, the serpent stealthily aiming at the man's heel, the man aiming at the serpent's head. But Protestants who believe, as the Apocalypse implies, that the serpent was the devil, and that our Lord is the promised "seed of the woman" who was to crush the serpent's head, are logically bound to understand the woman who is to be at enmity with the serpent as Mary. The woman and her seed are put close together—the "enmity" of the one is compared with that of the other, and to what woman is all this applicable except to Mary? She was the virgin [1] (this is not the place to discuss the meaning of the word in the original) who was to bear a child, and that child was to be called Emmanuel, "God with us."

This prediction was fulfilled, and Mary received the highest dignity possible to a mere creature. She was not indeed the mother of the Godhead, but she was the mother of God, for the simple reason that Christ her Son was God and man in one Person. True, her Son did not take his divine nature from her, any more than a son who is mere man receives his soul from his mother. The soul is infused by God, but as body and soul are united in one human person, we reasonably speak of a woman as the mother of her son, not merely as the mother of a human body. And granting this, it is strange that sincere Christians should stumble on the language in which the Church speaks of Mary. She is exalted above the angels, for surely God's mother is nearer to Him than the angels who stand before the throne. From her Christ took the blood He was to shed for her and for us all. Moreover, whereas the two great dignities of virginity and maternity are, according to God's ordinary law, incompatible, in Mary's case they were united. Joseph "took unto him his wife, and he knew her not until she brought forth her first-born son: and he called his name Jesus" (Matt. i. 24, 25). We do not know where to find more beautiful or more impassioned language used by the Church about Mary than the words which occur in the "Common" of the Breviary office:—"Holy and stainless virginity, with what praise to extol thee I do not know; He whom the heavens cannot contain was contained in thy bosom. Blessed art thou amongst women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb." Yet these words, strong as they are, simply state a primary tenet of the Christian faith. Her virginity, her divine maternity, her position as the sole parent of Him who had no man for his tion generally accepted among scholars from מָרָה, "to rebel," is correct; so that "Mary," or "Miriam" = "rebellion." The mediæval notion that the word "Mary" was connected with the Latin "mare" is curious. The last syllable "yam," יָם, does mean the sea. But how St. Bernard came to think "Mary" meant "star of the sea," we cannot say (מְאוֹר יָם, "light of the sea"?). No part of the word resembles any word for "star" in Hebrew, Syriac, Chaldee, or, so far as we are aware, in any language. It might easily (though, of course, quite wrongly) be taken to mean "Lord of the sea," and perhaps this led to the notion that it meant "star," unless our suggestion in brackets be right.

[1] Too much is made by some Catholic writers of the article in the Hebrew of Is. vii. 14, "Behold the virgin with child and bringing forth a son." Probably "the virgin" means the virgin standing before the prophet in vision. Besides, the definite article is used in Hebrew where we should not employ it in English. See, e.g. Num. xi. 27, lit. "the lad ran and told Moses," though this is the first mention of any lad (Ewald, Gram. § 277 a).

father—these are the deeply-laid foundations of Mary's glory.

But Mary was not merely the passive instrument of the Incarnation. By the free use of her own will she co-operated in our salvation, and was associated with her divine Son. It depended on her will whether or no the divine economy by which the Incarnation and our redemption were accomplished was to be frustrated, as the first dispensation had been by the disobedience of Adam and Eve. The account in Luc. i. 26–38, and especially Mary's question, "How will this be, seeing that I know not man?" are proof of the deliberate way in which Mary chose her part, and the freedom of the consent is expressed in her words, "Behold the handmaid of the Lord, be it unto me according to thy word." And so her cousin, St. Elizabeth, acknowledges not only Mary's dignity as the Mother of the Messias, "Whence is this unto me that the mother of my Lord should come unto me?" but also Mary's personal holiness and share in the work of our salvation. "Blessed is she who believed, because" (or perhaps "that") "there will be an accomplishment of the things spoken to her by the Lord" (Luc. i. 43–45).

Mary maintains and exercises her rights and privileges as the mother of Christ throughout the Gospel history. It is she who bore the Light of light into the world in the stable at Bethlehem. She nourished at her breast and with a mother's love that human life which her divine Son had condescended to take from her. He Himself has told us how grateful He is, how bountiful his reward for a cup of water given in his name. It was Mary's privilege to minister to Him directly, and, first by herself, then in union with St. Joseph, actually to support Christ's life during his early years. To her and to St. Joseph He, the Lord of all, "was subject" (Luc. ii. 51). Not less but more "subject" than ordinary sons, because He was "made under the law," and came to give a perfect example of the way that the law which commands filial obedience should be kept. In her company Christ spent thirty out of the three and thirty years of his earthly sojourn. At her request He made the water wine, and so inaugurated his public ministry and manifested his glory. When nearly all the Apostles had fled she stood at the foot of his cross, suffering surely as no other mother ever suffered, and drinking, as no other creature ever drank, the chalice of Christ's Passion.

There is no hint in Scripture of any sin or imperfection on Mary's part. No doubt our Lord, when she told Him at the wedding that there was no wine, answered, "Woman, what is there to me and to thee: mine hour is not yet come?" (the translation is that of Dr. Westcott). The passage is confessedly a hard one. Possibly Christ may have meant that there was nothing in common between his divine and her human nature. She could not fathom the counsels of his omniscience. The hour of full triumph which she naturally and innocently desired had not come yet, was not to come till that hour which St. John again and again calls Christ's own (John vii. 30, viii. 20, xiii. 1), the hour of his weakness, his passion, and his death.

Be this as it may, two things are certain. First, in the word woman (we quote the same distinguished Protestant scholar), there "is not the least tinge of reproof or severity. The address is that of courteous respect, even of tenderness." Next, Mary cannot possibly have been guilty of fault in asking, or rather suggesting, the very thing that Christ did. Nor does the New Testament ever imply that Mary ceased to be a virgin; on the contrary, it confirms, though it nowhere states, the Catholic dogma of her perpetual virginity. We read of our Lord's brethren, but the same word is used in Genesis xiii. 8, xxix. 15, for the relationship between Abraham and Lot, Laban and Jacob, and yet we know that they were uncles and nephews, not brothers in the strict sense. Again, those who press the word "brother" against the virginity of Mary, must be reminded that St. Joseph is called the "Father" of Jesus, and that not only by those who knew no better, but by the Blessed Virgin herself, who knew all (Luc. ii. 48). The evangelist himself calls Joseph the Father of Jesus (Luc. ii. 33), and Mary and Joseph (Luc. ii. 41, 43) his "parents," and it is interesting and most instructive to note that later scribes have taken offence and altered the reading in each of the three cases. Another objection to the Catholic doctrine is often drawn from the words of St. Matthew i. 25: Joseph "knew not" his wife "till she brought forth a son" (the word first-born is wanting in the best MSS.); and of St. Luke ii. 7: Mary brought forth "her first-born son." But St. Matthew's evident purpose is to accentuate the fact that Mary was a virgin at Christ's birth; he asserts and implies nothing as to what happened afterwards. In St. Luke the prominent idea is the consecration of the first male child, and this appears from v. 23 of the same chapter, "As it has been written in the law of the Lord, every male opening the womb shall be called holy to the Lord." With him the first-begotten is equivalent to the "male opening the womb,"[1] and has nothing to do with subsequent children. St. John furnishes positive evidence, urged, Bishop Lightfoot writes, "with fatal effect," against the view that Mary had other children than Jesus. Our Lord on the cross (John xix. 26, 27) commended his mother and St. John to each other's care. Why, if she had children of her own? Even Meyer admits that it will not suffice to say that Christ's "brethren" did not believe in Him (John vii. 5), for "the speedy overcoming of this unbelief (Acts i. 14) could scarcely be concealed from" Christ. And indeed it is inconceivable that Christ should appear to one of Mary's supposed sons, that this son should be specially entrusted with the administration of the Mother Church of Jerusalem, that Mary herself should join in worship with her "sons" (Acts i. 14), and yet all the time live in the house and under the care of a comparative stranger. We may add that this interpretation of Scripture has approved itself, not only to Catholics and learned High Churchmen like Pearson and Mill, but also to recent Protestant scholars who cannot be suspected of undue bias in the matter—viz. to Westcott (see the Commentary on John, ad vii. 3, xix. 26), and to Lightfoot (on Galatians, p. 253).[2]

Mary, then, was the Virgin Mother of God. She remained in perpetual virginity; according to the judgment of the ancient Fathers;" nay, heretical, since even general councils call Mary ἀεὶ πάρθενος (De Incarnat. xiv. 3). It has, however, been adopted by very many Protestants. (2) "Nearly all the Greeks," according to Maldonatus, besides Hilary and Ambrose, held that the "brethren" were sons of Joseph by a former marriage, and consequently that "James, the brother of the Lord," was a different person from James, the son of Alphæus, one of the twelve. In reality, as Lightfoot shows, this theory was common to all writers, Greek and Latin (except, of course, those who held the heretical view mentioned first), down to Jerome's time, and after his time to all Greek writers, except Chrysostom in his latest works and Theodoret.* It is incorporated in the Greek offices, which distinguish between James, "the Lord's brother," and Alphæus. Maldonatus (see Matt. xii. 46) rejects but does not censure this view. Petavius simply says it is "more probable that Joseph had not been previously married." In modern times this hypothesis has found a powerful advocate in Bishop Lightfoot. This older opinion afforded a ready explanation of the term "brethren." All who took Joseph for our Lord's father would look on his sons by a former marriage as our Lord's half-brothers, and speak of them as his "brethren." The use of the word is possible, but not nearly so natural, on the view to be mentioned next. At the same time it must be admitted that Catholic feeling, especially during the last three centuries, has attached itself strongly to the virginity of St. Joseph, as most in keeping with his office as the guardian of our Lord and the Blessed Virgin. (3) Jerome advocated and to all appearance started a third view—viz. that the "brethren" were sons of a sister of the Blessed Virgin also called Mary. The "brethren" of Jesus were James, Judas, Joseph, or Joses, and Simon (Mark vi. 3). Now, of these, James, the Lord's brother, is said by St. Paul (Gal. i. 19; this interpretation, however, is doubtful) to have been an Apostle. But the only James in the apostolic lists whom St. Paul can mean and name here, is James the son of Alphæus, James the son of Zebedee being dead long before the Apostle wrote (Acts xii. 2). Therefore, James the Lord's brother was the son, not of Joseph, but Alphæus. But we can also ascertain the name of his mother, since in Matt. xxvii. 56; Marc. xv. 40, we read that Mary the mother of James and Joseph, and therefore the wife of Alphæus, was present at the crucifixion. This Mary is to be identified with Mary the wife of Clopas and the sister of the Blessed Virgin, who St. John says was present by the cross (John xix. 25). It is very doubtful whether St. John means to say that the Blessed Virgin had a sister also called Mary ("his mother—and his mother's sister, Mary of Clopas—and Mary Magdalene"), or whether he mentions four

[1] Not, of course, in so strict a sense as to exclude the integritas carnis post partum.

[2] It would require a treatise to give the reasons alleged for the different views on the "brethren of the Lord," because these reasons depend on a number of details, most of which must be given at length or not at all. Here we can do little more than state the views themselves, with the history of their reception or rejection. (1) Helvidius, who lived at Rome, maintained, about 380, that these "brethren" were the sons of Joseph and Mary. This theory was supported about the same time by Bonosus, bishop of Sardica, and apparently also by Jovinian, a monk probably of Milan. It was condemned soon after it appeared, in Synods at Rome and Capua. It has no support in antiquity, except perhaps from Tertullian, and is regarded by all Catholic writers as heretical. Thus Petavius calls it "detestable to Christian ears, and sacrilegious she was associated with a closeness impossible to other creatures in the work of her divine Son. She was faithful and obedient to her Son and Saviour at the first, faithful and obedient to the end. Scripture is silent about her later life and its close. But Christians believe that life here is a preparation for the better life to come, and from the greatness of Mary's work and dignity on earth, they learned to conceive her greatness in power in heaven, where her love is made perfect and she is for ever with her Son. Naturally, therefore, they came to discover in the Apocalypse—the one book of the New Testament which can hardly fail to have been written after Mary's death—a picture of Mary in heaven. "The only passage," says Cardinal Newman—(but see Wisdom ii. 23, 24)—"Development," p. 414—"where the serpent is directly identified with the evil spirit occurs in the twelfth chapter of Revelation; now, it is observable that the recognition, when made, is found in the course of a vision of 'a woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet:' thus, two women are brought into contrast with each other. Moreover, as it is said in the Apocalypse, 'The dragon was wroth with the woman, and went about to make war with her seed,' so it is prophesied in Genesis: 'I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed. He shall bruise (?) thy head, and thou shalt bruise (?) his heel.' Also the enmity was to exist, not only between the serpent and the seed of the woman, but between the serpent and the woman herself; and here, too, there is a correspondence in the Apocalyptic vision." There is, then, "reason for thinking that this mystery at the close of the Scripture record answers to the mystery in the beginning of it, and that the woman mentioned in both passages is one and the same, and that she can be none other than" Mary. We need not be at a loss to imagine the way in which Mary exercises her great power in heaven. Once the body of Christ was entrusted to her care, surely in heaven she cannot fail to intercede for his mystical body—for all those who are her children because they are the brethren of her Son. And this Son is her Son still; He hears her prayers with filial love and tenderness, since—as the Scripture, and especially the Epistle to the Hebrews, assures us—Christ has carried his human nature to the right hand of the Majesty on high, and He cannot continue to be man if he has ceased to be a son. When Protestants assert that the relation of son and mother ceased to exist between Jesus and Mary when his earthly years were over, they thereby do away with all claim on our part to the human sympathy of Christ. Yet it is this human sympathy of his in heaven to which great prominence is given in the Epistle to the Hebrews, and to which devout Protestants, who will not hear of devotion to Mary, cling as their comfort and stay.

* Theophylact's opinion—viz. that Clopas dying childless, Joseph raised up children to him—is obviously only a modification of the common Greek theory.

II. The Tradition of the Church on Devotion to Mary.—It would be vain to deny that devotion to the Blessed Virgin was far less prominent in ancient than in modern times, and we shall have occasion shortly to show how easily this difference may be explained. But it would be a gross mistake to suppose that Catholics at any time doubted her great place in the work of redemption or ignored her dignity, as most Protestants do. The latter have always, and almost universally, shrunk from using the title "Theotocos," or Mother of God. We believe we are not wrong when we say that the use of this expression would serve of itself to mark the person who employed it as a Catholic.[1] Yet "it was familiar to Christians from primitive times, and is used, among other writers, by Origen, Eusebius, St. Alexander, St. Athanasius, St. Ambrose, St. Gregory Nazianzen, St. Gregory Nyssen, and St. Nilus" (Newman's "Development," p. 145). It is the universal women at the foot of the cross ("his mother and his mother's sister—Mary of Clopas and Mary Magdalene"). Anyhow, Jerome's theory is rendered still more plausible by the fact, for so it may be fairly regarded, that "Alphæus" and "Clopas" (this is the true reading in John xix. 25; "Cleophas," in Luc. xxiv. 18, is another name altogether) are two forms of the same Aramaic name "Chalpai" (חלפי). This view that our Lord's brethren were his cousins became the accepted one in the Latin Church, which in her Mass and office only recognises two Jameses, one the son of Zebedee, the other son of Alphæus, "brother" of the Lord and bishop of Jerusalem. Among Protestants, Dr. Mill, of Cambridge, has defended it with great learning and ingenuity in a treatise entitled The Accounts of our Lord's Brethren in the N.T. vindicated (Cambridge: 1843.)

[1] Of course we put the Greeks, &c., out of count, and also that modern school in the Church of England which studiously imitates Catholic phraseology. And even among these the popular use of the words "Mother of God" is, we imagine, very recent, if it exists even now.

doctrine of the early Church that Mary was the second Eve (see IMMACULATE CONCEPTION). St. Irenæus says that "Mary, being obedient, became, both to herself and to all mankind, the cause of salvation;" that "the knot of Eve's disobedience was loosed by Mary's obedience;" that "what the Virgin Eve bound by unbelief, this the Virgin Mary unbound by faith;" that "as by a virgin the human race had been given over to death, by a virgin it is saved" (Iren. iii. 22, 4; v. 19, 1); thus absolutely excluding the common Protestant notion that Mary was merely a passive instrument in the Incarnation, to whom no special gratitude is due. Further, he says that "she was drawn to obey God, that of the Virgin Eve the Virgin Mary might become the advocate" (v. 19, 1). In the last place, St. Irenæus speaks of Mary as "prophesying for the Church" when she uttered her "Magnificat," and it is certain that from the second century at latest Mary was taken as a type of the Church of Christ. Thus, the "Virgin Mother" is a title given to the Church in the letters written by the Christians of Vienne and Lyons in the year 177 (see Euseb. "H. E." v. 1, 45), and by Clem. Alex. ("Pæd." 1, 6). And this language was adopted by Marcus, a Gnostic heretic of the same period, who made the Virgin hold the place of the Church in his symbolical system (Iren. i. 15, 3). It is important to notice this, for it proves that when Catholics go to Mary as to their mother, a title and office which also belong to the Church, their practice is consonant with the spirit of ancient Christianity. Nor, again, does it by any means follow that because the Fathers take the woman in Apoc. xii. 1 to represent the Church, we are really following an opposite interpretation if we believe the Blessed Virgin to be primarily and directly intended.[1]

We have two instances of Mary's interposition from heaven in favour of Christians on earth, preserved from the scanty literature of the first three centuries. St. Gregory Nyssen, in the fourth age, relates that his namesake Gregory Thaumaturgus, in the third, was pondering theological doctrines shortly before he was made priest; that the Blessed Virgin appeared, and bade St. John disclose to the young man the "mystery of godliness," and that St. John answered, "that he was ready to comply in this matter with the wish of the Mother of the Lord, and enunciated a formula well turned and complete, and so vanished." So, St. Gregory Nazianzen records an incident contemporaneous with that just given—viz. that a Christian woman had recourse to Mary, and so obtained the conversion of a heathen who was trying to pervert her by magic. (See Newman, "Development," pp. 415, 416.) We need not defend the truth of these stories. True or false, they prove that in the fourth century devotion to the Mother of God was well established and already regarded as ancient; and in both instances "the Blessed Virgin appears especially in that character of Patroness or Paraclete, which St. Irenæus and other Fathers describe, and which the mediæval Church exhibits—a loving Mother with clients." (Newman, ib.)

But till the last part of the fourth century there were strong reasons which kept devotion to the Blessed Virgin in the background. There was the danger of scandal to the heathen, who, with their own inadequate notions of worship, might misconstrue the honour paid to Mary; and then there was the long struggle with Arianism, when the Church was contending for the very centre of the faith. When once the belief in the full Godhead of the Son had been fenced round by formal definition, when once it had been decided that no exaltation of the Son would suffice unless He was confessed to be the one eternal God, then there was no longer any danger of confusing Mary's honour with that of her Divine Son. To honour Mary was not idolatry, unless the Arians, who had employed far higher language of Christ than Catholics have ever used of his Blessed Mother, were orthodox in their belief. Nay, it became clearer than ever that the belief in Mary was necessary to a right belief in Christ. Nestorius denied the unity of his Person. He allowed that God dwelt in Him, but not that the man Christ Jesus was God; and this was tantamount to denying the Incarnation altogether, and reducing the difference between Christ and his creatures to a matter of degree, since God dwells in the hearts of all the just. In order, therefore, to secure right faith in the manhood of the Eternal Son, the Church defined at Ephesus, what she had held everywhere and from the beginning, that

[1] Erasmus denied that any of the early Fathers understood the woman in Apoc. xii. to be the Blessed Virgin. The passage quoted against him from St. Augustine by Ballerini in his Sylloge of Documents on the Immaculate Conception is not regarded as genuine by the Benedictine editors.

Mary is the Mother of God. Cardinal Newman has collected a catena of patristic passages ("Development," p. 145 seq.) on the Blessed Virgin, which date from the conclusion of the main controversy with the Arians and the rise of that with Nestorius. Augustine will allow no question of sin to be raised when Mary is concerned. Antiochus calls her "the Mother of Life, of Beauty, of Majesty," "the Morning Star." St. Proclus, "the Fair Bride of the Canticles," "the Stay of Believers," "the Church's Diadem." "Let us make confession," says an early writer, probably one of the Fathers of Ephesus, "to God the Word, and to his Mother . . . Hail, Mother, clad in Light! . . . Hail, all-undefiled Mother of Holiness! . . . With her is the fount of life, and breasts of the spiritual and guileless milk, from which to suck the sweetness we have even now earnestly run to her," &c. We have only taken a few words here and there from Cardinal Newman's quotations, but surely we have done enough to show that the Church of the fifth century addressed the same language to Mary as the Church of the nineteenth.

It is true that the great Fathers St. Basil, St. Chrysostom, and St. Cyril of Alexandria, sometimes express themselves in a very different tone. Cardinal Newman has considered these passages in his "Letter to Dr. Pusey" ("Diff. of Angl." vol. ii. p. 128), and we will only venture on one remark. It may sound paradoxical, but we believe it true, that these passages tend to confirm Catholic belief in Mary's spotless sanctity. Some great Father alleges that the sword which was to pierce Mary's heart was doubt in her Son's divinity which took possession of her soul beneath the cross, and again, that Christ reprehended his mother for some fault, of haste or the like, at the Marriage of Cana. We do not think any sober Protestant scholar would approve of such exegesis. And when individual Fathers argued in such a way, the Church was justified in disregarding their opinions, great saints and doctors though they were. Common sense, as well as the sense of the faithful, was against them, and they had neither right nor power to arrest the stream of devotion to Mary. The stream grew, no doubt, in its course through the ages, but its source was in the Eternal Hills.

Evil, indeed, would this devotion be, if it diminished or obscured, ever so little, that supreme devotion to God, who is over all, and to Jesus Christ whom He has sent. But one who dared to put Mary on an equality with God, or to deny that Christ is the "one mediator between God and man"—i.e. the sole author of our redemption, the beginner and the finisher of our faith—would, by that very fact, cease to be a Catholic. Every Catholic child is taught that Mass can be offered to God alone, and the obligation of hearing Mass every Sunday, the adoration paid to the Blessed Sacrament, &c., keep the supreme character of the worship due to God constantly before the mind. We are far, of course, from any wish to defend exaggerated or imprudent language. One of the greatest of the Church's theologians, among whose many virtues a tender devotion to the mother of God was not the least, protests against extravagant and ill-founded praise of Mary. "This kind of idolatry," he writes, "secret, and, as Augustine says, natural to the human heart, is far removed from the grave character of theology—that is, of heavenly wisdom." And he quotes certain "golden words" of Gerson, also a devout client of Mary, in which he (Gerson) "restrains immoderate licence in setting forth the praises of the Blessed Virgin, and confines it within the limits of a sober and manly piety" (Petav. "De Incarnat." xiv. 9). Admonitions to the same effect may be found in the work of another famous Catholic scholar—highly esteemed by Benedict XIV. and Clement XIV.—Muratori, "De Moderamine Ingeniorum." We would only urge that the effect of Catholic devotion to the Blessed Virgin must not be judged on à priori grounds but tested by experience. It is among Protestants who have repudiated this devotion, not among Catholics, who have retained it, that imperfect and false ideas on the divinity of Christ have struck root.

(There is a vast literature on this subject. We would specially notice the chapters of Petavius, in his treatise on the "Incarnation;" Cardinal Newman, in his "Development," and "Letter to Dr. Pusey;" "Jesus, the Son of Mary," by Mr. J. B. Morris—a work full, not only of recondite learning, but also of deep thought, and which, marred though it is by eccentricities, will well repay careful study; and a short but masterly rationale of the doctrine and devotion in Father Ryder's "Catholic Controversy.")

MARY, FEASTS OF. Benedict XIV., quoting a note of Mabillon on St.

Bernard, says that, even as late as the twelfth century, four feasts only of the Blessed Virgin were celebrated in the Church—those of the Purification, Annunciation, Assumption, and Nativity. At present, the number of her feasts has risen to about twenty. An account has been given, in separate articles, of those which relate to events in the Blessed Virgin's history—viz. to her Conception, Nativity, Name, Presentation, Espousals, Annunciation, Visit to St. Elizabeth (Visitation), Purification (see CANDLEMAS), Dolours, and Assumption. There are other feasts which commemorate Mary's interest in the Church militant on earth, and these will be mentioned here.

(1) Feast of Mary the Help of Christians, May 24—in the Supplement of the Breviary. The title "Help of Christians" was added to the Litany of Loreto by Pius V. after the naval victory of Lepanto over the Turks. The feast was instituted by Pius VII., who attributed his deliverance from a captivity of five years at Savona and his return to Rome, out of which he had been twice driven by violence, to the intercession of the Blessed Virgin.

(2) Feast of "The Blessed Virgin Mary of Mount Carmel."—For the connection of the Carmelite order with the mountain of that name, see the article on the Carmelites, and for the privileges attached to the Carmelite scapular, see SCAPULARS. The feast was approved for the Carmelites by Sixtus V. in 1587. Paul V. inserted new lections in the office, which was revised by Bellarmin. Benedict XIII. extended the feast to the whole Church.

(3) St. Mary of Snow (Dedicationis ecclesiæ S. Mariæ ad Nives).—This church is sometimes called, from the Pope who is said to have founded it, the Liberian Basilica; the Sixtine Basilica, because Sixtus III. enlarged, or, as Tillemont thinks, founded it; the Church of St. Mary of the Crib (B. Mariæ ad Præsepe), because the relics of the crib in which Christ is believed to have been laid were brought there about the middle of the seventh century; and, most commonly, the Church of St. Mary Major, a name given to it from the eighth century, because of its magnificence and its rank as the second church of Christendom, the Lateran Church being the only one which takes precedence of it. The name ad nives given in the Martyrology and Breviary is due to the following story. John, a Roman patrician, and his wife, being childless, wished to spend their fortune in honour of the Blessed Virgin. She signified to them and to Pope Liberius in dreams that she wished a church dedicated to her on the Esquiline Hill, and told them that the site would be marked out by snow. Next day it was found that the promised snow had actually fallen, though the month was August and the heat intense. Benedict XIV. collects all the evidence which can be produced for this miracle, his oldest authority being that of Pope Nicolas IV. in 1287. The lections in the older Breviaries add that when Liberius began to dig the foundation, the earth opened of itself.

(4) Our Lady of Mercy[1] (de Mercede), September 24.—The order of Our Lady of Ransom was founded by St. Peter Nolascus, St. Raymond of Pennafort, and James King of Arragon, with the object of freeing Christian captives from the Turks. The feast was approved first of all for the order itself, then extended to Spain, next to France, and lastly by Innocent XII. to the whole Church.

(5) Feast of Our Lady of the Rosary, first Sunday in October.—The victory of Lepanto was won by Don Juan of Austria, October 7, 1571, while the members of the Confraternity of the Rosary at Rome were making special supplication for the success of the Christian arms, and Pius V., then Pope, ordered that an annual commemoration should be made of "St. Mary of Victory." Gregory XIII. instituted the feast of Our Lady of the Rosary on the first Sunday in October for all churches with a chapel or altar dedicated to the Blessed Virgin under that title. Clement X. extended the feast to all the dominions of the Spanish king. The Emperor Leopold begged Innocent XII. to extend the feast to the whole Church, but the Pope died before he was able to do so. At last Clement XI., after another victory over the Turks had been obtained in 1710 by the Emperor Charles VI., and Corfu been freed from Turkish besiegers in the same year, made the feast of universal observance. The lections of the Second Nocturn, which contain a history of the origin of the feast, were added under Benedict XIII.

[1] "Ransom" would, of course, be the natural translation. But "Our Lady of Mercy" is the common rendering in most English Calendars; and so in German, "von der Barmherzigheit." And this appears to be correct, for, according to Dufresne. "merces," in mediæval Latin, is used for "misericordia."

(6) Patronage of the Blessed Virgin.—The feast was approved for Spain in 1679, for the States of the Church by Benedict XIII., in order to celebrate the power of the Blessed Virgin's intercession. It is now usually kept in churches which have permission to celebrate it on the second, not, as at first, on the third Sunday in November. Other feasts of the Blessed Virgin are celebrated by permission in certain parts of the Church. Such are the feasts of the Divine Maternity and of the Purity of the Blessed Virgin, kept on the second and third Sundays of October (the former feast is observed in the U. S.); the Prodigies of the Blessed Virgin, kept at Rome and some other places on July 9; the Mother of the Divine Pastor, kept in Tuscany on the first Sunday in May by leave of Pius VII.; Our Lady of Consolation, on the first Sunday in July; Our Lady of Peace, on the fourth Sunday in October. (See "Manuale Decret. S. Rit. Cong." No. 2139 seq.)

(7) The Feast of Our Lady's Expectation (Expectatio partus) should have been mentioned in a separate article. The Spanish Church used to keep the feast of the Annunciation on December 18, by a decree of a Council of Toledo in the seventh century. The object was to prevent the feast falling in Holy or Easter Week. When the Spaniards adopted the Roman usage with regard to the Annunciation, they instituted the feast of the Expectation to replace their old observance on December 18, and the latter feast was approved by Gregory XIII. The Spaniards also call it the "Feast of O," because the first of the greater antiphons is said in the vespers of its vigil. It was extended to the Venetian territory in 1695 and to the States of the Church by Benedict XIII. in 1725. It is kept in England, but is not a feast of the whole Church. (Chiefly from Benedict XIV., "De Festis.")

MARY, FEAST OF THE NAME. The real and supposed meanings of the name have been explained in the article on the Blessed Virgin. The feast of the Name arose at Cuenca, in Spain, and its local celebration was approved by the Pope in 1513. This permission was withdrawn by Pius V. and restored by Sixtus V. Originally, the feast seems to have been kept on September 22. Innocent XI., after the victory obtained against the Turks and the consequent relief of Vienna from siege in 1683, extended the feast and office to the whole Church.

MARY OFFICE OF SATURDAY. The office of the Blessed Virgin is said on all Saturdays, not, however, when a feast of Nine Lessons falls on that day, not during Advent and Lent, on ember days, vigils, or ferias on which the lessons of a previous Sunday have to be said at Matins. In this office of the Blessed Virgin the twelve ferial psalms are said, and there are only three lessons, the last, however, being followed by the Te Deum. This rule was authorised by Urban II. at the Council of Clermont in 1096. The present office was composed and issued under Pius V. Clement VIII. revised it, and substituted a lesson from St. Jerome instead of the previous one from St. Epiphanius for the month of April. Mystical reasons are given by liturgical writers for this commemoration of the Blessed Virgin on the Sabbath—e.g. that the eternal Word rested in her. (Gavantus on the Rubrics of the Breviary.)

MASS. The Catholic doctrine on the sacrifice of the Mass has been explained in the article EUCHARIST, the general history of the Roman Mass under LITURGY, and the history of the component parts of the Mass under special articles, CANON, COLLECT, INTROIT, KYRIE, and the like. Here we confine ourselves to matters of terminology and special regulation.

(1) The word "Mass."—About its meaning and derivation there is not the least room for reasonable doubt. Attempts have been made to find its origin in Hebrew. Asa (עָשָׂה) means to do, and sometimes to perform a sacred action, to sacrifice (like ἱερὰ ῥέζειν in Homer), and it was suggested that a noun, Misah (מַעֲשָׂה), might be derived from the verb. Such a formation is a sheer impossibility in Hebrew, and cannot be thought of without a shudder. Maaseh (מַעֲשֶׂה) is the proper form. A Hebrew word "Missah" (מִסָּה) does occur Deut. xvi. 10,[1] and an attempt was made to derive the Latin word from it, though the Hebrew word in question means "number," "rate," &c., and has nothing to do with sacrifice. It only occurs once, and if the Church had wished to adopt a Hebrew word for "sacrifice," she would have chosen, we may be very sure, one of the numerous Hebrew words which occur times without number in the Old Testament, and one of which, "corban," occurs in the New (Marc. vii. 11; cf. Matt. xxvii. 6), and is frequently used in the Peshito or chief Syriac version for "sacrifice." Besides, if the early Church had adopted the word from the Hebrew, as it did adopt other Hebrew words, such as "Hosanna," "Amen," "Alleluia," "Sabaoth," we should find some trace of it in the Greek and Oriental churches. We should expect to find it above all in Syriac, a language closely allied to Hebrew, and which has in its New Testament version three words for sacrifice as close to the corresponding Hebrew words as, e.g., the French homme is to homo. But no trace of "Mass" can be found except in Latin, and the languages which are daughters of Latin. Here and there we find μίσσα in Greek, but in such a way as shows at once that it is merely a Latin word written in Greek letters. Thus the "Chronicon Paschale," written about 600, describes Justinian as dismissing the officers of the palaces and bidding them keep their houses. The words are καὶ ἔδωκεν εὐθέως μίσσας τοῖς τοῦ παλατίου, καὶ λέγει τοῖς συγκλητικοῖς, Ἀπέλθατε, ἕκαστος φυλάξει τὸν οἶκον αὐτοῦ—"and straightway he gave their dismissals to the officials of the palace and said to the senators, 'Go away: let each keep his house.'" The word μίσσας is here clearly taken from the Latin, just as "Palatium" is. We are ashamed to linger so long over such a question, but unhappily the class of people who think that any word can be derived from any other word a little like it is not yet extinct.

The word "Missa," then, is of purely Latin origin and comes from "mittere," to send. St. Thomas (III. lxxxiii. 4, ad 9)[1] suggests among other explanations that "Missa" may mean prayers sent to God; and a similar explanation—viz. that "Missa" means the sending or offering up of the sacrifice to God—has been defended with great learning in recent times by a professor at Würzburg, the late Hermann Müller, in a treatise on "Missa: the Origin and Meaning of the Name" ("Missa, Ursprung und Bedeutung der Benennung," Wertheim, 1873). This writer proves that "mittere" is sometimes used by classical writers in connection with "inferiæ," the sacrifices of the dead. But this is not enough to explain why the Church adopted an obscure and scarcely intelligible word for "sacrifice," when plain and familiar terms, "sacrificium," "oblatio," &c., were at hand. Moreover, the history of the word is adverse to any theory which connects it with the notion of sacrifice. We may then dismiss this account also and give the accepted explanation.

"Missa" is only another form of "missio," "dismissal." A good instance of a similar form is supplied by "repulsa" (= "repulsio") in the line of Horace, "Virtus repulsæ nescia sordidæ;" and many more examples present themselves from the Latin of a later period—"ascensa" for "ascensio," "collecta" for "collectio," "confessa" for "confessio," and last of all "remissa" for "remissio," &c. About the year 500 Avitus of Vienne, writing to the Burgundian king Gundobald (Ep. 1, Migne, lix. p. 186), who wished for an explanation of the words "non missum facitis" in the old Latin version of Marc. vii. 11, 12, says that in churches and law-courts "Missa fieri pronuntiatur, cum populus ab observatione dimittitur" ("dismissal is announced when the people are let free from [further] attendance)." This derivation of "Missa" from "mittere" was clear to St. Isidore of Seville ("Etymolog." vi. 19). Now, in the liturgy there were two solemn dismissals—first, of the catechumens after the Gospel and Sermon; next, of the faithful at the end of the service. The word for dismissal then came to denote the service from which the persons in question were dismissed. The first authority for this use of Missa for the liturgy, putting aside a spurious letter of Pius I., is St. Ambrose (Ep. 20, 4.) He uses the words "Missam facere" More than two hundred years later St. Gregory of Tours uses the modern phrase, "Missam dicere." And it must be remembered that, so far from the word Missa having any necessary connection at the first with the Eucharist, it was employed, not only, as we have already seen in law-courts, but also for church services which had nothing to do with the Eucharist. Matins, as Sirmond in his "Notes on St. Avitus," (Ep. 1) shows, were called "Missæ matutinæ," Vespers "Missæ vespertinæ." "Missa" also occurs in a canon of the ninth century in the sense of festival (Hefele, "Concil." iv. p. 256 of the second edition).

II. Customs and Regulations concerning Mass.—Some of these are given in separate articles—e.g. under ALTAR, VESTMENTS, COMMUNION. Others may be mentioned here.

[1] Müller (p. 87) quotes Peter of Clugny (lib. ii. Mirac. 28): "Sacrificium offerimus, quod et usu jam veteri tracto nomine, quia Deo mittitur, Missam vocamus."

(a) The Frequency of Celebration.— In early times the bishop and priests celebrated together. This custom seems to have continued in Rome long after it had ceased elsewhere, being mentioned by Amalarius of Metz in the ninth century, and later still by Innocent III. It has not yet entirely died out among us, for at the Mass of Ordination the newly-ordained priests say Mass jointly with the bishop, though they do not partake of the same Host or of the Precious Blood. In churches outside the city priests celebrated independently; on the other hand, the priests of the Roman tituli, practically equivalent to urban parishes, used the Host consecrated and sent to them by the Pope.

Ordinarily speaking, then (an exception will be noted presently), there was but one Mass each day in the same church, and this is still the custom of the Greeks and Orientals, unless where, as in the case of Uniates, they have been influenced by Western practice. Nor was Mass said everywhere on all days of the week. It may perhaps be inferred from Acts ii. 42, 46, that the Apostles celebrated the Agape ending with the Eucharist daily. Justin, however ("Apol." i. 67), only speaks of the Eucharistic celebration on Sunday. St. Augustine (Ep. 54, "Ad Januar.") informs us that in some places there was Mass daily, in others only on Sundays, in others on Saturdays and Sundays. Mass was said daily in Africa (Cyprian, Ep. lviii.), in Rome and Spain (Hieron. Ep. lxxi. "Ad Lucin."), at Milan (Le Brun quotes Ambrose, lib. ii. ep. 14. "Ad Marc."), at Antioch and Constantinople (Chrys. "In Ephes." Hom. iii. d.[1]) But at Cæsarea St. Basil tells us Mass was said only on Sundays, Fridays, and Saturdays, and the feasts of the Martyrs. Of course, when we speak of Mass every day, we except Good Friday and Holy Saturday in the Roman Church, all the days of Lent except Saturdays and Sundays in the Church of Constantinople.

On many occasions Mass was reiterated by the same celebrant where now one Mass would be said and a commemoration made or more than one Mass said by different celebrants. We have spoken of this custom in the article on CHRISTMAS DAY, and need not dwell on it longer here. Apart from this, a twofold spirit prevailed in the middle ages. Some priests said several Masses daily out of devotion. "Priests were allowed to celebrate," says Meratus (Pars I. in Rubr. Gener.), "several times a day, as often as they thought good, so that one would say Mass twice, another three times, another as often as he pleased on the same day, believing that God was inclined to mercy as often as Christ's Passion was brought to mind:" and he quotes Walafrid Strabo, "De Rebus Eccles." cap. 25, who relates that Pope Leo III. sometimes celebrated nine times in one day. Pope Alexander II. forbade any priest to say Mass more than once in the day, and his enactment is incorporated in the "Decretum" of Gratian. The Pope, however, mentions, and apparently without disapproval, the habit of saying two Masses daily, "one of the day, another for the dead." St. Anselm and St. Albert are said by Meratus to have done so. Mr. Maskell ("Ancient Liturgy of the Church of England," p. 228) collects many English canons prohibiting the repetition of Mass on the same day by the same priest. Thus a Provincial Constitution of Archbishop Langton prohibits anyone from celebrating more than once a day except on Christmas and Easter Sunday, and on occasion of a funeral in the church; and one of the last injunctions published in England before the change of religion was, that "no priest say two Masses in one day, except Christmas Day, without express licence."

Devotion led some holy persons at the same period in quite an opposite direction. St. Thomas of Canterbury did not celebrate daily; and a contemporary, noting this, says the practice of priests on this point varied, that those who celebrated often were to be commended for the purity of their lives; those who acted like St. Thomas, for their humility (Fleury, "H. E." livr. lxx. § 64). Mass was said rarely among the Carthusians, and St. Francis of Assisi, in his "Testament," wished one priest only to celebrate each day in his convents. The other priests were to content themselves with hearing Mass (Fleury, livr. lxxix. 25).

By the present law priests are strictly prohibited from saying Mass more than once on any day except Christmas Day. Bishops, however, have often leave to celebrate, or allow their priests to celebrate, twice on a Sunday or holiday of obligation, if a large number of people would otherwise be unable to hear Mass; and most [1] Tillemont has shown that these homilies were delivered there, and Montfaucon is of the same opinion.

English priests hold faculties, renewed at intervals, to this effect. The ablutions must not be taken at the former Mass. The present Pope, moved by the necessity of the case, has permitted bishops in Mexico to have three Masses celebrated by one priest on the same day. No law requires a priest, as such, to celebrate daily, and it is commonly held that he is not bound to do so except on the more solemn feasts (St. Liguori, "Theol. Moral." lib. vi. § 313). A parish priest must say Mass whenever at least the people are bound to hear it. Modern saints—e.g. St. Ignatius and St. Francis of Sales—strongly encourage priests to celebrate daily, and this is now the common, though by no means the universal, custom.

(β) The hour of Mass was subject to no special regulation down to the middle of the fifth century, though it was usually said early in the morning. Le Brun thinks that the custom of saying Mass at tierce (i.e. at 9 A.M.) began with the monks. It is mentioned by Cassian, Sidonius Apollinaris, a Council of Orleans in 511, and St. Gregory of Tours. On the stations—i.e. Wednesday and Friday, and in Rome on Saturday (all usually fasting days) it was said at sext—i.e. noon; on other fasting days after none—i.e. three o'clock; at ordinations the fast was continued through Friday or Saturday till the early morning of the day following, when the Mass was said. (See Le Brun, tom iii. diss. i. art. 9.) According to the present law Mass must not be said before dawn or later than midday, and it is a serious matter notably to trangress these limits except in virtue of Apostolic indult. The rule which requires the priest to have said Matins and Lauds previously is not so strict. There are special rules on the relations of Office and Conventual Mass, Mass of Requiem, &c., in the rubrics of the Missal.

(γ) The Application of Mass.—The Mass is a sacrifice of adoration, of praise and thanksgiving; it is also a sacrifice of propitiation for sin, and a means of obtaining all graces and blessings from God. In the Canon of the Roman Mass and all other liturgies the sacrifice is always offered specially for certain persons —e.g. for those present in the church, for those who contributed the bread and wine for the consecration, &c. Theologians, following Scotus, recognise a threefold fruit of the sacrifice. There is the general fruit, in which all the faithful participate, the more special fruit, which belongs to those for whom the priest specially offers the sacrifice, and the most special fruit, proper to the celebrant himself. The Canon of the Mass recognises this distinction, and so bears witness to its antiquity. The celebrant offers "for thy holy Catholic Church"; again he speaks of those "on whose account we offer to Thee, or who offer to Thee, this sacrifice of praise"; he also calls the Mass "the oblation of our ministry," and in an earlier part of the liturgy offers the Host "for my numberless sins and offences and negligences." Theologians dispute how far and in what way the effect of the oblation is limited, very many denying that there is any such limit except in the capacity of those for whom the offering is made, so that, e.g., Mass said for a hundred persons would profit each as much as if said for one only. Practically, however, a priest has to act on the opinion that the effect of the sacrifice is limited by the ordination of Christ, or in some other manner over and above the limitation already mentioned. Here, then, it suffices to say that in "saying Mass" for a person or persons a priest applies in their interest the more special fruit of the sacrifice. If under an obligation of making this application, he must not extend it to others save with the implied condition that he does not intend to interfere with the rights of those who have the first claim. But of course he always offers generally for the whole Church, and reserves the special fruit of the Mass to himself. The following regulations exist with regard to the application.

All bishops and priests with cure of souls are bound to say Mass for their people on Sundays and holidays of obligation. If the holiday of obligation has become a day of devotion, the duty of saying Mass for the flock continues. Missionary priests, such as those in the United States, are mere delegates of the bishop without cure of souls in the strict sense. They are not therefore bound to offer the sacrifice on these days for the people in their district, though charity makes it fit that they should do so. In all cathedrals and collegiate churches the Conventual Mass (see below) must be said daily for benefactors, and chaplains, &c., are bound to say Mass daily for the founder of the chaplaincy or benefice, unless it appear from the terms of the foundation that this was not intended. Lastly, a strict obligation of saying Mass for the donor's intention is incurred by priests who accept an alms on that condition. This alms or stipend is meant for the celebrant's support, and corresponds to the offerings of bread and wine made by the faithful in old days. The bishop fixes the amount of this stipend or tax, as it is called, and the priest must not ask, though he may accept, more. If he has leave to duplicate or say two Masses he must receive alms for one only, and if he asks another priest to say the Mass in his stead, he must hand over the whole alms. Many rules have been made, particularly of late, to prevent any appearance of traffic or avarice in this matter. Moreover, Benedict XIV. points out that the rich have no unfair advantage over the poor because of their greater power to have Masses said for them. All souls are God's, and He can give the poor a special share in the general prayers of the Church, and supply their wants in a thousand ways. Riches and poverty are each, if rightly used, the means of salvation.

III. Names for different kinds of Masses.—(α) High Mass, in Latin Missa solemnis, is Mass with incense, music, the assistance of deacon and sub-deacon, &c. It is usually sung, when there is a sufficient number of clergy, at least on Sundays and great feasts. Meratus quotes the term Missa alta from Rymer's "Fœdera," and the term, Mr. Maskell says, seems to have been chiefly in use in England. But the fact that in Dutch and Flemish exactly the same term—viz. Hoogmis, is used, while the Germans have Hochamt, surely proves that Missa alta must have been familar in other countries. "Missa dominica" and "aurea" were mediæval names for Masses of special solemnity. Under solemn Masses, Meratus classes Pontifical Masses, celebrated by the bishop with his insignia, and Papal Masses, celebrated by the Pope on certain great feasts with special rites. The Pontifical Mass (the thing, not the name) is mentioned in a Roman Ordo supposed to belong to the former part of the eighth century. Meratus refers to a treatise on Papal Masses by Marcellus, archbishop of Corcyra—"Rituum ecclesiasticorum sive S. Cærimoniarum S. Romanæ Ecclesiæ."

(β) Low Mass: Missa bassa in French and English documents; Basse Messe; Missa plana in the "Cærimoniale Episc." Mass said without music, the priest at least saying, and not singing, the Mass throughout.

(γ) Missa cantata; also called media. A Mass sung, but without deacon and sub-deacon and the ceremonies proper to High Mass. In some American dioceses the use of incense is permitted at such Masses.

(δ) Missa publica (sometimes communis); a Mass to which the faithful of either sex are admitted. Hence Gregory the Great prohibited such Masses in monasteries. From the sixth century at least, nine o'clock was the time fixed for such Masses. The decree on this point attributed to Telesphorus in the second century is of course a forgery.

(ε) Missa privata (also secreta, familiaris, peculiaris) is difficult of definition. Meratus gives one explanation which identifies it with Low Mass; another according to which it is any Mass at which the priest alone communicates. It would be convenient if we could use this word or had another word to describe Mass which the priest says chiefly for his own devotion or that of his friends, and not to satisfy the wants of a parish, college, &c. In all private Masses the priest must have at least a server to represent the body of the faithful. Solitary Masses were once celebrated by indulgence or privilege in monasteries. They are now strictly forbidden.

(ζ) Missa parochialis; the "Assembly of the faithful in which they offer public prayers and sacrifice by the ministry of their pastor, and learn from him what they should do and not do for their own salvation and the edification of their neighbours." The Council of Trent directs bishops to warn the faithful that they should hear Mass in their parish churches at least on Sundays and greater festivals.

(η) Capitular Mass is the High Mass on Sundays or festivals in collegiate churches.

(θ) Conventual Mass is that which "the rectors of cathedral and collegiate churches are bound to have celebrated every day solemnly and with music after tierce." It must, as we have already seen, be applied for benefactors. It is also known among regulars as Missa canonica, tertiæ, publica, communis, major.

(ι) Votive Masses are those which do not correspond with the office of the day, but are said by the choice (votum) of the priest. On all days except Sundays, feasts of double and more than double rank, and certain other days specially excepted, a priest may say a Votive Mass of the Trinity, the Angels, St. Peter and St. Paul, the Holy Ghost, for the dead, &c. &c., instead of that assigned for the day.

(κ) Missa adventitia or manualis is a Mass said for the intention of a person who gives an alms; and is opposed to a Missa legata, said for a special intention in consequence of a legacy or foundation. Thus Missa adventitia or manualis is a "chance" Mass—one which "comes to hand."

(λ) The Missa præsanctificatorum is really not a Mass at all. Some account of it will be found under HOLY WEEK and LENT.[1] Still more remote from the true idea of Mass is the Missa sicca, a celebration without either consecration or communion, very common in the middle ages in the presence of the sick, at sea, and on other occasions when a true Mass could not be said. St. Louis of France used habitually to have this Missa sicca said at sea. Sometimes it was celebrated with all the ceremonies of High Mass. It is now fallen out of use, except that persons learning the ceremonies of Mass sometimes say a Missa sicca before ordination. A real Mass was sometimes said at sea. Gavantus (Pars I. tit. xx. f.) disapproves the practice, because of the danger that the chalice may be overturned. Benedict XIV. ("De Missa," lib. iii. cap. 6, § 11) holds that Mass cannot be said at sea, even if there seems to be no danger of irreverence, without an Apostolic indult.

MASTER. [See DEGREES.]

MASTER OF THE SACRED PALACE (magister sacri palatii). This is a dignity of the Roman Curia [CURIA ROMANA], and is said to have been first conferred on St. Dominic, who, observing that the attendants of cardinals, while their masters were transacting business with the Pope, for want of employment used to indulge in idle and frivolous pastimes, obtained the permission of Honorius III. to form them into a class and explain the Bible to them. Originating thus, the office gradually became one of greater importance, until it included the right of nominating the preachers before the Pope on certain great festivals, that of acting as consultor to several congregations, that of conferring the degree of doctor in theology and philosophy, with other privileges, as well as the duty of examining and licensing all books published in Rome.

MATRICULA (dim. of matrix, a roll or register). The roll containing the names of the clergy permanently attached to a cathedral, or a collegiate, or a parish church; also, the list of the names of the students regularly admitted into any university.

MATRICULATION (matricula). The act of entering the name of a student upon the matricula or roll of a university, which in ordinary cases is not done till the candidate for admission has proved his competency by passing an examination in certain prescribed subjects.

MAURISTS. The famous congregation of St. Maur, an offshoot of the Benedictine order [BENEDICTINES], took its name in honour of the favourite disciple of St. Benedict so called, who extended the order greatly in France in the sixth century, and founded the Abbey of Glanfeuil, called after him St. Maur-sur-Loire. Hence, in these northern countries, the Benedictine rule was regarded as having him for its author almost equally with St. Benedict himself; cf. Chaucer's—

"The reule of seynt Maure or of seint Beneyt.
(Prol. C. T.)

In the sixteenth century, much relaxation having crept into the monastic observance of Benedictine houses in the South of Europe, various enterprises of reform were set on foot by monks in whom the ancient fervour still glowed. There was established in Lorraine, by Dom Didier de la Cour, the austere congregation of St. Vanne. Many convents in France desired to embrace this reform, and it was solemnly adopted at the monastery of St. Augustine at Limoges in 1613. Here and at other French houses the congregation of St. Vanne planted monks who might teach their principles and procedure. But, Lorraine being at that time politically separate from France, it was thought expedient that a new congregation should be erected for the latter. This being effected in 161°, the new institute, of which Dom Bénard was the chief propagator, took the name of St. Maur; and being supported by Card. de Retz, and afterwards by Richelieu, rapidly extended itself among the Benedictine convents in France. In and near Paris they eventually had three great houses, the Blancs Manteaux, St. Germain des Prés, and St. Denis. The rule was at first observed in its full strictness in the houses which adhered to the congregation; and in union with this religious movement an enthusiasm for literature and learning developed itself, which modified all the arrangements adopted. A general, appointed for life, governed the whole institute, which, at the time when Hélyot wrote (about 1720), comprised one hundred and eighty abbeys and priories, grouped in six provinces. In every province there were one or two noviciates; on leaving which, the young novice was admitted to profession in some monastery, and trained in piety and ecclesiastical knowledge during two years. After that he was engaged for five years in the study of philosophy and theology, and finally for one year, called the "year of recollection," in the exercises and studies designed to fit him for receiving the priesthood at the end of it. If we may judge by the fruits, the preparation must have been exceedingly well fitted to train men for successfully engaging in the pursuits of literature and criticism. Those "Benedictine editions" of the Fathers, which scholars know so well and value so highly, all came from members of the congregation of St. Maur. Among their colossal labours may be mentioned "Gallia Christiana," the "History of French Literature," the "Recueil" of the historians of France, Mabillon's "Annals of the Benedictine Order," and "Lives of Benedictine Saints," Tassin's literary history of the congregation, Martène's "Amplissima Collectio," &c., &c. The majority of their own countrymen appear to be in haste to forget them; but the rest of the world will not soon forget the gentle, pious, genial, indefatigable Mabillon, the Venerable Bede of these later times; nor Edmond Martène, that model of exact and thorough research; nor Montfaucon, whose vast erudition illustrated by the engraver's art the whole field of Græco-Roman antiquity and founded the science of archæology; nor Ruinart, the historian of the Martyrs; not to speak of Rivet, Bouquet, Lami, Labat, Luc d'Achery, Le Nourri, Ménard, Martianay, and many more, whose names all suggest priceless services rendered in this or that field to the cause of secular and sacred learning.

The later history of the congregation, from the time of Hélyot to their suppression in 1792, is more chequered. Jansenism insinuated itself into some of the convents; and in the controversy which grew out of the publication of the Constitution "Unigenitus" (1713), although the general and the superiors remained loyal to the Holy See, many of the monks joined the party of opposition. After some time, relaxations of the rule, such as the abandonment of the old habit, modification of the prohibitions respecting food, and the curtailment of the midnight office, were demanded in many convents, and to a great extent conceded. The pseudo-philosophic spirit that was abroad infected even a congregation which had commenced as an austere reform not two centuries before; and if Hélyot's continuator may be trusted, a Freemasons' lodge was established at Glanfeuil in 1775, and the prior of the Maurist monastery there became the venerable of the lodge. Nevertheless, the congregation, though it no longer produced minds of the calibre of those which adorned it at the beginning of the century, continued to be devoted to learning and literature. The "Academy of Saumur," established in the abbey of that town, achieved a wide reputation. In education also their colleges and schools were most successful, and attracted, particularly after the suppression of the Jesuits, pupils of the best blood of France; among these colleges were Sorèze in Burgundy—reopened in our times by Lacordaire—Tiron, Pont Levoy, St. Germer, and Auxerre. After 1780 the dissensions which had long troubled the peace of the congregation grew more violent, and would probably have led to its dissolution even if the Revolution had not occurred, and turned them out of their monasteries. (Hélyot, continued by Badiche.)

MAY. In recent times, a custom has arisen of addressing public prayer to the Blessed Virgin, decking her altar with flowers, singing hymns in her honour, &c., daily during the month of May. The prayers used are from books of popular devotion, for the Church does not recognise this "Month of May" by any change in the Mass or Office. However, Pius VII. in a brief, March 21, 1815, granted an indulgence of 300 days daily to those who practise this devotion at home or in church, and a plenary indulgence any one day in the month on condition of confession, communion, and prayer for the intention of the Pope. It is somewhat difficult to ascertain where or when the celebration of the month of May was introduced among us.

MECHITARISTS. This congregation, which exists for the purpose of instructing and improving the scattered members of the Armenian nation, was founded by an Armenian named Mechitar, who was born in 1676 at Siwas, the ancient Sebastia, a town near the source of the Halys, on the borders of Pontus and Cappadocia. His family appears to have belonged to the section of the Armenian nation which has always adhered to the Catholic Church. From the time when he was ordained priest, in 1699, the desire of labouring for the temporal and eternal welfare of his countrymen possessed itself of his whole nature. He went to Constantinople, and formed an association there to carry out his design; but being opposed by some of the schismatic Armenians, he transferred his operations to Modon in the Morea, which at that time belonged to the Republic of Venice. Here he and his companions worked on for fourteen years; but in 1715, war having broken out between the Porte and the Republic, Modon was taken by the Turks, and Mechitar's convent was broken up. He then retired to Venice, and obtained from the Government the island of San Lazzaro, which lies in the lagune between the Lido and the city. Here he founded that Armenian convent which travellers from foreign lands never fail to visit and unanimously and cordially admire. Literary labours, which have for their object to perfect and regularise the Armenian language, and to translate into it the more important works of the various European literatures, have always been, and are still, zealously prosecuted here by these intelligent Orientals. Branches from the mother house have been founded at Vienna and Trieste, and at several places in Hungary. The Allgemeine Zeitung (December 17, 1850), thus writes of the Mechitarists: "When one takes a near view of their labours at Vienna and Venice, one is amazed at the powerful influence which the literary activity of these learned monks exerts on the Armenian nation scattered throughout the East. The reviews, the books, the numerous translations of works on history, geography, philology, natural science, and voyages and travels, which are printed in the Mechitarist presses of Vienna and Venice, are carried far beyond Persia to the banks of the Indus and the Ganges, and have everywhere called forth among the Armenians the desire of knowledge and a taste for reading, and set on foot a literary movement which was before entirely dormant in a people till lately essentially and exclusively commercial." (Art. by Gams in Wetzer and Welte.)

MEDIATOR (μεσίτης, "sequester Dei et hominum Christus" in Tertull. "Adv. Prax." 27). St. Paul (1 Tim. ii. 5) speaks of Christ as the "one mediator between God and man," and it is plain that he vindicates this office as one proper to Christ alone, for the passage runs: "There is one God, one mediator also between God and men, a man Christ Jesus, who gave Himself also a ransom for all," &c. Christ is the one mediator, because He alone could draw near to God in virtue of merits which were his own, and independently of the merits of any beside Himself. He alone could offer a propitiation infinite in value for the sin of man and obtain in return all the gifts of salvation. This He did as man, not however as mere man, but as man who was also God, so that He was able to make full and perfect atonement. Further, St. Thomas points out (iii. 26, 2) that a mediator, from the very fact that He comes between, must be distant from each extreme. Now "Christ as man is far from God (distat a Deo) in nature and from men in the dignity of grace and glory." Again, a mediator's office is to join the two extremes, and this Christ does "by setting before men the commandments and gifts of God, by making satisfaction to God for them and by interceding for them. Christ, therefore, as man is most truly called mediator."

The Arian error on this point lay in their belief that the Word in his superhuman nature came between God and creatures. Creatures "could not bear the hand of God," and "a mediator became necessary that things generated might come to be." St. Athanasius ("Defens. Fid. Nic." cap. iii. § 8) shows the illogical character of the error, for if the Son is a creature, then on the Arian theory another mediator must have been required to create Him; if not a creature, He is true God.

The Protestant mistake consists in interpreting St. Paul's words as if they excluded the mediation of the saints. Assuredly there is only one mediator of redemption, and the saints, says Estius (ad loc.), are "mediators in an imperfect way—i.e. they intercede for us with God, just as all persons do who in prayer commend our salvation to God." "Whoever beseeches God for others constitutes himself after a manner a medium and an intercessor between them and God, though he does this leaning not on his own merits, but on another's—viz. Christ's. For whatever the saints seek for us in prayer, they only seek through Christ." In this imperfect sense St. Paul calls Moses a "mediator" (Galatians iii. 19, 20). This is his common title in Jewish writers and his mediatorial office clearly appears, e.g., Deut. v 2, 5—"I stood between the Lord and you;" and the doctrine of angelic mediation is asserted in a beautiful passage of Elihu's speech (Job xxxiii. 23)

> If there be for him an angel to mediate,
> One of a thousand,
> To declare to man what is right for him,
> Then He (God) is gracious to him and says:
> "Loose him from going down to the pit;
> I have found a ransom."

There can be no doubt about the meaning of the word italicised (מְלִיץ). "An angel interceding with God on behalf of men, a μεσίτης," is Gesenius' commentary. So Delitzsch, "Mittler," "mediator" (he, however, understands the "angel of the covenant"). The Targum rendering is Paraclete, advocate (פְּרַקְלִיטָא). The LXX entirely misses the sense; the Vulgate has "loquens pro eo."

We may remark by the way that the doctrine of angelic mediation prominent in the book of Job has not, so far as we know, received due attention from Catholics; observe the words in the first speech of Eliphaz (v. 1).

> Call. Is there one to answer thee?
> To which of the holy ones (i.e. angels) wilt thou turn?

On which passage an eminent Protestant scholar comments thus: "They (angels) appear as intercessors for men with God, bringing men's needs before Him, and mediating in their behalf. This work is easily connected with their general office of labouring for the good of men, especially of the pious; still it is here for the first time ascribed to them." (Dillmann, on Job, p. 44.

MEDITATION AND MENTAL PRAYER. Meditation in its narrower and technical sense may be defined as the application of the three powers of the soul to prayer—the memory proposing a religious or moral truth, the understanding considering this truth in its application to the individual who meditates, while the will forms practical resolutions and desires grace to keep them. It is distinguished from vocal prayer, because in meditation no words are used, and from the higher forms of mental prayer (e.g. affective prayer, contemplation, &c.), because in these there is no methodical use of the reason. Mental prayer of some kind must be as old as the human race, but it was St. Ignatius of Loyola who reduced the rules of meditation to system, and contributed to the spread of meditation at a regular hour and for a fixed space of time. Thus St. Benedict supposes that some of his monks will pray after the vocal prayers of the office with tears and application of heart (Rule, c. 25, quoted by Fleury, "H. E." xxxii. 15), and an incident in his life (c. 4, Fleury, loc. cit.) shows that the religious used to pray in private after the chanting of the psalms. So St. Columban admonishes his religious on the duty of private prayer and the continual application of the mind to God. ("Pœnit." n. 19; Fleury, xxxv. 10).

Modern ascetical writers are much more precise, and in all communities of men and women, in all seminaries, &c., a time is set apart daily for mental prayer, which is imposed by rule. The practice of mental prayer is recommended to secular priests, and also to lay persons if they have some education and desire to lead a perfect life. The method given by St. Ignatius in his exercise is that generally recommended and used, at least till the person who meditates forms a method of his own. The best exposition of it is by Father Roothaan, General of the Society, "De Ratione Meditandi" (Romæ, 1871). The Ignatian method has been simplified by St. Liguori, and the Sulpicians have a method of their own, propounded by M. Olier; another is given by the Carmelite John of Jesus-Mary. Books of meditation without number have appeared during the last three centuries, and we cannot pretend to mention even the principal names. Da Ponte, Avancini, Crasset, Lancicius, Challoner, Chaignon are those which most readily occur to us.

Benedict XIV., in his work on Beatification, naturally rebukes the rashness of the Jesuit Hurtado, who maintained that the daily and formal practice of mental prayer was necessary for salvation. It is, however, a great and powerful help to self-improvement and advance in virtue.

After meditation comes affective prayer, in which the soul goes straight to God by affection of the will without need of formal discourse or reasoning. Next come higher degrees of prayer, which the experience of the saints proves to be most real, but which are far removed from ordinary experience. Contemplation, we are told, is either natural or infused in an extraordinary manner by God, and in the latter the soul is said to be passive—i.e. to be in some special sense moved by God. It is important to notice that in the passive prayer "free will exercises itself in the whole of its extent." Catholic mystics insist on this, and wholly reject the false notions of absorption in the Deity, loss of personality, &c. Bossuet proves this at length from St. Teresa, St. John of the Cross, &c. (See his "Instructions sur les Etats d'Oraison," traité 1, livr. vii. n. 13. This work makes the whole matter comprehensible, so far as it can be comprehended, and is full of learning).

MELCHITES. The word, which comes from the Semitic word (Heb. מֶלֶךְ, Syr. ܡܠܟܐ, Chald. מַלְכָּא, the Arabic is the same) for king, means royalists. When multitudes of Christians in the East and especially in Egypt fell away from the Church after the Council of Chalcedon, and clung to the Monophysite creed, the Church of Constantinople and the Byzantine Court remained orthodox, and the Emperors exerted their influence on the Catholic side. Hence the name of Melchites was given to those Christians in the patriarchates of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, who held to the definition of Chalcedon.[1] They were of course closely connected with the patriarchate of Constantinople, they adopted its liturgy, and when Constantinople was severed by schism from the Catholic Church, they lapsed also. In fact, both from a dogmatic and liturgical point of view, the Melchites are simply Greeks living in Egypt and Syria. And just as Jacobites, Copts, or Nestorians, when they return to the Church, retain their ancient rites, so the Melchites who have recovered Catholic unity retain the liturgies of St. Chrysostom and Basil, and the canon law to which they have been accustomed. Silbernagl, writing in 1865, reckons the number of Catholic Melchites at about 35,000.

The Melchite or Greek Catholic Church of Antioch dates from 1686,[1] when the Greek Patriarch Athanasius IV. of Antioch submitted to the Pope. From Antioch the Catholic Melchites spread to the patriarchates of Alexandria and Jerusalem.

The Patriarch of Antioch is chosen by the bishops of the patriarchate. The election, however, must be examined and approved by Propaganda and confirmed by the Pope. If the election is pronounced invalid, the Pope nominates, and the Pope may appoint, if necessary, a coadjutor with right of succession. The Patriarch, who is subject to Propaganda, lives at Ain Teraz, on the Lebanon, in the seminary for priests. The bishops are elected by the clergy of the diocese, the right of confirmation and consecration resting with the Patriarch. The bishops may be taken from the secular clergy, if unmarried. The Patriarch administers his own diocese of Damascus through a vicar. Subject to the Patriarch are the Archbishops of Aleppo, Diarbekir, Beyrouth, Bosra, and the Bishops of Homs or Emesa, Baalbek, Tripolis, Zahleh and Ferzul. The secular priests, who are educated at a seminary on Mount Lebanon, may continue to live as married men if married before receiving holy orders.

A Greek Patriarch of Alexandria made his submission and received the pallium from Clement XI. in 1713, but he had no Catholic successors, and the Alexandrian patriarchate is administered by the vicar of the Patriarch of Antioch. This vicar is a bishop in partibus and lives at Cairo. There are two Greek Catholic churches at Cairo, one at Rosetta, a hospice at Damietta. Another bishop in partibus, also a vicar of the Patriarch of Antioch, administers the Patriarchate of Jerusalem. Sur (Tyre) and Saida (Sidon) are archbishoprics, Jean d'Acre a bishopric.

The Melchite religious follow the rule of St. Basil, with modifications. The monks are divided into two congregations. The congregation of St. Salvator was founded in 1715, and is ruled by an abbot-general, who lives at Deir-el-Mukhallis, a few miles north-east of Sidon. There are 500 monks, eight monasteries, and twenty-one hospitia. This congregation has a house at Rome—Sta. Maria in Carinis. Most of the parishes are supplied by these monks. The other congregation, of St. John Baptist ("Mar Johanna-el-Shuweir"), erected early in the eighteenth century, has also a hospice at Rome—Sta. Maria in Dominica, detta la Navicella. This congregation, which is recruited from Aleppo and Lebanon, was subdivided, by authority of Gregory XVI. in 1832, into the congregation of Aleppo, with four monasteries and two hospices, and that of the Baladites, with the same number of monasteries and hospices, besides the hospice at Rome. At this last, however, the procurators of both congregations reside.

There are three convents of nuns, one belonging to each of the three congregations just enumerated. (Silbernagl, "Kirchen des Orients.")

MELETIAN SCHISM. The name is equivocally applied to two entirely different transactions.

I. Schism of Meletius of Egypt.—An admirable article by Hefele [1] throws light on this obscure and complicated affair, in which the principal actor figures to disadvantage in the writings of one saint, and to advantage in those of another. Meletius was bishop of Lycopolis in the Thebaid. At the time of the persecution of Diocletian, when many of the Egyptian bishops were in prison, and Peter, the Patriarch of Alexandria, absent from his see (perhaps he was in hiding), Meletius took upon himself to ordain priests in dioceses other than his own—a thing clearly against the canons—and, going to Alexandria, associated himself with Arius, then a layman, and ordained priests and episcopal visitors on his own authority, without reference to the absent patriarch. This conduct naturally occasioned a schism, which, beginning about 304, was not finally extinguished till the middle of the fifth century. It is not known in what year Meletius died. St. Athanasius mentions Meletius and the Meletians in several places of his writings, and says that the former sacrificed to idols during the persecution. Hefele thinks that with regard to this Athanasius must have been misled by a false report, since it is incredible that St. Epiphanius should have spoken in terms of commendation of Meletius if he had known him to have consented to this act of weakness. The Meletian schismatics joined the Arians in all their persecution of Athanasius. On the other hand, St. Epiphanius, in his work on Heresies, tells the story of the schism from a quite different point of view. It arose, according to him, out of a difference of opinion between the Patriarch Peter and Meletius, on the subject of the "lapsi," the former taking a lax view, and being willing to consent to their replacement in all their functions on terms by which the zealous piety of Meletius was scandalised. Hefele thinks it probable that this version of the schism was given to St. Epiphanius in his youth by some Meletian priests of Eleutheropolis, where Meletius is stated to have ordained clergy. The Council of Nicæa (325) took the matter in hand, and endeavoured, by means of a synodal letter, to dispose of it; but the cunning of the Meletians enabled them to elude, to a great extent, the conditions which it was sought to impose upon them.

MEMENTO. [See DIPTYCHS.]

MEMORIA. (1) A shrine or reliquary containing relics of some martyr or martyrs, which in primitive times it was customary to carry in procession. St. Augustine, in the twenty-second book of the "De Civitate Dei" (ch. 8), speaks of the "Memory" of the "Twenty Martyrs" at Hippo, and mentions several instances of "Memories" of the protomartyr St. Stephen, belonging to different churches, being carried in procession by the respective bishops, and becoming the occasion of miraculous cures. "Lucillus, bishop of Sinita," he says, "while carrying this holy burden (pia sarcina) was cured of an infirmity under which he had long laboured."

Abuses having arisen through the eagerness to obtain relics, a law of Theodosius ("Cod. Theod." ix. 17, 7) ordered that none should buy or dismember the bodies of martyrs, or remove them from place to place.[1] This law cannot have been in force in Africa at the time when St. Augustine wrote as above.

(2) A church or chapel built in memory of a martyr or confessor, and often over his tomb. Such a chapel usually, if not always, contained relics of the martyr.

MENOLOGY (Gr. μήν). A monthly register. By this name the Greeks designated the calendars inscribed with the names, primarily of martyrs, but afterwards of confessors also, which in the Latin Church were called Martyrologies. (See MARTYROLOGY.)

MENTAL RESERVATION or restriction (restrictio mentalis) occurs where a person uses words in a sense other than that which is obvious and which he knows they are likely to convey. Thus, a man who tells a beggar that he has no money in his pocket, meaning that he has no money to give the beggar, uses mental reservation. He inserts mentally a qualification or restriction which is not expressed.

If the restriction is of such a nature that it cannot be perceived by the hearer, then the person who uses it certainly sins. So all Catholics are bound to hold. (See Prop. 26, 27, 28, among those condemned by Innocent XI.)

On the other hand, almost all theologians hold that it is sometimes lawful to use a mental reservation which may be, though very likely it will not be, understood from the circumstances. Thus, a priest may deny that he knows a crime which he has only learnt through sacramental confession. A man may deny a crime he has committed if interrogated and forced to answer by one who has no authority; or, again, according to St. Liguori, if asked to lend money, he may equivocate, and say "I wish I had it."

But it must be remembered that, as is allowed on all hands, just cause is needed to make equivocation lawful. A habit of equivocation is detestable to all good men, and the practice of perfect simplicity and straightforwardness is not only estimable and engaging, and virtuous, but it is also the wisest course.

Next, St. Liguori says plainly that all equivocation is sinful when a man is put on his oath by just authority; that it is utterly wicked for tradesmen to affirm on oath that their goods cost more than they really did, and then shelter themselves under equivocation; that no equivocation must be used in contracts, or generally in matters concerning the interests of others.

Further, many even of the strongest opponents of mental reservation would allow equivocation in extreme cases: e.g. few would say that it was unlawful for a man to equivocate if a burglar asked him where his money was, or how much he had; or if a murderer asked him where he could find his intended victim. It may be mentioned that St. Liguori makes some difficulty about letting a servant say his master is not at home, when this is not true in its obvious sense. Yet this practice is common in England. If we admit, as many Protestant authorities have done, that equivocation is in some cases allowable, it is hard to settle what these cases are. No doubt, equivocation is always an evil, though not always a sin, and the less of it there is the better. With regard to St. Liguori's judgment on particular cases, it is well to bear in mind that no Catholic is bound to follow him throughout, and Cardinal Newman has recorded his own dissent from St. Liguori's teaching on this matter. In some of his decisions on mental reservation there is high theological authority on the other side.

We may add that Catholic theologians justify the lawfulness of equivocation by an appeal to John vii. 8, where our Lord says, "I go not up to this feast" ("Tabernacles"). The argument cannot be pressed against Protestants, for the weight of documentary evidence favours another reading—"I go not up yet to this feast." (See St. Liguori, "Theol. Moral." lib. iv.: and Cardinal Newman, "History of my Religious Opinions.")

MERCY, SPIRITUAL AND CORPORAL WORKS OF. In the middle ages seven great works of mercy to the souls and bodies of our fellow-men were enumerated, and called the Spiritual and Corporal Works of Mercy. The classification constantly appears in works of art, and is retained in modern catechisms. The Seven Works of Corporal Mercy are, to feed the hungry, give drink to the thirsty, to clothe the naked, visit prisoners, visit the sick, harbour strangers, bury the dead; of Spiritual Mercy, to convert sinners, instruct the ignorant, counsel the doubtful, console the afflicted, bear wrongs patiently, forgive injuries, pray for the living and the dead. They are all comprised in two rude hexameters—

Visito, poto, cibo, redimo, tego, colligo, condo.
Consule, carpe, doce, solare, remitte, fer, ora.

MERIT, in its strict theological sense, is a quality which belongs to the moral actions of free and responsible agents and makes these actions worthy of reward. Merit implies a real proportion between the work done and the reward given. Thus, a man who labours well in the fields deserves, or merits, his day's wages from the master who hired him; while, on the other hand, a beggar who comes to receive a promised alms cannot be said to earn or merit it. To put it in another way, a man who merits can claim his reward as a matter of justice, but one who has been promised a reward out of all proportion to the work done may appeal to the fidelity and kindness, but not, strictly speaking, to the justice of the donor. In order to merit, a man must be free, since he cannot claim reward for a service which he has no power to withhold, and which, therefore, is not his to give; what he does must, obviously, be good: it must be done in the service of the person who is to confer the reward, and the latter must have agreed to accept the work done and to reward it, since nobody is bound to pay for work, however excellent, which he does not want. We have been speaking of merit in a sense strict and definite, but at the same time general—of merit as it may exist, e.g., between man and man; and so far, we suppose, there is no matter for dispute between Catholics and Protestants.

The controversy begins, however, when we pass from the nature of merit to a consideration of the cases in which it exists. Protestants admitted that man might merit reward from his brother man and that Christ merited eternal life for Himself and for all who believe in Him from the hand of God. But the Reformers denied that the good works of the just merited an eternal reward, and they were bound in consistency to do so, for they were committed to the theory that men were justified solely by the merits of Christ imputed to them or reckoned to their account, and they rejected the Catholic doctrine that God accepted sinners, because they were renewed within by the grace of Christ, that He counted them just and good because they really had become just and good, because He Himself had washed and cleansed them and reformed their nature more wonderfully than He had formed it at the first. Hence Luther and Melanchthon held that the best works of good men were actually sinful—nay, that but for God's mercy they were mortal sins. "Every work of the just man," Luther writes, "is damnable and a mortal sin, if it be judged by God's judgment." Melanchthon is just as decided. "Works which follow justification, although they proceed from the Spirit of God, who has taken possession of the heart of justified persons, yet because done in the flesh which remains unclean are themselves also unclean." "We have taught that we are justified by faith alone, that our works, that our strivings are nought but sin." Calvin, though his language is more moderate, maintains the same thesis in substance—viz. that the "good works of the faithful lack such perfect purity as can endure the sight of God, and are in a manner defiled.'[1] In diametrical and conscious opposition to this estimate, the Council of Trent (sess. vi. De Justif. canon 32) declares that a man if already justified, "through such good works as he does by the grace of God and merit of Christ whose living member he is, truly merits increase of grace, eternal life, and the actual attainment of eternal life, if he dies in grace." This doctrine is limited in several ways, and it will be better to state these modifications and append the grounds of the Tridentine doctrine as we proceed. In great measure, indeed, the statement suffices to justify the doctrine.

(1) The just have no claim for a reward apart from God's merciful promise. This is plain from the very nature of merit as we have already seen. Even from other men, we cannot in strict justice claim a reward for services done, unless they have expressly or by implication agreed to remunerate them. But besides this we cannot profit God by our service. He is all-wise and almighty. His bliss is complete in itself, and He has no need of us and of our works. Besides, our service is already due to God by other titles. A slave looks for no reward from his master, and any recompense he may receive comes to him from liberality and not from justice. Thus, men condemned to penal servitude, which is a kind of slavery, work hard, but they have no claim at law for wages. But no slave can belong to his master so absolutely as man to his Creator. Our existence is God's gift: his strength supports us at each instant; his we are, and Him we have to serve. There would have been no injustice had God called us to serve Him without reward, and our service at the best would be imperfect. Hence our Lord reminds us of the manner in which God might have dealt with us. A slave, He says, has to work in the fields, and when he comes home he has to prepare his master's meal and take his own afterwards. "Does he thank that servant because he did the things he was bidden?" So you also, when you do all that you are bidden, say, "We are unprofitable servants: we have done what we were bound to do" (Luc. xvii. 7 seq.). So, we say, God might have dealt with us, but as a matter of fact He has not done so.[1] He has graciously promised to reward our good works with life eternal, and since the promise has been made, since further there is a real proportion between the work done and the reward given, the reward is merited or, in other words, God's justice, no less than his fidelity to his promise is the warrant that it will be given. Scripture speaks on this point as plainly as the Council of Trent. "For the rest, there is reserved for me the crown of justice which the Lord will give in that day, the just judge" (2 Tim. iv. 8). Whatever the exact sense of "the crown of justice" may be, the last words "the just judge" leave no room to doubt that St. Paul expected a reward from the justice of God. So again in Hebrews vi. 10, the words are, "God is not unjust to forget your work and labour of love," and the justice consists in giving the reward of "salvation," as the preceding verse proves. The same truth follows from the reiterated assurance that "God will render to every man according to his works" (Rom. ii. 6).

(2) It is only works done in the friendship and by the grace of God which merit eternal life. St. Paul constantly asserts that no man can be justified by the works of the law. In the Epistle to the Romans he shows that the heathen (i. 18–32) and the Jews (ii. 1–29) were alike under condemnation before God, that justification came by the Gospel and through faith (iii. 21–26), and that all boasting is thereby excluded (iii. 27–31). In 1 Cor. xiii. we have the general statement, "If I give my body to be burnt and have not charity, it profits me nothing." The contrary doctrine—viz. that man "can be justified by his own works done through the strength of human nature or the teaching of the law," is anathematised by the Council of Trent (loc. cit. canon 1). The work of our salvation begins wholly from the grace of God and the co-operation of our free will; it springs from grace, not from merit, from the divine mercy, not from the divine justice. God moves the sinner to believe and to repent, and pours the Holy Ghost and divine love into his heart, not because of any merits which He sees in him, but because of his own infinite compassion. But when the sinner has passed from death to life, the least work done by God's grace merits heaven. Each is the fruit of Christ's Passion, each is done and can only be done by those "who have received power to become the sons of God." The Holy Spirit in the heart is a "fountain of water springing up to eternal life" (John iv. 13). The smallest work of mercy, if done by Christ's indwelling grace, is from that very fact due to a principle which utterly transcends all earthly reward, and which therefore justly claims recompense in heaven. Hence St. Paul boldly tells the Colossians (i. 10) to "walk worthily of the Lord," and the Thessalonians (Ep. ii. 1, 5), so to suffer as to be "counted worthy" of the kingdom of God. To deny the merit of the just is to detract from the merit of Christ in whose strength they act.

Nor can the doctrine of merit, so understood, fail to prove a powerful incentive to humility and gratitude. "What merits of his own," St. Augustine asks (Ep. 119, al. 104) "has [the sinner] set free, to boast of, since had he received according to his merits, he would have been condemned? Are there therefore no merits of the just? Evidently there are, because they are just. But there were no merits in order that they might become just, for they were made just when they were justified; but as the Apostle says, 'Justified freely by his grace.'" And further on in the same epistle, "What merit, then, can there be in man, anterior to grace and on account of which he can receive grace, seeing that grace alone works in us all our good deserts, and seeing that God, when He crowns our merits, crowns what are nothing else than his own gifts. For as from the beginning of faith we obtained mercy, not because we were faithful, but in order that we might be faithful, so in the end, when life will be eternal, He will crown us, as it is written, 'in pity and in mercy.' So not in vain do we sing to God, 'And his mercy will go before me,' 'And his mercy will follow me.' Whence also even eternal life, which, endless itself, will be attained at the end, and therefore is given after merits, is itself too called a grace, because these same merits of which it is the reward have not been done by us of our sufficiency, but have been done in us by grace, because it (eternal life) is given freely, not that it is not given in consequence of merits, but because the merits to which it is given are themselves a gift."

Again, the Catholic doctrine is utterly opposed to the legalism which expects measure for measure, so much reward in heaven for so much external service on earth. There is a Jewish saying, "God did not reveal the reward attached to each commandment, for had He done so, man would keep some and neglect others."[1] It could not have arisen among Christians. To them "love is the fulfilling of the law." The love of God above all, and of men for his sake—that is the one indispensable work; and of itself, though all external works may be absent, it merits the kingdom of heaven. He who loves has passed from death to life; external good works can claim a reward so far and so far only as they spring from love, are the expression of love, serve to intensify love.

It is not worth while to show at length that the Fathers taught the Catholic doctrine on grace and justification, for the Reformers were conscious that they could not appeal successfully to tradition, and they professed to restore a belief contained indeed in Scripture, but forgotten even from early times in the Church. We may, however, refer the reader to (Clem. Rom. 1 Ep. 30, cf. 32; Ep. Barnab. 19; Iren. iv. 30, 3; Tertull. "Scorp." 12). It was only the Gnostics in the first ages of the Church who denied the merit of good works. (See Iren. i. 23, 3, i. 25, 5). It is more important to note that merit is sometimes used in a looser sense, and that theologians recognise an inferior or imperfect merit—viz. "Meritum de Congruo," merit of congruity. This latter is not, properly speaking, merit at all, it is a right founded in friendship and liberality, not in strict justice. Thus no one can merit the first grace or recovery from mortal sin, nor can a holy man merit the conversion of another,[1] or his own perseverance in grace. (See FINAL PERSEVERANCE.) It is, however, lawful to hold that a just man may merit a sinner's conversion de congruo, because it is congruous or fitting that God should hear the prayer of one who is admitted to his friendship. In the other cases, Billuart denies that there is any place even for merit de congruo, unless we take it to mean merit in a still laxer and vaguer acceptation. Thus we may say, if we like, that a man who, moved by God's grace, believes, sorrows for his sin, resolves to begin a new life, hopes in God's mercy, &c., merits de congruo the further grace of justification, because these previous works dispose the soul to receive sanctifying grace. But if the question be asked in general terms, does a sinner, so disposed, merit God's pardon and grace, the answer must be "no," and so the Council of Trent expressly defines.

METROPOLITAN (metropolita, metropolitanus). The thirty-third of the Apostolic Canons says that the bishops in every country (cujusque gentis) ought to know which among them is the first, and take him to a certain extent as their head, and do nothing unusual without his consent. It was manifestly the intention of St. Paul that Titus should stand in a relation of this kind to all the bishops established in the cities of Crete;[2] and a comparison of 1 Tim. ch. iii. with Tit. i. seems to justify the inference that Timothy bore a similar rank among the bishops of Asia. This leading bishop among his brethren would naturally be, or come to be, the prelate of the most important city (metropolis) in the province or country. In the case of an entire country, such as Syria or Egypt, each with its dependencies, the bishop of the capital city (Antioch, Alexandria, &c.), was called the patriarch; in the case of a province, the metropolitan. The ecclesiastical divisions, for a long time after the conversion of Constantine, conformed themselves closely to the civil; the same chief city of a province contained the prætor as the head of the temporal, and the metropolitan as the head of the spiritual

[1] Quoted from Tanchuma on Ekeb. in the learned Jewish work, Hamburger's Real Encycl. für Bibel und Talmud, p. 701, art. "Lohn und Strafe." There are noble rabbinical maxims on merit: e.g. "The reward of a commandment is a commandment (i.e. leads to the keeping of another commandment), and the wages of sin is sin" (Aboth. iv. 2); and by Antigonus of Soto (about 198 B.C.), "Be not as servants who serve their master to receive a reward, but be like servants who do not serve their master because of the reward: let the fear of heaven rule over you" (Aboth. i. 2). But there is nothing in the great collection of rabbinical dicta on the subject in the article referred to above which approaches ever so distantly to the spirit of Matt. xxii. 37–40; Rom. xiii. 10.

[1] Ps. xlix. 8 (in the Hebrew) may be quoted here, though it really speaks of redemption from temporal death, "Surely a brother cannot redeem a man; he cannot give to God an atonement for him; the ransom of his soul will be too precious, and he must let that be for ever."

[2] Tit. i.

organisation. In process of time it often happened that the seat of the civil government was removed to another city, while no corresponding change took place in things ecclesiastical; in such cases the name "metropolitan" ceased to be suitable, and was replaced by "archbishop."

In former times the power of metropolitans over their suffragans was great; they could hear and decide any charges made against them, and excommunicate them if they deemed it necessary. The Council of Trent reduced this power within strict limits. It enacted that criminal causes of a more serious kind, in which bishops were implicated, should be tried and decided only by the Supreme Pontiff, with the proviso, however, that if a previous local inquiry were necessary, it should be committed to none but the metropolitans, or bishops specially delegated by the Holy See. The minor criminal causes of bishops are, under the same canon, to be tried by the provincial council or by persons deputed by it.[1]

Metropolitans cannot exercise ordinary jurisdiction in the dioceses of their suffragans, nor visit their cathedrals, or any portion of their dioceses, except on the mandate of the provincial council. Nor have they any jurisdiction, proprio jure, over monasteries situated within the dioceses of their suffragans.

On the rights, privileges, and dignities still annexed to the office of a metropolitan, see the article ARCHBISHOP. (Ferraris, Metropolitanus; Soglia, ii. 5, 49.)

MILITARY ORDERS. Hélyot enumerates between ninety and a hundred military orders. Of these, the knights of CALATRAVA and the HOSPITALLERS have been already noticed; for the TEMPLARS and the TEUTONIC order, see those articles. Of the remainder, particulars respecting a few of the more important are here subjoined.

(1) Of Alcantara.—Founded in Castile in 1177; its object was the subjugation of the Moors. The knights wore a white mantle embroidered with a green cross. For a century after their institution they did great service to the Christian cause; in the fourteenth century their quarrels with the knights of Calatrava, resulting in actual war, no less retarded and disgraced it. The order became extremely wealthy; the rents of the grand-mastership in the time of Ferdinand and Isabella amounted to forty-five thousand ducats.[1] Castles, towns, and convents, belonging to this and the other military orders, were seen in every part of Spain. The election to the office of grand-master, involving the disposal of large patronage and the wielding of great power and influence, became the cause of infinite jealousy and contention; and by a prudent decision of the Pope (1494) the control of the order was granted to Ferdinand and Isabella for life. In the reign of Philip II. the grand-mastership was annexed in perpetuity to the crown; the subordinate dignities, having survived the object for which they were instituted, became the empty decorations of an order of nobility.

(2) The Annunziata, or the Collar.—Instituted by Amadeus, Count of Savoy, about 1360.

(3) The Bath.—So named from one of the ceremonies of knighthood according to the custom of England. The esquire who was to be knighted was put into a bath; while he was in it two other esquires, experienced in chivalry and its laws, came to him, and after explaining the duties which knighthood would impose upon him, poured water upon his shoulders and so left him. After the bath he was taken into a chapel, and continued in prayer the whole night, "asking the Lord and his blessed Mother that of their worthy grace they would give him power and strength to receive this high temporal dignity in honour of their holy Church, and of the order of chivalry."[2] At daylight he confessed to a priest, and afterwards heard Mass. After the completion of the ceremony by the king's striking him on the collar with his right hand and saying "Be a good knight," he was led up to the altar, knelt, and placing his right hand upon it, promised to maintain the right of Holy Church all his life long. Geoffrey of Anjou, the father of Henry II., is said to have been knighted in this manner by Henry I. in 1128.

The honours of the order of the Bath, though its religious meaning is now lost, are highly prized in England to this day. The dignities are—Knight Grand Cross (G.C.B.), Knight Commander (K.C.B.), and Companion (C.B.) In each grade there is a military and a civil division. The ribbon is crimson; the motto, "Tria juncta in uno." Altogether the order numbers more than 1,000 members.

(4) Of Constantine.—This order seems to have been created by the Emperor Isaac Angelus Comnenus about 1190, probably in imitation of the orders among the Crusaders. Innumerable fictions and forgeries have been set on foot from time to time, in order to invest this and other military orders with the dignity of an antiquity to which they have no claim. Thus the order now in question, it was stoutly maintained, was first founded by Constantine the Great. In the opinion of Papebroke the Bollandist, no military order can prove that it originated before the twelfth century.

(5) The Dannebrog.—This Danish order, if it had a mediæval origin at all, and was not, as Hélyot was inclined to suspect, manufactured in the seventeenth century, was founded by Waldemar II. about 1219. The number of knights must not exceed 19.

(6) The Garter.—Founded by Edward III. in 1347. According to the common story, which however appears to have been unknown to Froissart, the Countess of Salisbury dropped her garter in the court at Windsor, which the king picked up and bound round his knee, and then, perceiving that the courtiers were inclined to laugh, said, "Honi soit qui mal y pense." "Honi" is old French for maudit, accursed. The number of the knights, including the king, was fixed at twenty-six, and to this it was limited for several centuries. The number at the present time is forty-nine. The ancient dress was a blue mantle with a red cross on the left side, a collar whence depended a representation of St. George and the Dragon, called a "George" (cf. Shakespere's "Now by my George, my garter, and my crown"), and a blue garter round the left leg.

(7) The Glorious Virgin Mary.—Founded at Vicenza in 1233. The knights, who must be of noble blood, bound themselves (like a "vigilance committee" in modern times) to take up arms against the disturbers of the public peace, and against those who committed outrages and escaped punishment. They vowed conjugal chastity, obedience to their commander, and to protect widows and orphans. In course of time they became rich, and thought more of enjoying themselves than of anything else; whence the people called them in derision the "Frères Joyeux."

(8) The Golden Horseshoe.—Founded at Paris by a duke of Bourbon in 1414. Its object seems to have been to encourage duelling, since the seventeen knights of whom it was composed swore to fight with each other, on foot or à outrance, within two years, if they could not sooner find seventeen gentlemen outside the order who would fight with them.

(9) The Thistle.—Instituted by James V., King of Scotland, in 1534. The collar of the order is of thistles twisted together; from it hangs the badge of St. Andrew, with the motto "Nemo me impune lacesset." After the flight of Mary Stuart to England this institute fell into abeyance, but was revived by James II. at Windsor in 1687, when he made several great Scottish noblemen knights of the order. Again it came to nothing in consequence of the revolution of 1688, but was revived by Queen Anne in 1703, on a Protestant basis. The order, which numbers at present twenty knights, is accessible only to peers.

(10) The Toison d'Or, or Golden Fleece.—Instituted by Philip the Good, Duke of Burgundy, in 1429, with a distinctly religious and Catholic end. The original statutes say, that out of the great and perfect love which Duke Philip had to the noble estate of chivalry, "in order that the true Catholic faith, the estate of Holy Church our mother, and the tranquillity and prosperity of the Commonwealth may be . . . defended, guarded, and maintained," he had instituted, and did institute, on that his wedding day, to the glory of God, in reverence of his blessed Mother, and in honour of the Apostle St. Andrew, "an order and fraternity of chivalry or amiable company of a certain number of knights . . . to be called the order of the Toison d'Or." Charles the Bold, son of the founder, required the knights to assume a magnificent dress of crimson velvet. The grandson of Charles, the Archduke Philip, marrying the heiress of Ferdinand and Isabella, transmitted the right of conferring the order of the Toison d'Or to the kings of Spain, who have ever since retained it. The figure of a sheep in gold, hung round the neck by a silken ribbon or a small gold chain, is the distinguishing decoration of the order.

In the long list of these military orders there are several which accomplished in their day real work, and work which could not have been accomplished so well by any other agency. When the organisation of society as a whole was still imperfect, kings were glad to employ these partial organisations, in which the actuating principle was religious enthusiasm or love of fame, to check enemies abroad and abuses at home that otherwise could not easily have been reached. Yet it is impossible not to suspect that a large proportion of these institutions did more harm than good—by fostering aristocratic pride and exclusiveness, and pandering to social or personal vanity—thus raising barriers unnecessarily between class and class, and furnishing fuel to those smarting feelings of envy and alienation which are wont only to be appeased by revolution. (Hélyot.)

MILLENNIUM. In the Apocalypse (ch. xx.) it is said that after the destruction of God's enemies, "the beast and the kings of the earth and their armies," with "the false prophet" and Satan himself, will be bound and cast into the pit. The saints are then to rise and reign with Christ a thousand years. At the end of this period Satan is to be loosed for a brief space. The nations deceived by him will gather against the "beloved city" in which the saints are encamped. Then fire will descend and devour the wicked; Satan will be cast for ever into hell, and the general judgment will take place. Many of the early Christians took this as a literal description of events which would occur at the end of the world's history. Those who held to such an interpretation were known as Chiliasts or Millenarians—i.e. believers in the reign of a thousand years. This belief was very common in the early Church. It was held by Papias, bishop of Hierapolis, early in the second century (Euseb. "H. E." iii. 39), by St. Justin Martyr ("Trypho." 81), by St. Irenæus ("Adv. Hær." v. 36), by Lactantius ("Div. Inst." vii. 24), by Tertullian and Victorinus Petabionensis (see Hieron. "De Vir. Illustr." xviii., where he refers to a lost work of Tertullian). The opinion was no doubt Jewish in origin. (See Grabe, "Spicileg." vol. i. p. 231.) It was also held outside the Church in a gross and sensual form by the Judaising Gnostic Cerinthus (Euseb. "H. E." iii. 28), and opposed by the Roman presbyter Caius (Euseb. loc. cit.) At Alexandria the allegorical mode of interpretation was of course unfavourable to Chiliasm. Still, even in the Alexandrian district Nepos, bishop of Arsinoe, in the middle of the third century, was a vehement Millenarian. He wrote a "refutation of the Allegorists" (ἔλεγχος τῶν ἀλληγοριστῶν), directed particularly against Origen, and had a powerful following. Peace was restored by Dionysius of Alexandria, who held a council on the matter in 255. (See Euseb. vii. 23, and Hefele, "Concil." p. 134 seq.) It was probably the fear of Millenarianism which partly occasioned the objections long prevalent in the East to the authority of the Apocalypse. After the establishment of Christianity, the belief in the reign of the saints for a thousand years almost died out. But St. Augustine ("Civ. Dei." xx. 7) confesses that he once held it. It appeared from time to time in the middle ages, and is still advocated by some Protestants.

Muzzarelli (quoted by Jungmann, "De Novissimis," p. 303) sums up the common judgment of theologians on the subject. The theory as held by the early Fathers, he says, is not heretical, but, considering the weight of authority on the other side, it is at least improbable.

MINIMS (Ordo Minimorum Eremitarum Sancti Francisci de Paula). The name commonly applied to members of the order of Minim-Hermits, an austere order of mendicant friars founded by St. Francis of Paola. They were known in Paris before the Revolution as Bons Hommes—"Good Men"—because, as it is supposed, their convent in Paris had at one time belonged to the monks of Grand Mont, who had popularly been so called, and in Spain as "Brothers of Victory," on account of the victory which Ferdinand V. had gained at Malaga over the Moors as a result, according to the general belief, of the prayers of St. Francis of Paola. They were called "Minims" (minimi, the least) by their founder, to humble them even below the Franciscans, who in humility call themselves minor (friars minor), the "less."

St. Francis, their founder, was born about 1416 in Calabria in Italy, at Paola, a small city on the western coast midway between Naples and Reggio. His parents, James Martorillo and Vienna di Fuscado, were a pious couple of the middle class. When a boy of thirteen Francis was sent to a Franciscan convent in his native town, for he had already begun to display the extraordinary piety which gave indication of his future holy career. He showed a strong affection for the Franciscan rule, but it was not the will of God that he should become a member of that order. At nineteen he was living as a hermit in a solitary place near Paola, and the fame of his sanctity had already spread about in Calabria. Young as he was in years, his piety was so well assured that he was prevailed on, with the approbation of the ordinary of the diocese, to receive some disciples, and with them he began a religious community in Paola. Cells were constructed on ground belonging to his father, and the chapel of the new community was dedicated to St. Francis of Assisi. In 1444 he established a colony at Paterno, and eight years later he finished on a more splendid scale his convent and church at Paola; the next year (1453) making a third establishment at Spezano Maggiore, and in 1460 founding still another convent at Cortona. So far the new religious order had been living without any rule, except such as their holy founder had from time to time given them by word of mouth and by the example of his own life. But from the first a perpetual Lent had been observed by them. In 1464 Francis founded the first house of his order in Sicily, at Milazzo, where he remained until his return to Calabria in 1468.

The fame of his sanctity having reached Rome, a strict examination was made into the history of his life and into the working of his communities, and in 1473 Pope Sixtus IV. approved the new congregation under the name of the "Hermits of St. Francis of Assisi." The following year Francis was named by the Holy See its first superior-general, and the congregation was exempted from the jurisdiction of the ordinaries. But Sixtus refused to sanction the perpetual Lent, though even this was afterwards accorded. In 1493 Francis composed his first Rule, which was approved by Pope Alexander VI., who changed the name of the order to the "Minim-Hermits of Francis of Paola," the name it has retained ever since. In 1495 the same Pope confirmed the privileges hitherto conferred on the order, also giving it all the privileges generally possessed by the mendicant friars. In 1501, having perfected his first Rule and having rearranged it, and having also established his perpetual Lent as a vow, and having prepared a Rule for people of either sex who live in the world—that is to say, Tertiaries—he submitted these two Rules to the Pope, who approved them the next year (1502). The Rules, being again retouched, were confirmed by a bull of Alexander VI. which conferred new privileges; all of which was again confirmed in 1505 by Pope Julius II. Finally, the holy founder having put the finishing touch to his two Rules, and having added a third Rule for nuns, all three were approved and confirmed by a bull of the same Pope July 25, 1506. Besides these three Rules Francis composed a Correctorium, or manual of penances, and a Ceremonial for the recitation of the Divine Office, &c.

Francis was invited to France by Louis XI., whom he attended on his deathbed; and there he spent the rest of his days, founding numerous communities in France, Spain, Italy, and Germany. The first colony in Spain was made at Malaga in 1493, and in Germany in 1497. The order was never established in the North of Europe, nor in England, Scotland, or Ireland, for the persecution which soon set in in all those countries rendered them unfit fields for so contemplative an order as the Minims. St. Francis died in his convent at Plessis-les-Tours, Good Friday, 1507, being then ninety-one. In 1562 the Huguenots, while sacking this convent, found the saint's body, and, having fastened a rope about its neck, dragged it to the chapel, where they burned it along with the crucifix of the high altar, but some Catholics afterwards recovered the saint's bones from the ashes.

January 1, 1508, Father Francis Binet was elected general. At that time the order was divided into five provinces—Italy, Tours, France, Spain, and Germany—but it afterwards had thirty-one provinces. At first the general of the order was chosen for three years, but since 1605 he has always been elected for six years by the general chapter, which consists of the general, the colleagues-general, the provincial, and the procurator-general. Each province has its chapter also. The superior of a convent is called the corrector, because he is required to correct himself and those subject to him, and he is elected for one year, ordinarily not being eligible for re-election except after an interval of at least one year. Formerly there were visitors-general, but these were suppressed as unnecessary.

As in all of the mendicant orders, the Minims consist of First, Second, and Third Orders so called—that is to say, of friars, nuns, and tertiaries, these latter being affiliated lay people living in the world. The Minim tertiaries never but once, and that for a short time only—at Toledo, in Spain—have lived in community. St. Francis of Sales is said to have been a Minim tertiary. The first nuns of the order took their vows in 1495 at Andujar, in Spain. The habit of the Minim friars consists of a gown of coarse woollen stuff, reaching to the ankles, and of the natural colour of the wool without any dye. The chaperon, or shoulder-piece of the cowl, of the same colour as the gown, reaches in front to about half-way between the waist and the knee. The girdle is a woollen, unbleached and undyed rope, and has five knots for the clerical and lay friars and four for the tertiaries. Formerly the Minims were barefoot, or at most wore sandals; but the custom was relaxed and now all are shod. With the exception of the head-dress, which resembles that worn by most orders of nuns, the habit of the Minim nuns is similar to that of the friars.

The vow of a friar of this order is as follows: "I, Brother N., vow and promise to Almighty God and to the Blessed Virgin Mary, to the whole heavenly choir, and to you, my reverend Father N., and to this sacred order, to remain steadfast and to persist throughout the whole of my life in the way of living and in the Rule of the Brothers of the Order of Minims of St. Francis of Paola, which has been approved by our Holy Father Pope Alexander VI. and afterwards by Pope Julius II. of blessed memory, persevering in living under the vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, and of the life of Lent, according to the determinations and the circumstances indicated and prescribed in the same Rule."

MINISTER. Among the Franciscans and Capuchins the head of the order is the minister-general, and each province is placed under a minister-provincial. Again, the general of the Society of Jesus has five assistants, called ministers, who are elected by the general congregation, and are empowered, through the admonitor, to represent to the general anything irregular which they may have observed in his government.

MINISTERS OF THE SICK. This order was first founded as a congregation of priests and lay brothers by St. Camillus of Lellis to serve the sick in hospitals. The approval of the Holy See was given in 1586; five years later Gregory XIV. constituted them a religious order, under the protection of Cardinal di Mondovi, with their principal establishment at the Church of St. Mary Magdalen at Rome and in the houses adjoining. The religious, besides the three ordinary vows, take a fourth vow to assist the sick in the hour of death. There is a general of the order elected for life, who is assisted by four consultors; the chapter-general meets once in six years. The dress is that of secular priests, with the addition of a large brown cross on the soutane, and another on the cloak. The noviciate lasts for two years; the religious are exempt from the obligation of singing office in choir, and from attending processions, on account of the absorbing nature of their duties beside the sick. They only fast on Fridays, in addition to the fasts prescribed by the Church. At the death of the founder in 1614, there were sixteen houses of the order, containing about three hundred religious. MINORITES. [See FRANCISCANS.]

MIRACLES. The Latin word miraculum means something wonderful—not necessarily supernatural, for, e.g., the "Seven Wonders of the World" were known as the "Septem Miracula." In theological Latin, however, and in English, the words miraculum, "miracle," are used commonly only of events so wonderful that they cannot be accounted for by natural causes. This use, as we shall see presently, is not sanctioned by the Vulgate translation of the New Testament, and is not thoroughly supported by the language of the original Greek. It has its disadvantages as well as its advantages, though, of course, the established terminology cannot be altered now, even if it were possible—as we believe it is not—to find a more convenient word. It will be well, however, to say something on the Scriptural, and particularly the New Testament phraseology.

(1) Miracles are called τέρατα (prodigia. See Exod. iv. 21, where it is the rendering of מוֹפְתִים, shining or splendid deeds)—i.e. prodigies, because of the surprise they cause. The Greek word θαυμάσια, which would exactly answer to miracula, is found in the New Testament once only (θαῦμα,[1] never), Matt. xxi. 15; and there in a wider sense than "miracle." There is no great difference, from a theological point of view, between the words "prodigy" and "miracle." It is, however, well worth notice that the New Testament never uses the word "prodigy" by itself. It speaks of "signs and prodigies," &c., many times; of "prodigies" simply, never. Evidently, the wonder caused is not the only or even the chief feature in a miracle, and this the New Testament writers are careful to note.[1]

[1] Never, i.e. for a "wonderful thing." See Apoc. xvii. 7.

(2) Miracles are also frequently called "signs" (σημεῖα; an accurate rendering of אוֹתוֹת, Ex. vii. 3.), to indicate their purpose. They are "marvels" and "prodigies" which arouse attention, but the "wonder" excited is a means, and not an end, and the "miracle" is a token of God's presence; they confirm the mission and the teaching of those who deliver a message in his name (see Acts xiv. 3; Heb. ii. 4). Of course, it is only by usage that the word "sign" acquires this technical sense, and it does not always in the New Testament mean a supernatural sign.

(3) They are often described as "powers" (δυνάμεις),[2] inasmuch as they exhibit God's power. They are evidences that new powers have entered our world and are working thus for the good of mankind. God, no doubt, is always working, and He manifests his power in the operation of natural law. But we are in danger of looking upon the world as if it were governed by laws independent of God, and of forgetting that his hand is as necessary in each moment of the world's existence for each operation of created things as it was for creation at the first. In a miracle, God produces sensible effects which transcend the operation of natural causes. Men are no longer able to say, "This is Nature," forgetting all the while that Nature is the continuous work of God; and they confess, "The finger of God is here." In Christ, miracles were the "powers," or works of power done by Him who was Himself the power of God. And so, miracles done through the saints flow from, and are signs of, the power of God within them. "Stephen, full of grace and power, did great prodigies and signs among the people" (Acts vi. 8).

[1] The Hebrew נִפְלָאוֹת, "wonderful thing in the land of Cham" (Ps. cvi. 22) is the word nearest to "miracula."

[2] גְּבוּרוֹת, "deeds of strength," is the Old Testament word which comes nearest δυνάμεις, and the Peshito has almost the same word, ܚܝܠܐ, but it is used very inaccurately for σημεῖα (Acts ii. 19, 43; v. 12; 2 Cor. xii. 12), for τέρατα (Acts xv. 12), for τέρατα καὶ σημεῖα (Acts ii. 22; iv. 30). In Acts vii. 36 there are three Syriac terms for two Greek. The text of the Peshito before us is that of Leusden and Schaaf.

(4) Christ's miracles are often called his "works," as if the form of working to be looked for from Him in whom the "fulness of the Godhead dwelt bodily." They were the characteristic works of Him who came to free us from the bondage of Nature, to be our life, to overcome death, to lead us, first to a worthier and more unselfish life, and then to a better world in which sorrow and death shall be no more. They are the first-fruits of his power; the pledges of that mighty working by which, one day, He will subject all things to himself and make all things new.

From a different point of view, then, the same event is a "prodigy," a "sign," and a "power;" each word presenting it under a distinct and instructive aspect. The three words occur three times together—viz. in Acts ii. 22; 2 Cor. xii. 12; 2 Thess. ii. 9 (in the last passage of the false miracles of Antichrist). In each case the Vulgate has kept the distinction with accurate and delicate fidelity; and we cannot help expressing our regret that the Douay version, in Challoner's recension, should have obliterated the distinction and blunted the sense of Scripture by translating—e.g. Acts ii. 22—"by miracles and wonders and signs," as if "wonder" added anything to "miracle."

We cannot pretend to consider here, in full, the objections made to the possibility of miracles, but can only give in brief the teaching of Catholic theologians, and particularly of St. Thomas, on the matter. The latter defines a miracle as an effect which "is beyond the order (or laws) of the whole of created nature"—"præter ordinem totius naturæ creatæ" (I. cx. 4). He explains further, that an event may transcend the laws of some particular nature and yet by no means be miraculous. The motion of a stone when thrown up in the air, to take his own instance, is an effect which exceeds the power which resides in the nature of the stone; but it is no miracle, for it is produced by the natural power of man, and does not therefore exceed the power of nature in its entirety. No natural law can account for the sun's going back on the dial of Achaz, for the resurrection of Lazarus, or for the cure of Peter's wife's mother by Christ when she was sick of a fever. All these things exceeded the powers of Nature, though in different degrees, and they are instances of the three grades of the miraculous which St. Thomas distinguishes (I. cv. 8). In the first case, the very substance of the thing done is beyond the power of Nature to effect ("excedit facultatem naturæ, quantum ad substantiam facti"); in the second, the recipient of the effect stamps it as miraculous ("excedit facultatem naturæ, quantum ad id in quo fit"), since natural powers can indeed give life, but not to the dead; in the third, it is the manner and order in which the effect is produced ("modus et ordo faciendi") that is miraculous, for the instantaneous cure of disease by Christ's word is very different from a cure effected by the gradual operation of care and medical treatment. The latter is natural, the former supernatural.

The definition given makes it unreasonable to deny the possibility of miracles, unless we also deny the existence of God. Usually, He works according to natural laws, and this for our good, since we should be unable to control natural agents and to make them serve us, unless we could count on the effects known causes will produce. But God is necessarily free; He is not subject to natural laws, and He may, for wise reasons, make created things the instruments of effects which are beyond their natural capacity. A miracle is not an effect without a cause; on the contrary, it is a miracle because produced by God, the First Cause. It is not a capricious exercise of power. The same God who operates usually, and for wise ends, according to the laws which He has implanted in Nature, may on occasion, and for ends equally wise, produce effects which transcend these laws. Nor does God in working miracles contradict Himself, for where has He bound himself never and for no reason to operate except according to these laws?

It is also clear from the definition given that God alone can work miracles. "Whatever an angel or any other creature does by his own power, is according to the order of created nature," and therefore not miraculous according to the definition with which we started (I. cx. 4). It is quite permissible to speak of saints or angels as working miracles; indeed, Scripture itself does so speak. Still, we must always understand that God alone really performs the wonder, and that the creature is merely his instrument. Hence it follows that no miracle can possibly be wrought except for a good purpose. It does not, however, follow that persons through whose instrumentality miracles occur are good and holy. St. Thomas, quoting St. Jerome, holds that evil men who preach the faith and call on Christ's name may perform true miracles, the object of these miracles being to confirm the truths which these unworthy persons utter and the cause which they represent.[1] Thus the gift of miracles is in itself no proof of holiness. But, as a rule, miracles are effected by holy men and women, and very often they are the signs by which God attests their sanctity and the power of their prayer (2 2ndæ clxxviii. 2). In all these cases, the miracle is a sign of God's will, and cannot, except through our own perversity, lead us into error.

It is otherwise with the "lying wonders" which, St. Paul says, Antichrist will work, or which Pharaoh's magicians are supposed by some to have done by the help of devils. Real miracles these cannot be, for God, who is the very truth, cannot work wonders to lead his creatures into error. But the demons, according to St. Thomas, are so far beyond us in knowledge and strength, that they may well work marvels which would exceed all natural powers, so far as we know them, and would seem to us superior to any natural power whatsoever, and so to be truly miraculous (I. cxiv.). True miracles, then, are practically distinguished from false ones by their moral character. They are not mere marvels, meant to gratify the curiosity of the spectator and the vanity of the performer. They are signs of God's presence; they bring us nearer to Him with whom "we ever have to do;" they remind us that we are to be holy as He is holy, to cultivate humility, purity, the love of God and man. The doctrine which they confirm must appeal to us, apart from its miraculous attestation. "Jesus answered them and said, My doctrine is not mine, but his who sent me. If any man will do his will, he will know of the doctrine whether it be of God, or whether I speak from myself. He who speaketh of himself, seeketh his own glory, but he that seeketh the glory of Him that sent him, he is true, and injustice is not in him" (John vii. 16). So our Lord appeals, in answering John's disciples, to his miracles, not simply as works of power, but as stamped with a moral character, and in their connection with the rest of his work. "Blind see again and lame walk, lepers are cleansed, and deaf hear, and corpses are raised, and the poor have the Gospel preached to them; and blessed is he whosoever shall not be scandalised in me" (Matt. xi. 5 seq.). In short, there was a witness within, as well as without, to Christ's mission, and the miracles had no voice for those who were deaf to the voice within. Because they were deaf to this voice within, the Pharisees ascribed Christ's miracles to Beelzebub. They blasphemed, or were in danger of blaspheming, the Holy Ghost who spoke to their hearts. And precisely the same danger which made men reject Christ's miracles will make them accept the marvels of Antichrist.

So far, many Protestants are with us; but whereas most of them consider that miracles ceased with, or soon after, the Apostolic age, the Catholic Church, not, indeed, so far as we know, by any formal definition, but by her constant practice in the canonisation of saints, and through the teaching of her theologians, declares that the gift of miracles is an abiding one, manifested from time to time in her midst. This belief is logical and consistent. Miracles are as possible now as they were eighteen centuries ago. They were wrought throughout the course of the old dispensation and by the Apostles after Christ's death; and although miracles, no doubt, were specially needed, and therefore more numerous, when Christianity was a new religion, we have no right to dictate to the All-wise, and maintain that they have ceased to be required at all. Heathen nations have still to be converted. Great saints are raised up in different ages to renew the fervour of Christians and turn the hearts of the disobedient to the wisdom of the just. The only reasonable course is to examine the evidence for modern miracles, when it presents itself, and to give or withhold belief accordingly. This is just what the Church does. The Anglican Bishop Fitzgerald, at the end of a most thoughtful and useful essay on "Miracles" in Smith's "Bible Dictionary," asserts that, according to the confession of their ablest advocates, ecclesiastical miracles belong to the class "of miracles which may be described as ambiguous and tentative—i.e. the event, if it occurred at all, may have been the result of natural causes." Then, indeed, the question would be at an end. But any one who looks into Benedict XIV.'s treatise on "Canonisation," or into Cardinal Newman's "Lectures on Anglican Difficulties," will see what an extraordinary mistake this is. This able writer is wasting words and exposing the weakness of his own cause when he argues that the course of Nature cannot be interrupted "by random and capricious variation," that strong evidence is needed to make supposed miracles credible, and that the true miracles of Christianity at its birth may have occasioned spurious imitations of fanatical credulity. All this may be admitted, but it does not touch the question. And when Dr. Fitzgerald rests the belief in miracles upon the authority of inspired writers, and urges that there is no such authority for ecclesiastical miracles, he forgets that the first Christians must have believed the miracles of Christ and the Apostles before any inspired record of them had been made. In many cases, too, the belief in Apostolic miracles must have come first, that in Apostolic inspiration second.

It must be observed, however, that ecclesiastical and Scriptural miracles claim widely different kinds of belief. The Scriptural miracles rest on divine faith, and must be accepted without doubt. No ecclesiastical miracle can become the object of faith, nor is any Catholic bound to believe in any particular miracle not recorded in Scripture. He could not, without unsoundness in doctrine, deny that any miracles had occurred since the Apostolic age, and he owes a filial respect to the judgment of high ecclesiastical authority; but within these limits he is left to the freedom and to the responsibilities of private judgment.

Lastly, although there is a danger in incredulity, even when this incredulity does not amount to abandonment of the faith, Catholic saints and doctors have insisted on the opposite danger of credulity. To attribute false miracles, says St. Peter Damian, to God or his saints, is to bear false witness against them; and he reminds those who estimate sanctity by miraculous power that nothing is read of miracles done by the Blessed Virgin or St. John Baptist, eminent as they were in sanctity, and that the virtues of the saints which we can copy are more useful than miracles which excite our wonder (Fleury, "H. E." lxi. 2). Neander ("Kirchengeschichte," viii. p. 26 seq.), after speaking of the popular taste for legendary miracles in the middle ages, continues: "Men were not wanting to contend against this spirit, and a catena of testimonies may be produced from the twelfth and thirteenth centuries on the true significance of the miraculous in relation to the divine life, and against an exaggerated estimation of external miracles. Nor were such thoughts peculiar to enlightened men who rose above their age; they may be taken as an expression of the common Christian feeling in those centuries." The mediæval biographer of Bernard of Tiron says that for the conversions of fallen women which he effected through God's grace he was more to be admired than if he had raised their dead bodies to life. And the biographer of St. Norbert writes: "It is the visible miracles which astonish the simple and ignorant, but it is the patience and virtues of the saints which are to be admired and imitated by those who gird themselves to Christ's service." (See the references in Neander, loc. cit.)

(On the subject of miracles generally, Archbishop Trench's dissertation at the beginning of his "Essays on the Miracles" may be consulted. It is specially valuable for its Patristic references. The opinions of the Schoolmen on the nature of miracles are well given by Neander, vol. viii. p. 26 of the last German edition. Cardinal Newman's "Essay on Ecclesiastical Miracles" is well known.)

MISSAL. The book which contains the complete service for Mass throughout the year.

In the ancient Church there was no one book answering to our Missal. The service for Mass was contained in the Antiphonary, Lectionary, Book of the Gospels, and Sacramentary. This last, besides matter relating to other sacraments, gave the collects, secrets, prefaces, canon, prayer infra canonem, and post-communion, and from the eighth century at latest it was known as Missal or Mass-book. There were "Completa Missalia," —i.e. Missals which contained more of the service of the Mass than the Sacramentaries; but we do not know how far this completeness went, for "during the ages which intervened between the use of the Liber Sacramentorum and the general adoption of the complete book of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, the Missal was in a transition state, sometimes containing more, sometimes less of the entire office. Thus the MSS. which still exist vary in their contents (Maskell, "Monumenta Rit.," p. lxiii. seq.).[1] There are, of course, printed Missals according to the various rites—Missale Romanum, Ambrosianum, Missal ad usum Sarum (first printed edition known, Paris 1487), and the various uses of religious orders (Dominicans, Benedictines, &c.) The Roman Missal was carefully revised and printed under Pius V., who carried out a decree of the Council of Trent on the matter, and strictly enjoined the use of this Missal, or faithful reprints of it, in all churches which could not claim prescription of two hundred years for their own use. It was revised again under Clement VIII. and Urban VIII. New Masses have of course been added from time to time, and to the Missal as to the Breviary a "Proper" may be added by permission of the Holy See, containing Masses for the saints venerated in a particular county, diocese, order, &c.

[1] The Missale Plenarium contains all the service for Mass—i.e. it is a Missal in the modern sense.

MISSION. Mission is inseparably connected with jurisdiction, so that he who is validly "sent" exercises a lawful jurisdiction in the place to which, and over the persons to whom, he is sent; and, e converso, any person exercising a lawful jurisdiction must be held to have received true mission. Mission precedes jurisdiction in the order of thought, but is coincident with it in practice.

A priest having the care of souls within a certain district must be sent to that district by the bishop, who has the general charge of all the souls within his diocese; he cannot appoint himself to it. "How shall they preach unless they be sent?"[1] In a regular parish there may be more priests than one engaged in ministerial functions, but one alone has the responsibility, as the curatus, of the souls within it. He has ordinary, not delegated faculties; other priests ministering within his parish have not ordinary faculties. In missions, as here in England, the head priest and the others usually differ only in this, that the latter receive their faculties to be exercised "cum dependentia" of the former. Priests, even parish priests, are not now held to have jurisdiction in the external forum (Soglia, ii. § 86), but only in the internal. [FORUM, &c.]

Again, the bishop from whom the mission of the parochus is derived does not assume his pastoral office of his own authority; still less, in consequence of a call from his flock; his recognition or confirmation, if not actual election, by the Pope as the successor of St. Peter constitutes his mission and the title of his jurisdiction. The mission of the Pope himself is from above, and rests on the divine promises, clearly expressed as they are in Holy Scripture, and certified by the tradition of the Church. [CHURCH OF CHRIST; POPE.]

"The mission of the priest," says Beudel,[1] has its prototype in that of Jesus Christ: "As my Father hath sent me, so send I you." Jesus Christ was sent into the world to seek all the souls which were lost; the Apostles were sent by Jesus Christ to all parts of the earth to continue his work in his name; the successors of the Apostles, without any break in the chain, are sent by the Church to fulfil their charge, and these send in their turn the confessors and pastors delegated by them to spread the beams of grace from the centre to the extremities, and cause every soul which desires it to participate in the benefits of their ministry." . . . . "The Church is the visible institute of salvation among men; through her alone power is given to the priest, by mission, to announce in the virtue of the Holy Ghost the word of God, as it has been all along preserved incorrupt by her, to transmit to the faithful the graces of which, through the merits of Christ, she is the depositary, and to direct them in the way of salvation in virtue of the sovereign authority which she represents. He who is not legitimately sent cannot be, in the full force of the words, "a minister of the Church having charge of souls."

In non-Catholic denominations the mission to a particular locality usually proceeds from the governing body, such as the General Assembly in the Kirk of Scotland, or the Conference of a hundred ministers among the Wesleyans. But if it be asked whence such governing bodies derived their mission, it is invariably found that they derived it in the first instance from some heresiarch or other self-appointed individual, who made a breach in ecclesiastical unity, or else made a fresh schism in that which was itself a schism. Thus mission among the Presbyterians has Calvin, and among the Methodists, Wesley, for its fountain head. In the Anglican Church mission is derived ostensibly from the Crown, which claims to be "in all causes and over all persons, ecclesiastical and civil," within the British empire "supreme." Every bishop, on doing homage for his see to the sovereign, has to say, "I do acknowledge and confess to have and hold the bishopric of it, and the possession of the same entirely, as well the spiritualities as the temporalities thereof, only of your Majesty, and of the Imperial Crown of this your Majesty's realm."[1] Those who find this view too Erastian hold that mission is conferred along with consecration, in which case Anglican mission must be ultimately derived from Parker, Elizabeth's first bishop, who made a breach in ecclesiastical unity. [See JURISDICTION.]

MISSION (= quasi-parish). In countries where the majority of the population is non-Catholic, either through having lost the faith or not having yet been converted to it, the priests having charge of souls are not inducted into parishes, but stationed on missions. In England, after the change of religion, many such missions were entrusted to members of religious orders, which enjoyed in a normal state of things various privileges and exemptions. This led to a conflict of jurisdiction between the monastic superiors and the vicars-apostolic, and it was finally decided by Benedict XIV. that "regular missionaries in England are subject to the vicars-apostolic in all that concerns the care of souls and the administration of the sacraments,"[2] notwithstanding the privileges of their orders. In what relates to the observance of their rule they are subject to their monastic superiors. Since the establishment of the hierarchy in England in 1850 the priests with quasi-parishes still remain mere missioners removable at the bishop's will, with the exception of "Missionary Rectors" permanently instituted (see Acts of Prov. Council of Westm. I. App.), who, in virtue of decrees of Propaganda and synodal statutes confirmed by the Holy See, hold certain rights and privileges. (Ferraris, Missiones; Missionarii.)

MISSIONS, POPULAR. To quicken faith and piety among Christians, whom their life in the world has made tepid and careless, is for the pastors of the Church an object of no less solicitude than to convert the heathen. In substance, mission-preaching has been employed in every age of the Church; it was applied with extraordinary fruit by St. Francis and St. Dominic; but its reduction to a system has been the work of comparatively recent times, and was commenced by St. Vincent of Paul, when (1617) he preached his first mission to the peasants of Folleville. [See LAZARISTS.] The Jesuits, Redemptorists, Passionists, and Rosminians have applied themselves with special earnestness to this branch of pastoral work; see those articles. The following sketch of a mission and of its fruits is from an article by Stemmer.[1] "A popular mission consists in a series of sermons and religious exercises, lasting over a certain number of days, directed by missionary priests with the approbation of the ordinary, in order to instruct and convert sinners, and rekindle Christian faith and Christian practice. This series or cycle of meditations, devotional exercises, and addresses, the general aim of which is to excite penitential feelings, treats of the destiny and end of man, of free will, of the need of grace, of the divine justice, eternity, the necessity of conversion, the heinousness of sin, its consequences, and the misery of impenitence; of the last things —hell, eternal punishment, and damnation. Together with these terrifying themes the preacher speaks of the mercy and love of God, the graces stored up in the Church, the sacraments of Penance and the Eucharist; usually also of loving our enemies, Holy Communion, the renewal of baptismal vows, and perseverance in doing good. In this way the sinner is brought to contrition, whence come hope and a moral change." After describing the availableness at this stage of the tribunal of Penance, the writer proceeds: "The mission is usually terminated by the renewal of baptismal vows," a general communion, "the dedication of the parish to the Blessed Virgin, promises of amendment and thanksgiving before the altar, the erection of a cross or stations, the solemn publication of the indulgence attached to the mission, and the celebration of Mass for the souls of the relatives and friends of the faithful present. Thus do the few days devoted to a true popular mission, with all the truths which it proclaims, all the acts which it disposes to and realises, form a real source of benediction to the souls that are willing to profit by it. It is a work of teaching and conversion which undeceives those who are misled, convinces those who doubt, shakes the indifferent in their false security, and stops hardened sinners in full career; it is an extraordinary weapon with which falsehood and error are attacked directly, boldly, and persistently, to the destruction of erroneous systems and the triumphant erection of truth on their ruins. Deep-seated prejudices and inveterate faults, though attacked at intervals from the pulpit, always find some corner in the heart where they can hide themselves and hold their ground; but the man who attends a mission meets an assailant who deals blow after blow until the conviction of the enormity of his blindness and of his faults is forced upon the hearer's conscience. Ill-gotten gains are renounced, guilty practices and criminal connections are broken off, hatreds of old standing are appeased, separated couples reconciled, lawsuits amicably settled; the converted sinners show a change of conduct, and the face of family and parochial life is altered; through the whole district human existence is modified for the better; sanctification spreads; and where unbelief, immorality, discord, disobedience, and antipathy formerly prevailed, the severity of Christian faith is now established, with union, love, and the peace of God."

MISSIONS TO THE HEATHEN. The kingdom of God, beginning as a grain of mustard seed eighteen hundred years ago, has grown into a great tree; the stages of its growth are here briefly noticed.

The multitude collected at Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost, from whom the first converts to the Christian faith were gathered, belonged for the most part to countries bordering on the Levant or lying still further east. They came from Persia, Mesopotamia, Asia Minor, Arabia, and North Africa; some were from Crete; the only western country indicated is Italy. These converts, when they returned to their homes, must have spread Christian belief around them. The seed thus sown needed tending; and the traditions as to the teaching of the Apostles, which tell us that the labours of most of them were confined to these very Eastern countries, are therefore in strict accordance with the report in Acts ii. St. Thomas, according to a probable tradition, visited India, and founded there the Christian community which still bears his name. The legend that St. James the son of Zebedee passed into Spain and founded a Church at Santiago in Galicia, is of little authority.[1] It must have been regarded in the Apostolic circle as a momentous step, when St. Paul (Acts xvi. 6–10), crossing the Hellespont, first carried the light of Christianity into Europe. St. Peter, after residing for some time at Antioch, fixed his see about A.D. 42 at Rome, which from that time became the centre of Christendom. But the full bearing and import of his primacy were only gradually discerned in the Church; and the Apostolic sees of Alexandria and Antioch, with, later on, Constantinople and Jerusalem, and generally the greater sees, acted as powerful secondary centres to diffuse the faith among the neighbouring countries. In Macedonia, at Athens and Corinth, and in Greece generally, Christianity was planted by St. Paul. A very ancient legend carries Lazarus and his sister Martha to the South of France, near Marseilles. A beautiful tradition, not however older than the middle ages, speaks of Joseph of Arimathea as visiting Britain and founding a flourishing Church at Glastonbury.

Second Century.—The great work of this period was the conversion of Roman Gaul. Documents still extant describe for us the persecution at Lyons in 177, when St. Pothinus was bishop, and Blandina suffered martyrdom. All along the coast of North Africa, and in Spain, the faith must have been silently spreading throughout this century, but details are wanting. About 182, Pope Eleutherus, at the request of Lucius, a British king, is said by Beda to have taken measures for the introduction of Christianity into Britain.

Third Century.—The records of the persecution of Severus disclose the existence of a flourishing Church in North Africa. In Italy, Christianity is believed to have been planted in the principal cities, such as Milan and Ravenna, in or soon after the time of the Apostles; but detailed information, except as to the names of the bishops, is wanting. In Persia, the faith made rapid advances all through this century, from Seleucia as a centre of operations, where one of the seventy-two disciples named Mares is said to have been the first bishop. About 220 the Parthian monarchy gave way to the dynasty of the Sassanides, which, under the belief that its stability depended on its firm adhesion to the old fire-worship of the nation, produced after a time a series of unrelenting persecutors of Christianity.

In Central and Northern France, St. Denys made numerous conversions in the years 270–280. About the same time St. Quentin planted the faith in the Vermandois, St. Lucian at Beauvais, and St. Mellon at Rouen.

Fourth Century.—The persecution of Diocletian showed that Spain, which gave St. Eulalia of Merida, and Britain, which gave St. Alban, to the roll of martyrs, both possessed a strongly rooted Christianity. The Armenians were converted in great numbers by Gregory the Illuminator. Frumentius planted the faith in Abyssinia, and was the first bishop of Axum (356). St. Martin of Tours extinguished most of the paganism that still lingered in Western Gaul.

Christianity at Zurich, in Switzerland, dates from St. Felix and his sister St. Regula, martyred in 303. Alemannic pagan invaders overran the country in the fifth century. After the great defeat of Zulpich (496), the Alemans gradually became Christians, and a noble Aleman, Robert, re-established the faith and built a church at Zurich about 692. His brother, Wichard, did the same at Lucerne towards the end of the seventh century. The see of Martigny in the Valais, not far from St. Maurice, famous for the martyrdom of the Theban legion, is said to have been founded about 300. The see of Lausanne grew out of that of Avenches, which is believed to have been founded about 350.

The Teutonic Goths, pressing southward from the Baltic, occupied in the fourth century what is now Roumania, on the north bank of the Danube, and were allowed by Valens when pressed by the Huns to cross the river (376), and settle in the Roman province of Mœsia. Christianity, which had been introduced among them by some captives whom in one of their expeditions they had carried away from Cappadocia, appears to have made rapid progress. Theophilus, bishop of the Christian Goths, was present at the Council of Nicæa and subscribed its decrees. A persecution arose about 370, of which we have an interesting account in the acts of the martyrdom of St. Sabas.[1] At that time, according to the distinct testimony of St. Austin,[2] the Christian Goths were all Catholics. But Ulfilas, who was their bishop after Theophilus, visiting Constantinople in 376, was persuaded to embrace Arianism, and he introduced it among his people. The same Ulfilas invented an alphabet for the Goths, and translated the Bible into their tongue; of this version, large portions are extant. These Goths of Ulfilas belonged to the Visigothic or Western branch of the nation, and they communicated the Arian heresy to the Ostrogothic or Eastern branch. In Theodoric the Ostrogoth Arianism mounted on the throne of Italy; but soon after his death it was crushed by the sword of Belisarius. The Arian Visigoths, driven out of Gaul by the Catholic Franks, founded a powerful kingdom in Spain; their conversion will be noticed further on.

[1] Hefele seems to reject it; see his article on St. James, in Wetzer and Welte.

[1] Alban Butler, Apr. 12.

[2] De Civ. Dei, xviii. 52.

Fifth Century.—At its commencement the Persian king Izdegerd listened favourably to the teaching of St. Marruthas, who made many conversions. A fresh persecution raged between 420 and 450. About this latter date the Persian clergy began to side with Nestorius; and the kings, from motives easily understood, encouraged them to set at naught the decrees both of Ephesus and Chalcedon. In 490, through the defection of Babuæus, the patriarchal see of Seleucia became Nestorian. The heresy obtained at one time an immense development, reckoning, under the Patriarch, 25 metropolitans and 140 bishops.

Many Jews were converted (418) in Minorca, and St. Euthymius (421) preached with success to some Arabian tribes.

Ireland was converted by the preaching of St. Patrick. [See IRISH CHURCH.]

The Burgundians, a Teutonic people, in alarm at the approach of the Huns, sought instruction in Christianity from the Romanised Gauls among whom they had settled; and having obtained it, and embraced the faith, they defeated the invaders. This was about 430.[1] Afterwards they lapsed for a time into Arianism

The see of Geneva, where there are believed to have been bishops as far back as A D. 200, was subjected by Leo the Great (450) to the jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Vienne. The first bishop of Coire in the Grisons was St. Asimo, for whom the Bishop of Como signed the decrees of a council at Milan in 452.

The Franks, who under Clovis, had invaded Gaul from beyond the Rhine, and destroyed every vestige of Roman domination, embraced Christianity along with their king in 496, after his great victory over the Alemanni.

The Southern Picts in Galloway were converted by St. Ninian, a Briton, about the beginning of the century.

Sixth Century.—The Arian Suevi of Galicia were converted, chiefly by the preaching of St. Martin of Duma, about 561. In 587, under King Recared, the whole Visigothic nation in Spain renounced Arianism and embraced the orthodox faith. Great progress was made in converting the Flemings by St. Vedast († 540), first bishop of Arras and Cambrai, who may be regarded as their apostle.

St. Gall, an Irish monk, about 585 penetrated into Switzerland and established the famous abbey. From the monastery of Iona, founded in 570 by the Irish St. Colm cille—i. e., "dove of the cells"—missionaries, at first mostly Irish, evangelized Western and Northern Scotland. The Celts of Cumberland, Wales, and Cornwall still preserved the Christianity long before received from Roman missionaries. In 596 St. Augustine, with forty monks, was sent from Rome by Pope Gregory the Great, and began to establish Christianity among the pagans of the South of England.

Seventh Century.—The conversion of the Angles and Saxons was being regularly carried on, not by kings forcing the creed upon unbelievers at the sword's point, but by bishops, monks, and secular priests who manifestly sought not their goods but their souls. It is true that there were reaction and relapse here and there, as may be seen in the pages of Beda; but the general movement of the moral tide was forward. The Angles of Deira (Yorkshire) with their king, Edwin, received the faith (633) from the Roman missionary Paulinus. The Angles of Bernicia—i.e. of the eastern districts of England and Scotland from the Tees to the Forth—were made Christians by the preaching of the Irish monks of Iona, whom St. Oswald (635) invited into Northumbria. No difference of doctrine divided the two classes of missioners: but they were at variance on an important point of discipline—viz. the right observance of Easter [EASTER; IRISH CHURCH]. St. Aidan, the first bishop in Bernicia, fixed his see at Lindisfarne on Holy Isle; in the tenth century it was removed to Durham.

[1] Milman, Lat. Christianity, i. 348.

The Gospel was carried by English missioners to Friesland and Holland. St. Wilfrid, banished from his see (679), dwelt for some time in Friesland and converted many. But the true founder of the Dutch Church was St. Willibrord, who, landing in Holland in 690, fixed his see at Wiltenburg or Utrecht.

Eighth Century.—The German tribes were still for the most part buried in heathenism; only at the north-west, through the mission of Willibrord and his companions, and at the south-west, through the gradual conversion of the Alemanni of Baden and Suabia since their subjugation by the Franks, had an impression been made. The eighth century witnessed the solid foundation of the German church through the preaching of Winfrid (St. Boniface). In this great affair the blessing and sanction of the Roman See were as carefully sought and as deliberately given as before the conversion of England. St. Boniface was papal legate in Germany for many years, having been first consecrated bishop by Gregory II. in 723. In 745 he fixed his metropolitan see at Mentz. Some time before (740) he had found his way into the vast region watered by the Danube and its tributary streams, and there founded the sees of Regensburg (Ratisbon), Frisingen, Passau, and Salzburg. From the last two sees Christianity was carried to the Teutonic or mixed populations further east.

The Saxons of Westphalia, Hanover, and Oldenburg were coerced by Charlemagne, who harried them with perpetual war till they submitted, into the reception of Christianity. This was the commencement of the system, too common all through the middle ages, by which unbelievers were scared by the threatened loss of life or goods into embracing, or at least professing, the religion of Christ. There is reason to believe that the treatment of the Saxons was a considerable factor in the anti-Christian ferocity which from this time till their tardy conversion two centuries later possessed their searoving neighbours of Scandinavia, and brought innumerable miseries, wrongs, and losses on the innocent English and Irish populations.

The English St. Willehad, who had been working among the Saxons and Frisians since 770, was consecrated to the see of Bremen in 787.

Ninth Century.—The missionary efforts of the Church were now chiefly directed to the rough Scandinavian North, and to the Slavonic peoples which everywhere bordered on the German tribes and the Byzantine empire. St. Anschar visited Sweden in 830 and made many converts. In 834 he was chosen Archbishop of Hamburg (with which Bremen was afterwards united), in fulfilment of a grand scheme of Charlemagne for planting at the mouth of the Elbe a missionary centre for the conversion of all the pagans of Northern Europe. In 853 he was again in Sweden, and from that time the light of religion was never quenched there, though it long flickered and seemed on the point of expiring. Some progress was made under Charlemagne in converting the Slavs of Brandenburg. Again, on the Danube, east of Passau, by the extermination of the Avars, Charlemagne made room for the "Eastern March" (Austria) and the great see of Vienna. The Slavs of Bulgaria were converted by the monk Methodius (865), whom their king Bogoris had invited from Constantinople. Constantine and the same Methodius brought the faith, at the request of their duke Bartilas, to the Slavs of Moravia. Methodius about the same time visited Bohemia, and baptised the duke Boriwoy, with his saintly wife Ludmilla. The Czech population readily followed the example of their rulers. The country remained for some time ecclesiastically subject to the Bishop of Ratisbon; the see of Prague was not founded till 968.

Tenth Century.—The work of converting the Slav races and the Northmen continued. The Normans, after the grant of what is now Normandy to their duke Rollo (911), embraced the faith, and soon began to extend and illustrate it with the force and genius characteristic of the race. The Slavs of Brandenburg were finally converted under Henry the Fowler (928), who turned their country into a march of the empire.

From the beginning of the century good progress had been made in Russia in the territory of Kiew. Olga, the widow of the Grand Duke Igor, visited Constantinople in 957, and was baptised in the church of St. Sophia. The schism caused by Photius had been healed up, and the Eastern church was at this time in communion with Rome; it was not till the middle of the eleventh century that the breach was reopened under Cerularius, and became chronic. [GREEK CHURCH.] Olga's example was not generally followed by the people; it was not till the reign of her grandson Vladimir that a strong movement towards Christianity took place among the Russians. The see of Kiew was founded in 988.

In Denmark, where many missioners had laboured in the ninth century with little outward fruit, the time had at last come for sees to be founded. Sleswig, with Poppo for its first bishop, and Aarhuus were erected into bishoprics about 948. Lunden, near the mouth of the Eider, was made a metropolitan see in 1104.

Misaco or Mieceslas, duke of Poland, marrying a pious Bohemian princess, agreed to become a Christian, and was baptised in 966; his subjects made little difficulty about following his example. Jordan was the first bishop of Poland, which was attached to the province of Magdeburg.

Geisa, the duke or voyvode of the Magyars of Hungary, became a Christian about 995. In 996 he welcomed into his country St. Adalbert of Prague, by whose preaching great numbers were converted. His son, St. Stephen, the first Christian king of Hungary, married Gisela, sister to the Emperor Henry II. St. Adalbert gave up his life in the attempt (997) to convert the Prussians about Dantzic.

Shortly before the end of the century Olaf, king of Sweden († 1024), brought over Siegfried, the English priest, and was baptised at Husaby in West Gotland. Christianity became the religion of the kingdom, but paganism lingered long in remote districts.

Thorwald, an Icelander, having been converted in Saxony, took home with him the priest Friedrich (981), and had much success in bringing over his countrymen. The conversion of the islanders was finished, after a rough fashion, by Thangbrand, an emissary of the King of Norway, between 997 and 999. The first bishop fixed his see at Skalholt in 1056.

Eleventh Century.—About A.D. 1000 the English Siegfried already mentioned preached to the Norwegians. Olaf Tryggwason, king of Norway, who fell in battle in that year, was a Christian, but his people had not gone with him. Norway, after being for many years under the rule of the Swedes and Danes, regained its independence through the courage and endurance of Olaf Haraldson (St. Olaf) in 1017. By a mixture of force and persuasion Olaf brought over the great majority of his countrymen into the pale of the Church. Grimkele, an Englishman, was the first bishop of Trondhiem.

The Slavs of Mecklenburg, among whom Christianity had been already preached, but ineffectually, all embraced the faith about 1050, under their prince, Gotschalk.

Twelfth Century.—The conversion of the Slavs went on. Boleslas, duke of Poland, having conquered Pomerania, sent for St. Otho, bishop of Bamberg, who, having first obtained the sanction of the Pope, came to Gnesen in 1125, and thence passed into Pomerania, visiting Piritz, Wollin, and Stettin. The people readily listened to him, and were baptised in vast numbers by total immersion. Adalbert was appointed the first bishop of Kammin in 1128.

Christianity was forced upon the Finns by their Swedish masters about 1150. The see was at first at Randamaki, but was removed to Abo in 1300.

The Slavs of the Isle of Rugen, having been subdued by the King of Denmark, showed a readiness to embrace Christianity. They worshipped a monstrous wooden idol with four heads, which they called Suantovit, a corruption of "St. Vitus," the name of the patron saint of the monastery of Corbie, whence some monks had come 300 years before, but had been compelled to depart before their message was half comprehended by the simple islanders Now (1168) Suantovit was broken up and burnt, and the people received baptism. They were the last member of the great Slavonic family to embrace the faith. The Pope placed the island under the Bishop of Roskild.

The remaining pagan population of Livonia, Courland, and Esthonia, was compelled by violence to adopt Christianity towards the end of this century by Albert the Bear, margrave of Brandenburg, and Henry the Lion, duke of Saxony.

Thirteenth Century.—All the nations of Europe were now Christian; all belonged to the Catholic Church, though the Russians did so in an imperfect sense, being out of communion with the Holy See. Attempts were made by fervent preachers of the newly-founded mendicant orders to carry the faith among the Mahometans, and the Christian populations under Mahometan rule in Asia Minor, Syria, &c. These efforts, owing to the pride and invincible prejudice of the Moslems, met with little success. The Teutonic knights, uniting themselves to the Order of the Sword founded in 1202, carried on from 1237 a long and cruel war against the natives of East Prussia. These last had been found intractable and ferocious, and their rejection over and over again of the teaching of the missionaries was held to justify proceeding against them by way of a crusade. The war lasted fifty-three years, and ended in the complete subjugation of Prussia, over which the Teutonic order then claimed to exercise sovereign rights. Prussians who were willing to become Christians were declared free men and enjoyed all private rights, but those who chose to remain in unbelief were made slaves to the conquerors.

Fourteenth Century.—This was an age of lamentable reaction. Crusades to the Holy Land being now regarded as impracticable, Christian princes turned their arms against one another. The hundred years' war between England and France began. The see of St. Peter remained for seventy years at Avignon, to the detriment of many religious interests; and soon after the return of Gregory XI. (1376) began the Great Schism, which distracted and perplexed all Christian nations for nearly forty years.

The people of Lithuania (1386), at the command of their duke, Jagellon, accepted the Gospel, and were baptised in vast numbers.

Fifteenth Century.—The maritime nations, Spain and Portugal, while extending the limits of geography, were full of zeal for the propagation of the faith. The people of the Canary and Azore Islands were converted in this age, and under Portuguese auspices three Dominican friars (1491) opened a promising mission on the Congo, in Western Africa. Immediately upon the discovery of America (1492) the religious orders, especially the Dominicans, Franciscans, Augustinians, and Trinitarians, hastened to send labourers to the new field.

Sixteenth Century.—While some of the European nations were being led away by heretical teachers into revolt from the Church, new populations were entering her fold in the Transatlantic regions opened out by the energy of Spain. Cortes, as soon as he had conquered Mexico, did all that he could to make the people Christians. Franciscan missioners appeared there in 1523, followed by Dominicans and Jesuits. The heroic virtue of Martin de Valenza, and his zeal in preaching, converted great numbers of the Mexicans. At the present day but few of the people remain unconverted; the country is divided into eleven sees, that of Mexico being metropolitan.

In New Granada, Spanish missionaries appeared very early; the first see was founded at Santa Marta in 1529. St. Louis Bertrand laboured here from 1561 to 1569, and is said to have converted fifteen thousand of the Indians.[1] St. Peter Claver, sometimes called the Apostle of the Negroes, after extraordinary labours and sufferings, died at Cartagena in 1654. Before 1800 the majority of the population, both Indian and negro, had become Catholic.

In Venezuela the see of Caraccas was founded in 1531. In 1800 three-fourths of the Indian population of the province were computed to be Christians.

The conquest of Peru by Pizarro was soon followed by the establishment of a bishop's see at Lima (1539), raised to metropolitan rank in 1548. St. Turibius, the third archbishop, is regarded as the apostle of that region. The glorious St. Rose of Lima, who died in 1617 at the age of thirty-one, "bloomed in the Indies in the flower of virginity and patience."[2] Dominican, Franciscan, and Jesuit missioners combined their efforts, and by the middle of the seventeenth century the conversion of the Peruvian Indians, within all the districts subject to Spain, was accomplished.

In Bolivia, Chiquisaca was erected into a bishop's see in 1551. Jesuit missions made rapid progress in converting the Indians; about a hundred years later not less than 100,000 of them were Christians.

In Chili, the see of Santiago dates from 1561. Those of the native tribes which submitted to the Spaniards soon became Christians; but the nation of the Araucanos and other tribes, preserving their independence, retained along with it their idolatry. To this day there are many unconverted Indians in Chili.

The vast and fertile plains of Brazil began to be occupied by the Portuguese about 1500. The first missionaries were Franciscans. The Jesuit Father, Nobrega, was sent to Brazil by St. Ignatius in 1549. Father Anchieta joined him four years later, and spent the rest of his life in extending the faith among the Indians. His sanctity was demonstrated by miracles, and he is often called the Apostle of Brazil. The first see was founded at Bahia in 1561.

The first see in La Plata, now the Argentine Republic, appears to have been that of Cordova (1570), where the Jesuits had in process of time a magnificent college. St. Francis Solano preached to the Indians of Tucuman and the Chaco in 1589, and converted a great number of them.

The faith was brought into Central America by Franciscans. Alfonso de Betanços preached both to Spaniards and Indians in Costa Rica with great fruit from 1560 to his death in 1566. Other friars laboured successfully in Guatemala during the last thirty years of the century.

Some Augustinian friars, headed by Alfonso Gutierrez, went out to the Philippine Islands in 1575 at the request of Philip II., and began to preach to the natives. Three years later they were joined by a party of Franciscans under the B. Pedro de Alfaro. In nine years 250,000 natives had embraced Christianity. At the present day, out of a population variously estimated at from five to nine millions, the vast majority are Catholics; and they have learnt the arts of civilised life, along with the doctrines of salvation, beneath the fostering wing of the Church. It is lamentable to compare with this picture the miserable condition of the Maories of New Zealand. Victimised by half a dozen Protestant sects, and unable to decide for themselves which of the Christianities offered to them was the true one, this brave and gifted people, divided still more than when they were heathens by the very influence which should have united them, have been unable to resist the corrupting effects of the civilisation which has enfolded them within its toils, and are now rapidly perishing.

The first see in the Philippine Islands was founded at Manila in 1581. This was made metropolitan in 1621, and three other sees have been since erected.

The Portuguese established their power firmly on the west coast of India about the beginning of the century, and a see was founded at Goa in 1534. St. Francis Xavier arrived in India in 1542; he preached on the Fishery Coast, and in Cochin, Madura, and Travancore, and made many thousands of converts. These were chiefly of low caste, or of no caste at all; Brahmin exclusiveness and Mussulman rancour strongly barred the way against the spread of Christianity among the upper classes of Indian society.

Japan received St. Francis, when he landed at Cangoxima in 1549, with open arms. The progress of Christianity was extremely rapid, and kings and princes embraced the faith; and it seemed as if a national conversion, like those of which earlier ages afforded so many examples, were about to be effected. Gregory XIII. in 1585 forbade any missionaries not belonging to the company to preach the Gospel in Japan. About the same time a Japanese embassy visited Rome. The sequel will be told in the next section.

Seventeenth Century.—Xavier had desired to carry the Gospel into China, but he died in the neighbouring isle of Sancian (1552) without having set foot in the empire. Towards 1600 some Jesuit Fathers entered China, but little effect was produced till after Father Ricci had made his way to Pekin (1602) and conciliated the goodwill of the emperor. The scientific attainments of Ricci, and, after him, of the Fathers Schall, Verbiest, &c., were what won from the imperial house respect for them, and some degree of toleration for the Chinese converts. In 1663 there are said to have been 300,000 Catholics in China. But several causes combined to overcloud this bright prospect: (1) the dispute about the Chinese ceremonies between the Jesuit and the Dominican missioners [JESUITS]; (2) the persecution, more or less connected with this dispute, raised by the Government against the Christians towards the middle of the eighteenth century; (3) the suppression of the Society of Jesus; and (4) the French Revolution, which paralysed the missionary energy of the chief Catholic nation for many years. Within the last fifty years great efforts have been made to regain the ground lost. China is now divided into twenty-five sees, under vicars-apostolic, and the total number of Catholics can be little less than a million. Numerous conversions occur each year in almost every one of the "Chrétientés," or Christian settlements, which are planted thickly in every province of the vast empire.

The Seminary "des Missions Etrangères," founded in 1663 in the Rue du Bac, Paris, has carried on ever since, chiefly in Eastern countries, a glorious work of evangelisation.

In the course of this century missionaries belonging to various orders, chiefly Dominicans and Jesuits, carried the Gospel to Tonquin, Cochin-China, Camboja, Siam, Malaysia, and Burmah, countries which all lie within the Indo-Chinese peninsula. The later history of these missions has been of the usual chequered character. In Tonquin and Cochin-China there have been prolonged persecutions and frequent martyrdoms. At the present day these countries are governed by twelve vicars-apostolic, and the number of Catholics contained in them may be roughly estimated at 280,000.[1]

Canada and Acadia (Nova Scotia) were colonised by France early in the seventeenth century; the first bishop's see was founded at Montreal in 1659. The Jesuit Fathers Brebeuf, Jogues, Lallemant, and Daniel converted the Hurons to Christianity. But the enemies of France instigated the Iroquois to attack the Hurons; all the above-named missionaries met with violent deaths, and the Hurons were nearly exterminated.[2] Acadia was ceded to England in 1713, and Canada in 1763. The French-speaking population of Lower Canada has remained Catholic, and the efforts of the missionaries have secured for the Church the large floating half-caste population of "voyageurs" and traders, besides converting many of the Indian tribes which roam over the surface of British North America.

In India, the Jesuit Nobili (1606), assuming the dress and customs of a Brahmin, and not associating with persons of inferior caste, made a considerable impression. The B. John de Britto, also a Jesuit, addressed himself to the lower castes, and is said to have converted 8,000 idolators; he gave his life for the faith. The flourishing Christianity of Ceylon, evangelised partly by Franciscans, partly by the Ven. José Vaz, of the Goa Oratory, and other Fathers of the same congregation, was injured and retarded by the Dutch after they had dislodged (1656) the Portuguese from the island. When Ceylon fell into British hands, equity was better observed, and at the present day there are 400,000 Catholics, governed by two vicars-apostolic.

The policy of British rule in India, with other causes, has tended to keep Christianity stationary, and at this day the total number of Christians in British India is said to be less than one million. Of these, about 250,000 are believed to be Europeans or Eurasians (half-castes). Of the remainder about 534,000 are found in the Madras Presidency, and of these about 416,000, or four-fifths nearly, are "returned as Roman Catholics."[1] In the Native States the Christians number about 700,000. Concerning these we have not met with creed returns, but there is no doubt that the great majority are Catholics.

The Goa schism arose in the following manner. When the see of Goa was founded in 1534, a treaty was signed between Portugal and the Holy See, giving to the king of that country the right of patronage over the churches of India on certain conditions. After their power on the Malabar coast had been displaced by that of the Dutch, and the circumstances were consequently changed, the Portuguese still refused to recognise the action of the Holy See in entrusting ecclesiastical interests in those regions to clergy of non-Portuguese nationality. A long and painful history is connected with these disputes, and the schism is not entirely healed to this day. The Indian missions were reorganised by Gregory XVI., who in 1840, Portugal having notoriously failed or become unable to fulfil its part of the contract, suppressed the original bull of patronage. Including the two sees in Ceylon, there are now twenty-three vicariates-apostolic in India.

In Japan, where a considerable section of the people had become Christians, the Government took the alarm, and commenced to persecute about the end of the sixteenth century. Xogun became taicosama, or supreme temporal ruler, in 1615, and from that time to his death in 1650 pursued a settled plan of extermination. In this he was aided by the selfish policy of the Dutch, who assisted him in putting down the revolt of the Christians of a large district, whom the persecution had driven to despair. About 1650 there were but few professed Christians left. When, however, after Japan was opened to Europeans a few years ago, the Catholic missioners returned, they found interesting proofs of the survival of a pure Christianity among a considerable number of the people. At present there is one bishop in Japan; the number of Catholics we have seen roughly estimated at 15,000.

Eighteenth Century.—The celebrated Jesuit missions, or "Reductions," in Paraguay attained their greatest development in the first half of this century. The Jesuits had obtained permission from the King of Spain to isolate their Indian converts in the settlements founded by them, and to manage their affairs independently of the colonial administration. A group of theocratic communities was thus formed in the plains of the Parana and Uruguay, in each of which the clergy were at once the spiritual and temporal rulers of their flocks; in which crime was almost unknown, and industry universal; and a community of goods was established as in the Apostolic age. The Indians "in medium quærebant;" the crops which they raised were thrown into a common stock, and divided by the clergy among the different households; not that this was regarded as a permanent arrangement, but only as that most suitable for the new Christians at the actual stage of mental and moral development which they had reached. The converts after a time displayed an extraordinary talent for imitating any kind of handicraft, mechanism, or artistic workmanship. The eyes of all the philanthropists of Europe were turned upon this new experiment in human education. Unfortunately the hostility of the colonists, the transfer of the territory of Uruguay from Spain to Portugal, the malignant policy of Pombal, and finally the suppression of the Society of Jesus, brought utter destruction on a work than which the whole history of evangelic enterprise presents nothing more suggestive and encouraging.

Nineteenth Century.—In 1822 the "Work of the Propagation of the Faith" was established at Lyons, with a view to assisting in the establishment and support of foreign missions. It was computed that in the first fifty years of its existence the Church had received, by the instrumentality of the missions connected with this society, an accession of about 700,000 neophytes. It distributes at the present time an income exceeding 200,000*l.* a year.

By the exertions of the present Bishop of Salford (Dr. Vaughan) "St. Joseph's College of the Sacred Heart for Foreign Missions," the chief object of which is to educate missioners to preach to the heathen, was founded a few years ago at Mill Hill, near London. Its missionaries already occupy important fields of work in the Madras Presidency of India and Borneo, besides the Negro Missions in the United States.

Great efforts have been made in recent years for the extension of the Gospel in Africa. Besides the titular sees in Algeria there are eleven vicariates, administered by bishops, which embrace the greater part of the seaboard all round the continent, and also the newly-founded vicariate of Central Africa, of which its bishop, Mgr. Comboni, fixed the seat at El Obeid, in Kordofan.

In Oceania there are fifteen vicariates-apostolic, most of which are of recent creation. When the Catholic missionaries have not been interfered with (as in the Gambier Islands, Easter Island, and Marquesas Islands) the native population has sometimes embraced Christianity en masse; but in numerous instances the work has been and is made difficult by the opposition of Wesleyans, Baptists, and other sectaries.

The supreme direction of all Catholic missions rests with the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda [PROPAGANDA]. (Henrion, "Hist. des Miss. Cath.;" Durand, "Miss. Cath. Françaises;" Wetzer and Welte, passim; Fleury, "Hist. Eccl.;" "Dublin Review," Jan. 1879.)

MITRE (Mitra infula). A head-dress worn by bishops, abbots, and in certain cases by other distinguished ecclesiastics. Mitra (μίτρα) is used in Greek and Latin for the turban which was worn by women, and among the Asiatics, specially Phrygians, by men. It had no connection with religious rites.

On the other hand, a band (infula) was worn by heathen priests and by the sacrificial victims. The Jewish priests wore a cap (מִגְבָּעָה, κίδαρις in the LXX) of uncertain form, though the root points to a round shape, and the high priest a turban (מִצְנֶפֶת), from a root meaning "to wind" (in LXX, κίδαρις and μίτρα), with a plate of gold on the front (צִיץ; LXX, πέταλον; Vulg. "lamina"), inscribed with the words, "Holiness to the Lord." The Vulgate uses "mitra" for the high priest's head-dress (Ecclus. xlv. 14), for the priest's (Exod. xxix. 9; Levit. viii. 13). It is certain, however, that the early Church did not adopt the head-dress of the Jewish priesthood and transfer it to her own priests or chief priests. Polycrates of Ephesus, indeed, writing about 190 (apud Euseb. "H. E."

v. 24) says of St. John the Evangelist that he "became a priest, having worn the plate (πέταλον)," and Epiphanius (Haer.) about 380, makes a similar statement about St. James, except that he makes it in St. James's case a mark of his Jewish, not his Christian priesthood, for he says he was allowed both to wear the πέταλον and enter the Holy of Holies. This account of Epiphanius is evidently legendary, for on what possible ground could the authorities of the Temple treat James as high priest? Bishop Lightfoot (see also Routh, "Rell. Sacr." ii. p. 28) is probably justified in regarding the language of Polycrates on St. John's "plate" as metaphorical. But, in any case, such a "plate" answers to no vestment now in use; and even if we could translate it "mitre" (as we cannot), this use by St. John stands quite by itself. It would have been his custom, not that of the Church.

Hefele, who treats the above notices of St. John and St. James as mere legends, contends, nevertheless, that there are clear traces of mitres used as part of the official ecclesiastical costume from the fourth century. After carefully considering the proofs which he alleges, we can see no reason for abandoning the judgment of Menard, the learned Benedictine editor of St. Gregory's Sacramentary — viz. that for the first thousand years of her history there was no general use of mitres in the Church. All Hefele's references can, we think, be explained as poetical or metaphorical. And, on the other hand, Hefele himself allows that no Sacramentary or Ritual-book before 1000 A.D. mentions the mitre, much less the bishop's investment with it at consecration, though, e.g., in a Mass for Easter Sunday written before 986 the ornaments of a bishop are enumerated. Again, liturgical writers, such as Amalarius and Walafrid Strabo, are silent on the subject. "It is not," we again quote from Hefele, "it is not till the eleventh century that representations of popes, bishops, and abbots with the mitre occur; though from that time onwards they are very numerous."

The use of the mitre seems to have begun at Rome, and then to have spread to other churches. Leo IX., in 1049, gave the "Roman mitre" to the Archbishop of Treves, and this is the earliest instance known of such a concession. Canons also, e.g., at Bamberg, got leave from Rome to wear the mitre on certain feasts, and it was used by all cardinals till, in 1245, the first Council of Lyons sanctioned the cardinal's hat. According to Gavantus (tom. i. 149), the first concession of a mitre to an abbot was made by Urban II. in 1091. The straight lines and sharp point familiar to us in the Gothic mitres first appear in works of art of the thirteenth century. The Italian mitre with its greater height and curved lines came into use in the fourteenth.

Bishops and abbots (if mitred) receive the mitre from the consecrating bishop, a ceremony, as Catalani shows, of late introduction. The "Cærimoniale Episcoporum" distinguishes the "precious mitre," adorned with jewels and made of gold or silver plate; the "mitra auriphrygiata," without precious stones (it may, however, be ornamented with pearls) and of gold cloth (ex tela aurea); the "plain mitre" (mitra simplex) of silk or linen and of white colour. The bishop always uses the mitre if he carries the pastoral staff. Inferior prelates who are allowed a mitre must confine themselves to the simple mitre, unless in case of an express concession by the Pope ("Manuale Decret." 870). The Greeks have no mitre. The Armenians have adopted a kind of mitre for bishops and a bonnet for priests since the eleventh century. (Hefele, "Beitrage," vol. ii.; Gavantus, Bona, "Rerum Lit." lib. i.; Catalani on the "Pontifical"; Menard on St. Gregory's Sacramentary. Innocent III. gives mystical meanings to the mitre and its parts—e.g. the two horns are the two testaments; the strings, the spirit and the letter, &c.).

MIXED MARRIAGES are marriages between persons of different religions. A marriage between a baptised and unbaptised person is invalid; one between a Catholic and a person of another communion—e.g. a Protestant—is valid, but, unless a dispensation has been obtained from the Pope or his delegate, unlawful. This explanation has been already given in the article on the IMPEDIMENTS OF MARRIAGE. But it will be useful to say something here on the legislation of the Church on marriages between Catholics and other Christians not Catholics.

(1) Benedict XIV. (Instruction on Marriages in Holland, 1741. Encyclical, "Magnæ nobis") has declared the Church's vehement repugnance to such unions, on the ground that they are not likely to be harmonious, that they expose the Catholic party and the children to danger of perversion, that they are apt to produce indifference, &c., &c.

(2) He says the Church has permitted them for very grave reasons, and generally in the case of royal personages; but even then on condition that the Catholic party be free to practise his or her religion, and that a promise be given that the children of either sex be brought up Catholics.

(3) Increasing intercourse between Catholics and Protestants made such marriages far more frequent, and the conditions insisted on by Benedict XIV. were neglected. In Silesia a law of the State in 1803 required the children of mixed marriages to be brought up in the religion of the father. In England, till very recent times, there was a common arrangement by which the boys were brought up in the father's, the girls in the mother's, religion; and neither in Silesia (see Hergenröther, "Kirchengeschichte," vol. ii. p. 856 seq.) nor in England did the Catholic clergy, as a rule, oppose this state of things. An attempt was made by the Prussian Government in 1825 to introduce the law which prevailed in Silesia and the other Eastern provinces to the Rhineland and Westphalia; and this order of the Cabinet was accepted by Von Spiegel, archbishop of Cologne, and also, though with some scruple, by the Bishops of Paderborn, Münster, and Treves. This led Pius VIII. and Gregory XVI. to declare a mixed marriage, when it was not understood that the children of either sex should be brought up Catholics, contrary to the "natural and divine law." Otherwise, the priest could take no part in the celebration. In extreme cases, and to avoid greater evils, he might passively assist at the contract; but more the Pope himself could not permit. Obedience to these Papal briefs led to the imprisonment of Droste von Vischering, the new archbishop of Cologne, in 1837, and to that of the Archbishop of Posen in 1839. The bishops, even those who had once been of a different mind, steadfastly adhered to the Papal regulations. One exception, however, must be mentioned. The Prince-Bishop of Breslau resigned his see in 1840 rather than submit, and became a Protestant. He died in 1871. Under the good king, William IV., peace was gradually restored beween Church and State.

(4) In the U. S., as elsewhere, the following is the present law. If a Catholic and Protestant desire to marry, they must promise to comply with the conditions given above. Then, if the bishop is satisfied that some grave reason for the marriage exists, he may grant a dispensation, and the marriage is then celebrated in the priest's house. But the nuptial benediction is not permitted. In England, the Anglican clergy no longer being registrars for civil recognition, no repetition of the ceremony in the Established Church is tolerated.

MOLINISM. [See GRACE.]

MOLINOS. [See QUIETISM.]

MONASTERY. [See CONVENT; MONK.]

MONK (A.-S. munuc, through the Lat. monachus, Gr. μοναχός, "solitary"). The ascetics of the first Christian age have been already described [ASCETÆ]. They did not, as a rule, separate themselves from men, but in the world practised a rigid mortification, and aimed at fulfilling the counsels of perfection. Monachism commenced in Egypt. In the middle of the third century the persecution of Decius caused many fervent Christians to leave the cities and flee into the deserts, there to find that freedom in the divine service which human laws denied them. For a long time they lived apart, each in his own cell, supporting themselves by daily labour. The anchorites or hermits [HERMITS] were those who specially desired solitude; of these, St. Paul was the founder. St. Antony, whose life embraces more than a hundred years (250–356), chose for a time absolute solitude, but in his later years he allowed a number of disciples to gather round him, who, though living each apart, were eager to profit by the depth and wisdom of his advice, and ready to practise whatever rules he might impose. Thus St. Antony was the founder of Monachism, although the cœnobitic life, which has been a characteristic of nearly all the monks of later times, had not yet appeared. Of this, St. Pachomius is regarded as the originator, who, about A.D. 315, built monasteries in the Thebaid. It is easy to conceive how the common life should appear, under given conditions, more suitable as a road to perfection than the separate life. How one might pass into the other may be seen from a passage in the "Orations" of St. Gregory Nazianzen.[1] Speaking of St. Athanasius taking refuge with the contemplatives of Egypt, who, "withdrawing themselves from the world, and embracing the wilderness, live to God," he says that, of these, "some, practising a life absolutely solitary and unsocial, converse with themselves and God alone, knowing no more of the world than they can become acquainted with in the desert; others, loving the law of charity by way of intercourse (κοινωνία), at once men of solitude and men of society, while dead to all other men and to worldly affairs in general . . . are a world to one another, and by comparison and contact sharpen one another's virtue." Hilarion, a disciple of St. Antony, is said to have been the first to introduce communities of monks in Palestine: Eustathius of Sebaste, in Armenia; St. Basil, in Cappadocia. St. Athanasius, by making known at Rome the story of the wonderful life of St. Antony, is said to have caused a great movement towards monasticism; in the time of St. Jerome the city had many monasteries both of monks and nuns. St. Martin was a strenuous upholder of the cœnobitic life; two celebrated French monasteries, Marmoutier, near Tours, and Ligugé, near Poitiers, were of his foundation. The rule of St. Austin was perhaps rather designed for regular clerks than for monks, who for a long time after their institution were all laymen. At first it was nearly true that every monastery followed its own rule; gradually, however, the rule of St. Basil [BASILIANS] obtained a preference, and, after its translation into Latin by Rufinus of Aquileia, was largely adopted in the West. Monachism languished in Italy in the fifth century, owing to the irruptions of the barbarians; in the sixth (529), the strong but gentle hand of St. Benedict of Nursia raised it to a pedestal from which it has never since been dethroned. [BENEDICTINES.] The Benedictine rule gradually swallowed up all the others, being found more suitable than any to the conditions of life in Western Europe. For several centuries no other rule was heard of. In the tenth and eleventh centuries, the Orders of Cluny, Camaldoli, the Chartreuse, and Citeaux, branched off from the parent stem. In the thirteenth century appeared the friars; in the sixteenth, the Jesuits, Theatines, and other regular clerks; followed down to our own day by the various congregations of both sexes, the members of which, under their several institutes, devote themselves to the glory of God and the good of their neighbour.

MONOPHYSITES. The early history of the Monophysites, who held that there was but one nature in Christ, and were condemned at the General Council of Chalcedon, has been given in a separate article. [CHALCEDON.] For two years, Eudocia, the widow of Theodosius II., was averse to the Confession of Chalcedon, and the monks in Palestine, counting on her protection, drove Juvenal, the Patriarch, from his see. In Egypt, Proterius, the orthodox successor of Dioscorus, was murdered in 457 by the fanatical populace, headed by Timothy the Cat and Peter the Stammerer, of whom the former usurped the Patriarchate, till driven out by the troops of the Emperor Leo I. In Antioch, another monk, Peter the Fuller, overthrew the lawful Patriarch, on his refusal to insert the words, "Who was crucified for us," in the Trisagion. Scarcely were these Monophysite leaders removed, when their party found a protector in the usurping Emperor Basiliscus (475–477). Timothy the Cat and Peter the Fuller recovered their sees, and the decision of Chalcedon was set aside in an Imperial Encyclical.

The Catholics might have looked for triumph when Zeno came to the throne. The Bishop of Constantinople, Acacius, had been hitherto orthodox, and Zeno restored an orthodox Patriarch at Alexandria—viz. Timothy Salifaciolus, succeeded by Talaja. But the latter offended the court and Bishop of Constantinople, and Acacius leagued with Peter the Stammerer, who on the death of Timothy the Cat became leader of the Egyptian Monophysites, and Zeno hit on a compromise meant to unite Catholics and Monophysites. His "Henoticon" of 482 condemned Nestorius and renewed the anathemas of St. Cyril but ignored the Council of Chalcedon, ordered preachers to avoid the points of controversy between Monophysites and their opponents, and bade the churches confine themselves to the Nicene Creed with the additions made to it at Constantinople. Peter the Fuller at Antioch, Timothy the Stammerer in Egypt, on the one hand, Acacius of Constantinople on the other, accepted these terms. But Rome would hear nothing of the "Henoticon," and there was a schism between East and West from 484 to 519. Even at Constantinople a powerful party, headed by monks, known as the Acœmeti, rejected the "Henoticon," and again many Monophysites in Egypt abhorred it, fell away from Timothy the Stammerer, and formed a separate sect, that of the Acephali. Justin I. acknowledged the authority of Chalcedon, and the church of Constantinople was once more in communion with that of Rome.

From this time the Monophysites split up into numerous sects. The Phthartolatræ, or Severians, fought with Aphthartolatræ, or Julianists, on the corruptible or incorruptible nature of Christ's body. A subdivision of the latter held that Christ's body since its union with the Word was increate; the Ctistolatræ were of the contrary opinion. The Themistians, or Agnoetæ, held that the human element in Christ before his resurrection was subject to ignorance. A Monophysite Aristotelian, Philoponus (560), argued that the three Persons of the Trinity were three distinct individuals, and his followers were known as Tritheists. Other Monophysite sects are mentioned by Petavius.

In 536, Armenia became Persian; in 640, the Saracens became masters of Egypt; and in these countries the Monophysites were of course freed from Byzantine persecution. In Syria and Mesopotamia they were harassed by Justinian, but their cause was maintained by the zeal of the beggar-monk, Jacobus Zangalus, called El Baradai. In all these countries, Monophysite churches still exist. They are represented (1) by the Armenian National Church; (2) by the Jacobite Christians of Syria and Mesopotamia; (3) the Coptic church; (4) the Abyssinian church. The Schismatic Christians of St. Thomas are now connected with the Jacobites. All these sects are described under separate articles. (Hefele, "Concil." vol. ii. For an elaborate account of the Monophysite divisions, see Petavius, "De Incarnat." I. cap. 16, 17.)

MONOTHELITES. A name given to those who held that Christ had only one will. "One will;" "one operation," of the Word made Flesh, were the watchwords of their party. They argued, there is but one Person in Christ, therefore a single will, and a single operation. The Catholic doctrine, on the other hand, is that there are two natures, and therefore two operations and two wills in Christ. The will is a faculty of the nature, and if Christ had no human will He cannot have been true man. He remains for ever God and Man, in two distinct natures each nature operates in the way proper to itself. Nature being the principle of operation; there are therefore two operations and two wills in Christ, the one Divine, the other human, although these wills are in perfect harmony with each other—since the human will of Christ follows, and is perfectly subject to, his Divine will. That Christ had two wills is implied in Luc. xxii. 42, John v. 30, where He distinguishes his own (human) will from that of the Father's, which is one with Christ's Divine will. Thus, Pope Agatho's synodal letter, accepted at the Sixth General Council—the Third of Constantinople—defines that Christ has "two natural wills, without division, change, partition, confusion, not contrary to each other, but the human will following and subject to the Divine." We may here add that Catholic theologians distinguish three kinds of operation in Christ; those which are purely Divine—e.g. creation, preservation of his creatures, &c.; those which are purely human, eating and drinking, weeping, &c.; those in which each nature acts—the Divine, as the principal, the human, as the instrumental cause—e.g. raising the dead, giving sight to the blind, &c. We proceed to the history of the heresy.

Heraclius (610–641) naturally desired the reconciliation of Monophysites and Catholics, for the Persians had pressed forward to the Hellespont, and there was urgent need to unite the Christians of the Empire as one man against them. In 622, Heraclius, in an interview with Paul, the head of the Armenian Monophysites, suggested the form "one energy," as a means of reconciling the contending parties. He made use of the same expedient, taught him probably by Sergius of Constantinople in 626, when he tried to effect a union between Cyrus, Catholic bishop of Phasis, and Athanasius, the Jabobite Patriarch. When Cyrus became Patriarch of Alexandria, he taught in nine κεφάλαια that Christ, because his two natures were united in one Person, "performed Divine and human acts by one theandric operation (i.e. by one operation at once Divine and human) according to St. Dionysius" (i.e. pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite). Sophronius, a monk of Palestine, when at Alexandria, tried to keep Cyrus from publishing these κεφάλαια, and also opposed the Monothelite doctrine at Constantinople. Soon after, Sophronius was raised to the Patriarchate of Jerusalem, and continued to oppose the union which had been effected with a section of the Monophysites—viz. the Theodosians. Cyrus and Sergius, occupying the two great sees of Alexandria and Constantinople, vigorously supported the Monothelite compromise, and the latter tried to enlist Pope Honorius on the same side—with what measure of success has been shown in a separate article. [See HONORIUS.] On the other hand, the Catholic doctrine was clearly formulated by the Synod of Jerusalem, which met under Sophronius, in 634. Three years later Jerusalem was taken by the Saracens, and shortly afterwards Sophronius died. In 638 Honorius, too, was gone, and a new phase of the controversy began.

In 638 Heraclius gave his Imperial authority to an Ecthesis or exposition of the faith composed by Sergius. This document forbade either phrase "one" or "two energies," but affirmed "one will" in Christ. The Ecthesis was supported by Pyrrhus and Paul, successors of Sergius at Constantinople, and by two councils held there in 638 and 639; but it was opposed throughout the West, condemned by the Popes John IV. and Theodore, Paul of Constantinople being excommunicated by the latter Pope. Moreover, the orthodox doctrine found a powerful champion in the abbot Maximus, formerly secretary of Heraclius, then abbot of Chrysopolis, who was active in defence of the Catholic doctrine in Africa (the particular place is uncertain) where he held a dispute with Pyrrhus, and at Rome. The Emperor Constans II. withdrew the Ecthesis and enforced upon the empire under strict penalties another document, known as the Type, which forbade all discussion of the number either of the energies or the wills. But in the Lateran synod of 649 Pope Martin I. condemned both Type and Ecthesis, and anathematised the Monothelite leaders. Martin was seized, finally banished to the Chersonnese, where, after enduring much misery, he died in 655. Maximus also died in banishment after cruel maltreatment in 662. An approach to peace between Rome and Constantinople was made about this time, but it was not concluded till Constantine Pogonatus (668–685) in union with Pope Agatho convoked the Third General Council of Constantinople. It met in 680, defined the existence of two wills in Christ and anathematised Sergius, Cyrus, Honorius, Pyrrhus, Paul, &c. The presiding Papal legates signed the decrees, which were confirmed by Pope Leo II. So ended the last great dogmatic dispute in the East. It was only in a corner of Asia—viz. in the fastnesses of Lebanon—that the Monothelite doctrine lingered. The adherents of this doctrine gathered round the monastery of St. Maro, acknowledged its abbot as their head, and persevered in their isolation till, during the Crusades, they were reconciled to the Church. [See MARONITES.] (Hefele, "Concil." vol. iii.)

MONTANISTS. The earlier writers call them "the men of Phrygia" (οἱ κατὰ Φρύγας) because Montanus belonged to that country, and it was at Pepuza that he and two women, Maximilla and Priscilla, claimed to exercise prophetic gifts. The great importance of the movement is shown by the facts that Tertullian, the ablest of the Antenicene Fathers except Origen, was won over to Montanism; that Claudius Apollinaris, Miltiades, and Rhodon exerted themselves against it; that the first councils of the Church were held in the middle of the second century to stem its progress in Asia Minor; and that three bishops of Rome, Soter, Eleutherus, and (probably) Victor, pronounced themselves against it—the last, according to Tertullian, after some hesitation (Tertull. "Adv. Prax." 1). Montanus, if we may believe the report mentioned by Euseb. ("H. E." v. 16), hanged himself, and so did Maximilla. The power of Montanism did not outlast the second century, but adherents of the sect are mentioned even in edicts of Justinian and Leo the Isaurian.

Montanism was a reaction against a change which necessarily occurred as the number of Christians increased, as the extraordinary gifts, prophecy and the like, became very rare, and there was no sign of our Lord's coming to close at once the fortunes of the world and the Church. It was this speedy coming of Christ which the new prophets announced; it was the belief in its nearness which they endeavoured to revive. "After me," said Maximilla (Epiphan. "Hær." xlviii. 2), "there will be no longer a propheteess, but the consummation." The prophets had already seen a miraculous representation of Christ's descent from heaven (Tertull. "Adv. Marc." iii. 24). It was time, then, for Christians to break utterly with a world which would ere long break with them. The concessions which the Apostles even had made to human weakness were to be allowed no longer. The Paraclete had appeared in the prophets and inaugurated the last and most perfect stage in the development of the Church ("De Virg. Veland." 1). The new discipline now in force made second marriages unlawful (Tertull. "Adv. Marc." i. 29, and "De Monog." and "Exhort. Castit." throughout); made the fasts of the Stations obligatory, and prolonged the fast till the evening, whereas with the Catholics it ended at 3 P.M. ("De Jejun." 10); and imposed two weeks (Saturdays and Sundays excepted) of "xerophagy" — i.e. of abstinence from flesh-meat, wine, dainties of all sorts, and the bath (ib. 15). No flight in persecution was lawful ("De Fuga," 6). But the most serious difference between Montanists and Catholics arose from their different views on absolution. In the "De Pudicitia" Tertullian combats the claim of the Roman bishop to pardon grievous sinners and restore them to the peace of the Church. He argues that this power belonged to the Apostles personally, just as the grace of miracles did, but denies that it was transmitted to their successors. God alone could forgive sins, and though, no doubt, He might declare his will through the prophets, and enable the Church to absolve from adultery, &c., as a matter of fact the Paraclete had said through the prophets, "The Church can pardon crimes, but I will not do so, lest they commit more crimes" ("Pudic." 21). "Psychici," or "animal men," is the name the Montanists gave to Catholics; "spiritual men" was the title they claimed for themselves.

Except on the power of the Keys there was no dogmatic difference between Montanists and the Church. Tertullian speaks of the Paraclete as inaugurating new discipline, not new doctrine ("De Pud." 11), and the author of the "Philosophumena" (viii. 19) expressly says the Montanists held Catholic doctrine, and only attributes Sabellian[1] error to some of them (τινὲς δὲ αὐτῶν τῇ τῶν Νοητιανῶν αἱρέσει συντιθέμενοι. κ.τ.λ.). As the Gnostics undermined the dogma, so the Montanists the discipline of the Church. The one set individual wisdom and intellect, the other individual holiness and devotion against the claim of ecclesiastical authority. And thus it is that Gnosticism and Montanism are two great factors in the development of the Catholic Church. The opposition which they occasioned led the Church to assert explicitly her double claim—her claim to teach the absolute truth on the one hand; to try the spirits and restore the sinner on the other. [Schwegler's work on Montanism—Tübingen, 1841—led to a more intelligent appreciation of the subject. Baur has given an interesting summary of his views in his "Kirchengeschichte," p. 237 seq. But the best and most careful account, so far as we know, is that of Ritschl, "Entstehung der Altkatholischen Kirche," pp. 462 seq.]

[1] "Patripassian" would be more accurate. No one could be more opposed to such an error than Tertullian. The general orthodoxy of the Montanists is further attested by Firmilian, Ad Cyp. and Epiphan. Haer. xlviii. 1.

MORAL THEOLOGY is the science of the laws which regulate duty. It is distinguished from moral philosophy, or ethics, which is concerned with the principles of right and wrong, and with their application, so far only as they can be discovered from the light of nature; whereas moral theology estimates the moral character of actions by their conformity, or want of conformity, not only to the natural standard of ethics, but also to the Christian revelation and positive law of the Church. It is different from dogmatic theology, which investigates the truths of revelation, their connection with each other and the conclusions which may be drawn from them; moral theology, on the other hand, looks primarily to duty and practice, not to speculative truth: it considers faith as a moral obligation, and the truths of faith as principles of conduct. But perhaps we shall give a better, if a less scientific, idea of moral theology by describing it as the science of priests sitting in the confessional, the science which enables them to distinguish right from wrong, mortal sin from venial sin, counsels of perfection from strict obligation, and so to administer the sacrament of Penance. Indeed, it is because moral theology has arisen from the wants and is adapted to the needs of priests in the confessional, because it is directed to the solution of cases more or less likely to occur, that treatises on the subject are mostly deficient in scientific unity. They draw from philosophers and dogmatic theologians, canon and civil law, ascetical and liturgical authors, &c., the material which a priest wants that he may know when to give, when to refuse, absolution, what conditions he is to exact from his penitents, how he is to advise and exhort them.

In the first centuries of the Church public penance was in force. This was regulated by the canons; much less was left to the judgment of the bishop or the priest, and therefore there was no pressing need for compendiums of moral theology. The administration of the sacrament of Penance was regulated by conciliar decisions or by collections of penitential canons, such as those attributed to St. Gregory Thaumaturgus, St. Peter of Alexandria, St. Basil, and St. Gregory Nyssen. From the seventh[1] to the thirteenth century the use of penitential books prevailed in the Latin Church—that is to say, from the whole body of decrees, canons, and sentences, those things which pertained to the sacrament of Penance were gathered in one book, known as "Extracts from the Canons of the Fathers for the Healing of Souls," "On Remedies for Sins," or, simply, "Penitential Book." In the thirteenth century moral theology arose. Up to that time the confessor had to be guided purely by his own reason and the authority of ecclesiastical decisions contained in his "Penitential Book." But now scholastic theologians and canonists began to discuss the sense of ecclesiastical decisions, to harmonise them, to draw inferences from them and from the principles of the natural and revealed law. "Cases of conscience" were considered and decided on the private judgment of theologians, and not merely, as before, by councils and bishops, though the name of "casuist" began, apparently, some centuries later. Collections were made of the things a confessor should know when he had to decide cases and doubts proposed to him.

Among the earliest works on moral theology are the following, which belong to the thirteenth century: "Summa de Casibus Penitentialibus," by St. Raymund of Pennafort (floruit 1228). Its four books treat (1) of sins against God; (2) of sins against our neighbour; (3) of ecclesiastics, their rights, privileges, duties; (4) of marriage. It was printed at Louvain, 1480; Cologne, 1495; Paris, 1500. "Summa de Virtutibus" and "Destructorium Vitiorum," are two works attributed, on doubtful grounds, to Alexander of Hales. The "Speculum Morale," by Vincent of Beauvais. The "Liber Penitentiarum," by John of God, written in 1247. Glosses on the "Summa" of St. Raymund of Pennafort were written by a Dominican, Gulielmus Redonensis, about 1250, and widely circulated under the name of "John of Freiburg." A little later came St. Bonaventure's "Confessionale."

The chief productions of the fourteenth century were: the "Summa Major" and "Quæstiones Casuales," by the Dominican, John of Freiburg; the "Summa de Casibus Conscientiæ," by a Franciscan, Astesanus or Astensis; "Summa Casuum Conscientiæ," by Monaldus, another Franciscan, who flourished about 1330; "Summa Casuum Conscientiæ," by Bartholomæus a S. Concordia, a Dominican of Pisa, who wrote in 1338; "Speculum Curatorum," by a Benedictine, Ranulphus Higdenus (1357). But the most famous book of this age appeared in 1385 from the pen of Joannes de Burgo. It is entitled, "Pupilla Oculi omnibus Sacerdotibus tam Curatis, quam non Curatis, summe necessaria, in qua tractatur de septem sacramentorum administratione, de decem præceptis decalogi, et de reliquis ecclesiasticorum officiis."

Many famous works on moral theology are due to authors of the fifteenth century. Gerson's "Opusculum Tripartitum de præceptis decalogi, de confessione, de arte moriendi," had so great a reputation that seventeen synods ordered priests to use it in expounding the Decalogue, hearing confessions, and visiting the sick. Three canonised saints, St. Bernardine of Sienna ("De Confessione"), St. John Capistran ("Speculum Conscientiæ," tractatus "De Canone Pœnitentiali," "De Usuris," "De Contractibus," &c.), and St. Antoninus, archbishop of Florence, wrote on moral subjects The "Summa Theologica et Summa Confessionalis" of the last has often been republished and is still quoted. Many other names might be given. Nor must it be supposed that an idea can be formed of mediæval moral theology from an account, even if an exhaustive one, of books exclusively devoted to this science. On the contrary, the greatest moral theologian of the middle ages, and the one who has had the most enduring influence, is St. Thomas of Aquin. But he, especially in the "Secunda Secundæ," treats moral theology in its organic connection with dogmatic theology. His example has been followed by many later writers; and this, we venture to think, is the true scientific method, though far less convenient for practical purposes. Scotus, on the other hand, scarcely touched on moral questions; perhaps because he found the ground sufficiently occupied by Alexander of Hales and St. Thomas.

[1] They were introduced rather earlier in the East; see the article on PENITENTIAL BOOKS.

From the sixteenth century moral theology has been treated with greater completeness, and its order has been perfected for practical use. But the great change which has occurred consists in this, that theories affecting the whole system of moral theology arose and divided casuists into schools clearly separated from and often bitterly hostile to each other. Medina, a Spanish Dominican (1528–1581) and professor at Salamanca, first (in his "Exposition of St. Thomas") propounded the theory since known as Probabilism[1] in set terms, and kindled a controversy which raged for two centuries after his death and is not yet quite extinct.

A probable opinion is one which rests on reasons which are good and solid, but not so strong as to exclude all doubt. Hence, in many matters of conscience there may be a probable opinion according to which I am free to choose a particular course of action, and another opinion, also probable, that I have no such liberty, the law, human or divine, having already decided the matter for me. After doing my best to ascertain the real extent of the obligation, I am still in doubt. The opinion which favours the law and that which favours my liberty both seem probable. In such cases, Probabilists hold that I am free to use my liberty. A doubtful law, they urge, is not binding. A man's conscience can be bound by a law only so far as he knows of its existence; and in this case I do not know for certain the existence of the law, nor have I the means of doing so. Therefore I may act with safety, because I am certain that practically the law does not bind me. But several limitations must be made. First, I must be sure that the opinion on the side of liberty rests on a firm basis in the reason of the thing, in the authors of great name and weight who support it, or in both. The proposition that I may follow a probability however slight in favour of liberty, belongs to lax, not to Probabilist, theologians, and was condemned by Innocent XI. (Prop. 3). Next, if a man is under the obligation of attaining to some definite external end, he is bound to take all reasonable means of securing that end, and may by no means follow an opinion probable, or even more probable, that the end will be secured. He must take the most certain means open to him. For example, a priest must not confer the sacraments after a fashion which leaves doubt as to their validity, if a safer path is open to him. A man must not pay a debt with money or a cheque which he knows may prove worthless, though he has strong reasons for thinking them good. A doctor must not use doubtful remedies, if he has better ones at command. A man may not fire at game, if he knows there is even a slight danger of wounding a fellow-creature. Such opinions, again, are lax, not Probabilist, and are contrary not only to the fundamental principles of Christianity, but also to the natural conscience and common sense of mankind.

Laxity manifests itself in many ways, and the reader may form some idea of the scandalous excesses into which it has run by reading the list of propositions condemned by the Popes, especially by Innocent XI. We need not say more about it here; and, on the other side, we may also dismiss the opinion of the Rigorists, or Tutiorists, who held that we must always take the safer way, always sacrifice our freedom, however small the probability that our freedom is restrained by the law. This opinion was proscribed by Alexander VIII. A kindred opinion that we must not take advantage of our liberty unless we can point to an opinion of the highest probability in its favour may also be dismissed, for it never found any considerable support among theologians. Very different is it with another system of moral theology, known as Probabiliorism, for long the powerful and even, for a time and in a certain degree, the triumphant rival of Probabilism.

The Probabiliorists put no restraint on liberty, where a man was convinced on solid grounds that the balance of evidence was decidedly in favour of his liberty. In such a case, they said, he acted prudently and as became a Christian. He was doing his best to ascertain the truth, and after weighing the reasons, had decided that he might do this or that without sin. He judged according to the merits of the case and decided according to the rules of evidence, just as an honest judge would do. He chose the way to which he was inclined, not solely because of his inclination, but because of the preponderating evidence. On the other hand, a man who used his liberty when the probability of the opinions for and against his right to exercise it were evenly balanced, wantonly exposed himself to danger of material sin. If he acted against an opinion which he himself allowed to be more probable, alleging an opinion also probable on his own side, he was judging against the weight of evidence and therefore sinning against the truth. If the Probabilists quoted the maxim, "A doubtful law does not bind," the Probabiliorists retorted, "In doubtful matters choose the safer side." If the Probabilists pleaded that they acted with safe and sure conscience, since, doubtful as they might be as to the absolute lawfulness of a particular action, they could be certain in practice that the action was lawful to them, since the law was uncertain, and, not being certain, had no binding force, the Probabiliorists replied, "You cannot feel certain of this without culpable presumption. The reflex principle which you assume to be morally certain and make the basis of your conviction that in the particular case you are certainly free to act, is, in fact, contested by all Probabiliorists—i.e. by a vast number of grave and learned theologians from all nations, orders, and ranks in the Church. Yet, if this reflex principle be doubtful, if your argument, 'The law is uncertain, and therefore I am certain it does not bind,' is itself not absolutely and evidently cogent, then the question is at an end. You yourselves admit the wickedness of acting with a conscience practically doubtful. 'Whatsoever is not of faith is of sin.'"

From 1580 till about 1650 Probabilism, as even Billuart does not venture to deny, held possession of the schools. The great theologians prior to Medina's date did not treat the question formally, and are quoted on both sides. From about 1650 a powerful reaction set in. In France, Zaccaria writes, Probabilism was hated as "the pest of morality," and in 1700 it was condemned in the Assembly-General of the French clergy. The learned Benedictines of St. Maur and St. Vannes and the Fathers of the French Oratory were notoriously hostile to it. Nor must it be thought that this hostility was peculiar to French ecclesiastics or to Gallicans. Most, according to Billuart, of the Dominicans, some distinguished Jesuits (e.g. Gonzalez, General of the Society), and many Italian writers (e.g. Concina, the learned brothers Peter and Jerome Ballerini, Berti, Fagnanus, many years secretary of the Congregation of the Council) were in the hostile ranks. Benedict XIV. made the moral theology of the Jesuit Antoine (in the Roman edition of the Franciscan Carbognano), an author rigid even among the Probabiliorists, the text-book at the Propaganda. And it may perhaps be worth mention that Bishop Milner recommended Collet, another Probabiliorist, for the use of his clergy. It was the text-book at Oscott within the memory of priests still alive. Henno, a well-known Franciscan, calculated that when he wrote—viz. in 1710—there were twenty Probabiliorists for one Probabilist; while the Flemish theologian Billuart, in 1747, thought the preponderance of numbers on the side of Probabiliorism had been doubled in the interval. No faith can be placed even in the proximate accuracy of these estimates. Still, they may be fairly accepted as evidence that numbers were on the side of Probabiliorism.

The proportion is now reversed, and Probabilism is the popular theory throughout the Church. It may indeed be regarded as the only existent theory. Carrière (died 1864), a distinguished Sulpician, who wrote "De Contractibus et Matrimonio," is the only recent writer on moral theology, so far as we know, who is not a Probabilist. This change is due partly, we think, to the force of reason, for we cannot see that Probabiliorism is logical and consistent, and the arguments adduced by its advocates really tend to Tutiorism; partly to the disappearance of the old French church and many Catholic universities where the stricter doctrine on morals had a strong hold; partly to the great influence of St. Liguori's works on moral theology. His "Theologia Moralis" and "Homo Apostolicus" appeared about the middle of last century, and have often been republished. At present the Probabilist theology of this writer is accepted almost everywhere in the Church, and the recent works of Scavini and Gury are little more than adaptations of St. Liguori, though, of course, these authors do not follow him blindly, and the Jesuit Ballerini (in his notes to Gury) often differs from his conclusions. Moreover, the Congregation of Rites, in a decree confirmed by the Pope in 1803, declared that St. Liguori's works contained "nothing worthy of censure." This, as Heilig, the Redemptorist editor, explains, by no means implies that each statement of St. Liguori is true, or even that none of them will ever be condemned by the Church. It only means that his works are free from any "error already recognised as such by the Church." So again, in 1831, the Sacred Penitentiary affirmed that a confessor might safely follow all St. Liguori's opinions on account of the judgment of the Holy See just quoted, adding, however, that there was no fault in adopting the opinions given by other approved authors. The recent elevation of St. Liguori to the rank of Doctor of the Church makes no formal difference in the authority of his system, though it is clearly another mark of the Church's approbation. The Pope would not have made St. Liguori a Doctor of the Church had he regarded the great literary work of his life in defending and expounding Probabilism as a mistake.

We passed over by design a subdivision which exists among Probabilists themselves. Æqui-probabilists hold that a man may use his liberty, if the reasons in favour of his right to do so are at least equal in probability to those on the other side, but not otherwise. Probabilists pure and simple would allow a man to take advantage of his liberty, if he has really probable grounds for thinking that the law does not bind him, even if the argument on the other side is more probable. This subdivision of Probabilists is an old one, but it has attracted more attention of late, now that Probabilists are in possession of the field and have time for disputes with each other. The Redemptorist authors of the "Vindiciæ Alphonsianæ" try, we believe, to show that St. Liguori was an Æqui-probabilist. The object of their book is to correct Ballerini, who edited the moral theology of his brother Jesuit Gury, with elaborate notes, in which he not only assumes that St. Liguori was a Probabilist pure and simple, but often defends the probability of opinions which St. Liguori rejected. In his third edition, Ballerini replies to the charges of laxity which the Redemptorists made against him.

(The historical part of this article is drawn from Zaccaria's learned dissertation prefixed to some editions of St. Liguori's "Theologia Moralis." We have said nothing of the great moral theologians who have written during the last three centuries, De Lugo, Sporer, La Croix, &c., because a useful list of them is prefixed to Gury's work and is sure to be in the hands of those whom the subject interests.)

MORTAL SIN. [See SIN.]

MOZZETTA (from mozzo mutilus: cf. μίτυλος and μύτιλος, curtailed). A short vestment, quite open in front, which can, however, be buttoned over the breast, covering the shoulders and with a little hood behind. It is worn by the Pope, by cardinals, bishops, abbots, and others who do so by custom or Papal privilege—e.g. in England by canons. As it is the usual state dress of a bishop, when he is not saying mass or performing other sacred functions, bishops, &c., are usually painted with the mozzetta. The mozzetta leaves the greater part of the rochet uncovered, hence it is either not worn at all or worn only over the mantelletta by cardinals, bishops, and others where they have no jurisdiction. Thus the cardinals wear the mozzetta and rochet only in the churches from which they take their titles; but throughout Rome during a vacancy of the Holy See, especially at Conclaves.

The Pope wears five different mozzette. In the hotter part of the year—viz. from the first vespers of the Ascension to the feast of St. Catharine, his mozzetta is of red satin except on vigils, ember days, Masses of the dead, and other penitential occasions, when it is of red serge or camlet ("di saia rossa o cammellotto.") The other half of the year, he wears a mozzetta of red velvet, except as a mark of sorrow or penance in Advent, Septuagesima to the end of Lent, vigils, &c., when his mozzetta is of red woollen cloth (panno rosso). On a feast, such as those of the Annunciation and Conception, the anniversary of his election and consecration, on visiting a church where the Blessed Sacrament is exposed, &c., he puts aside the mourning mozzetta even during penitential seasons. From Holy Saturday till Saturday in Low Week, his mozzetta is of white damask. The cardinals have four mozzette—viz. of red or purple silk, violet silk, rose-coloured silk, violet serge. (Moroni, "Dizionario Istorico.")

MUNDATORY or Purificatory. A cloth of linen or hemp (S. C. R. May 18, 1819), used for cleansing the chalice. It has a small cross in the middle to distinguish it from the Lavabo towel. It is mentioned in the "Cæremoniale Episcoporum," but its use is of recent date and it is not blessed. The Greeks use a sponge instead. (Benedict XIV. "De Miss." i. v. 5.)

words signify things; but sometimes God ordained that the things signified by the words should signify other things, and so we get the mystical or spiritual sense. St. Paul, for example, tells us in the Epistle to the Galatians, that Ismael and Isaac were types of Jewish bondage and Christian liberty. The mystical sense is subdivided into the allegorical, where the things of the old signify the mysteries of the new law, the moral where they signify moral precepts, the anagogical where they signify future glory (St. Thomas, I. Qu. I. a. 10). The mystical interpretation is by no means peculiar to Christians. Philo, St. Paul's contemporary, found in the allegorical interpretation of the Old Testament an easy means of reconciling it with Greek philosophy, and allegorical interpretation has been systematised by the Rabbins.[1] St. Paul's authority proves that there is a mystical sense in Scripture; but common sense warns us of the dangers attached to such a method of interpretation. And St. Thomas, following St. Augustine, teaches that arguments can be drawn from the literal sense alone (loc. cit.).

MYSTICAL THEOLOGY. One of the subdivisions of theology classed under the more general division of Moral Theology. It is sometimes identified with Ascetical Theology, but it seems more proper to confine its definition in such a way as to distinguish it precisely by its specific name of "Mystical," from that which is more properly called "Ascetical." According to this stricter definition it is described as comprising two parts—viz. the doctrinal and the experimental. The experimental is defined as "a pure knowledge of God which the soul ordinarily receives in a luminous darkness or obscure light of sublime contemplation, together with an experimental love so intimate that the soul, losing itself altogether, is united to God and transformed into Him." This is called Theology because it contains acts proximately referred to God as their object; Mystical because acquired by a secret operation known only to God and the recipient of his divine favours; and experimental, because it is only by personal spiritual experience that such a knowledge of God can be gained. Doctrinal Mystical Theology is "a science which considers the acts of the experimental, and discusses their essence, properties, and effects, according to the authority of the Scriptures and the contemplative saints, giving practical rules for the guidance of those who have attained, or are in the way to attain, the state of high contemplation."

The most eminent mystical writers in the Catholic Church are Pseudo-Dionysius the so-called Areopagite, St. Bernard, St. Thomas, St. Anselm, St. Buonaventura, Hugh and Richard of St. Victor, Gerson, Harphius, Tauler, St. Teresa and St. John of the Cross, and others. The great modern Doctor in Mystical Theology, whose works are the most complete and luminous, the most sublime, and at the same time the most philosophically exact and precise, and whose authority is the highest which any private theologian can have, is St. John of the Cross. His works have been translated into English in the best manner by Mr. Lewis. A more unpretending but very solid and useful treatise is the "Sancta Sophia" of F. Baker, an English Benedictine. As scientific and methodical treatises for the use of directors and professed theologians, the "Institutiones Theologiæ Mysticæ" of F. Schram, O.S.B., and the "Directorium Mysticum" of F. Scaramelli, S.J., are in the highest repute.

[1] They also recognise four modes of interpreting Scripture—viz. the literal (פְּשַׁט), the seeking of hints for laws, precepts, &c. (רֶמֶז), the deduction of dogma and legal determinations (דְּרַשׁ), the interpretation of mystical theology (סוֹד). See Hamburger, Real. Encycl. für Bibel und Talmud; art. "Exegese."

NAME, CHRISTIAN, ETC. [See BAPTISMAL NAME.]

NAME OF JESUS. [See JESUS.]

NAME OF MARY. [See MARY, FEAST OF THE NAME.]

NATALE, NATALITIA. The day on which a saint is born into eternal life —i.e. the day of his death. The Church does not celebrate the natural birthday of the saints because they were born in sin, and the fact that she keeps the birthday of St. John the Baptist is, as St. Augustine points out, an exception which proves the rule, for St. John was cleansed from original sin before his birth.[1]

The use of Natale, Natalitia, &c., for the day of a saint's death is very ancient. Thus the Church of Smyrna says of their bishop Polycarp, "We keep the birthday of his martyrdom" (τὴν τοῦ μαρτυρίου αὐτοῦ ἡμέραν γενέθλιον) ("Mart. Polyc." 18), and Tertullian speaks of the Mass said on the feasts of Martyrs as "oblationes pro natalitiis" ("De Corona," 3). The Church still retains the use of the word in her collects. Thence Natale came to mean a feast generally—e.g. "Natale Petri de Cathedra" in the ancient Kalendarium Beccleriannum is the feast of St. Peter's chair. It was also used for the anniversary of a bishop's consecration. (Probst, loc. cit.; Smith and Cheetham.)

NATIONAL SYNOD. [See COUNCIL.]

NATIVITY OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN. Nothing is known about the place, date, or circumstances of the Blessed Virgin's birth. Joachim and Anne were her parents, and this belief, the earliest authority for which is the tradition of Apostolic days, was current in the East. This teaching is found in the "Protoevangelium Jacobi," an apocryphal gospel of early date. It is recognised by St. John of Damascus and James, bishop of Edessa, while the "Liber Pontificalis," mentions in the life of Pope Leo III. that he had the history of St. Joachim and St. Anne painted in the Basilica of St. Paul. The feast of St. Anne on July 26, which is mentioned in the Roman and other Martyrologies, was sanctioned for the whole Church by Gregory XIII. in 1584.

It is very uncertain when the feast of the Blessed Virgin's nativity was introduced. The Breviary lessons for the feast, said to be taken from St. Augustine, are of course spurious. The mention of the feast in Sacramentaries of St. Leo and St. Gregory prove little, considering the changes and frequent recensions which books of that sort, intended, as they are, for practical purposes, are sure to undergo. It is not mentioned by the Council of Mayence in 813, though it gives a list of the feasts then celebrated, nor again in the capitularies of Charlemagne and Louis the Pious. On the other hand, it is mentioned by Walter, bishop of Orleans, in 871, and in a work on the virginity of Mary ascribed to St. Ildefonsus, but really, as Dachery thinks, written by Paschasius Radbertus, in the middle of the ninth century. It is placed in the list of holidays by the Emperor Manuel Commenus in the middle of the twelfth century, and the Copts as well as the Greeks have adopted it. Both Greeks and Latins now keep it on September 8, though at one time this was not everywhere the day fixed for the celebration. The octave was added by Innocent IV. in consequence, it is said, of a vow made by the cardinals at the election of Celestine IV. The dissensions between the Church and Frederic II. made it difficult to secure the peace necessary for an election, and in this extremity the Conclave begged the Blessed Virgin's prayers and promised, in case the favour was granted, to have an octave added to the feast of her nativity.

NECROLOGY. A book containing the names of the dead, especially of bishops who had built the church to which the necrology belonged, of benefactors, friends, &c., that they might be prayed for. Such a book, as Meratus shows, is mentioned by Bede[1] ("H. E." iv. 14). According to Mr. Maskell it seems also to have been called Album or "White Book," Obituarium, Mortilegium. (Meratus on Gavantus, tom. II. § v. 21; Maskell, "Monumenta Ritualia," clxxvii. seq.).

NEOPHYTE (Gr. νεόφυτος, newly grown, of new nature). The term was applied in the primitive Church to converts newly baptised. They were dressed in white garments, and continued to wear them for eight days after their baptism. Thus of the West Saxon king Cedwalla, who renouncing his crown went to Rome to be baptised, and died soon after, we hear that he died while still in his white garments, "in albis adhuc positus."[2] The Nicene Council ordered (Can. 2) that neophytes should not be hastily admitted to holy orders, but should undergo a probation of considerable length. This canon was evidently founded on the prohibition of St. Paul (1 Tim. iii. 6), and occasioned by the ill effects which had arisen from neglecting it. In later times the neophytes commonly met with, at least in Europe, were converts from heresy, Judaism, or Islam. For these Gregory XIII. founded an ecclesiastical college. The matrimonial relations between spouses, of whom one has become a neophyte but the other refuses to leave his or her original persuasion, give rise to many difficult questions in canon law. The Catholic missionaries still use the term for their converts from the heathen, whose fervour and steadfastness are often found to equal anything recorded of the primitive neophytes. (Ferraris, Neophyti.)

NESTORIANS. A name given to the Christians who follow the doctrine of Nestorius, and hold that there are two persons as well as two natures in Jesus Christ. These two distinct persons, the person of God and that of man, were, he said, bound together in Jesus Christ by a merely moral union—i.e. there was a conformity of will between the man Christ and God the Word, who dwelt in Him, and hence the properties of one nature or person could not be ascribed to the other. He rejected, e.g., such expressions as the "Word suffered," on the ground that it was the man Christ and not God the Word who was capable of suffering; "Mary is the mother of God," since Christ indeed had a mother, but God had none (Petav. "De Incarnat." i. 9). But a full account of the doctrine and history of Nestorius has been given in the article on the Council of Ephesus, and we confine ourselves to the history of the Nestorian Church.

The Nestorians had their original home and centre in Chaldæa and Mesopotamia. Christianity, it is said, was first preached there by Mar Addai and Mar Mari, of the number of the Seventy. The Bishop of Seleucia and Ctesiphon held the chief see in these parts, and after the schism became independent of Antioch.[1] The famous school of Edessa and the writings of Theodore of Mopsuestia prepared the way for Nestorianism, and when in 498 Babæus, whom the metropolitan Barsumas of Nisibis had won over to Nestorianism, ascended the throne of Seleucia-Ctesiphon, Catholicism disappeared almost entirely in Mesopotamia. The Persians for obvious reasons encouraged the schism which separated their Christian subjects from the Greek church of the Byzantine empire. The Persian kingdom was the refuge of Nestorianism. Thence it spread not only through Mesopotamia, Chaldea, and Persia, but also to Arabia, Egypt, Media, Bactria, Hyrcania, India, and even China. The Nestorian Patriarch in the eleventh century had twenty-five metropolitans under him; the Nestorian "communion extended from China to Jerusalem, and its numbers, with those of the Monophysites, are said to have surpassed those of the Greek and Latin Churches together" (Newman's "Arians," p. 425).

Towards the end of the fourteenth century the Nestorian numbers fell rapidly, owing to the persecution by the Mongol king Timour. Later, the Nestorians suffered from internal schism. On occasion of a contested election to the Patriarchate three bishops and many priests appealed to Pope Julius II., who in 1553 proclaimed Sulaka "Patriarch of the Chaldeans," and thus began the series of patriarchs for the Chaldeans or descendants of Nestorians, who have renounced Nestorian doctrine and are in union with the Pope In 1582 an archbishop, Simeon, who had separated some years previously from the Nestorian Patriarch, and called himself Patriarch of Kurdistan, also submitted to the Pope, and he too received from Rome the title of Chaldean Patriarch. These reunions with the Catholic Church did not last long. But since the middle of the sixteenth century there were two Nestorian Patriarchs, one residing at Mosul, another in Central Kurdistan, and the constant intestine strife favoured the efforts of the Roman missionaries. In 1780 the Nestorian Patriarch Mar Elias at Mosul became a Catholic, and consequently it is only by the Lake of Urumiah and among the mountains of Kurdistan that Nestorians are found. The Christians in the low countries by the banks of the Tigris are Chaldeans—i.e. the descendants of Nestorians, now re-united to the Catholic Church. The Nestorians proper call themselves Suraya (Syrian) Christiane, Meshihaye (Christians) Nestoraye, but never Chaldeans, which name is exclusively reserved to Catholics. It is true the Nestorian Patriarch calls himself "Patriarch of the Chaldeans in the East," but this title he only only assumes in order to place himself on a level with the Catholic Patriarch at Mosul, and to avoid being regarded by the Latins as the head of an heretical sect.

The Bishop of Seleucia and Ctesiphon received the title of Catholicos in the fourth century—as representative in the East of the Antiochene Patriarch. He himself assumed the title of Patriarch after the schism. Till the middle of the fifteenth century he was chosen by the metropolitans and other bishops. These last assembled with the archdeacon of the former Patriarch and with the chief laity and chose the new Patriarch unanimously. In difficulty, recourse was had to the lot, and from 987 the secular power confirmed the election. Since 1450 the Patriarch has been chosen from one family, and generally the office has descended from uncle to nephew. The indispensable qualification for a Patriarch is that his mother during her pregnancy and while suckling her child, and the new Patriarch himself till the time of his election, should never have tasted flesh-meat. The Patriarch confirms the election of bishops, translates and deposes them. He alone consecrates the holy oils; no book can be published without his approbation. He prescribes the liturgical rules and his name is always mentioned in the daily office. The Patriarch also exercises civil jurisdiction in cases where Nestorians only are concerned, and though there is a right of appeal to the Emir, it is seldom used. In 872 the residence of the Patriarch was transferred from Seleucia to Bagdad; from 1258 onwards, he resided in various places; after 1560 he lived in the neighbourhood of Mosul. After Elias XI., patriarch of Mosul, had been reconciled to the Catholic Church in 1780, the Bishop of Urumiah, who had assumed the title of Patriarch long before in 1582, became the only Nestorian Patriarch. In 1590 he withdrew to Kochanes, in Kurdistan. In 1842 his residence was burnt by the Emir, Nurallah Beg, next year he was driven by the Kurds to Mosul; but in 1848 he returned to Kochanes (Badger, vol. i. pp. 258, 374.) His income is got from a poll-tax levied every three years, from commutation of excommunications into fines, and from a tithe on the first-fruits contributed for the support of the churches.

The new bishops used to be chosen by clergy and laity in the presence of the provincial bishops. At present they are chosen, if any suitable candidate can be found in this way, from the relatives of the former bishop. The bishop is consecrated by the Patriarch and sometimes by the metropolitan; but in the latter case he must receive the completion of the rite, involving the confirmation of the election, from the Patriarch himself. Diocesan synods are to be held twice a year, those of the metropolitan province annually, those of the Patriarchate every four years. Bishops in distant places may send, instead of personal appearance, an account of their dioceses and letters of union to the Patriarch once every six years. Married men or widowers cannot become bishops, metropolitans, or patriarchs. A law of the Patriarch Babæus in 499 permitted the reiterated nuptials even of the highest ecclesiastics; but it was repealed by the Patriarch Mar-Abas in 514. Still the letter of two canons in the Sinhados assumes that bishops may be married (Badger, vol. ii. ch. 36, p. 180). The metropolitan (matran) has no power over his suffragans, except that of summoning them to synods and consecrating them. The usual title of the bishop is "Abuna" (Father). He is supported by an annual poll-tax, gifts in kind at harvest-time, fees for ordination, consecration of churches, dispensations for marriage, &c. The diocese of the Patriarch is in Central Kurdistan. There are eight metropolitans with seven bishops. The whole Nestorian population amounts to about 70,000 ("Silbernagl." p. 222). The archdeacon is the bishop's vicar in the spiritual and temporal matters. The chorepiscopus (saura or visitor, corresponding to the Greek περιοδεύτης) visits the country churches. He instructs the country clergy in their functions, sees that the episcopal dues are collected, superintends the election of parish-priests, &c. His place is at the bishop's left, that of the archdeacon at his right. Next comes the archpriest, who is the chorepiscopus of the city.

The parish-priests, who are married and may even marry again after ordination, are chosen by the people, the bishop confirming the choice. An office peculiar to the Nestorians is that of the Sciahara or cleric, who is responsible for the night-hours of the Breviary office. He is only, as a rule, a cantor (amura) by ordination, although he is called deacon or priest. The parish-priests, though they have great influence and are consulted in all political and domestic affairs of importance, get very little money and follow a trade. There are two minor orders, reader and subdeacon; three higher, deacon, priest, bishop. The tonsure is given before the lectorate.

The monasteries, once numerous among the Nestorians, are now extinct. The only old monastery is in the hands of the Chaldeans—i.e. Catholics of the same rite, and no new ones have arisen. The monastic profession declined after the fourteenth century, when vows of chastity were no longer regarded as irrevocable. The canons, however, required monks and nuns who married to do so privately and with the bishop's leave. A monk and nun before their marriage were subjected to penance. Although there are now no nunneries, there are women under temporary[1] vows of chastity who occupy themselves in works of Christian charity (Badger, vol. ii. p. 179).

NICENE COUNCILS. The main history of the Nicene councils has been already given—that of the former in the articles ARIANS and CREEDS, that of the latter under ICONOCLASTS. Little need be added here. For the convocation, presidency, &c., of both, see the article COUNCILS.

1. The First Nicene and First General Council met in 325, after Constantine had sent Hosius to Alexandria in order to reconcile the Catholics and Arians, and the mission had proved unsuccessful. The bishops, according to Athanasius, who was present, were 318 in number, mostly from the East, though Hosius of Cordova played a great part in the council, and the Roman bishop was represented by the priests Vitus and Vincentius. Besides asserting the full and consubstantial divinity of the Son, the council dealt with various matters of discipline, especially the Paschal controversy (see EASTER) and the Meletian schism. The canons are twenty in number, for the eighty Arabic canons are mostly of much later date. Neophytes were not to be ordained (Canon 2), clerics not to live with subintroductæ (3); the metropolitans to confirm and superintend episcopal elections (4); no bishop to receive persons excommunicated by another, but an appeal might be made to the provincial council (5); the patriarchal rights of Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch were to be maintained (6); decisions follow on the rights of the Bishop of Jerusalem (see JERUSALEM); on the reconciliation of the Cathari or Novatians (8); then come penitential canons (9–14); canons on usury, change of place by the clergy, &c. (15–17); subjection of deacons to priests (18); the disciples of Paul of Samosata were to be rebaptised before they were received into the Church (19); prayer was to be made standing on Sundays and during Easter time. (See also CELIBACY.)

2. The Second Nicene Council, the Seventh General, met in 787 under Tarasius. Besides defining the veneration due to holy images, the council published twenty-two canons, in which the so-called Apostolic Canons, and the œcumenical character of the Council in Trullo were recognised, clerics forbidden to leave the church where they had been stationed, the lives of bishops, the relations of clerics and nuns regulated, double monasteries forbidden, &c., &c. For the position taken by Rome with reference to some of these enactments, see TRULLO, COUNCIL IN.

[1] It appears, however, to be very possible to obtain release from these vows (Badger, vol. ii. p. 179).

NOMINATION. One of the ways by which the designation of a bishop to a see may be effected. The ordinary mode is that of election by the chapter; this has been the rule ever since, in the Empire, the Concordat of Worms (1122) put an end to the abuse of the emperor's investing bishops by "ring and crosier," and since, in England, the Papal interdict compelled King John to cease from forcing his nominee upon the see of Norwich. In France, by the Concordat of 1515 [CONCORDAT], the Holy See conceded the nomination to bishoprics to the Kings of France, but the persons chosen were to be confirmed by the Pope, after due inquiry into their canonical qualifications. Under the Concordat of 1802 the nomination, with a similar proviso, continues to be in the hands of the French Government. Not the King of France only, but the Kings of Spain, Portugal, and the Two Sicilies, and the House of Austria, obtained this right of nomination. It was extended even to the President of Hayti, by a Concordat signed in 1860. Yet, as Buss well remarks,[1] the monarchical principle does not imply or require such a right; and if it be said that it is part of that surveillance which a civil ruler must exercise over all that passes within his dominions, "one may answer that it is solicitude for ecclesiastical interests which ought to determine the election of a bishop, and that this solicitude is more to be expected in an ecclesiastical body than in the government."

NOMOCANON (νόμος, law; κανών, rule). Collections of the canons of recognised councils, and of such portions of the civil law as refer to Church matters, are called by this name. The earliest is that of Fulgentius, a deacon of the Church of Carthage in the sixth century. The best known is that compiled in the ninth century by the celebrated Photius, patriarch of Constantinople; it contains the ancient canons down to and including those of the Seventh General Council, or second of Nicæa (787), and the imperial constitutions affecting the church to the same date. Balsamon, chartophylax at Constantinople in the thirteenth century, added a commentary to the work of Photius. The Nomocanon which goes under the name of St. Wladimir, and is accepted as the basis of canon law in Russia, contains canons which are not recognised by the Western Church.

NOVATIANISM. Novatian, a Stoic philosopher, was delivered, as is said, from demoniacal possession by the exorcisms of the Church, and became a catechumen. In danger of death, he received clinical baptism, and afterwards, without being confirmed, was ordained priest. During persecution he refused to assist his brethren, but, later on, he protested against the laxity of the Roman clergy in receiving the lapsed to penance, and led away many Roman priests. Afterwards, he was a bitter opponent of Pope Cornelius, on the ground that he was a libellaticus; persuaded three country bishops to consecrate him in the year 251, and thus became, in Fleury's words, "the first Anti-Pope" (Fleury, ii. p. 220). He consecrated new bishops and sent them as emissaries to various parts (Cyprian, Ep. lv.).

He added heresy to schism, for he denied the Church's power to absolve the lapsed[1] (Pacian, "Ad Symphor." Ep. 3). He was condemned in councils at Rome and Carthage, and by Dionysius of Alexandria. His sect, however, continued, and won adherents in Constantinople, Asia Minor, and especially Phrygia. Like the Montanists, they condemned second marriage, and they rebaptised Catholics who joined them. They called themselves "the pure" (καθαρούς, Euseb. "H. E." vi. 43). Even at the Nicene Council, Ascesius, a Novatian bishop, defended these severer principles on penance (Socrates, "H. E." i. 10).

A modern historian (Baur, "Kirchengeschichte," i. p. 367) has said with justice that the Cathari, or Novatians, sacrificed the catholicity to the sanctity of the Church. Undoubtedly, the full privileges of the Church are for the pure, and the pure alone. But the Church is the steward of the Divine mysteries, and it is her office, through the means of grace entrusted to her, to effect and to renew that purity of heart which she requires from her children. The Church has neither the power nor the will to exclude those who truly repent. Hatred of sin and mercy to sinners is the double lesson taught by her Divine Founder. If she refused to receive sinners, she would cease to be catholic; if she received them without true repentance, she would cease to be holy. (The principal authorities on the Novatian schism are Euseb. "H. E." vi. 43 seq.; Cyprian's numerous Epistles to Cornelius. Pacian, Ep. 3, "Ad Symphorian." thus sums up the doctrine of Novatian: "Quod mortale peccatum ecclesia donare non possit, imo quod ipsa peccat recipiendo peccantes." For the later history of the Novatians, see Socrat. "H. E." v. 21, 22.)

[1] It must be remembered how strict the discipline of the Church was in those day Thus Cyprian (Ep. lv.) tells us that some of th Catholic bishops absolutely refused to accep the repentance of any one who had committed adultery: "totum pœnitentiæ locum contra adulteria cluserunt."

NOVICE, NOVITIATE (Lat. novitius). The name of "novice" is given to those persons, whether men or women, and whatever their age may be, who have entered some religious house and desire to embrace its rule. Upon entering, they assume the habit of the order or congregation, and follow the community life and customs. The term of probation, or "novitiate," is at least for one year;[1] sometimes it extends to two or three years. During that period neither is the order bound to the novice nor the novice to the order. At the end of the term the order is in no way bound to allow the novice to make his profession, if he does not seem to those in authority likely to adorn the religious life; and the novice, on the other hand, may quit the order without censure, and retains, should he do so, the property which he possessed at the time of his admission, or which he may have subsequently become possessed of. Nor can he, while a novice, legally renounce such property in favour of the order, unless with the licence of the bishop and within the two months next preceding his profession.[2] But he may make a will in favour of the order which he has joined, and for this reason—because it is in his power at any time, if he decides not to go on to profession, to cancel his will. The fact of his having made it is therefore no restraint upon his leaving the order if he thinks himself unfit for it; whereas, if he had renounced his property altogether in favour of the order, or his parents had renounced it for him, this fact would tend to restrain his freedom in the event of a sudden reaction of feeling coming upon him soon after his becoming a novice.

The earliest age at which profession is allowable was fixed by the Council of Trent at sixteen years.

The name "novitiate" is also sometimes given to the house, or separate building, in which novices pass their time of probation. (Ferraris, Novitius.)

NUN (Lat. nonna. From the fifth century nonnus and nonna occur pretty frequently in relation to monks and nuns, a sense of quasi-filial respect being attached to the words. Comp. the Gr. νάννα, aunt, and the It. nonno and nonna, grandfather and grandmother). A nun is a maid or widow who has consecrated herself to God by the three vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, and bound herself to live in a convent under a certain rule.

1. Historical.—Hélyot and other French ecclesiastical writers of the last century were of opinion that the founder of the first nunnery was St. Syncletica of Egypt, of whom an ancient life is extant, written not later than the end of the fourth century.[1] This opinion was chiefly grounded on the belief that the author of that life was St. Athanasius, who thus would have been the biographer both of the first monk (St. Antony) and of the first nun. But the difference of style is too great to allow us to ascribe the latter work to St. Athanasius. No earlier notice of a nunnery occurs than that found in the saint's life of St. Antony, who, when he was renouncing the world (about 270), placed his sister in a house of virgins (παρθένων), and many years afterwards rejoiced to find her persevering in a chaste and holy life, and ruling other virgins similarly minded. But long before the institution of nunneries, and even side by side with them long after their first establishment, the Church recognised and encouraged several classes of pious women, such as widows, deaconesses, hospitallers, canonesses (canonicæ; their principal duty was the care of funerals), ascetriæ, and consecrated virgins living with their parents.[2] The letters of St. Jerome[3] give us a clear view of the austere and exalted life led by these last. Towards the end of the fourth century nunneries began to be multiplied at Rome. St. Augustine founded one at Hippo under his own sister as superior, and gave to it a rule which is extant in his 109th Epistle. St. Scholastica, the sister of St. Benedict, founded and governed a nunnery under her brother's direction. The rule of enclosure [ENCLOSURE] was gradually enforced on nunneries with more and more of strictness. A French council (755) says:[1]—"Nuns must not go forth out of their monastery; but if any among them have fallen into a fault, let her do penance within the monastery under the direction of the bishop." The chapter "Periculoso" of Boniface VIII. settled the question irrevocably; enclosure has been since imposed on all nuns taking solemn vows. Nevertheless some convents have evaded the rigour of the rule, and the Holy See has tolerated their conduct.

The primitive practice in the Church was, that virgins becoming nuns should be veiled and consecrated by the bishop. In process of time, "through oversight occasionally, but more frequently owing to absence or pressure of occupation on the part of the bishops" (Thomassin), the ancient practice ceased to be strictly observed, and great numbers were veiled by the abbesses, or by simple priests. This was strongly condemned as an abuse by several French councils, and the right of veiling virgins was reserved to the bishops; presbyters, however, might give the veil to widows. Thomassin infers, from a canon of the Council of Tribur (895), that the Fathers of that council recognised two veils—one, that of probation, with which a young girl might clothe herself as early as twelve years; the other the veil of consecration, to be given by the bishop, and not to be assumed till she was twenty-five years old.

The capitularies of Charlemagne and his son order the suppression or consolidation of small nunneries, in which it was thought the rule could not be perfectly observed.

It may be stated as a general fact, applicable to nearly all the great orders of men, that, soon after the foundation of each, an order or orders of women, subject to or in connection with it, was established, in which the rule and statutes of the founder were, so far as the difference of sex permitted, punctually observed. Even the Society of Jesus is not an exception, for although the founder obtained a prohibition from the Pope against the Company's undertaking the direction of nuns, the "Dames Anglaises," and several more recent institutes, though not otherwise connected with the Society, follow the rule of St. Ignatius.

If we consider the four principal monastic rules separately, we find that—

[1] Thomassin, I. iii. 47.

a. The rule of St. Basil [BASILIANS] was the basis of that framed by Albert, patriarch of Jerusalem, for the order of Mount Carmel [CARMELITES], and adopted in its original rigour by St. Teresa, for the order of Discalced Carmelites, which she founded in 1562.

b. The rule of St. Austin is followed by communities of nuns annexed to every congregation of Austin canons and hermits; also by Dominican nuns and the Ursulines. All, or nearly all, the communities of women founded since the Council of Trent follow the rule of St. Augustine, but have in addition a body of constitutions or customs suited to their special end and spirit.

c. The rule of St. Benedict is followed by the nuns of Camaldoli, Vallombrosa, and Fontevrault. (See Hélyot.)

d. The rule of St. Francis of Assisi is embraced by the order of nuns called Poor Clares, founded by St. Clare; this is the second order of St. Francis.

The nuns of St. Jerome follow a rule found in the works of that doctor; the nuns of the Visitation (1610), one given them by St. Francis de Sales; it is the rule of St. Austin with a number of slight modifications.

2. Rights and Obligations.—Of the numerous and minute regulations contained in the canon law touching the rights, obligations, and privileges of religious women, a few of the more important are here subjoined. The general direction of all their houses is vested in the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars [CONGREGATIONS, ROMAN]. The orders and congregations of recent origin are usually under the ordinary jurisdiction of the bishops; of the older orders, some are under the jurisdiction of regulars. It is an exceptional case when, as with the Brigittines, and the order of Fontevrault, the homes of the connected congregation of men are (or were) under the jurisdiction of the superior general of the nuns. Nearly all nuns who are bound by solemn vows are under the obligation of performing the divine office in choir, and this they must do for themselves; their chaplains may not undertake it for them. The bishop may control their music. They use either the Roman Breviary or that approved for some order of men. They may solemnise, so it be done moderately and discreetly, their titular feast. The number of religious who can be received in any convent is determined according to the amount of revenues, or of customary alms, available for their support. Nuns are allowed to receive young girls as boarders for education, but upon many conditions—e.g. the consent of the Sacred Congregation must be obtained; the boarders must sleep in a separate building or wing; they must not be under seven or above twenty-five years, and if any one of them desires to become a nun, she cannot do so without being first interrogated by the bishop or his deputy, so that the sincere and voluntary character of her wish may be tested. The novitiate, which postulants in early times often passed before they took the habit, cannot now be passed in a secular dress. Nuns cannot stand in the relation of sponsors. While on the one hand those are excommunicated who attempt to force any virgin or widow to become a nun against her will, those on the other are visited with the same penalty who without just cause hinder any woman from assuming the religious habit and taking vows.

The confessors of nuns must be selected and approved by the bishop for convents subject to him. For convents subject to regulars the regular prelate appoints confessors, subject to the approbation of the bishop. In either case a confessor cannot hear confessions in the same monastery for a period exceeding three years.

3. Government, mode of life, the veil, &c.—The superiors of nuns are elected in chapter by secret voting[1] (see ABBESS), in some cases for life, but generally for a term of years. In every convent there is a superior and a mistress of novices; the other offices vary. The bishop often appoints a canon, or an experienced priest, to exercise his authority in regard to the external government of the convent. Nuns take their meals in common, but each must have her separate cell. With regard to diet, fasting, clothing, taking the discipline, mode of saying office, &c., there is an infinite diversity of practice in the different orders and congregations. In primitive times, when a virgin consecrated herself to God, her hair was cut off; this is expressly mentioned in the lives of St. Syncletica (fourth century) and St. Gertrude of Nivelle (seventh century).[2] The white veil of reception is given to the postulant either by the bishop or the superior at the commencement of her novitiate; the veil of profession (which is black in some orders, white in others) is given by the bishop at the end of it. (See RELIGIOUS PROFESSION.) The veil of a Christian nun symbolises continence in flesh and spirit, holiness to the Lord. It signifies an espousal, not that harmonious union of two unlike human beings on which conjugal happiness depends, but a far more perfect union of two unlikes—viz. of the human soul and Christ, effected by means of prayer, obedience, and the sacraments. (Ferraris, Moniales; Thomassin, "Vetus et Nova Eccl. Disc." Part I.)

NUNCIO (nuntius, messenger). A Legate a latere of the Roman see [LEGATE] discharges a commission directed to special ends, and in its nature temporary; a Nuncio of the same see is its permanent official representative at some foreign court. The diplomatic agents of the Pope are of three classes: nuncios, internuncios, and apostolic delegates. In 1882 there were nuncios at the courts of Vienna, Madrid, Lisbon, and Rio de Janeiro, and to the republican government in Paris; internuncios at Munich and the Hague; and apostolic delegates at Costa Rica, Buenos Ayres, and Quito. In 1865, besides the capitals named, there were nuncios at Brussels, Mexico, and Naples, and an internuncio at Florence. Before the French Revolution nuncios resided at Warsaw, Venice, Lucerne, Naples, Florence, Cologne, and Brussels. To the last named Clement VIII. committed the oversight of the Dutch and English missions. A constitution of Benedict XIV. enjoins all nuncios to watch over the residence of bishops within their dioceses.

Papal nuncios were formerly invested with an extensive jurisdiction; their tribunals were courts of appeal from the ordinary ecclesiastical courts of the countries in which they resided. From the language of one of the Tridentine decrees,[1] it would appear that they sometimes encroached on the rights of the bishops, and tried causes in the first instance. In Germany, the Archbishops of Mentz, Cologne, and Treves, who were Electors of the empire and legati nati, resented, and often thwarted, the exercise of jurisdiction by the nuncios; and the establishment of a nunciature at Munich in 1785 by the Elector of Bavaria was the signal for an acrimonious controversy. The troubles arising out of the French Revolution soon absorbed the attention of the disputants; and the Munich nunciature was abolished in 1799. (Ferraris, Nuntius.)

O

OATH. The calling on God to witness that the statement made is true or to make the fulfilment of a promise bind under a more solemn obligation. Oaths were required on certain occasions in the Hebrew law (see, e.g., Exod. xxii. 10, 11; Deut. vi. 13, x. 20), and the prophets (e.g. Amos iv. 2; Is. xiv. 24; Jer. li. 14) speak of God Himself as swearing. Two places (only two, so far as we remember) in the O.T. seem at first sight to condemn swearing—viz. Zach. v. 3; Ecclesiast. ix. 2, but it is clear from the context that false and perhaps rash swearing is meant.

There is, however, much more difficulty about our Lord's teaching on oaths, and it is well known that some sects—e.g. the Waldenses, the Hussites, the "Society of Friends," have believed that oaths are forbidden to Christians. In Matt. v. 33–37, Christ certainly seems to forbid all oaths, whether direct—i.e. by the name of God Himself—or indirect—i.e. by objects related to God, such as the temple, heaven, &c. "Let your word be yea, yea, nay, nay, but what is beyond this, is from the evil one." St. James's words (v. 12) are to the same effect. On the other hand, St. Paul, far from contenting himself always with a simple "yea," or "nay," most distinctly calls God to witness the truth of his assertions (Rom. i. 9; 2 Cor. xi. 31; Gal. i. 20; Philip. i. 8; and especially 2 Cor. i. 23), and the fact seems to be that our Lord desired a state of perfection in his followers which would make oaths unnecessary, and therefore wrong, so long, at least, as they were a "little flock" known to one another. A Christian's character was to make his word as good as his oath. In dealing, however, with the heathen world, Christians could not expect their word to be taken in this way, and the presence of bad Christians in the Church made its actual state very different from that ideal which Christ set before his disciples. Many who could not be trusted to avoid the shameful sin of lying, might still shrink from the greater sin and shame of perjury; and hence the Church not only maintained the obligation of taking an oath when it was required in civil courts, but also herself exacted oaths on certain solemn occasions from her children She has ever taught the lawfulness of oaths, provided always that they are taken with judgment—i.e. for a grave cause; in justice—i.e. provided the thing sworn be lawful; and in truth—i.e. provided the thing sworn be true (Jer. iv. 2). (See the profession of faith imposed by Innocent III. on converted Waldenses; the Constitution of John XXII. against the Fraticelli, anno 1318; Prop. 43, among the propositions of Wickliff condemned by Martin V. and the Council of Constance, anno 1418.)

Although it is always wicked to swear without a conviction that the thing sworn is true, it is not always wrong to break a promise made on oath. A promissory oath to commit a crime is sinful, and to keep the promise is an additional sin. Again, notable change of circumstances may excuse from the keeping of an oath. Further, though, generally speaking, no earthly power can dispense from keeping an oath made in favour of another, still, in other cases a dispensation may be valid. Thus, a superior may dispense in an oath concerning things subject to his authority, because such an oath is unlawful, except with an implied condition—viz. if the person who has authority in the matter consents. A parent, e.g., may annul the promissory oaths of his children below the age of puberty. So, again, an oath against the common good, or an oath extorted by fear or fraud, may be dispensed by the bishop or by those who have quasi-episcopal jurisdiction—e.g. by a chapter in the vacancy of a see, or again by confessors with power to dispense from vows. (St. Liguori, "Theol. Moral." lib. iv. tract. 2.)

Many solemn oaths ordered by the Church are made more solemn by touching the Gospels; and in the middle ages persons swearing often touched the Blessed Sacrament, relics, the sacred vessels, &c. Such an oath was called "corporal," a term which has nothing to do with the "corporal," or linen cloth on which the Blessed Sacrament is laid, but simply refers to corporal or bodily contact with the sacred object. (See Maskell, "Monument. Rit." vol. ii. p. li. seq.).

OBEDIENCE. [See EVANGELICAL COUNSELS.]

OBLATES. Oblates of St. Charles. This is a congregation of secular priests, who "offer" themselves (whence the name) to the bishop, to be employed by him in any part of the diocese he may choose, and upon any work which he may commit to them. St. Charles Borromeo, archbishop of Milan, having found in his large diocese, parts of which were greatly neglected or totally abandoned, the need of a band of zealous self-sacrificing labourers, who would be ready to go and do at once whatever he commanded them to do, founded this congregation of "Oblates of the Blessed Virgin and St. Ambrose" in 1578. He established them in the church and presbytery of the Holy Sepulchre at Milan. Dividing the congregation into six "assemblies," he directed that two of these should always remain in the community house in the city, while the four others were at work in other parts of the diocese. There is a house of this congregation at Bayswater, having several affiliations in other parts of London.

Oblates of St. Frances of Rome. A community of religious women, bound only by simple vows, established at Rome in 1433.

Oblates of Italy. An association of secular priests founded by some zealous ecclesiastics at Turin in 1816. They have the charge of the mission of Eastern Burmah.

Oblates of Mary Immaculate. A society of priests founded at Marseilles in 1815 by Charles de Mazenod, afterwards bishop of the diocese. The Bishop of Marseilles for the time being is their superior general. Their numbers have increased greatly, and they have been of inestimable service by placing themselves at the disposal of the bishops to be employed on the mission in Canada, British India, and the United States. These Oblates were introduced into the United States in 1848. There are not many in this country, but they have flourishing houses at Plattsburg, N. Y., and Rio Grande City and Brownsville, Texas.

OBLATI. Children dedicated in their early years to the monastic state. [See BENEDICTINES; SCHOOLS.]

OBLATI. A class of persons of whom ecclesiastical annals, especially in the middle ages, furnish frequent examples, who "offered" and gave themselves and their property to a monastery for the glory of God and their own spiritual improvement. The father of St. Hugh of Lincoln was an "oblatus" in the monastery of the Great Chartreuse, in which the saint himself was a monk, and tenderly watched over his father's old age. Benedict XIV. ("De Synodo Diœces." vi. 3) says, that although oblati are not religious, yet if they have transferred their entire property to the monastery, retaining neither capital nor rent, they are ecclesiastical persons, and enjoy the privilegium fori, and immunity from secular burdens. (Ferraris, Oblati Monasteriorum.)

OCTAVARIUM. The purpose of the book is explained by its title, "Octavarium Romanum sive octavæ festorum, lectiones secundi scilicet et tertii nocturni singulis diebus recitandæ infra octavas sanctorum titularium, &c." Mr. Maskell knows of no edition prior to the seventeenth century. The use of the book is not obligatory on those who have to say the divine office, though it is sometimes referred to in the Ordo.

OCTAVE. The Christian, following the example of the Jewish, Church celebrates certain feasts till the eighth or octave day. The number eight is supposed to represent perfection, for the seven days of the week are taken as figures of the ages of the world and the eighth of the eternal rest which is to follow them.

Octaves are privileged or non-privileged; and the former, again, are subdivided into classes. In the octaves of Easter and Pentecost, no other feast may be kept and no commemoration made, except of a simple, if it falls after the first three days. In the octave of Epiphany (not, however, on the octave-day) the feast of the patron saint, title, or dedication of the Church may be kept. In the octave of Corpus Christi doubles may be kept (only doubles, however, of the first and second class can be transferred to this octave), but the octave day only gives place to a double of the first class. During non-privileged octaves even semi-doubles are celebrated. Those last, to which all octaves except those already enumerated belong, are again arranged in order of dignity, so that the lesser gives way to the greater in case of concurrence. (Gavantus, tom. ii. § 3, cap. 8.)

OFFERTORY. (1) An antiphon which used to be sung by the choir while the faithful made their offerings of bread and wine for the Mass, of gifts for the support of the clergy, &c. From St. Augustine's time verses of the Psalms were sung in North Africa during the presentation of the gifts, and the Offertory in the Roman Missal has been in use from ancient times, being found in the Antiphonary of St. Gregory, though the precise date at which it was introduced is uncertain. The oblations of bread and wine by the faithful began to fall into disuse from about the year 1000, but the antiphon and its name are still retained. The Offertory is said immediately after the Creed.[1] (Le Brun, Benedict XIV.).

(2) The oblation of bread and wine by the priest, made after the recitation of the antiphon just mentioned. "The Church does really offer bread and wine, but not absolutely and in themselves; for in the new covenant no oblation is made of lifeless things: indeed, no oblation is made other than that of Jesus Christ; wherefore the bread and wine are offered that He may make them his body and blood." (Bossuet, "Explic. des Prières de la Messe.") In the oblation the priest speaks of the bread as "the spotless victim," and of the chalice as the "chalice of salvation" by anticipation—i.e. he looks forward to the moment when they will be changed into the body and blood of Christ. All the ancient liturgies contain an oblation of the gifts before consecration (see the comparative table in Hammond's "Ancient Liturgies," p. xxvi. seq.); but the five prayers with which the oblation is made—"Suscipe, Sancte Pater," "Offerimus tibi," "In spiritu humilitatis," "Veni, Sanctificator," "Suscipe, Sancta Trinitas," are of recent date, as appears "from the silence of Walafrid, Amalarius, Rupert, and Innocent III." concerning them (Benedict XIV. "De Miss." II. x.) The incensation of the oblata or gifts in solemn Masses seems to have been little known in the West till the ninth century, when it was introduced in France. The ceremony occurs in the Greek liturgies (Le Brun, tom. ii. 2 P. a. 7). The great oblation of Christ's body and blood must be carefully distinguished from the Offertory or anticipatory oblation of bread and wine.

OILS, HOLY. There are three holy oils, consecrated by the bishop on Holy Thursday, and received from him by the priests who have charge of parishes and districts.

(1) The oil of catechumens, used in blessing fonts, in baptism, consecration of churches, of altars whether fixed or portable, ordination of priests, blessing and coronation of kings and queens.

(2) Chrism (see CONFIRMATION), used in blessing the font, in baptism and confirmation, consecration of a bishop, of paten and chalice, and in the blessing of bells.

(3). Oil of the sick, used in extreme unction and the blessing of bells.

The Rituale Romanum requires these oils to be kept in vessels of silver or alloyed metal (stannum—properly a mixture of silver and lead), in a decent place, and under lock and key. The S. Cong. Rit. strictly forbids the pastor to keep them in his house, except in cases of necessity. (See "Manuale Decret." 2, 670-2). The oils of the past year must not be used, but common oil, in lesser quantity, may be added to the blessed oils if necessary. For the history of the use of these oils, see BAPTISM, CONFIRMATION, &c. &c.

OLD CATHOLICS (Alt-Katholiken). A name assumed by various priests and lay-people in Germany who protested against the Vatican definition of Papal infallibility, and formed themselves into a separate body.

Scarcely was the Vatican definition issued, when Dr. Döllinger solemnly protested against it, as an innovation on Catholic doctrine. He found large support in the universities. Nearly all Catholics in the teaching body of Munich (44 Docenten), professors from Freiburg, Breslau, Prague, Münster, four professors from Bonn, joined the opposition. Some of them, such as Reusch, Langen, Friedrich, were men of considerable reputation for ability, learning, and character. Nothing of course need be said of Döllinger. The party looked for encouragement to those German bishops who had been opposed to the definition, but in this they were disappointed. The leaders of the protesting movement were excommunicated.

In 1871, at an Old Catholic Congress in Munich, but against the declared wish of Döllinger, the resolution of forming Old Catholic congregations was formed, and on June 4, 1873, Dr. Reinkens was consecrated bishop by Heydekamp, Jansenist bishop of Deventer. The bishop had a salary allotted him by the Government (16,000 thalers from Prussia, 2,000 from Baden); but his jurisdiction over his adherents is very limited; the real power is vested in a Synod of Deputies from the congregations, of whom the majority are laymen. In many cases the Catholic churches were made over to the Old Catholics by the Government, a result which was accelerated by a decree of Pius IX. forbidding Catholic rites in all churches where partial possession had been granted to the new body. The cause of "Old Catholicism" enjoyed the special favour of the Government then engaged in a contest with the Church.

Facts, however, have proved that so inconsistent a position could not be maintained. The first synod, in 1874, changed the Tridentine doctrine on auricular confession and made fasting and abstinence voluntary; the second, in 1875, reduced the number of feasts and set aside nearly all the canonical impediments of marriage, except those recognised by the State; the third, in 1876, permitted priests to marry and receive the nuptial blessing, but forbade them to officiate after marriage; the fifth, in 1878, allowed persons in holy orders to marry, and to perform all the functions of the ministry. This resolution was passed in spite of a protest from the Jansenist Bishops of Holland. Friedrich and the Bonn professors, Langen, Menzel, and Reusch (previously vicar-general to the Old Catholic bishop), withdrew from their former associates. Reusch continued to officiate at Bonn, and thus formed a schism within a schism. There is no official census of the German Old Catholics, for in 1880 Dr. Reinkens told his adherents to return themselves simply as Catholics; but it may be safely said that their number in the whole empire, to judge even by their own statements, does not reach 50,000.

In Austria they are a very insignificant body, though they have two men of learning among them—viz. the Canonists Von Schulte and Maassen. In Switzerland only three priests refused submission to the Vatican Council; but a "Christian-Catholic" Church was formed in great part from the most disreputable elements under the auspices of the cantonal governments. Edward Herzog was consecrated bishop by Dr. Reinkens in September 1876. The "Christian-Catholic" Church has a married priesthood, a vernacular liturgy, and has made confession voluntary. This body is visibly dwindling away. Attempts have been made to erect schismatical churches by the ex-Dominican Prota-Giurleo at Naples, in Spain by the priest Aguazo, in Mexico by eighteen priests, in France by the eloquent ex-Carmelite Loyson ("Recteur de l'Église Catholique Gallicane);" but they do not deserve serious notice. (From the art. "Alt-Katholiken" in the new edition of the "Kirchen-Lexikon." See also ARMENIANS, in the Appendix to this Dictionary.)

OMOPHORION. [See PALLIUM.]

ONTOLOGISM. This is the name, first given by Gioberti, which designates a form of Platonic Mysticism whose principles were inculcated by Marsilius Ficinus, systematically constructed by Malebranche, and again recast by the above-mentioned Gioberti. The name denotes that it is a first principle of the theory of cognition which lies at the basis of the system; that the order of intellectual apprehension follows the order of real being. The necessary, self-existing being is first in the real order; therefore it is the first object of intellectual vision, and is that in and by which every contingent and created existence becomes visible. Gioberti's theory was, for a time, very attractive to many Catholics, and seemed likely to gain an extensive sway. It was very vigorously controverted by Liberatore and others as contrary to the doctrine of St. Thomas, as rationally groundless, and as leading logically to consequences which are theologically unsound and incompatible with dogmas of faith. On account of this dangerous theological tendency seven propositions, embracing the fundamental tenets of Ontologism, were censured by the Holy See, as propositions which cannot safely be taught, in a decree of the congregation of the Inquisition bearing date September 18, 1861.

Prop. I. An immediate cognition of God, at least habitual, is essential to the human intellect, so that without this it can have cognition of nothing, inasmuch as it is the intellectual light itself.

II. The being which we perceive by the intellect in all things, and without which we intellectually perceive nothing, is the divine being.

III. The universals, considered a parte rei, are not really distinguished from God.

IV. The congenital knowledge of God, as being in the simple sense of the term.

involves in an eminent mode every other cognition, so that by it we possess an implicit cognition of every being under every respect in which it is cognoscible.

V. All other ideas are nothing but modifications of the idea, in which God is intellectually perceived as being, in the simple sense of the term.

VI. Created things are in God as a part is in a whole, not indeed in a formal whole, but in one which is infinite and most simple, which places its quasi parts outside of itself, without any division or diminution of itself.

VII. Creation can be thus explained: God, in the special act in which He intellectually cognises and wills Himself as distinct from any determinate creature—e.g. man—produces that creature.

Various attempts were made by partisans of Ontologism to maintain that this censure of the Holy See was not directed against this system, but against another species of pantheistic Ontologism taught in Germany. But one of their number, M. Brancherau, having a conscientious doubt on the subject, drew up a summary of the doctrine contained in a text-book which he had himself composed, comprised in fifteen theses, which he submitted to the Roman congregation for judgment. The decision was given in September, 1862, pronouncing the substantial identity of these propositions with the seven already disapproved, and declaring that they fell under the same censure, that they consequently could not be taught, and that the text-book itself, which was only a development of the same theses, could not be placed in the hands of pupils. On February 22, 1866, a decree of the united Congregations of the Inquisition and of the Index, formally approved by the Holy Father, censured the writings of Prof. Ubaghs, of Louvain, another distinguished Ontologist, as containing the same doctrine condemned in the seven propositions. During the same year M. Hugonin, who had been nominated to an episcopal see in France, was required by the Papal Nuncio at Paris, as a condition of receiving the confirmation of his appointment, to publish a retractation of the doctrine contained in his "Études Philosophiques, Ontologie," and to promise to do all which depended on him in the episcopal office to prevent the teaching of this same doctrine in the schools of France. All these distinguished persons submitted with docility to the sentence of Rome. Since it has become manifest that the Holy See did intend to condemn as unsafe the fundamental doctrine of Ontologism proper—viz. that the human intellect has an immediate cognition of God as its proper object and the principle of all its cognitions—the system has fallen dead, so far as Catholics are concerned. It still lingers, under various modifications, by which the genuine idea which lies at its basis is so far altered or obscured as to be comparatively harmless, and really or apparently exempt from positive censure. In such shapes, however, it is no longer potent to attract thoroughgoing thinkers, and is of small moment.

(Kleutgen gives a brief but thorough exposition of the seven propositions, with a refutation of the errors contained in them, in a work, which in the French translation is entitled "Ontologisme jugé par le Saint-Siège." [Paris: Gaume Frères et J. Duprey, 3 Rue de l'Abbaye, 1867.] The works of Cardinal Dechamps may also be consulted for information concerning the controversy.)

OPUS OPERATUM. A word used by mediæval theologians and adopted by the Council of Trent (sess. vii. can. 8) to express the nature of the effects which the sacraments produce. Man has the power by the perversity of his will to stay the efficacy of the sacraments; and certain dispositions—such as the love of God and man, or again, true repentance and sincere purpose of amendment—are absolutely necessary, in those who have the use of reason, in order that they may derive benefit from the sacraments. These dispositions, however, are only conditions without which the grace of the sacraments cannot be received. The grace itself comes not from them, but from the institution of Christ.

The following clear explanation is given by Bellarmin ("De Sacramentis," lib. ii. 1). In justification, he says, as received through the sacraments, many causes concur: on God's part, the will to employ the sensible sign; on Christ's part, his Passion and merits; on the part of the minister, power and intention; on the part of the recipient, the will to receive the sacrament, faith, and repentance; on the part of the sacrament, the application of the sensible sign. "But of all these, that which actively, proximately, and instrumentally effects the grace of justification, is only that external act, called sacrament, and this is the sense of 'Opus Operatum,' the word (operatum) being taken passively, so that when we say the sacrament confers grace ex opere operato, our meaning is that grace is conferred by virtue of the sacramental act itself instituted by God for this end, not by the merit of the minister or the recipient."

ORARIUM. [See STOLE.]

ORATE, FRATRES, &c. So the address begins in which, after the Offertory and Lavabo, the priest bids the people pray that his sacrifice and theirs may be acceptable to God. Originally the priest simply said "Orate," or "Orate pro me," "Orate pro me, peccatore." Rémi of Auxerre, in A.D. 880, is the first to give a fuller form, but he appends it merely as an explanation, "Orate, fratres"—i.e. "ut meum ac vestrum pariter sacrificium acceptum sit Domino." In the churches of Paris and Meaux down to the seventeenth century, and the English Missals of Sarum, Bangor, and York, the words ran, "Orate, fratres et sorores," &c. The answer which the server makes is "Suscipiat," &c.; but the response is given in a vast variety of forms by the mediæval Missals, and it still varies much in the rites of different religious orders. (Le Brun, tom. ii., iii. Part. art. x. Maskell, "Ancient Liturgies.")

ORATORY. In the earliest times Mass could only be said in private houses, and after the erection of churches it was still often said in private dwellings. The growth of the parochial system led to a sharper distinction between parochial churches and oratories or chapels. Thus the Council of Agde, canon 24 (anno 506), permits Mass to be said in oratories, but not on the great feasts of Easter, Christmas, &c. So the Council of Clermont, can. 14 (anno 535). In the East, the Synod in Trullo, can. 31 (anno 692), prohibited service in oratories without the bishop's leave, and many Western councils issued similar edicts.

An oratory is public or private, according as it has or has not a door opening into the public road. The older canon-law allowed Mass to be celebrated in either with the bishop's leave. But the Council of Trent limited episcopal powers in the matter, and the following is the present state of the law.

A bishop may always permit Mass in a public oratory, blessed and set apart for divine service.

In the oratories of religious, seminaries, hospitals, &c.

In his own palace.

In the house, wherever it may be, in which he resides at the time. (This privilege was taken away by Clement XI., but restored by Innocent XIII.)

In private oratories for just cause and for a time.

But a permanent privilege of celebrating in a private oratory can be granted by the Pope alone. (Concil. Trident. i. sess. xxii. Liguori, "Theol. Moral." lib vi. Tract 3, cap. 3, dub. 4).

ORATORY, THE FRENCH. A society of priests founded by Cardinal de Bérulle at Paris in 1611, with the advice of César de Bus, the Père Cotton, and other eminent men, in order to strengthen ecclesiastical discipline, which had been weakened during the troubles of the League. Bossuet says that Mons. de Bérulle "preferred to give no other spirit to his company but the spirit of the Church itself, no other rule than her canons, no other superiors than her bishops, no other bond but charity, and no vows but those of baptism and ordination." To deepen devotion, promote professional studies, and spread an ecclesiastical spirit among the secular clergy, that through them the whole population might be reached and influenced, were the principal objects of the institute. In 1612 it was declared a royal foundation. After some hesitation Paul V. (1614) approved the society, under the title of "Congregation of the Oratory of Our Lord Jesus Christ in France." In 1616 a residence, with chapel annexed, was occupied in the Rue St. Honoré. The fathers paid much attention to music, and were called "les pères du beau chant." The favourite work of the founder was the institution of seminaries for the training of priests; of these he lived to see six—at Langres, Nevers, &c.—in working order. He was the friend and supporter of Descartes, and the congregation always had the reputation of being rather favourable to Cartesianism. The cardinal died in 1629, leaving fifty seminaries, colleges, and houses of retreat in the erection of which he had been instrumental, all in full activity. The saintly Père de Coudren succeeded him in the government of the congregation; he was followed by Bourgoing, Senault, Sainte Marthe, and De la Tour. Jansenism took a strong hold of the congregation, and the bull "Unigenitus" was long a bone of contention among the members; but the sounder portion at last prevailed, and the bull was accepted by the society in 1746. At the Revolution the educational functions discharged by the congregation saved it for a time; but the Fathers firmly resisted the Civil Constitution of the Clergy, and when the ceremony of consecrating the constitutional bishops was appointed to take place in their church in the Rue St. Honoré, they all refused to be present. Later, a few gave way and took the oath. The "Oratory of the Immaculate Conception," founded at Paris in 1852 by M. Pétetot, curé of St. Roch, and the abbé Gratry, adopted the rule of the ancient society.

Among the eminent men whom the French Oratory produced were Thomassin (a name often quoted in these pages), Lejeune, Richard Simon, Malebranche, Quesnel, Pouget, Massillon, Renaudot, Jean Morin, commonly called Morinus, Le Brun, Lami, and Duhamel. ("Encycl. du XIX^me^ Siècle," 1852, art. by Jules Sauzay.)

ORATORY OF ST. PHILIP NERI. Philip Neri, a native of Florence, remarkable from his childhood upwards for the singular beauty and purity of his character, came to reside at Rome, at the age of eighteen, in 1533. For some years he was tutor to the children of a Florentine nobleman living in Rome. His life was one of habitual self-denial, penance, and prayer. A thirst for doing good consumed him; and by degrees he gathered round him a number of men, young and old, whom he animated by his discourses to a greater zeal for God and hatred of evil, and to a more exact regularity of life than they had known before. This he did while still a layman; but on the advice of his confessor he received holy orders, and was ordained priest in 1551. For a short time after his ordination he received in his own chamber those whom he had won to God, and instructed them on spiritual things; then, during seven years, in a larger room. Out of these colloquies was gradually perfected the plan of evening exercises, which is to this this day practised by the congregation,—plain sermons being preached, hymns sung, and popular devotions used, in a regular order, on every week-day evening except Saturday. The number of persons attending the exercises still increasing, he obtained (1558) from the administration of the Church of St. Jerome leave to build over one of the aisles of that church a chapel, to which he gave the modest name of an "oratory," whence arose the name of the congregation. About this time many persons afterwards eminent in the Church and the world joined him, amongst whom were Cæsar Baronius, the ecclesiastical historian, and Francis Maria Tarugi, afterwards Cardinals, Lucci, Tassone, &c. Six years later, the Florentines living in Rome having requested him to undertake the charge of the Church of St. John the Baptist which they had just built, the saint (1564) caused Baronius and others of his followers to remove thither and to receive ordination. From this date the commencement of the congregation is reckoned. Their numbers increasing, it seemed desirable to the Fathers to have a house of their own. The old church of the Vallicella, situated in the heart of Rome, was ceded to them in 1575; and St. Philip at once caused the present magnificent church, called the "Chiesa Nuova," to be commenced on the site. The Fathers removed to the Vallicella in 1577 on the completion of the church; St. Philip joined them in 1583. Gregory XIII. had approved and confirmed the erection of the congregation in 1575. The constitutions of the society—which St. Philip desired should be composed of simple priests, without vows, but agreeing to a rule of life—were approved by Paul V. in 1612. St. Philip died in 1595, was beatified in 1615, and canonised in 1622. The rule of the congregation from the first was that each house should be independent, the only exception being made in favour of certain Italian oratories (Naples, San Severino, and afterwards Lanciano), which were at first administered by the mother house at Rome.

The Oratory was introduced into England in 1847 by Dr. (now Cardinal) Newman, who, during his long sojourn in Rome following upon his conversion, had studied closely the work of the holy founder and become deeply imbued with the spirit of his institute. The first house was at Mary Vale, i.e. Old Oscott, and was transferred, after a temporary sojourn at St. Wilfrid's, Staffordshire, to Alcester Street, Birmingham, in January 1849. A short time later a house was opened at King William Street, Strand, London, by F. Faber, with several other fathers who belonged to the Birmingham congregation, and were still subject to Father Newman. In October 1850 the London house was released from obedience to Birmingham, and erected into a congregation with a superior of its own. It was finally transferred to Brompton, where it is now erecting a large domed church. The Oratory at Birmingham has remained under the direction—even since his elevation to the purple—of its illustrious founder, and has become a great centre for the midland counties of Catholic preaching and education.

The following passage embodies a portion of the cardinal's conception of St. Philip's work. "He was raised up," writes Cardinal Newman, "to do a work almost peculiar in the Church." Instead of combating like Ignatius, or being a hunter of souls like St. Cajetan, "Philip preferred, as he expressed it, tranquilly to cast in his net to gain them; he preferred to yield to the stream and direct the current—which he could not stop—of science, literature, art, and fashion, and to sweeten and sanctify what God had made very good and man had spoilt. And so he contemplated as the idea of his mission, not the propagation of the faith, nor the exposition of doctrine, nor the catechetical schools; whatever was exact and systematic pleased him not; he put from him monastic rule and authoritative speech, as David refused the armour of his king. No; he would be but an ordinary individual priest as others; and his weapons should be but unaffected humility and unpretending love. All he did was to be done by the light, and fervour, and convincing eloquence of his personal character and his easy conversation. He came to the Eternal City and he sat himself down there, and his home and his family gradually grew up around him, by the spontaneous accession of materials from without. He did not so much seek his own as draw them to him. He sat in his small room, and they in their gay worldly dresses, the rich and the well-born as well as the simple and the illiterate, crowded into it. . . . And they who came remained gazing and listening till, at length, first one and then another threw off their bravery, and took his poor cassock and girdle instead; or, if they kept it, it was to put hair-cloth under it, or to take on them a rule of life, while to the world they looked as before."[1]

ORDER, HOLY. Holy Order, according to Catholic doctrine, is a sacrament of the new law, by which spiritual power is given and grace conferred for the performance of sacred duties.

I. The Meaning of the Word "Ordo" is explained by St. Thomas ("Suppl." xxxii. 2, ad 4), and the investigation of modern scholars has proved his view to be substantially correct. "Ordo" means "rank," whether high or low, but the meaning was restricted, much as our own word "rank" often is, to "eminent rank"—i.e. the clerical position as distinct from that of laymen. Salmasius suggested (see Ritschl. "Entstehung der Altkatholischen Kirche," p. 388) that the earliest Christian writers in Latin borrowed the word from the municipal constitution of the Romans, so that "ordo" would mean "magistracy." But it is much more likely that they adopted it as a version of κλῆρος; and, as the reader will presently see, it was only by degrees that it acquired the exclusive sense of "eminent" or "magisterial rank." Thus, though Tertullian implies that the "ecclesiæ ordo" is distinct from the laity ("De Monog." 7), though he speaks of persons who "are chosen into the ecclesiastical order" ("De Idololatr." 7), and, again, of "the priestly order" ("ordo sacerdotalis," "De Exhort. Cast." 7); he also recognises "widows" as an "order" of the Church ("Ad Uxor." i. 7; and cf. "ordines," in the plural, "De Monog." 12). Even Jerome uses "ordo" in its wide and, as we believe, original sense. For ("In Jesaiam," Lib. V. cap. xix. 18) he enumerates five "orders" of the Church ("ecclesiæ ordines")—viz. bishops, presbyters, deacons, the faithful, catechumens.

II. The Number of Orders.—In the Latin Church the ecclesiastical orders are those of bishops, priests, deacons, subdeacons, acolytes, exorcists, readers, ostiarii, or door-keepers. The first three are as old as the time of the Apostles; and all must be very ancient, for they are mentioned incidentally by Cornelius, bishop of Rome, in the middle of the third century (apud Euseb. "H. E." vi. 43). Nor is there any reason to think that their institution was recent even then. Some canonists add another order, that of the tonsure, but it is generally regarded as a mere introduction to the clerical state, and this view is consonant to the language of the Council of Trent (sess. xxiii. cap. 2). Apart from this, very many theologians, among whom is St. Thomas, do not regard the episcopate as a separate order, but only as the completion and extension of the priesthood, and hence reckon the number of the orders as seven. The title of the Tridentine chapter already referred to, "De Septem Ordinibus," favours this view; but, according to the eminent canonist Philips, it is not found in the earlier editions. The theory rests on the assumption that all orders are referred to the Eucharist, and thus the bishop has no power, which a simple priest has not also, except that the former can, the latter cannot, convey this power to others by ordination. Those who hold the episcopate to be a distinct order not unnaturally reject this exclusive reference of holy order to the Eucharist as arbitrary, and argue that the power of ordination and confirmation sufficiently justifies the position of the episcopate as separate order. The orders of bishop, priest, deacon, and (but only since the thirteenth century) subdeacon are called "sacred" or "greater," those of acolyte, &c., "minor," orders. In the Greek, Coptic, and Nestorian Churches the orders recognised are those of bishop, priest, deacon, subdeacon, and reader, to which that of "singer" (ψαλτης) is sometimes added. Great variety, however, has prevailed in the East, both as to the number and classification of the orders, and we must refer the reader for fuller information to Goar ("Euchologion"); to Denzinger ("Ritus Orientalium," vol. i. p. 116 seq.); and to the articles on the individual orders in this work.

III. Holy Order as a Sacrament.—The Council of Trent defines (sess. xxii. De Sacr. Ord. can. 3) that order is "truly and properly a sacrament instituted by Christ," and that by means of it the Holy Ghost is given (Canon 4). Evidently, in ordination there is an external sign, but the question at issue between Catholics and most Protestants turns on the grace which, as Catholics believe, accompanies the sign. A priest, as the Church teaches, receives supernatural power in his ordination, an indelible character (see the article on CHARACTER), and, if rightly disposed, grace to support him in the exercise of his ministry. If this question be settled, the rest of the contention follows. A sign which necessarily conveys grace cannot have been instituted by authority which is merely human, and the external sign, grace given, institution by our Lord, are the three constituents of a sacrament.

That grace is given, follows from the clear statements of Scripture. Christ "breathed on" his Apostles and said, "Receive the Holy Ghost; whosesoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; whosesoever sins ye retain, they are retained" (John xx. 23). St. Paul twice reminds St. Timothy of the grace he had received at ordination. "Do not neglect the grace which was given through prophecy, with laying on of the hands of the presbytery" (1 Tim. iv. 14); "I put thee in mind to rekindle the grace (or rather gift, χάρισμα) of God, which is in thee through the laying on of my hands" (2 Tim. i. 6). St. Timothy was marked out for his office by some one who had the prophetic spirit, common in the early Church, and the presbyters joined St. Paul in the imposition of hands, just as presbyters unite with our bishops in the same way at the present time. But the former was an accidental, the latter an unessential circumstance, and hence St. Paul omits the mention of both in the second passage. The grace was conveyed by the imposition of Apostolic hands (observe the contrast "with," μετὰ, the laying on of the hands of the presbytery, "and 'through,' διὰ, the laying on of my hands"), and the context leaves no doubt that the grace given was for the right administration of the ecclesiastical office. St. Timothy is to remember the grace received, and to let no one despise his youth, to be the example of the faithful, &c. &c; he is to "rekindle it," for the Spirit given is one of power, love, temperance, &c., and he must not be ashamed of the "testimony of the Lord." It is in vain that an able writer (Hatch, "Organisation of the Early Christian Church," p. 133) urges that χάρισμα has a latitude of meaning, and may be rendered "talent." This is not a fair account of its meaning in the New Testament; but if it were, what then? Plainly Timothy did not receive a natural "talent" by laying on of hands. Nor was it merely the office entrusted to him, for it would be senseless to speak of "rekindling" an office. It was, then, just what Mr. Hatch denies that ordination can give—viz. an interior quality, the fire of the Holy Ghost in the heart, ever present to empower and quicken St. Timothy in the exercise of his duties. It did not come from man, though man had it in his power to "rekindle" and correspond to it. It is well to notice that an interpretation substantially identical with ours is given and justified from the context by one of the best Protestant commentators on the Pastoral Epistles (Huther, ad loc.). Further, if, as Mr. Hatch supposes, the clergy had been originally mere representatives of the people, deriving all their power from them, and only doing for the sake of order and convenience what laymen might do also, then indeed it would be hard to believe in the sacramental character of the rite. St. Paul, however, speaks of ἐπίσκοποι (the precise meaning of the word does not concern us here) as those whom "the Holy Ghost had appointed to tend the Church of God which he acquired through his own blood" (Acts xx. 28). If the Holy Ghost appoints those who are ordained to their sacred function, the prophecy or popular election which designs them for these functions being a separable accident, then we are not surprised to find St. Paul assuming that the same Holy Ghost endowed them with grace and power. It is quite true that Jewish Rabbis were set apart by imposition of hands,[1] and Mr. Hatch has collected many interesting and instructive parallels to different parts of the ordination rite from the customs of the Roman magistracy, &c. These, however, in no way affect the main question. No one supposed that the imposition of hands would of itself prove the grace of orders, while the other rites to which Mr. Hatch refers are allowed on all hands to be of merely human institution. Our appeal is to the grace which Scripture assures us is attached to the imposition of hands for holy orders, and we fail to see that the appeal can be set aside on the grounds which Mr. Hatch and so many other learned Protestants allege.

Such is the value assigned to the Sacrament of Holy Order in the Scripture, and the burden of proof lies on our adversaries, if they maintain that the clergy, having first received their power from God, sunk after the Apostolic age to mere representatives of the congregation. As a matter of fact, Christian antiquity is in harmony with Scripture. Only, the question of election or designation to office must not be confused with the power given in ordination to the office; and again, we must not expect full and dogmatic statements on the nature of Holy Order in the brief and occasional writings of the early Fathers. Their main contention against heretics did not turn on the question of their orders, or want of orders; in many cases heretics did possess true orders; but on the fact that they were outside the one Church. Still, St. Ignatius speaks of the bishop as having "acquired his ministry, not from himself, nor through men" (Philad. i.). The bishop is to be regarded as "the Lord Himself" (Ephes. vi.) "Let that be considered a valid Eucharist which is under the bishop or one commissioned by him" (Smyrn. viii.) —a rule, however, which in all likelihood was meant as a warning against all schismatical rites, even if celebrated by a priest, for the word βεβαία can scarcely be pressed. True, Tertullian ("De Exhort. Cast." 7, "Monog." 7, 12) holds very different language, asserts the universal priesthood of Christians, and reduces the difference between clergy and laity to one of ecclesiastical institution. But then Tertullian was a bitter Montanist when he thus wrote, and it was the characteristic of Montanism to set the claims of individual piety against the claims of the hierarchy. And, although he does certainly assume that his premiss—viz. that all Christians are priests—will be accepted by Catholics, it is quite in the manner of this exaggerated writer to take the Catholic and Scriptural doctrine that all Christians are priests in a sense, just as Israel was in a sense a nation of priests, and to distort it into the admission that even Catholics made no essential difference between priest and layman. (See Döllinger, "Hippolytus and Callistus," English translation, p. 320 seq.) His reckless use of Scripture, and misrepresentation of fact, to enforce his Montanist views (see e.g. "Exhort. Cast." 7 and 9), shows how little he can be trusted. Nothing of the sort can, so far as we are aware, be found in a Catholic bishop who called Tertullian his master, we mean Cyprian. He speaks of the bishops as successors of the Apostles (Ep. xliv. lxvi. See also Clarus a Mascula, "In Sentent. Episc." 79, and this by ordination, as he expressly says); he derives the power of the Episcopate (xxxiii.) not from the people but from Christ's commission to Peter (ib.). Just as much to the point is a passage of Cyprian's contemporary Firmilian, who says the power of forgiving sins has been bestowed on the Apostles, then on the churches and the bishops, who have succeeded the Apostles by successive ordination (ordinatione vicaria, inter "Opp. Cypr." Ep. lxxv.). So again in the Apostolic Constitution, which belongs to the same period, we read, "Neither do we permit laymen to perform any of the priestly functions (ἱερατικῶν ἔργων)—e.g. sacrifice, baptism, ordination, blessing great or small. For through the imposition of the bishop's hands such dignity is given." ("Const. Ap." iii. 10.) This rule is attributed to the Apostles. The Council of Nicæa forbade deacons to give communion to presbyters, and this on the ground, which is taken for granted, that the former had no authority or power to offer sacrifice. "Neither the rule nor custom has handed down, that those who have no authority to offer (i.e. to offer sacrifice, προσφέρειν, this principle being assumed), should give the body of Christ to those who do offer." (Can. 18.) Later Fathers who treated of doctrine at greater length furnish, as we should expect, more explicit statements. "Who gives," says the author of a work falsely attributed to St. Ambrose,[1] "the episcopal grace? You answer without doubt, God. But still God gives it through man. Man imposes the hand, God gives the grace." ("De Sacerdot. Dign." cap. 5.) St. Augustine ("Contr. Epist. Parmen." ii. 13) compares the sacrament of order to that of baptism; neither can be reiterated; ordination, even when given by a schismatical bishop, is valid, and again ("De Bono Conjugali," cap. 24), he maintains the indelible character of order. It is not lost, if the flock is withdrawn from the pastor; it abides in spite of the pastor's crimes, though of course its permanence increases the culprit's guilt. ("Sacramento domini semel imposito non carebit quamvis ad judicium permanente"). This indelible character of order follows from the principles for which we have been contending. Man cannot take away what he did not give. And further, if a wicked or schismatical bishop ordain, after all it is God who, in the words of the author quoted above, "bestows the grace."

We will only add that the existence of the sacrifice of the body and blood of Christ naturally inclines us to believe in the sacrament of order. God, who in the old law appointed a priesthood to offer sacrifices which could not take away sin, did not surely leave the sacrifice in which the "Word," as St. Irenæus says, is "offered up" to Him without appointed ministers and guardians. Nor does Catholic belief foster priestly pride. Such an abuse may and does occur, for here, as elsewhere, man's weakness and sin mars the work of God. But the very fact that bishops and priests hold a commission from God and not from their flocks, is a preservation against the temptation to please men at the expense of virtue and truth. A man who holds his place because of his popularity has far more temptation to vanity than a priest who knows he is nothing except for a grace he has received beyond any merits of his and in common with multitudes of others; that he can only use this grace in accordance with laws which man cannot change, and that it involves dread responsibilities. It needs no great piety or humility to feel the contrast between the trust reposed in him and his own weakness. It is the contrast between God and man, not between men, which is the true source of humility; and what is said of Christians generally is specially applicable to priests. "We have the treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellence may be God's, and not from us" (2 Cor. iv. 7). Priests and people alike sink into nothing before Him. "The eyes of man's pride shall be humbled, and the loftiness of men shall be bowed down, and the Lord alone shall be exalted in that day" (Isa. ii. 11).

IV. The Orders in which the Sacrament is given.—St. Thomas ("Suppl." xxxvii. a. 3) holds that each order is a sacrament, and this apparently was the common opinion in the middle ages. But historical study and knowledge of the Eastern rites do not favour this view, which is, we believe, no longer common. Probably, the orders lower than the diaconate are only of ecclesiastical institution, and are not, therefore, accompanied by sacramental grace. It is certain from the proofs given above and from the Tridentine definition (sess. xxii. especially canons 4, 7), that the episcopate and priesthood are sacraments; and it is all but universally held (Durandus and Cajetan are quoted on the other side) that the diaconate is so also. Indeed this seems to be a clear consequence from Canon 4, just quoted, and Billuart calls this opinion that the diaconate is a sacrament, "so common and certain that several theologians charge the contrary sentiment of Durandus and Cajetan with rashness" (Billuart, "De Ord." I. a. 3, § 1).

V. The Minister of Orders.—The distinction by Divine right between bishops and presbyters has been sufficiently explained in the article on the former. Here it is enough to say that the ordinary minister of orders is the bishop. Priests, however, may, by concession of the Pope or Church, confer minor orders, and certain abbots exercise this privilege, though the Council of Trent (sess. xxiii. cap. 10, "De Reform.") withdrew from them the right of doing so, except in the case of their own subjects. Those who hold the subdiaconate to be of merely ecclesiastical institution would naturally allow that the Pope might permit a simple priest to give that order. It is much harder to believe that the Pope could empower a priest to ordain any one deacon. Theologians of name assert that such a privilege was given in 1489 to a Cistercian abbot, and used by the Cistercian General at Rome in 1662 with the Pope's knowledge, but the alleged fact is disputed. (See Billuart, loc. cit. diss. ii. a. 1.) A bishop cannot lawfully ordain any except those who belong to his diocese by birth, domicile (see the Article), possession of a benefice, or by having lived in his house for three years. In this last case the bishop must at once confer a benefice on the person ordained. A bishop may give letters dimissorial, enabling another bishop to ordain the bearers of them, and if the see has been vacant a whole year, then, but not till then, the chapter may give such letters. The superiors of Regulars must send their subjects to the bishop of the diocese, but in case he is absent, then the superior may send his subjects with dimissorials to any bishop. The dimissorials must, however, be accompanied with a certificate from the bishop's vicar-general, chancellor, or secretary (Gury, "Theol. Moral." De Ord. cap. 3). The episcopate may be conferred on any Sunday or feast of an Apostle, the other holy orders on Ember Saturdays, Saturday before Passion Sunday and Holy Saturday. Minor orders may be given on the days mentioned last, and also, if the ordination is not a general one, "on Sundays and other festivals" (Liguori, "Theol. Moral." De Ord. § 794). These rules as to the time of ordination, and in particular the greater freedom as to the time allowed for consecration of bishops and conferring minor orders, are very ancient. The only change consists in this, that the ordinations used to be held, not as now, in the morning of Saturday, but on the evening of Saturday or Sunday morning. They were held in the Church in the presence of the people. As a rule, a bishop was consecrated in his own church or that of his metropolitan. (Chardon, "Hist. des Sacr." tom. v. ch. vi.)

We have seen that Augustine recognised the validity of heretical and schismatical ordinations, provided, of course, the ordaining bishop had used the essential matter and form. The same principle had been followed by the Council of Nicæa in dealing with the Meletians and Novatians (see Hefele, "Concil." vol. i. pp. 353, 407 seq.), and by Popes Leo I., Anastasius II., and Innocent I. But in the eighth and following centuries this point of doctrine was obscured. The fact that persons ordained in conscious schism could receive no sacramental grace, though they did receive character and power, that they had no jurisdiction, that they were reconciled to the Church by an imposition of hands, mistaken perhaps for re-ordination, led to the error. The decision of a Roman council in 769 against the Anti-Pope Constantine has been variously interpreted. But in any case, "after the death of Pope Formosus, his adversaries, Stephen VII. and Sergius III., regarded the orders given by him as invalid." (The words are Cardinal Hergenröther's, "Kirchengeschichte," vol. i. p. 712.) In the tenth century, persons ordained by the Anti-Pope Leo VIII. were required to say at their degradation "My Father Leo had nothing to give, and has given me nothing." In the eleventh century, simony was known as the "heresy of Simon," and many maintained that ordination by bishops simoniacally elected was invalid (Hergenröther, ib.). St. Peter Damian defended the true doctrine, but Peter Lombard found the diversity of opinion on the validity of heretical ordination so great that he considered the question to be almost insoluble. Even in the thirteenth century William of Paris believed that the Church could withdraw the character of holy order by degradation, while others, starting with the view that the episcopate was a mere extension of the presbyterate, supposed that, although a degraded priest could still say Mass, a degraded bishop could not validly ordain. As a rule, however, the great scholastics adhered to the teaching of St. Augustine, which in the end was accepted. (Hergenröther, ib. p. 987 seq.).

VI. The Matter and Form of Holy Order.—An account of the rite of ordination will be found under the different articles, DEACON, LECTOR, &c. This, however, seems the fitting place to discuss the theological question as to the essential matter and form of the orders in which the sacrament is undoubtedly given—viz. the orders of bishop, priest, and deacon. There are three opinions.

(α) "Nearly all the scholastics," says Catalani ("Comm. in Pontif." tom. i. p. 197), "who discuss the matter and form of the episcopate, make its form consist in these words, 'Receive the Holy Ghost,' which are uttered by the consecrating and assisting bishops, touching the head of the person to be consecrated, just as the book of the Gospels is placed on his head." Many scholastics hold that the matter and form of ordination to the priesthood consists in the bishop's handing to the new priest the paten and chalice—an act commonly called the "tradition of the instruments," and the form in the accompanying words. The scholastics felt special difficulty about the diaconate, but some of them placed the matter and form in the giving of the dalmatic, or else of the book of the Gospels. (See Chardon, tom. v. "De l'Ordre," ch. v.) And St. Thomas ("Supp." xxxiv. a. 4, 5) implies that he held one or other of these theories.

(β) We do not think any theologian at the present day would defend the theory just stated.[1] The objection to it will presently appear. Many of the later scholastics, however, hold a doctrine which has some resemblance to it. They suppose that Christ left the Church to determine the specific matter and form of holy order, and that this determination has been different for different places. According to them, the matter and form for the West consist partly in the words and rites just enumerated, partly in the imposition of hands (for the ordination of priests the third imposition in the Roman Pontifical), and in the accompanying words, which denote the reception of the Holy Ghost for the office given.

The following reasons tell, as we venture to think, with fatal effect against either of these theories, the latter of which has the additional defect of resting on arbitrary assumption.

The words "Receive the Holy Ghost," cannot be the necessary form of episcopal consecration. They are unknown in the Greek and Syriac rites, and not only so, but they are of recent introduction in the West. "They do not occur," says Chardon, writing in 1745, "in Latin Rituals which are older than 400 years, and they are wanting even in several modern ones" (loc. cit. ch. i.). The testimony of Morinus and Martene is substantially the same. "None of the English Pontificals, except the Exeter, contain this form" (Maskell, "Monument. Rit." vol. ii. p. 274). Again, the tradition of instruments for the ordination of priests is unknown at this day to the Greeks, and was unknown to the Latins till the tenth (so Morinus) or eleventh (Chardon) century. The last imposition of hands in the Roman Pontifical, that after the communion, and also the words "Receive the Holy Ghost, whose sins ye remit," &c., were unknown, according to Morinus and Chardon, even in the West, for 1,200 years. Again, Western Rituals previous to the ninth century say nothing about the placing of the Gospels in the hands of the man to be ordained deacon, and, of course, do not contain the form of words with which the book of the Gospels is presented. The rite began in England (Chardon, ch. v.; Maskell, p. 210), and is not to be found in any Pontifical before the tenth century, those of English use alone excepted. Even in the twelfth century, Latin writers who treat in detail about the rite for ordination of deacons are silent about the form "Receive the Holy Ghost, for strength," &c. It is scarcely necessary to add that investing of the deacon with the dalmatic cannot be traced beyond the middle ages. These facts are, we believe, accepted by all the most eminent critics, Morinus, Martene, Chardon, &c. It is only in slight details—e.g. as to the precise date of introduction—that they differ, and thus we are led to the third theory, which we state chiefly in the words of Chardon.

(γ) The form need not be imperative—"Receive the Holy Ghost," or the like; no tradition of instruments is needed for validity. "The essential matter and form of ordination consist only in the imposition of the bishop's hands, joined to the invocation of the Holy Spirit."[1] Morinus was

[1] Still, even the Carmelite, Thomas a Jesu, in his learned work, De Procuranda salute omnium Gentium (Antwerp, 1613; it is a guide for missionaries, with special reference to Oriental rites), says (lib. vii.) that Oriental orders, according to the truer opinion, are invalid, because given without tradition of instruments.

[1] Thus, in a certain sense, the necessary form is indeterminate; it may be precatory, imperative, &c. But, according to this opinion, the led to adopt this opinion by the knowledge he gained when member of a Roman congregation formed by Urban VIII. to examine the Greek Euchologium. It has been adopted, scarcely, as Chardon asserts, by nearly all theologians of repute, but certainly by nearly all critics and scholars. It is in harmony with the statements of Scripture, of the Fathers, and the ancient Ritual books. It in no way contradicts the statements of the Tridentine Council, as Morinus shows, nor the practice of the Church in requiring those who have not touched the instruments, to be re-ordained conditionally. For, so long as there is no authoritative decision on the point, the Church rightly insists that the safer course be taken.

Thus the matter of the consecration of a bishop would lie in the imposition of hands when the Gospels are placed on his head and the form in the invocation of the Holy Ghost which is preceded in the present Latin rite by the words "Receive the Holy Ghost." A priest is ordained when the bishop, with the assistant priests, imposes his hands and says, "Oremus, fratres," &c., "Exaudi nos, quæsumus," &c. (i.e. when the second imposition is made). A deacon is made by the imposition of the bishop's right hand, and the form lies in the prayer, "Emitte in eos, quæsumus," &c. But the other ceremonies and prayers seem to determine and specificate the meaning of these forms, and mark the special purpose (the office of a deacon, &c.), for which the Holy Ghost is invoked. Hence, though these particular rites are not absolutely necessary, it by no means follows that if all were omitted and nothing left in any way corresponding to them, the grace of orders would be conveyed. (On the question of the matter and form we have followed Tournely, "Prælect. Theol.," De Ordine.[1])

VII. The Subjects or Recipients of the Sacrament.—Any baptised male capable of intending to receive the sacrament may do so validly. We make the limitation as to intention on the authority of Tournely (loc. cit. qu. iv. a. 4, "verisimilius videtur"), and because it commends itself to us on grounds of history and reason. It is right, however, to say that the Thomists generally believe that an infant, or those who are hopelessly mad, might validly receive any order except the episcopate, to which last cure of souls is necessarily attached.[1] All admit that in adults, with the exception just mentioned, intention is required.

To be ordained lawfully a person must have the due age and knowledge; he must have observed the interstices: he must be free from irregularity, suspension, excommunication; he must be of good life, and have the signs of a call or vocation from God. For holy orders he needs a title. For these requisites we refer to the articles devoted to them. But the mention of interstices suggests the questions raised on ordinations per saltum—i.e. ordination to a higher order of a person who has not received a lower one.

The Church has always disapproved such ordinations, except in rare cases, and looked on the exercise of lower orders as the best preparation for ascending higher. Still, St. Cyprian was made priest and bishop without passing through the lower grades ("Vita Pontii," cap. 3). St. Augustine received the priesthood in the same way ("Vita Possidii," cap. 4). Morinus, a very high authority, denies that antiquity furnishes any instance of a person who was not already a priest being consecrated bishop. But clear cases are produced by Chardon (ch. v.), and Martene ("De Antiq. Eccles." lib. i.; "Rit." cap. 8, a. 3).[2] The lower order is contained in the higher, and Church history records sudden elevations justified by extraordinary merit and emergency, just as secular history records sudden elevations like that of Xanthippus the Lacedæmonian in the first Punic war (Polyb. "Hist." i. 32), or of Spinola to the rank of general.

ORDERS, RELIGIOUS. The fundamental conceptions which lie at the root of the religious life (in the technical sense of the word "religion")

Church has not determined and cannot determine, so far as concerns validity, what Christ left indeterminate.

[1] Our own view would rather be that whereas the form may be either precatory or imperative, the Latin Church has now adopted an imperative form, "Accipe Spiritum," in ordaining bishops and deacons. The change in the form of absolution would thus offer a complete analogy. But we have thought it safer to follow a recognised authority.

[1] So St. Thomas, Suppl. xxxix. 2. But Billuart, diss iii. a. 3, § 1, with some other Thomists, will not admit this exception; and, indeed, it can scarcely be maintained.

[2] "Certe Joannes S. Galli discipulus, diaconus ordinatus, episcopus Constantiensis factus est, presbyteratu non suscepto, ut satis clare docet Strabo in Vit. S. Galli, c. 28." Martene, loc. cit.: he gives other instances.

have been more or less examined in the articles ASCETÆ, HERMITS, MONK, and NUN. On the external development of that life within the Church, since the time when religious orders first arose, a few general remarks will find here their appropriate place.

The conception of orders of monks did not arise so long as every monastery was an independent entity, managing its own affairs without reference to any other authority but the general law of the Church. Beda speaks of monasteries following the rule of St. Benedict, but he never speaks of the order of St. Benedict. It was only when, commencing in the tenth century, separate communities such as those of Cluny, Citeaux, and the Chartreuse, were formed within the great Benedictine brotherhood, and these communities, however widely scattered, submitted to the rule of a single superior (usually the abbot of the mother house), and met periodically in order to settle their common affairs, that the term "order" came into use. A completely new order—the Trinitarians, was founded by St. John of Matha towards the close of the twelfth century for the redemption of Christians held in captivity by the infidels. The institution of Our Lady of Mercy, founded (1218) by St. Peter Nolasco as an order of chivalry, but afterwards transformed into a religious order, had the same end in view. Early in the thirteenth century the mendicant orders—Franciscan, Dominican, and Carmelite friars (see those articles)—were either founded or came into distinct prominence; in the second half of the century they were joined by the Augustinian friars. These four orders, having no landed property, but subsisting on alms, preached in all parts of Europe, but especially in cities, where luxury and civic pride were beginning to show themselves, the humbling and fortifying doctrines of the Cross. The Servites, founded by seven merchants of Florence and propagated by St. Philip Beniti, after a struggling existence of more than two centuries, were recognised by Innocent VIII. (1487) as a fifth mendicant order, with privileges in all respects equal to those of the other four. The Jeronymites and Brigittines were founded in the fourteenth century. The founder of the Minims (1473), a filiation of the order of St. Francis, was St. Francis of Paula.

The movement of the Reformation, of which the mainspring was the rebellion of man's lower, against the restraints imposed upon it by his higher nature, was met on the Catholic side partly by direct antagonism, partly by argument, and partly by the reassertion, under new forms adapted to the altered circumstances of the time, of the unchanging Christian ideal of the moral and religious end of man. And since the spirit of the Church is most clearly seen in the religious orders, it was to be expected that the conflict with Protestantism would fall to a large extent into the hands of men bound by the three vows. The Society of Jesus (1540) opposed to the indiscipline and licence of Protestantism a more rigid and unquestioning obedience to authority than had yet been known in the Church. The Theatines (1524), Capuchins (1528), and Barnabites (1533), were founded in order to wage war against the corruption of morals which prevailed, and to promote the religious education of the people. The Discalced Carmelites, men and women (1580, 1563), practised the full austerities prescribed by the original rule. On the movement among the Benedictines, see that article, and MAURISTS. In the following century an austere reform of the Cistercian order was established in the monastery of La Trappe by Dom Armand de Rancy (1662). [TRAPPISTS.]

In the middle ages, when the power of law was still weak, and society was often agitated by unpunished acts of turbulence and injustice, the sight of the peaceful and orderly life of a monastery, spent in a round of ceaseless prayer, praise, and study, was by the very contrast deeply refreshing and stimulative to the higher characters among the laity. But when in process of time the "reign of law" was firmly established, this contrast lost much of its sharpness, and, so far as immunity from illegal violence was concerned, ceased to exist. It was therefore fitting that religious society, in order to maintain its ground in advance of civil, and not only "allure to brighter worlds," but also "lead the way," should produce new manifestations of the old endeavour after perfection. Coming forth from the cloister into the world, but still not of the world, the religious life has sanctified and embraced all those varied activities which have the relief of human suffering, and the dispelling of that ignorance which is an obstacle to salvation, as their end. Hence has arisen the multitude of congregations which adorn the Catholic Church of our own day. A few of these are noticed in the article CONGREGATIONS, RELIGIOUS.

The opposition of the governing class in nearly all the countries of Europe to the religious orders—an opposition lately carried in France to the length of an ignoble persecution—is grounded not on anything political, but on fundamental divergence in moral and religious ideas. The governing classes appear to think that man has no hereafter, and that his business is to get as much enjoyment out of his short term of life here as he can. Religious men and women know that the case is far otherwise; they cannot cease therefore to hold up the teaching of Christ and the practice of the saints for human instruction, in spite of any impediments which statesmen may throw in their way.

ORDINARY, THE. By this name, in the language of the Church, is denoted the diocesan bishop, "who, in union with the common Father of Christendom, in virtue of the mission and the powers which he holds from our Lord, as a lawful successor of the Apostles, is called of common right, jure ordinario, to accomplish the Divine work of the sanctification of the faithful in the diocese over which he presides."[1] The ordinary performs all ecclesiastical functions — teaching, administering the sacraments, governing the flock of Christ—in his own right; priests perform them by virtue of the delegated right which they derive from their bishop. [See BISHOP, SUFFRAGAN, and COADJUTOR.]

ORDINATION. The chief rules of law concerning the collation of holy orders, in relation to Persons, Times, and Places, form the subject of the present article.

Persons.—Women are incapable of being validly ordained, inasmuch as both the healthy natural instincts of mankind and positive Apostolic injunction (1 Cor. xiv. 34; 1 Tim. ii. 11) require that women should be "silent in the churches." When mention is made in the "Corpus Juris" of the ordination of deaconesses,[2] this is to be understood not of ordination properly so called, but of a special benediction in virtue of which, in convents of women, those receiving it were empowered to read homilies or gospels before the community.

To receive holy orders validly, it is necessary to have been baptised and, at least for adults, to be acting voluntarily. To receive them licitly, it is necessary to be in a state of grace, to have been confirmed,[1] to take them in regular order and not per saltum, not to be irregular [IRREGULARITY],[2] to have attained the canonical age required, to be under no censure, to be sufficiently educated,[3] to be ordained either by one's own bishop, or, if otherwise, with his licence, and after the production of his dimissorial letters [DIMISSORIALS], and, lastly, to have a legitimate and sufficient title, by which is understood, either a benefice, or a patrimony adequate to a man's support, or religious poverty—i.e. the poverty which religious men embrace by vow. All orders in the regular course of things are conferred by bishops; but abbots also have the power—in some cases even before they have been blessed—of conferring minor orders on their own subjects (subditi).

Times.—The canonical age required for the tonsure and the three lowest grades of orders (ostiarius, lector, and exorcist) is seven years completed. For the acolyteship, twelve years completed. For the subdiaconate, the canonical age is 22, for the diaconate 23, and for the priesthood 25; in these three cases it is the commenced not the completed year that is meant. For the episcopate the full age of 30 years is required.

The tonsure can be conferred on any day, at any hour, and in any place. Minor orders can be conferred at general ordinations, and also on any Sunday or holiday,[4] and not necessarily during Mass. Sacred orders, according to the law, can only be conferred on the Saturdays in the four Ember weeks, on the fifth Saturday in Lent, or on Holy Saturday, and always during Mass. But since the plenitude of the Papal authority can dispense with any positive law, it is to be noted that orders are lawfully conferred on the members of all those religious orders which have received a special privilege of such a tenor from the Holy See at times

[2] There are, however, certain cases of irregularity, incurred for no very grave cause, in which the bishop can give a dispensation and then ordain licitly.
[3] In the Corpus Juris Pope Gelasius says: "Let none presume to promote illiterate persons to the clerical order, for one who is destitute of learning cannot be fit for sacred functions." See also Conc. Trid. sess. xxiii. 4, De Ref.
[4] In dioceses where a special custom prevails to that effect, minor orders can be given on Fridays or on an Ember Wednesday.

other than those named by the law. The episcopate is conferred on a Sunday, or on the festival of an Apostle, unless a Papal indult has authorised the choice of some other day.

Two grades of sacred orders—e.g. the diaconate and the subdiaconate—cannot be conferred on the same day.

On the intervals to be observed between the collation of the various grades, see INTERSTICES.

Place.—The Council of Trent enjoined (sess. xxv. 8, De. Ref.) that sacred orders should be publicly conferred in the cathedral or in one of the principal churches of the diocese in the presence of the canons. Minor orders the bishop can confer in his own palace. But notwithstanding the injunction of the council, custom has long sanctioned the collation of sacred orders by the bishop in his own house or chapel, if any reasonable cause can be shown for the non-compliance with the law. (Ferraris, Ordo, Ordinare.)

ORDO ROMANUS. Certain ancient collections of ritual prescriptions, or rubrics, as observed in the Roman Church, bear this name. They are represented at the present day by the Ceremoniale and the Pontificale Romanum (q.v.) The first of these collections which appeared in print was the "Ordo Vulgatus" (1559) of Melchior Hittorp. Towards the end of the seventeenth century Mabillon, in his "Museum Italicum," edited fifteen "Ordines," the first ten[1] of which are of great but uncertain antiquity; of the last five the authors and dates are known. The rubrics and directions which they contain relate, some to ordinary, others to extraordinary ceremonies. Of the former class are the Papal Mass, the Episcopal Mass, the celebration of Baptism and Extreme Unction, Ordinations, the Communion of the sick, the ceremonial of the last three days of Holy Week, Papal and cardinalitial functions during the offices of the whole year, sacerdotal functions on all ferias, benedictions, &c., &c. Of the second class are the election and consecration of a Pope, the coronation of the emperor and of kings, the creation of cardinals, the nomination of legates, canonisation, &c. (Wetzer and Welte, art. by Kober.)

ORGAN (ὄργανον, organum) is used in the LXX for instruments of any kind, but especially of musical instruments. It occurs not only as the rendering of עוּגָב, the "pipe" or "flute," but also of כִּנּוֹר and נֵבֶל, which were stringed instruments (Ps. cl. 4, cxxxvii. 2; Amos v. 23, vi. 5). Our Latin psalms naturally conform to the Septuagint use; but the Vulgate, so far as it is Jerome's independent work, employs the word much more carefully. There "organum" never means a stringed instrument. It occurs fourteen times in Jerome's rendering of the Hebrew text; three times it represents עוּגָב, a "pipe" (Gen. iv. 21; Job xxi. 12, xxx. 31); in the other places it is the generic word for instruments of all kinds, a very accurate rendering of the Hebrew כֵּלִים, to which in this latter case it always answers. (So 1 Paral. xv. 16; xvi. 5, 42; xxiii. 5; 2 Paral. v. 13; vii. 6; xxiii. 13; xxix. 20, 27; xxx. 27; xxxiv. 12). Aquila, so far as we have observed, anticipated Jerome in accuracy on this point, for he did not fall into the blunder of mistaking with the LXX the "pipe" of Job xxi. 12 for a harp (see Field, "Hexapl. Orig." tom. ii. p. 39). Nor, again, does he in Amos v. 23 and Ps. cxxxvii. 2, use ὄργανα for the stringed instruments mentioned there (Field, tom. ii. pp. 974, 290). Jerome not unfrequently imitated Aquila, and he may have done so in this case.

The organ, then, in the Vulgate, so far as it means a definite instrument at all, is equivalent to pipe. But in St. Augustine's time, as appears from his commentary on Ps. lvi. (Heb. lvii.), it was already used in its modern sense. He speaks of it as a large instrument in which the wind was supplied from bellows. It arose from a development of the syrinx or set of pipes bound together. First these pipes were placed in a box and sounded by means of a slide which opened the hole with which the pipe was connected. The invention of this perforated slide is attributed to Ctesibius. Then, as the breath of the musician was not enough to play so many pipes, wind was supplied by bellows worked by the hand or by water. Such an hydraulic organ ("organum hydraulicum") is described by Tertullian ("De Anima," 14), who attributes the invention to Archimedes; and there is also a well-known account of an organ with a bellows of bull's hide in an epigram by Julian the Apostate. The hydraulic organ is also mentioned by Talmudical writers, who retain the word ὑδραυλις (אֻדְרַבְלִס), and the legend adds that it was not allowed in the temple because its soft tones spoilt the singing (Hamburger, "Real Encycl. für Bibel und Talmud," p. 886). In 757 the Byzantine Emperor Constantine Copronymus sent an organ to Pepin, and another was sent to Charlemagne by Constantine Michael (references in Ducange, sub voc. "Organum"). A little later Pope John VIII. begged Anno, bishop of Freising, to send him an organ, with some one able to manage it (Mansi, "Concil." tom. xvii. col. 245). The development of the instrument does not concern us here. We only observe that keys were introduced in the eleventh century and pedals invented in the fifteenth, by Bernard, a German in the service of the Doge of Venice, and pass on to the ecclesiastical use of the organ.

[1] The first are at least older than the ninth century, for they are mentioned by Amalasius.

It has never been adopted among the Greeks or Orientals. Chrysostom (in Ps. cl.) speaks of musical instruments generally as only "permitted" in Jewish worship "on account of their weakness." Theodoret (in Ps. cl. 5 and 6) holds much the same language, while the author of "Quæst. et Respons. ad Orthodox.," once attributed to Justin Martyr, but certainly written after the conversion of the empire, says expressly that, whereas instruments were allowed in the temple, singing only without instruments is permitted in Christian churches. ("Respons. ad Quæst." 107.) The Greeks and Russians at this day rigidly follow the same rule.

As to the West, we may at once put aside the fables that the organ was introduced into the churches by Pope Vitalian or even Pope Damasus. There is little doubt that it was the presents of organs made to Pepin and Charlemagne which led to the Church use of the instruments. For Walafrid Strabo in the middle of the ninth century gives an account of the organ in the church at Aix-la-Chapelle, probably the very organ sent to Charlemagne from Constantinople. Its tones were so sweet and powerful, according to this writer, that they caused a woman to faint and die (Walafr. Strabo, "Carm. de Apparatu Eccles. Aquisgranensis"). Further, it has been shown from ancient charters that there was an organ in the church of Verona in Charlemagne's time. (Ughelli, "Italia Sacra," tom. v. pp. 604, 610.) A great organ with fourteen bellows and 400 pipes was built by Elfeg, bishop of Winchester, for the Benedictine abbey there (Mabillon, "Annal. Benedict." tom vi. p. 630), and another at Ramsey is mentioned in the life of Oswald, archbishop of York. (Mab. ib. p. 727.) From the eleventh and twelfth centuries organs were usual in cathedral and monastic churches, and Bingham's assertion ("Antiq." vii. 7, § 14) that they were unknown there till after the time of St. Thomas Aquinas is quite erroneous. True it is, however, that protests were occasionally made against the use of organs. "Whence," says Aelred ("Speculum Caritatis," ii. 23), "whence, now that types and figures are over, so many organs and cymbals in the church? Wherefore that horrible sound of bellows, more like thunder than the sweetness of the voice?" More remarkable still is the opinion of St. Thomas (2 2ndæ xci. 2). He is answering the objection that as "the Church does not use musical instruments for the praise of God, lest it should seem to Judaise, so by parity of reasoning" it should not permit singing. He replies, "musical instruments" such as pipes, harps, &c., "minister to delight and do not promote virtue, and were only permitted to the Jews because of their carnal dispositions; whereas singing does help devotion." It is evident that he did not approve of instrumental music. In the Papal chapel it has never been employed. At Trent efforts were made to banish all music from Mass, but the majority of the bishops, especially the Spaniards, opposed this measure (Pallavicino, "Istoria del Concil. di Trento," xviii. 6), and the Council (sess. xxii. Decret. de Observ. in Celebr. Miss.) simply required that the music should be grave and devout. Similar injunctions were made by Benedict XIV. in 1749.

The use of the organ is rejected in orthodox synagogues. The Protestants were divided on the matter; the Lutherans and Anglicans retaining, the "Reformed" at first rejecting it. Thus, it was not till the close of the last century that organs were introduced at Berne, and they are still absent in most of the Scotch Presbyterian churches, though even there a change has begun.

[Bingham, and the articles in Wetzer and Welte, Smith and Cheetham, Mr. Grove's "Dictionary of Music," have been consulted. But we have found by far the most full and accurate information in Ersch and Grüber, "Conversation's Lexicon," article Orgel.]

ORIGEN. [See HELL.]

ORIGINAL SIN is the sin which we inherit by natural descent from Adam, our first father. The Council of Trent (sess. v. Decret. de Peccato Orig.) defines, as of faith, that Adam lost original justice not only for himself but also for us; that he "poured sin, which is the death of the soul, into the whole human race," and that this sin comes, not by imitation of Adam's transgression, but by propagation from him. Further, the council teaches that original sin does not consist in those desires and temptations which are common to our fallen nature, because they remain even after baptism, which takes away original sin; and the council condemns the error of Lutherans and others who supposed that original sin destroyed free will and made man incapable of good actions. The Fathers of Trent, as Pallavicino informs us, carefully abstained from interfering in the scholastic disputes on this point. They appeal to St. Paul, particularly in Romans v. 12 seq., and do not go beyond the plain statements of Scripture. But it will be well to draw out the common teaching of theologians, putting aside for the present points on which they differ.

God made Adam the representative of all who were to descend from him by natural generation. "God, who had made him our beginning, had made all depend on him for himself and us. . . . . In sinning, he lost all, as well for himself as for us." (Bossuet, "Défense de la Tradition," p. ii. l. ix. ch. 12). Had he persevered, we should have been born in original justice. As it is, we are conceived and born in sin and the children of wrath. Our nature and faculties remain entire and we are still capable of natural good, but we are left without grace, and therefore without the means of reaching that supernatural end to which God has ordered us. "The remission of this sin consists in being transplanted into Jesus Christ as the Just one, and the Author of all justice." Thus St. Thomas places the essence of original sin in "the privation of original justice," the privation not the mere negation, because the gifts of grace are absolutely necessary for us in order that we may prepare for heaven. Concupiscence, or the rebellion of the senses, though not original sin, or in itself a sin at all, is still a consequence of the fall.

Such is the common teaching of Catholic theologians, for the opinion of Gregory of Rimini and others,[1] that it consists in a morbid quality transmitted by Adam, is universally rejected; while, on the other hand, the views held by Catharinus and Pighius,[2] that it is merely the actual sin of Adam imputed to us, does not seem to satisfy the requirements of the Tridentine definition. And so understood, the Catholic doctrine, mysterious though it is, does not, like that of the Reformers, present insuperable difficulties to the moral sense.

For, whereas it would have been unjust had God deprived us of the gifts proper to our nature, without actual guilt on our part, Catholics hold that He did nothing of the sort. Grace is in no way a part of, or due to human nature. It is God's free gift. He gives it and withdraws it according to his own will. We have no claims to possess it, no ground of complaint if it is taken away. Our natural faculties enable us to know and love God as our Creator and constant benefactor, and to order our lives aright. We have no title to more.

It may be objected that God has ordered us to a supernatural end, that we cannot choose one which is simply natural, and that grace is our only means of escaping utter misery. This is true. But God condemns none to misery because of original sin. He deprives us of original justice to which we had no title, and then He gives all abundant opportunity of recovering grace and entering heaven by the merits of Jesus Christ, by becoming new men in Him. God ordered us, first of all, to an end infinitely above our nature, and gave us by his free gift original justice to attain it. Adam forfeited the original gift, and then God, still ordering us to a supernatural end, and having no will to impose impossible commands, gave us the grace of our Redeemer as the means of reaching it. The only exception occurs in the case of infants who die without baptism. And they, according to the belief now universally received, far from being miserable, attain natural happiness in the next world. [See LIMBO.]

The doctrine, then, of original sin is mysterious, but by no means cruel or unreasonable. We cannot fully understand the manner in which it is trans-

[1] "Nullo modo defendi potest," Bellarmin says; but he admits it was held by Peter Lombard, Henricus, Gregory of Rimini, and Driedo. Bellarm. De Amiss. Grat. lib. v. cap. 15.

[2] See Bellarm. loc. cit. cap. 16.

mitted, for the soul comes directly from God, not from the parents. But here, too, the Catholic doctrine that original sin is a mere privation, not a positive quality, comes to our help. God cannot be the author of sin, nor can He stain the souls which come from Him. But He can and does infuse souls deprived of original justice; and since the infusion follows by a natural law on the generation of the body, in that sense natural propagation may be rightly called the cause of original sin.

Theologians differ widely on the consequences of original sin. Undoubtedly concupiscence flows from the deprivation of original justice. Had Adam persevered, our bodily appetites would have been in perfect subjection to reason, our reason itself to God. But according to the stricter Thomists, by the rebellion of the flesh consequent on original sin, man sinks below his natural state. Thomas de Lemos ("Panopl. Grat" tract. de Læsione Lib. Arbitr.) insists that, although after the fall nature remains entire "as to its essence and faculties, it is not so with respect to the natural inclination to good." (So also Alvarez, "De Auxil. Grat." lib. vi. disp. 45.) Both these quotations are from Kuhn ("Dogmatik. Lehre der Gnade," i. p. 269). Other great theologians, and, as we think, more reasonably, look on man's ignorance, the rebellion of his appetites, &c., as connatural to his finite and composite nature. In Adam, an extraordinary grace perfectly restrained appetites which reverted after the fall to their natural condition. The opposite theory is well put by Bellarmin. When he says, the supernatural gift was removed, "Human nature, left to itself, began to experience that struggle between the lower and higher part, which would have been natural—i.e. would have followed from the condition of matter, had not God conferred on man the gift of justice over and above." Human nature, he continues, "does not suffer more from ignorance and infirmity than it would do had it been created in a purely natural state." And he concludes: "The corruption of nature does not come from the want of any natural gift, or from the accession of any evil quality, but simply from the loss of a supernatural gift on account of Adam's sin. ("De Gratia Primi Hominis," apud Mohler "Symbolik," p. 64.)

The Doctrine in Scripture.—The Old Testament never asserts that we sinned in Adam, or even inherited sinfulness from him. But Ps. li. (l.) 7, "Behold, in guilt I was brought forth, and in sin my mother conceived me," "contains the basis of the doctrine, inasmuch as it regards sinfulness as something inborn, and so not as resulting from the abuse of freedom" (Hupfeld, ad loc.). Job expresses the same idea, though less distinctly. "Who can bring pure from unclean? Not one" (xiv. 4). In Wisdom ii. 23, 24, death is said to have entered into the world "by the envy of the devil," and the Rabbins [1] developed the doctrine that all had sinned and incurred death, because represented by Adam and so implicated in his sin. Even this, however, is less than the doctrine of original sin.

In St. Paul we have the first explicit statement of the doctrine. "As through one man sin came into the world, and death by sin, and so death penetrated to all men, because [2] all sinned. (The construction breaks off here.) For until the law, sin was in the world, but sin is not reckoned if there is no law; but sin reigned from Adam to Moses, even on those who did not sin after the likeness of the transgression of Adam, who is a type of the one to come. But not as the trespass, so also the gift of grace. For if by the trespass of one the many died, much more the grace and the gift in the grace of the one man Jesus Christ abounded to the many."

It may safely be maintained that Pelagius and many other writers ancient and modern, who understand St. Paul to speak only of actual sin by which men imitate Adam, distort the grammar and sense of the passage. For (α) St. Paul describes a momentary act of sin "because all sinned" (ἥμαρτον)—i.e. in Adam. Not "have sinned, or were sinning." (β) It is not true that death is universal because all have actually sinned. Millions have died before they were capable of sin. (γ) The parallel between the two Adams would be destroyed on the Pelagian interpretation. Not, in the first instance, by the imitation of Christ, but by the reconciliation (see v. 11) which Christ's death effected, we are saved; just so, not by following Adam's example, but by an act external to us on the part of the former Adam, we were lost. (δ) St. Paul argues that there could be no trespass against law—i.e. law externally promulgated—between Adam and Moses, because no such law was given except to a few. Men in that interval did not sin like Adam by actual transgression of positive law. Yet they died because they sinned in Adam their head.

[1] The Rabbinical names for original sin are "the sin of the first man" (חטא אדם הראשון), "the pollution of the serpent" (זוהמא שׁל נחשׁ). The Targum on Ruth iv. 22 alleges that David's father, having no sin of his own, died on account of the counsel given to Eve by the serpent, for which all the generations of the earth were condemned to death. Levy, Chaldäisches Wörterbuch, sub voc. עיטא, quotes a similar statement from Baba Bathra, 17 a, respecting Benjamin, Amram, father of Moses, Jesse, father of David, and Kilab, David's son. These four were personally sinless, and died for the counsel of the serpent.

[2] ἐφ' ᾧ cannot mean in quo, "in whom" (ἐν ᾧ), as the Vulgate renders it. But the Vulgate rendering does not alter the dogmatic sense. Estius defends the Vulgate rendering on insufficient grounds, but with great moderation. "Tolerari potest" is his verdict on our rendering. Bossuet (loc. cit. liv. vii. ch. 12 seq.) is far more severe.

The Tradition of the Church.—The forcible teaching of St. Paul was, as everybody knows, fully appreciated by St. Augustine. It is useless to multiply citations, but we may give one passage ("Enchirid." cap. 10) which fairly represents the form in which he constantly expresses the doctrine. "He [Adam], exiled after sin, bound his offspring also, which by sinning he had corrupted as it were in the root, under the penalty of death and condemnation, so that all progeny born of himself and his wife the occasion of his sin and partner in his condemnation by concupiscence of the flesh, in which concupiscence his disobedience met a punishment like itself, should draw to itself original sin, and thence be drawn through diverse errors and pains to that last and endless torture with the angels who deserted and corrupted [others], and with those who inherit and share in their portion."

Here we have the doctrine distinctly formulated that all men sinned in Adam, and that we are condemned because of him, and it is very hard to produce testimonies which touch this, the central point at issue, from Ante-Nicene Fathers. Irenæus (ii. 22, 4) speaks of "infants" as born again to God, and of Christ as "sanctifying infants." Clement of Alexandria ("Strom." iii. 9, p. 540) connects the fact of physical death with Adam's sin. Tertullian holds that Adam not only imparted death to his descendants, but also infected all who sprang from him with lust, and generally with a morbid inclination to sin ("Testimon. An." 3; "De Pud." 6; "De Jejun." 3; "Adv. Marc." i. 22, v. 17). Origen admits a natural inclination to sin (πάντες μὲν οἱ ἄνθρωποι πρὸς τὸ ἁμαρτάνειν πεφύκαμεν) "C. Cels." iii. 62-64, iv. 40 (where see a catena of passages from Ante-Nicene Fathers in Spencer's note); and, "In Levit." Hom. viii. 3, which only exists in the Latin version, he infers from the custom of baptising infants their need of purification. "In Levit." xii. 4, he attributes the corruption of nature to the fact that men derive their bodies from their parents by natural generation. Cyprian, like Tertullian, traces sin and death to the fall ("De Bono Patient." 17; cf. "Testimon." iii. 54), but he goes in one passage far beyond Tertullian. Adults, he says, be their sins ever so great, are not to be deterred from baptism, much less infants, who "have committed no sin," but only "by carnal descent from Adam have contracted the infection of ancient death," and, in whose case, "not their own sins, but those of another, are remitted ("remittuntur non propria sed aliena peccata," Ep. lxiv.).

The above account has been made from private notes, and the conclusion to which it leads is confirmed by the greatest historical authorities. Petavius ("De Incarnat." xiv. 2) says the Greek Fathers speak little, and then not clearly, about original sin, and that Augustine was the first among the Latins to treat the matter accurately. Cardinal Newman is of the same mind, and he quotes Petavius, Jansenius, Walch, "men of such different schools that we may surely take their agreement as a proof of the fact." ("Development," p. 22.) Bossuet, indeed (loc. cit. liv. viii.), argues vigorously, but with small success, on the other side. It is enough for Catholics to show, as they certainly can, that their belief in the doctrine is due, not to St. Augustine, but to St. Paul.

ORTHODOX CHURCH. [See GREEK SCHISMATIC CHURCH.]

ORTHODOXY, FEAST OF. [See ICONOCLASTS.]

OSTIARIUS, or Doorkeeper, holds the lowest of the minor orders in the Latin Church. His office was more important in ancient times before the conversion of the Roman Empire. He had to prevent the heathen from entering and disturbing the service, to keep the laity separate from the clergy, men from women, and to see generally that decorum was maintained. He had to guard the church and all that it contained, to open the church and sacristy at certain hours, to open the book for the preacher, &c. (Chardon, "Hist. des Sacr." tom. v. ch. 2.)

The office is mentioned by Pope Cornelius in the middle of the third century (Euseb. "H. E." vi. 43), and in the very ancient collection of canons commonly but wrongly attributed to the Fourth Council of Carthage, in 398. The rite of ordination is the same as that in the Roman Pontifical. The bishop gives the keys to the persons ordained, saying, "Go act, as having to render God an account of the things locked by these keys." In the present rite the ostiarius is led by the archdeacon to the church doors; he locks and opens them and rings the bells. Neither of these two ceremonies is mentioned in the Carthaginian canons or in the Gelasian Sacramentary. The former, however (the opening of the doors), is very ancient, being given in the Gregorian Sacramentary and in some very ancient MSS. Of the latter (ringing the bells) no trace is found in ancient Pontificals. In the time of Charlemagne and Amalarius (A.D. 820), it was the priest's business to ring the bells.

P

PALEA. Certain canons in the Decretum of Gratian [CANON LAW], about fifty in number, have the superscription "Palea." Some have considered this to be a part of the word "Paucopalea," the name of one of Gratian's disciples; others have thought that these canons (which in the MSS. of the Decretum usually appear in the margin), as treating of matters of slight importance, were hence called "palea," chaff. But as many of these canons refer to matters of the highest importance, this derivation appears inadmissible. Whatever be the origin of the name, it is certain that in the oldest MSS. of the Decretum the Paleæ are few, that in those of later date they become numerous, and that in practice they are of equal authority with the canons known to have been compiled by Gratian himself.

PALLA. A small cloth of linen used to cover the chalice and usually stiffened with cardboard, &c. The upper part may be covered with silk (S.C.R., January 10, 1852). Part of the corporal used to be employed for the covering of the chalice, but Innocent III. mentions the palla as distinct from the corporal. (Benedict XIV. "De Miss." I. v. 6.)

PALLIUM. A band of white wool worn on the shoulders. It has two strings of the same material and four purple crosses worked on it It is worn by the Pope and sent by him to patriarchs, primates, archbishops, and sometimes, though rarely, to bishops as a token that they possess the "fulness of the episcopal office." Two lambs are brought annually to the Church of St. Agnes at Rome by the Apostolic subdeacons while the "Agnus Dei" is being sung. These lambs are presented at the altar and received by two canons of the Lateran Church. From this wool the pallia are made by the nuns of Torre de' Specchi. The subdeacons lay the pallia on the tomb of St. Peter, where they remain all night. A bishop cannot, strictly speaking, assume the title of patriarch, archbishop, &c., cannot convoke a council, consecrate bishops, ordain clerics, consecrate chrism or churches, till he has received the pall. He is bound, if he is elected to a see of metropolitan or higher rank, to beg the pallium from the Pope, "instanter, instantius, instantissme," within three months after his consecration or from his confirmation, if he was already a bishop and has come to the metropolitan see by translation. Meanwhile, he can depute another bishop to consecrate if he has in due time applied for the pallium. He receives it from the hands of another bishop, delegated by the Pope after taking an oath of obedience to the latter, and wears it on certain great feasts, a list of which is given in the Pontifical. He cannot transmit it to his successor or wear it out of his own patriarchate, province, &c. If translated, he must beg for another pallium. The pallium or pallia, if he has received more than one, are buried with the bishop to whom they were given.

The early history of the pallium is involved in hopeless obscurity. We take the following facts from Chardon ("Hist. des Sacr." tom. v. De l'Ordre, ch. ix.). Pallium is the Latin name for the ἱμάτιον or loose upper garment of the Greeks.[1] Among the Romans, the use of the pallium was specially affected by philosophers, and afterwards by Christian ascetics (see Tertullian's treatise "De Pallio"). Two great critics—viz. De Marca and Baluze—believed that the pallium was first given to bishops as a mark of special dignity by the emperors. It is true Pope Vigilius would not grant the pallium to Auxanius and Aurelian, archbishops of Arles, without the emperor's consent. Gregory the Great took the same precaution in granting it to Syagrius, bishop of Autun. But this deference to the imperial will arose from the difficult circumstances of the time, and De Marca admits that Gregory, before he had been calumniated to Maurice, gave the pallium to Vigilius of Arles without consulting the emperor.[2]

We may dismiss the doubtful statement of Anastasius (ninth century) that the Pope Marcus (d. 336) gave the pallium to the Bishop of Ostia, and the mention of the pallium in the spurious donation of Constantine. In all probability the pallium was at first an ornament of prelates (probably of metropolitans), and had no special connection with Rome. See the synod of Macon (anno 581), canon 6, which forbids archbishops to say Mass without the pallium, though it is certain that then the French metropolitans, as such, did not get their pallia from Rome.

The Pope then wore the pallium as a mark of his own authority, and an examination of the Liber Diurnus makes it probable that he sent it to suburbican bishops—i.e. bishops in the provinces near Rome, over whom the Pope exercised a specially immediate authority. The sending of it marked the special dependence of these bishops on the Pope. Next, the Popes granted the Roman pallium to vicars-apostolic—i.e. to their representatives in distant provinces. The first certain example of such a concession is the grant of a pallium to St. Cæsarius of Arles by Pope Symmachus in 513. Thus the Roman pallium came to be regarded as a special mark of honour and was eagerly coveted by bishops. Gregory the Great granted it to Syagrius of Autun, to the two metropolitan bishops in England (Canterbury and York), &c. This Chardon calls "the third degree in the fortunes of the pallium." Next a rule was made at a general synod of Franks under St. Boniface in 747, that metropolitans must ask the pallium from Rome. This law was not always regarded. It was enforced, however, in a capitulary of Charlemagne, and after that always or nearly always observed in the Frankish Empire.

In 877,[1] the great synod of Ravenna under John VIII., representing all Italy, required (cap. i.) metropolitans to demand the Roman pallium personally or by deputy within three months of their consecration. Otherwise, they could not consecrate other bishops, and were liable, after three monitions, to deposition. The Pope insisted on this rule being kept in France. The rule was soon afterwards established throughout the West, except in Ireland, where the pallium was unknown even in St. Malachi's time, as appears from St. Bernard's life of that saint. Innocent III. forbade even the assumption of the name of archbishop till the pallium had been obtained, and the decree forms part of the "Corpus Juris."

In the East, the Patriarchs gave a sort of pallium (ὠμοφόριον) to their metropolitans. After the time of the Crusades, the Fourth Lateran Council (canon 5) required even patriarchs to receive the pallium from the Pope.

To sum up, the pallium was an ornament of metropolitans, given to them perhaps from early times by the patriarchs and by the Pope in that comparatively narrow district which was under his most immediate supervision. Then the Pope gave it to his vicars in distant parts, then as a mark of special honour to some bishops, then he required all Western metropolitans to ask it from him before exercising their functions as archbishops, and finally the rule was extended even to patriarchs.

PALM SUNDAY. The Sunday before Easter, on which the Church celebrates Christ's entry into Jerusalem. The name, "Palm Sunday" ("Dominica in Palmas," or "ad Palmas," βαΐων ἑορτή), is ancient, for it occurs in the "Life of Euthymius" (died 472), and is spoken of [1] It was tucked round the neck in running or other active exercise. Hence perhaps the origin of the present form.

[2] A decree of Valentinian III. (anno 432), grants the dignity of archbishop and honor pallii to the prelate holding the see of Ravenna. Baronius and Bona deny the authenticity of this decree.

[1] Nicolas I. had made a still more stringent rule, but only for Bulgaria.

as a great day by Isidore of Seville. According to our present rite, palms or olive-branches are blessed by the celebrant before Mass, and distributed to the faithful; the clergy walk in procession through the church and pass outside. Then cantors enter the church, leaving the rest without; the hymn, "Gloria, laus, et honor," is sung, both parties, those within and those without, taking part. At last the subdeacon knocks at the door with the shaft of the processional cross, and the whole body march up the church. The Greeks have a procession with palms at matins.

Martene denies that any trace of the procession can be found before the eighth century, and he seems to be perfectly right, in spite of Merati's elaborate attempt (Tom. II. pars. iv. tit. 7) to produce earlier testimonies. Merati shows that the name Palm Sunday occurs in an ancient Roman Calendar published by Martene himself in his "Anecdota," and dating from the fourth or fifth century; that St. Adhelm (709) mentions the singing of the "Ozanna;" and that in a prayer in the most ancient MS. of the Gregorian Sacramentary (tenth century) there is an allusion to the practice the faithful had of coming to the church with palms. These instances clearly are not to the point. In an "order" observed in a German monastery, and ascribed by Mabillon to the year 800 circ., the procession is mentioned, and so in Pseudo-Alcuin (tenth century).

In ancient times those who were to be baptised on Holy Saturday, called "competentes," heard the whole Creed explained on this Sunday. Hence its old name, "Pascha petitum s. competentium."

PARABOLANI (Gr. παραβάλλεσθαι, to expose oneself to danger. The word "parabolani," with its Latin suffix, was evidently formed from παράβολοι, "dare-devils," the men who for money fought with wild beasts in the amphitheatre). The "parabolani," a class of lay assistants to the clergy, principally engaged in looking after the sick and attending to funerals, are frequently mentioned by writers of the fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries. Gibbon describes them as a charitable corporation originally founded in the time of the Emperor Gallienus.[1] They were very numerous at Alexandria, and seem to have formed a kind of body-guard to the patriarch Cyril at the time of his contest with the prefect.

[1] Decline and Fall, ch. xlvii.

PARACLETE (παράκλητος). A word used four times in St. John's Gospel (xiv. 16, 26; xv. 26; xvi. 7) as a name of the Holy Ghost, once in his first Epistle (ii. 1) of Christ. It is found nowhere else in the N.T. and nowhere in the LXX. The Vulgate rendering in the Gospel is Paracletus, in the Epistle Advocatus; and Paraclete (usually Paraclitus) is a common title of the Holy Ghost in the Breviary. The Rhemish follows the Latin.

Aquila gives παράκλητοι as a rendering of "comforters" (מְנַחֲמִים), Job xvi. 2, where the LXX more rightly has παρακλήτορες. Origen, "De Princip." ii. 4, in the version of Rufinus, says the word when used of the Holy Ghost means comforter ("a consolatione dicitur Paraclesis enim Latine consolatio dicitur"). This interpretation, though widely adopted by Greek and Latin Fathers, is surely erroneous. The word means "one called in," an advocate or pleader. This appears from the passive form, the constant classical use, the undoubted sense in 1 John ii. 1 (though even there the Greek Fathers take it as "comforter"), and the use of the word in Rabbinical writers (see פרקליט in Buxtorf.)[1] The Holy Ghost pleads the Christian cause against the world (John xv. 8), and Christ's with the Christian (xiv. 26; xv. 26; xvi. 14).

PARADISE (פַּרְדֵּס). An old Persian word adopted at an early date by the Hebrews. It only occurs three times in the Old Testament, and always means simply "a park" (Cant. iv. 13; Neh. ii. 8; Eccl. ii. 5, pl.). In the LXX (Gen. ii. 8) and Peshito it is used for that particular garden or park in which Adam and Eve were placed; and in the later Jewish theology for that part of Hades which was inhabited by the souls of the just, and which we call "Limbo." In this sense it occurs in Luc. xxiii. 43. Lastly, in 2 Cor. xii. 4; Apoc. ii. 7, it means "heaven," or "a part of heaven." [See HEAVEN, and LIMBO.]

PARASCEVE (παρασκεύη), "preparation"—i.e. for the Sabbath and so equivalent to Friday. It is retained in the Missal as a name for Good Friday.

[1] He quotes, e.g., a gloss on the Pirke Avoth. ii.: "A paraclete is a good mediator for a man to a king;" "If he has good paracletes he will be delivered;" "Penance and good works are a man's paracletes in the heavenly judgment," &c.

PASSION SUNDAY. The Sunday before Palm Sunday. With Passion Sunday the more solemn part of Lent begins; the images are veiled with violet at the first vespers; the Judica psalm and the Gloria Patri are omitted at the Introit, &c. The name Passion Sunday is ancient, but we have been able to find no ancient or even mediæval author who mentions the veiling of the images. None is quoted by Gavantus or Meratus. It is said to refer to the last words of the Gospel for the day. "Jesus autem abscondit se et exivit a templo."

PASSIONISTS. Their full title is, "Congregation of the Discalced Clerks of the most holy Cross and Passion of our Lord Jesus Christ." Their founder, St. Paul of the Cross, born near Genoa in 1694, put on the habit of the order in 1720, with the sanction of the Bishop of Alessandria, Monsignor Gastinara. The dress resembles that worn by regular clerks; over the soutane hangs a heart, suspended from the neck, with a cross above it; a black leathern strap is round the waist. In 1721, having compiled the constitutions which he wished his followers to observe, Paul went to Rome in order to obtain sanction for his proceedings. This sanction was withheld for many years, in the course of which Paul was ordained priest and employed on various works of charity in Rome. All obstacles being at length removed, he established the first monastery of his congregation at Argentaro, near Orbitello, in 1737. The rules of the society were confirmed by Benedict XIV. in 1741. Clement XIV. showed the Fathers marked favour, and conferred on them the house and church of SS. Giovanni e Paolo on the Cœlian Hill. Here the holy founder took up his abode, and here (1775) he died. The congregation rapidly extended itself after his death, but for some time within the limits of Italy only. But Paul's most settled purpose, and the subject of his impassioned longing, had been to work and pray for the conversion of England. His desire was in part fulfilled when, in 1842, his followers obtained a footing in Great Britain. Their provincial was Father Ignatius Spencer, a convert from Anglicanism. There are now five Passionist houses in England—at Highgate, Broadway, Harborne, Sutton, and St. Helen's; two in Ireland—Mount Argus, near Dublin, and Belfast; and one in Scotland—Glasgow. The congregation has for many years had the spiritual charge of those Catholics in Bulgaria and Roumania, about 10,000 in number, who adhere to the Latin rite. They have also houses in Belgium and in New South Wales.

The life of a Passionist is very austere. They fast three days in every week, besides Advent and Lent; they wear nothing on their feet but sandals; they rise at night to say Matins, and, indeed, recite the office in choir at all the canonical hours. They divide their time between contemplation and action; being indefatigable in giving missions and retreats, especially to persons living in community. Besides the three usual vows, they make a fourth—that they will do their utmost to keep alive in the hearts of the faithful the memory of our Lord's passion. On the day of their profession they make a vow of perseverance in the congregation. Nevertheless, they only take simple vows. (Hélyot, "Contin.")

The Passionists in America. — The following account has been furnished us of the introduction of the Congregation of Passionists into this country, and of the present condition of the American Province:

"The Passionists were introduced into the United States in 1852 by the Right Rev. Michael O'Connor, bishop of Pittsburg. The first colony consisted of three priests and one brother. The superior was Father Anthony Calandri, who died April 27, 1878. A retreat was soon built in a suitable location on a hill to the south of Pittsburg, which is still the novitiate of the order in the United States. Applications for admission were not wanting, and in 1859 the Fathers were able to establish a second house in Dunkirk, diocese of Buffalo, N.Y. In 1861 a third foundation was made in West Hoboken, N.J., which has since become the residence of the provincial. These three houses were erected into a province in 1863, with Father Dominic Tarlattini as first provincial. Since then three more retreats were added—one near Baltimore, Md.; another in Cincinnati, O.; and the third near Louisville, Ky.; to say nothing of the foundations in Mexico and Buenos Ayres. The American Province of St. Paul of the Cross numbers, at present (1883), about 150 religious — viz. 70 priests, 40 clerical students, and 40 lay brothers.

"Although missions and spiritual retreats are the principal external works for the good of souls prescribed by the rule of the Passionist fathers, still the necessities of the faithful and the scarcity of priests in this country compelled them at first to undertake the spiritual charge of the Catholics living in the vicinity of their foundations, who otherwise would have had no one to minister to their spiritual wants. But as the population increased and priests became more numerous, most of these charges were gradually relinquished, and at present the Passionist Fathers retain only a few parishes. Calls for missions and retreats, on the other hand, have become very frequent, and during the greater part of the year several bands of missionaries are at work simultaneously in different localities. Their method in conducting missions is substantially the same as that followed by other missionaries, but the prominence given in their preaching to the mysteries of our Lord's passion is found to be singularly effective in rousing the negligent and stimulating the devout to still greater fervour."

PASTOR. Jesus Christ, who, in the Preface for festivals of the Apostles, is called "Pastor æternus," communicates the characteristics of a good shepherd of souls to all those who faithfully discharge the office of governing in his Church. This communication is pre-eminently made to the Roman Pontiff, who, in the collect "pro Papa" is described as "pastor ecclesiæ;" it also appertains in lesser degrees to bishops and priests, upon each one of whom it devolves to lead, feed, and gently rule, like a shepherd, the flock committed to him.

PATEN. A plate used from the earliest times to receive the Host consecrated at Mass. Larger patens, called ministeriales, were used for the communion of the people. It is consecrated with chrism by the bishop, and this rite of consecration is mentioned in a Gallican Sacramentary as old as the eighth century, published by Mabillon in the "Museum Italicum."

PATER NOSTER. The prayer taught by our Lord to his disciples. It occurs in all the ancient liturgies with one notable exception—that of the so-called Clementine liturgy—given in the Apostolic Constitutions. Its absence there has never been satisfactorily explained. In all the chief liturgies it occurs much in the same place—i.e. shortly before the Communion. In most of the Greek, in the Mozarabic and the Ambrosian liturgies, the Canon was followed by the Fraction of the Host, then came the Pater. St. Gregory settled finally the place of the Pater in the Roman Mass, placing it where it now stands, immediately after the Canon and before the Fraction. This seems to be the sense of Gregory's words when he says (Lib. 7. Indict. 2. Epist. 64, quoted by Le Brun) that the Sicilians taunted him with following the use of Constantinople and reciting the Pater, "mox post canonem," "immediately after the Canon," and so they are understood by Le Brun, tom. iii. Diss. ii.; Benedict XIV. "De Miss." ii. 19; Probst, "Lit. der ersten drei Jahrhund." p. 356; Hammond, "Ancient Lit." lxxii. The other view—viz. that the Pater was introduced into the Roman liturgy by Gregory, is maintained by Mr. Scudamore in his article on the Lord's Prayer in Smith and Cheetham. The Pope also tells us that, whereas in the East (and also in the Gallican rite) the Pater was said by priest and people, at Rome it was recited by the priest alone. In nearly all the ancient liturgies the Pater is introduced by a preface, like the exhortation in the Mass. "Præceptis salutaribus," &c.[1]

The Pater occurs in all the Breviary hours at the beginning and end, and sometimes in the course of the hour itself. But whereas in the Mass it is said aloud, in the Breviary it is said secretly, or at most only the first and concluding words are said audibly. The reason is that at the part of the Mass where the Pater occurs the faithful only were present, while catechumens, &c. were admitted to the hours. (So Benedict XIV. loc. cit.)

The addition to the Lord's Prayer, "For thine is the kingdom," is wanting in the best ancient authorities. It probably arose for the embolismus [see the article] of the liturgy used in the Syrian church. (See Westcott and Hort, N.T. vol. ii. Notes on Matt. vi. 13.)

PATERINES. A Manichæan sect which first came into notice under this name in Italy about 1040, when a number of them were convicted of heresy by Heribert, archbishop of Milan, and burnt at the stake. They taught that matter was essentially evil, condemned marriage, and set at nought Church authority. The Lombard married clergy, when (1057) they were attacked on the score of incontinence by Anselm of Badagio and Ariald, taunted their assailants with being Paterines. Möhler[1] identifies them with the Boni Homines who were condemned by the Council of Lombers in 1176. They appear again among the heretical sects that infested Languedoc at the end of the twelfth century, and are then identified with the Cathari or Puritans. Innocent III. spoke of "impii Manichæi, qui se Catharos vel Patarinos appellant."[2] The origin of the name is unknown. [Albigenses; Boni Homines; Bulgarians.]

[1] The Ethiopic liturgy is an exception. But the introduction to the Pater is generally in the form of a prayer—not a statement, as in the Roman and Ambrosian Mass.

PATRIARCH, PATRIARCHATE. The dignity of Patriarch—the Primacy of St. Peter being considered as standing apart—is the highest grade in the hierarchy of jurisdiction. Immediately next to the rank of Patriarch may come that of "Primate;" metropolitans or archbishops follow; under each metropolitan are ranged his suffragan bishops. In the fifth century the Exarchate [Exarch] was an intermediate grade between the Patriarchate and the rank of metropolitan.

The Sixth Canon of the first Nicene Council recognises an ancient, customary, and legitimate authority in the Bishops of the three sees of Alexandria, Rome, and Antioch (named in this order) over their respective provinces. The title of "Patriarch," however, is not given; the thing is recognised, but not the word. The title came into use in the fifth century, at least in its present sense, for it had earlier been used loosely for any great see. From the latter part of the fourth century, Constantinople gradually came to occupy the position of a fourth Patriarchate. That of Jerusalem, after a struggle for precedence between it and Cæsarea, became the fifth. For the history of each of these Patriarchates, excluding Rome, see Alexandria, Church of; Antioch; Constantinople, Patriarchate of; Jerusalem, Patriarchate of. Since the misfortunes which overtook the Eastern church (Monophysite heresy, Mussulman domination, Greek schism, &c.) severed all these four sees from Catholic unity, the Popes have continued to nominate bishops to the lost Patriarchates; but these bishops have resided at Rome, except lately in the case of Jerusalem, the Patriarch of which, Monsignor Valerga, commenced to reside at his see in 1847. Besides the Latin Patriarch of Antioch, the Holy See admits a Maronite, a Melchite, and a Syrian Patriarch of the same see, a Patriarch of Cilicia of the Armenian, and a Patriarch of Babylon of the Chaldaic, rite.

There are also three minor Patriarchs in the Western Church—the Patriarch of the Indies, who is the prelate of highest rank in the church of Spain; the Pátriarch of Lisbon; and the Patriarch of Venice.

PATRIMONY OF ST. PETER. [See States of the Church.]

PATRIPASSIAN. [See Sabellian.]

PATRON, PATRONAGE. The word patronus is used in three senses in canon law: it signifies (1) an advocate or barrister; (2) the former master of a manumitted slave, to whom under the Roman law a certain control over his freedman was reserved; (3) a person having the right to present to a benefice. The third sense only is here in question.

The subject of patronage is of little practical interest to American Catholics, as there are no benefices in the United States. Nor has it much more importance for the Catholics of Ireland or Great Britain, as a benefice in Catholic hands in those countries since the spoliation of the "Reformation" has been something very rare indeed.

Patronage (juspatronatus) is defined to be "the right or power of nominating or presenting a clerk for preferment to a vacant ecclesiastical benefice." It may be usefully considered from three points of view, according as (1) its acquisition, (2) its transfer, and (3) its prominent incidents are taken into account.

1. The right of patronage is acquired in one of three principal ways—by foundation, or building, or endowment—according to the memorial line:

Patronum faciunt dos, ædificatio, fundus.

If one person founds a church by giving the ground, a second builds it, and a third endows it, the right of patronage belongs to the three jointly. The consent of the bishop is, of course, always necessary. An endowment, in order to convey a right of patronage, must be sufficient—i.e. it must be ample enough to provide a decent maintenance for those serving the Church, and to meet the annual expense of lights and other Church requisites. Otherwise it is not an endowment, but a benefaction, and as such carries no right of patronage.

[1] Kirchengeschichte, ii. ch. v. § 3.
[2] Wetzer and Welte, art. "Patariner."

Patronage acquired by Papal privilege, conceded at any date anterior to the Council of Trent, was abolished by a decree of that Council;[1] hence anyone now claiming it on that ground must show that such privilege was conceded since the Council, with a clause expressly derogating from its decree. Patronage can also be acquired by prescription, if multiplied unopposed presentations can be proved.

2. The transfer of patronage ordinarily takes place in one of four ways—by succession, donation, sale, or exchange. By succession—as when, on the death of a patron, the right passes to his heirs, whether at law or under settlement or devise. When the patronage passes by donation, the consent of the bishop is usually, but not in all cases, necessary. With regard to the third mode—sale—it is instructive to compare the provisions of the canon law with the law and practice of the Anglican communion as regards the sale of advowsons.[2] In England an advowson can be sold separately, and for the best price. The sole condition is that the benefice be not actually vacant at the time of sale; otherwise no distinction is made between advowsons and any other kind of property. The canon law does not permit an advowson (jus patronatus) to be sold separately at all. It can only be sold indirectly—i.e. through being inseparably annexed to some other property which is susceptible of legal sale. Thus, if a man sell his whole estate, and to this estate an advowson be annexed, the latter passes to the purchaser along with the other property. Or even if the sale be not of a man's whole estate, but only of a particular piece of property—a palace, a farm, a field, &c.—to which a right of patronage is inseparably annexed, that right is transferred to the purchaser by the sale. But in all such cases canon law exacts the condition that the price given be not enhanced on account of the annexed patronage. Any simoniacal attempt to sell the patronage as such is visited by the law with severe penalties.

3. The chief incidents of patronage are four—presentation, honour, defence, maintenance in case of poverty. (1) The first-named is so strictly inherent in a patron that if he present a qualified clerk for a benefice, the bishop is bound to accept him, even though he may know of one more worthy. But the presentation must be made within four months if the patron be a layman, within six if he be a clergyman; otherwise it passes for that time to the bishop. The law is more tender of lay than of ecclesiastical patronage, because interference with the former would tend to discourage rich laymen from building churches and extending Christianity. Women are capable of presenting to benefices equally with men. No patron can present himself to any benefice in his gift, although he may ask the bishop to confer it upon him, and the bishop may, at his discretion, legally do so. (2) By "honour" are understood the precedence and respect which a patron may justly claim in a church founded by him or his ancestor. (3) "Defence" refers to the right and duty of the patron to watch over the beneficiary property, and prevent its waste or dilapidation. (4) "Maintenance in poverty" is the claim which the patron has, should misfortune overtake him and reduce him to want, to receive a decent maintenance (and this applies to his wife and children also) out of the revenues of the benefice in his gift. (Ferraris, Jus patronatus.)

PATRON AND TITULAR OF CHURCH, PLACE, &c. The title of a church is the name it bears—e.g. of the Trinity, St. Augustine, St. Mary, St. Saviour, &c. The patron saint is that saint under whose special protection it has been placed. Thus the titular is a wider term comprehending the persons of the Trinity, mysteries (e.g. Corpus Christi), and saints; the patron of a church can only be a saint or angel. Of churches with the title of St. Mary, the patronal feast is the Assumption. Only a canonised (not a beatified) saint can be chosen as patron. (S. C. R. 23 Martii, 1630.)

The patron of a church is chosen by the founders ("ex fundatorum beneplacito," Merat. § iii. 12, 1). Usually only one patron is chosen, or else two patrons whose feast falls on the same day. The feast of the principal titular or patron is a double of the first class with an octave. This holds good even of churches not yet consecrated. The rule, however, does not apply to chapels of seminaries, &c. &c. The rules for churches which have more than one patron with independent feast are the same as those given below for local patrons.

The patron of a place is chosen by the people with the consent of the clergy. (Decret. Urban. VIII., 23 Mart. 1630.) A place may have several patrons, principal and less principal, but not more than one principal patron except by immemorial custom or Apostolic indult. The feast of the principal patron is a double of the first class with an octave (so also, if there are several chief patrons); of a "less principal," a greater double when celebrated solemnly, otherwise a lesser double.

[1] Sess. xxv. De Ref. c. 9.

[2] An advowson is the perpetual right of presentation to a benefice.

The feast of the chief or titular patron of the cathedral church is kept throughout the diocese even by regulars, who, however, are not obliged to celebrate the octave. (S. C. R. 27 Maii, 1628.)

The constitution of Urban VIII. (Const. clxi. "Universa," § 2) requires that only two patronal feasts be imposed in any one place as holidays of obligation —one the feast of a chief patron of the kingdom or province, the other that of a chief patron of the city, town, village, &c.

PAUL OF SAMOSATA. [See ALOGI.]

PAULICIANS. In the fancy of Gibbon ("Decline and Fall," ch. liv.), this Manichean or quasi-Manichean sect, after its banishment from Asia, "scattered over the West the seeds of reformation." By "reformation" can only be meant revolt; a common fury of negation and destruction may easily have induced the Protestants of the sixteenth century to accept the Paulicians as the ancient exponents of their own principles; but negation is no permanent bond; and when the positive doctrines of the sect are calmly examined, they appear to be such as no moderate Protestant would endorse. The Paulicians rejected or minimised the Sacraments, abhorred images, and condemned the invocation of the saints; while reverencing some books of Holy Scripture, they repudiated Church tradition and the doctrine of a visible Church; in their eyes relics were rubbish, miracles impostures, and the Blessed Virgin not the mother of God. So far all is plain sailing; and a zealous Presbyterian might recognise in the Paulicians the theological ancestors of his own "Nullifiers." But the Paulicians also believed in two Powers, one good, the other evil, dividing the universe between them; and they held the earth and all things sensible to have been created by the spirit of evil. The good God, they said, created the soul of man; the wicked power, or Demiurgus, created his body. Instead of sin in the body being an offence against the "temple of the Holy Ghost," on this view it was the natural outcome of the bodily constitution; therefore, of course, inculpable. They rejected the Old Testament as the work of the Demiurgus. Jesus Christ, they said, did not take his body from Mary, but brought it down with him from heaven. They admitted neither of St. Peter's Epistles; most of them rejected also the Acts. Such was the sect which, according to Gibbon, "scattered over the West the seeds of reformation"!

The origin of the name "Paulician" is uncertain; one theory derives it from a certain Paul, who, with his brother John, founded a society near Samosata early in the seventh century; another—which Gibbon prefers—sees in it merely an evidence of the high value which they set on the life and writings of St. Paul. They first come prominently into notice in the seventh century, when they were organised by Constantine, a native of a village near Samosata, who took the name of Silvanus. Other eminent leaders among them were Simeon, Sergius, Chrysocheir, and Baanes. They became very numerous in Armenia, and, being persecuted by the imperial officers, rose in revolt; nor was their subjugation entirely effected till the tenth century. For their later history see the article BULGARIANS. (Wetzer and Welte, art. by Kerker; Photius, "Contra Manichæos;" Petrus Siculus, Hist. Manich. in "Bibl. Patrum," vol. xvi.)

PAULISTS. The Institute of the Missionary Priests of St. Paul the Apostle was founded in New York by the Rev. I. T. Hecker and several associates in the year 1858. Its members are engaged in ordinary parochial work, in giving missions, in the education of their scholastics, and in literary labour. The monthly magazine, "The Catholic World," is under their direction, and they have published several volumes of sermons as well as other works on different topics connected with the Catholic religion.

PAX. The KISS OF PEACE in the Mass has been described under that heading. The Pax here intended is that which was given to the people to kiss at Mass. It was introduced in England about the middle of the thirteenth century, and widely used. It is called "osculatorium" (Syn. Constit. of York, 1250 and 1252); "osculatorium pacis" (Statutes of Canterbury, about 1281); "asser ad pacem" (Council of Oxford, in 1287); "tabula pacis" (Council of Merton, about 1300); "marmor deosculandum" (Synod of Bayeux, about the same date). It was adopted in France, Italy, Spain, and Germany. But the use was almost extinct in Le Brun's time, on account of the absurd contentions for precedency to which it gave rise; though it was presented in some cases to communicants, &c. We have been referring to the use at Mass. It is still used in communities, confraternities, &c., at times of ordinary prayer. (From Le Brun, Tom. II. part v. art. 7. See also Maskell, "Ancient Lit." p. 50.)

PAX VOBIS is said by bishops after the "Gloria in Excelsis." If the "Gloria" be not said, then the bishop's salutation is the same as the priest's—viz. "Dominus vobiscum." The fact that "Pax vobis" was our Lord's Easter greeting to the Apostles made it unsuitable for penitential days. (Benedict XIV. "De Miss.")

PECTORAL CROSS. A small cross of precious metal worn on the breast by bishops and abbots as a mark of their office, and sometimes also by canons, &c., who have obtained the privilege from Rome (Decr. S. C. R. 17 Sept. 1828). Innocent III. is the first author who clearly mentions the pectoral cross as one of the episcopal insignia. (Gavant. P. I. tit. 2.)

PECULIUM CLERICI. The property of which an ecclesiastic can be in possession is divided into peculium beneficiale, or ecclesiasticum, and peculium patrimoniale, or quasi-patrimoniale. The former consists (1) of the annual profits of his benefice or benefices; (2) of the dues which he receives in the discharge of his clerical functions. The latter consists (1) of property which has come to him by inheritance, donation, or bequest; (2) of that which he has acquired for himself—e.g. by writing. Over property of the former class he has no power of testamentary disposition; that of the latter class he can freely dispose of.

PELAGIANISM was an extreme reaction from the Gnostic and Manichean doctrine that men were necessarily determined to good or evil. According to Pelagius (1) Adam's sin injured himself only, so that his posterity are born innocent. Infants were baptised that they might be united to Christ and enter the kingdom of heaven; not that they might be purged from original sin (Concil. Carthag. anno 411, can. 2, 3). (2) It was possible to live altogether without sin ("hominem posse esse sine peccato," Pelag. apud August. "De Gratia Christi," cap. iv.). (3) Grace, as Catholics understand the term, was not necessary or even possible. Pelagius made grace consist simply in the gift of nature, and especially of free-will. When pressed by his adversaries, he admitted the need of exterior grace—viz. "law and teaching," "the example of Christ," &c. Nay, some think he allowed that God, by interior grace, enlightened the understanding (August. op. cit. 7, 10, 40; Petav. "De Pelag. et Semi-Pelag. Hær." cap. iv.)[1] But the essence of his heresy remained, for he never granted that the will must be moved and aided by God's grace before we can take one step towards life eternal; and even if Pelagius admitted the possibility of interior illumination of the understanding, he certainly did not hold such a grace to be necessary.

Pelagius, who was a monk or ascete, and is said to have been born in Britain (Bretagne?), preached at Rome (400–410) with great applause. Here he was joined by Celestius, also a monk. Pelagius attacked the doctrine of original sin in his fourteen books on St. Paul's Epistles. They still exist, but with serious alterations in a Catholic sense, and are edited by Vallarsi in his edition of St. Jerome. His letter to Demetrius (anno 411), and his "Libellus fidei ad Innocentium" (anno 417) are also given there. St. Augustine ("De Grat. Christi, Peccat. Orig. Nat. et Grat.") has preserved fragments of four books by Pelagius on "Free-will." The strife on original sin began at Rome in 410. Celestius was condemned by a synod of Carthage, whither he had gone in 411. Pelagius next appears in Palestine, whither Orosius pursued him at the request of Augustine, who had already written three anti-Pelagian works—viz. "De Spiritu et Littera," "De Peccatorum Meritis et Remissione," "De Perfectione Justi Hominis." Jerome also attacked Pelagius in an "Epistle to Ctesiphon" and a dialogue against the heresy in three books. A synod at Jerusalem in 415 tried Pelagius, but came to no decision; another at Diospolis, late in the same year, acquitted him. St. Augustine attacked Pelagius again in his work "De Gestis Pelagii." Theodore of Mopsuestia defended him in a lost work (πρὸς τοὺς λέγοντας φύσει καὶ μὴ γνώμῃ πταίειν τοὺς ἀνθρώπους); the Africans, again, condemned the heresy in the Councils of Carthage and Mileve (416). Both parties had recourse to Pope Innocent, who declared the doctrine of Pelagius erroneous, but died before the case could be fully judged. Zosimus (417–18) was deceived by a profession of faith which Celestius made, and declared both Celestius and Pelagius innocent. More condemnations of Pelagianism followed in the Carthaginian Councils of 417 and 418, and in the latter year Zosimus re-investigated the matter, anathematised Pelagius and Celestius, and notified this step in an "epistola tractoria" to the bishops. Eighteen Italian bishops who refused to subscribe this epistle were deposed, among them the learned Julianus of Eclanum, against whom St. Augustine wrote ("Contra Duas Epist. ad Bonifac." anno 420; "Contr. Julian." lib. vi. anno 421; later still, the "Opus Imperfect. contr. secundam Julian. Respons."). Pelagius and Celestius now found an asylum with Nestorius of Constantinople, and along with him they were condemned in the Third General Council—that of Ephesus—in 431. This result was due in great measure to the energy of Augustine and the efforts of Marius Mercator, a Western layman living at Constantinople.

PENANCE, SACRAMENT OF. The Latin word pœnitentia (from punire in an archaic form pœnire) means sorrow or regret, and answers to the Greek μετάνοια, change of mind or heart. As a theological term, penance is first the name of a virtue which inclines sinners to detest their sins because they are an offence against God. Then penance came to mean the outward acts by which sorrow for sin is shown, and the word was supposed by St. Augustine to come from "pœna" and by others, e.g. Peter Lombard, from "pœnam tenere." The Greek word[1] μετάνοια has wandered further still from its original sense, for in the Greek liturgies it means simply a prostration. Thus in the office for ordination of deacons the rubric runs, "The priest departs with the deacon and they make three bows (ποιοῦσι μετανοίας τρεῖς) to the icon of the Lord Christ." (See Morinus, "De Pœn." lib. i. cap. 1.) In a more restricted sense still, penance is used for the penitential discipline of the Church, or even for the third station of public penitents (so, e.g., I. Concil. Tolet. canon 2), and again for the satisfaction which the priest imposes on the penitent before absolving him from his sins. Lastly, penance is a sacrament of the new law instituted by Christ for the remission of sin committed after baptism.

So understood, penance is defined as a "sacrament instituted by Christ in the form of a judgment for the remission of sin done after baptism, this remission being effected by the absolution of the priest, joined to true supernatural sorrow, true purpose of amendment, and sincere confession on the part of the sinner." The Council of Trent (Sess. xiv.) defines that priests have real power to remit and retain sins, that persons are bound by the law of God to confess before the priest each and every mortal sin committed after baptism, so far as the memory can recall it, and also such circumstances as change the nature of these sins, and that the sacrament of penance is absolutely necessary for the forgiveness of post-baptismal sin. It is true that perfect sorrow for sin which has offended so good a God, at once and without the addition of any external rite blots out the stain and restores the peace and love of God in the soul. "There is no condemnation to those who are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the spirit." But this perfect sorrow involves in a well-instructed Catholic the intention of fulfilling Christ's precept and receiving the sacrament of penance when opportunity occurs. This implicit desire of confession and absolution may exist in many Protestants who reject the Catholic doctrine on this point. They desire the sacrament of penance in this sufficient sense, that they earnestly wish to fulfil Christ's law, so far as they can learn what it is. In this sense the sacrament is necessary for the salvation of those who have fallen into mortal sin after baptism. They must receive it actually or by desire, this desire being either explicit or implicit. This point is of capital importance for the apprehension of Catholic doctrine. We in no way deny that God is ready to forgive the sins of non-Catholics who are in good faith and who turn to Him with loving sorrow. But the High Church doctrine that confession of mortal sin is not an absolute duty imposed by the law of Christ, or that absolution is a benefit which the penitent is not absolutely bound to seek, is in the sharpest antagonism to the Catholic faith as defined at Trent. The Council also teaches that satisfaction must be made for the temporal punishment which may be due even to pardoned sin, and that confession, contrition, absolution and satisfaction, are the four parts of penance. The minister, and the only possible minister of the sacrament is a priest with ordinary or delegated power to absolve. The form consists in the words, "I absolve thee from thy sins," &c. Mortal or venial sins (for it is of faith that venial sins may be confessed, though there is no obligation of doing so)[1] supply the place of matter. The Council speaks of sins as the "quasi materia," for though Thomists and many other theologians hold that sorrowful confession of sins is the proximate matter of the sacrament, Scotists maintain that absolution is both matter and form, and the Council abstained from interfering in this scholastic dispute. In the articles on CONFESSION, ABSOLUTION, &c., many details relating to this sacrament have been given, so that we may content ourselves here with an elucidation of the main principles.

[1] The Rabbinical term is תְּשׁוּבָה, "turning," "conversion"; and the Syrian Christians have the same word in the Syriac or Chaldee form—viz. ܬܘܒܬܐ. This word is the translation of μετάνοια in the Peshito, and is still retained, e.g., by the Maronites (see Morinus, i. 7.).

1. Priests have received power from Christ to forgive sins in his name and according to his law—i.e. in the case of true repentance. God alone can remit sins, but He has been pleased to make the priest's absolution the means by which his grace is conveyed. He said to his Apostles, "Receive the Holy Ghost; whosesoever sins ye remit, they are remitted (i.e. become remitted) unto them, and whosesoever sins ye retain, they have been retained" (i.e. continue to be retained before God, John xxi. 23). This wonderful power must have been intended for the successors of the Apostles, as well as for the Apostles themselves, for it is incredible that this means of pardon was conferred only for a short period of the Church's life. While sin lasted, the stream of grace and mercy must continue to flow. History proves the correctness of this inference, for in all ages the power of absolution has been used and recognised. Thus Cyprian urges the sinner to repent "while confession may be made, while satisfaction and remission through the bishops (sacerdotes) are accepted before God." ("De Laps." 29; the remission included, no doubt, absolution from censures.) In this, says St. Chrysostom ("De Sacerdot." iii. 5, 6), the priests of the Gospel excel those of the Jewish Church, that, whereas Jewish priests could merely declare a man clean of leprosy, the Christian priests "have received power," not with regard to the leprosy of the body but "the impurity of the soul," a power which consists not in declaring that the uncleanness is removed but in actually "removing it entirely" (ἀπαλλάττειν παντελῶς ἔλαβον ἐξουσίαν). He proves this sacerdotal power by an express appeal to the words in St. John, "Whose sins ye remit," &c. So again the author of an ancient homily, printed among the works of St. Athanasius (Migne, "Patrol." iv. p. 183. The Benedictines place it among the dubia, but say it is found "in ancient MSS."), says, "If thy bonds are not loosed, entrust thyself to the disciples of Jesus. Those are to be found who can loose us, having received this power from the Saviour" (ἐξουσίαν ταυτην εἰληφότες παρὰ τοῦ Σωτῆρος), "whose sins ye remit," &c. Morinus (lib. viii. cap. 1) quotes from Leo, Ep. 91, "Ad Theodor.": "Very useful and necessary is it that the guilt of sin should be loosed before the last day by the judgment of the priest." Augustine, Ep. 180, "Ad Honorat." (apud Morin. ibidem), urges the clergy not to flee in persecution, because their presence will be urgently required for "the administration (confectionem) of the sacraments." "If the ministers are wanting, what ruin will come on those who depart this life unregenerate [i.e. unbaptised] or bound, [i.e. unabsolved]!" The value of these testimonies lies partly in the fact that they do not argue for the priestly power of absolution, but assume it, partly in their connection with the strong utterances of Scripture on the one hand, the penitential discipline of the Church on the other. It must have required a strong belief in the power of absolution to make men undergo long years of rigorous penance in order to obtain it. It may be well here to answer two objections. Morinus (lib. viii. 8, 10, 11) has shown, and indeed demonstrated, that down to the twelfth century absolution was always given among the Latins in a precatory form. And it is evident from Goar and Renaudot (in the "Perpétuité de la Foi") that the Greeks, the Jacobites, and Nestorians still preserve this precatory form. This, however, cannot fairly be alleged against our belief, that the priest exercises judgment in the sacrament of penance, and does really bind or loose. No one will deny that the bishop in absolving an excommunicate person and restoring him to Church communion exercised judicial power and authoritatively remitted ecclesiastical censures. Yet here, too, as well as in sacramental absolution, the form was precatory even as late as the time of Burchard, bishop of Worms, who lived at the close of the tenth century. (See the quotation in Chardon, "Hist. des Sacr." tom. iv. §§ 4, 7.) Further, it may be said, that absolution was sometimes given by a deacon, and Cyprian (Ep. xviii.), writing in the summer of 250, does certainly require the lapsed in danger of death to make confession (exomologesis) and receive imposition of hands from a deacon, if a presbyter cannot be found. But it is clear that he is speaking of absolution from censures, and indulgence granted through the intercession of the martyrs, and the distinctions already made in the article on ABSOLUTION are sufficient to meet this difficulty.[1]

2. Absolution is invalid unless given by a priest with ordinary or delegated jurisdiction over the penitent. This follows from the fact, attested by Scripture, that the priest in penance exercises judgment. A magistrate cannot bind or loose a man charged with theft, unless the law subjects that man to his authority, or unless he has received special power from the state to try the case. The tribunals of the Church are not less carefully regulated than those of the State, since God is a God of order and not of confusion. The fundamental power to absolve is given at ordination, but its exercise depends absolutely on ecclesiastical authority. In earliest times absolution was given by the bishop alone, or by the bishop in union with the presbyters. After the rise of the Novatian heresy, the office of penitentiary priest was instituted. Later, parishes were established first in the large towns and then in the country, and from that time the accepted principle approved by the Fourth Lateran Council was, that parishioners were bound to confess to their own priest or to another priest with his permission. Chardon reports a case from the twelfth century in which St. Ailert, monk of the abbey of Crespin in Hainaut, received power from Paschal II. and Innocent II. to hear the confessions of all who came to him. In 1227, Gregory IX. gave the Dominicans authority to hear confessions everywhere, and the same privileges, which led to bitter opposition, lasting for centuries, on the part of the seculars, were extended to the other mendicant friars and confirmed by many Popes. They were limited by the Council of Trent, as has been shown in the articles on ABSOLUTION and CONFESSION. (See Chardon, tom. iii. § 8, ch. 2.) In all these disputes, the principle that absolution could only be given by a priest with jurisdiction was fully acknowledged, for the mendicants had of course jurisdiction, though it was extraordinary—i.e. not attached to their office but directly conferred by the Pope. The Orientals also regard absolution as a judicial act, and do not dream that it can be given by any priest. Confession, according to an Oriental document, probably Coptic (cited by Denzinger, "Rit. Orient." tom. i. p. 100), "cannot be made save to a priest, whether secular or religious, &c., who must have received this authority from the Patriarch or from his own bishop, with the consent of the clergy and chiefs of the people."

3. The necessity of confessing all mortal sins after baptism also follows from the very nature of the absolving power. Christ gave his Apostles authority to bind and loose, but they cannot exercise this discretion till the sins, as they are in the conscience of the penitent, have been submitted to their judgment. It is only in the case of mortal sins that this necessity arises, though, as a rule, it is expedient to confess venial sins likewise, for venial sin does not bind the soul over to evil and destroy the grace of God within it, or exclude absolutely from the kingdom of heaven, so that here there can be no strict necessity for absolution. It is needless to prove that certain mortal sins of a very aggravated character had to be confessed in the primitive Church, for this no instructed person will deny, and the writer of the article on Penitence in the "Dictionary of Christian Antiquities," edited by Smith and Cheetham, admits that this confession of the three "mortalia peccata" was obligatory, even if the sin had been secret. Possibly St. James may be alluding to the public confession when he says, "Confess your sins one to another;" for, as Döllinger ("First Age of the Church," p. 325) points out, this confession is mentioned in immediate connection with extreme unction. "'Confess to one another' refers to the priests called in to anoint the sick man and to pray for him, and to whom he is to confess his sins." Whatever may be thought of this interpretation, we have early evidence that confession much more extensive than that of the three great mortal sins (viz. murder, idolatry, and adultery) was known to the early Church. Origen (Hom. in Ps. xxxvii. n. 6) thus exhorts the sinner: "Look round diligently for one to whom you should confess your sins." He is to find a physician "learned and merciful" who will judge if his sickness is of such a nature that "it ought to be exposed in the meeting of the whole church;" and again (Hom. in Luc. xvii.), "if we reveal our sins not only to God but also to those who can heal our sins and wounds, our sins will be blotted out by Him who says, 'Behold, I will blot out like a cloud,'" &c. Basil's words are express. "It is necessary to confess our sins to those who are entrusted with the dispensation of the mysteries of God" (ἀναγκαῖον τοῖς πεπιστευμένοις τὴν οἰκονομίαν τῶν μυστηρίων τοῦ Θεοῦ τὰ ἁμαρτήματα ἐξομολογεῖσθαι. "Reg. Brev. Tract. Respons. in Interr." 288). Further, what followed on the cessation of public penance is well worth consideration. This, in the case of secret sins, came to an end in the Church of Constantinople soon after the abolition of the presbyter ἐπὶ τῆς μετανοίας, or penitentiary, at the close of the fourth century. It came to an end because it was of human institution. But sacramental confession, being of divine origin, lasted when the penitential discipline had been changed, and continues to this day among the Greeks and Oriental sects.[1] So again Leo, in a letter to the Bishops of Campania (Ep. clxviii., ed. Ballerini), desired the abrogation of public penance because of its deterrent effect, and because it was not of Apostolic institution; but he adds, "since it is enough that the guilt of consciences should be manifested to the priests alone by secret confession." An opinion, however, did prevail to some extent in the middle ages, even among Catholics, that confession to God alone sufficed. The Council of Châlons in 813 (canon 33) says: "Some assert that we should confess our sins to God alone, but some think (percensent) that they should be confessed to the priests, each of which practices is followed not without great fruit in Holy Church . . . . Confession made to God purges sins, but that made to the priest teaches how they are to be purged." This former opinion is also mentioned without reprobation by Peter Lombard ("In Sentent. Lib. IV." dist. 17). St. Thomas, in his commentary on the Sentences, says that what had once been a mere opinion was, in his time, on account of the decision of the Church, under Innocent III., to be accounted heresy, and ("Suppl." qu. vi. a. 3) he maintains that the necessity of confessing mortal sins after baptism exists by divine, and not merely by church, law.

[1] It is plain, however, from many decrees of synods, that deacons did hear confessions in cases of necessity, though, of course, they had no power to absolve. This practice lasted till late in the middle ages. Many also confessed to laymen at the hour of death, if a cleric was not to be found, and great scholastic doctors recommended this act of humiliation (Chardon, t. ii. § 7, ch. 2).

4. We say nothing here of the sorrow for sin and purpose of amendment requisite in the sacrament, referring the reader for an explanation of this point to the article on CONTRITION, and we pass to satisfaction, which is the fourth and last part of penance. It is defined by Billuart ("Pœn." diss. ix. 1) as "a payment of the temporal punishment due to sin through works which are good and penal and are imposed by the confessor."

"Catholics," says Bossuet ("Expos. de la Foi Cath." viii.), "teach unanimously that only Jesus Christ, who is both God and man, was capable, through the infinite dignity of his person, of offering to God sufficient satisfaction for our sins. But, having satisfied superabundantly, He was able to apply this satisfaction in two ways, either by granting entire remission without letting any penalty remain, or, on the other hand, by commuting a greater into a lesser penalty—i.e. eternal into temporal punishment. As that former fashion is more complete and in better harmony with his goodness, He employs it in baptism; but we believe that He employs the second way in the case of those who fall back into sin after baptism, being, as it were, constrained to do so by the ingratitude of those who have abused his first gifts so that they have to suffer some punishment, although the eternal one is remitted. From this we must not infer that Jesus Christ has failed to make entire satisfaction for us; but, on the contrary, that, having acquired an absolute right over us by the infinite price He has offered for our salvation, He grants us pardon on the conditions, under the laws, and with the reserves which seem good to Him." He proceeds to argue that Protestants, who allege that Christ could not have satisfied fully for actual sin, if He left us subject to temporal punishment, might as well say that Christ has not satisfied for original sin because He has left us subject to death and to other infirmities of the soul and body which are consequences of the Fall. "Similarly, we should not marvel that He who showed Himself so merciful to us in baptism should display greater severity when once we have broken our holy promises. It is just, nay, it is for our own good, that He, when He remits [the guilt of] sin along with the eternal punishment, should exact some temporal punishment from us in order to bind us to duty."

Scripture proves that God inflicts temporal punishment for pardoned sin, for Nathan said to David after he had acknowledged his double crime, "The Lord also has caused thy sin to pass away; thou shalt not die. Only because thou hast so made the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme through this matter, even the son that is born to thee shall surely die," (2 Reg. or Sam. xii. 14), Dan. iv. 27 (so Heb. LXX and Vulg. "Authorised," iv. 27) is the classical passage for the doctrine that man has the power of making satisfaction for sin by good works. "Therefore, O king, let my counsel please thee, and redeem thy sins by justice, and thy perversities by showing kindness to the poor." Here, as in all other articles on dogma, we have given a literal translation from the original, and our version of this text is justified, while that of the "Authorised Version" ("break off") is excluded, both by the laws of the language and by the judgment of the best Protestant and Jewish scholars. We append our reasons in a note.[1] The

[1] The words occur in the Chaldee portion of Daniel, and the main question is, does the Chaldee word פְּרַק mean "redeem" or "break off"? It can only mean "redeem." (1) The word is found once only in that small portion of the Bible which is written in Chaldee, but it is of very frequent occurrence in the Chaldee literature. It is used by Onkelos (Exod. xxi. 8) of "redeeming" a slave; a "field" (Lev. xxv. 25); in the other Targums for the redemption of the soul—"who hast redeemed my soul from every affliction" (2 Sam. iv. 9). Levy, in his Chaldee Dictionary, gives numerous instances of the use of the verb in Peal from the Targums. In all, except one, it must mean "to buy back," "redeem," &c.; it never once bears the sense given it in the Protestant version. (2) Syriac, which is scarcely a distinct language from Chaldee, has the same word, ܦܪܩ. It occurs pretty often in the Peshito version of the N.T., and "redemit" is the first rendering given by Schaaf in his Syriac Lexicon. Thus it is used to render ἐρρύσατο (Coloss. i. 13), "and redeemed us from the power of darkness." Sometimes it means "to go away"; never "to break off." (3) The Vulgate rendering, "redime," is supported by the LXX λύτρωσαι. (4) It is adopted, sometimes even without a notice of the rendering given in the "Authorised" and Lutheran versions, by De Wette in his revision of Luther's Bible; by Ewald (Propheten, vol. iii. p. 366)—"löse deine Sünden durch Gerechtigkeit ein"; Hitzig (Comm. on Daniel, p. 67), who justly remarks that the rendering "break off" is contrary to the exegetical tradition, and has "no analogy to support it"; and by Gesenius. To these Protestant authorities we may add another, Bertheau, and the Rabbins, Eben Ezra and Saadia (cited by Hitzig), and a modern Jewish scholar, Fürst, in his Hebrew and Chaldee Concordance and in his Dictionary. Were the passage in Daniel Hebrew, the rendering "break off" could be supported by a comparison of Gen. xxvii. 40; but it is Chaldee, and common sense requires us to interpret a Chaldee word by Chaldee, not Hebrew, usage penitential discipline of the early Church witnesses to the belief that satisfaction by penitential works is necessary in itself, and is required as a part of the sacrament of penance. Nor did the early Christians consider satisfaction merely as means of deepening repentance, repairing scandal, and awakening salutary sorrow. Cyprian ("De Laps." 35, 36) exhorts the lapsed "to be forward in good works by which sins are purged, to give frequent alms by which souls are freed from death," "to induce the Lord to pardon sin by perseverance in good works." Calvin himself acknowledges that all Christian antiquity admitted the necessity of penitential satisfaction. "I am little moved," he writes, "by passages which everywhere occur in the writings of the ancients concerning satisfaction. I see that some of them, I will say frankly nearly all whose works are extant, went wrong in this matter, or spoke too severely and harshly." ("Instit." iii. cap. 4, § 38, quoted by Billuart.)

It is to be noted, however, that satisfaction is in theological language an integral but not an essential part of the Sacrament. In other words, the priest, both as judge and physician of the soul, is bound to impose a penance; and the penitent, if it is reasonable, is bound to accept it. Even if the penance is unreasonable, he must seek another penance and absolution from another priest. But whereas true supernatural sorrow with purpose of amendment, absolution, and, according to the common opinion, some outward confession of sin by word or sign, are always and in all circumstances necessary for the validity of the Sacrament, still, in the case, e.g., of a man in his agony, the priest may give absolution without imposing a penance. (Billuart, Diss. ix. a. 2.) In the ancient Church part at least of the penance was usually performed before absolution; at present the priest in most cases imposes the penance, and, if he judges that the penitent is well disposed, gives absolution. The difference is one of discipline and not of principle, for, with the exception given above, absolution is not given even now unless there is the resolution on the part of the sinner to perform the penance imposed upon him.

Many Protestant objections to the sacrament of penance, as administered among us, arise from misunderstanding. Confession to the priest tends to deepen and not to replace shame and sorrow for the offence done to God. It protects the sinner against self-delusion—for no man is a good judge in his own cause—and the priest is able to insist upon the duty of restoring ill-gotten goods, reconciliation with enemies, forgiveness of injuries, avoiding occasions of sins, retracting calumny, &c., in many cases when the sinner might be blinded by his own passions or interests. At the same time the priest affords the best protection against despair or indiscreet zeal. There is little in the laborious work of the confessional to satisfy curiosity, for the priest learns nothing except the number and species of sins committed, and he is bound under the most sacred obligations to abstain from all unnecessary questions, particularly from all such as might convey knowledge of sins previously unknown to the penitent. He has to decide according to the principles of an elaborate casuistry which he has studied for years, and in which he has been examined by his superiors, before he enters the confessional. There is little room for tyranny on his part, for the faithful know well that they may have recourse to any approved confessor. Here, as elsewhere, holy things may be profaned. But the Church deprives a priest of the power to absolve an accomplice, rigorously punishing any attempt to do so; and were a priest so miserable as to abuse the confessional for bad ends, then the person to whom he had spoken wrongly could not be absolved even by another priest till he or she had communicated the name of the criminous clerk to the bishop of the diocese. Such cases are necessarily of very rare occurrence; for sin of this kind would involve almost inevitable ruin to the priest. Of all pastoral ministrations we firmly believe there is none which involves a more self-denying devotion to a monotonous duty, none where the good effects are so plain and visible, and very few which are more seldom marred by human weakness and sin.

(The work of Morinus is a storehouse of learning. Much historical information will be found in Chardon's "Hist. des Sacr." The writer of this article only knows Denys de Ste. Marthe, "Traité de la Confession," Paris, 1685, by Chardon's quotations.)

PENITENTIAL DISCIPLINE AND BOOKS. The right of punishing members for offences against its laws and depriving them altogether or for a time of its privileges, belongs to any well-constituted society. It was exercised by the Synagogue (Luc. xvi. 2; John vi. 2); Christ sanctioned the use of it in his Church (Matt. xviii. 15–17); and in 1 Cor. v. 1–5 we see St. Paul enforcing the penitential law of the Church against a notorious offender. Of course, this penitential discipline in the Christian Church, though analogous to the procedure of human societies, claims a higher origin and is of a much more serious nature. The power of inflicting spiritual penalties has been put into the hands of the Church by Christ Himself; it is exercised in his name; it may involve deprivation of the sacraments, which are the great appointed means of grace; and, on the other hand, it is the object of penitential discipline, not only to preserve the holiness of the Church, but also to awaken wholesome fear and sorrow in the heart of the offender while there is yet time, "that his soul may be saved in the day of the Lord." Obviously, the Church must use this power in the way most likely at the time to benefit souls, and her penitential canons have varied much at different periods and in different places. Still, on the whole, it is possible to distinguish three distinct periods in the history of penance—the first extending from the beginning of the Church to the rise of the Novatian heresy in the middle of the third century (Morinus, lib. iv.), the second reaching to about the year 700 after Christ (ib. lib. vi.), the third to the eleventh century (ib. lib. vii.). Of these periods, the first represents penitential discipline in its initial stage; the second, in its full development and vigour;

the third, in its decay. Most of what we have to say is taken from the great work of Morinus, "De Disciplina in Administratione Sacramenti Pœnitentiæ," in the Venetian edition of 1702.

First Period.—The sins for which public penance was inflicted, were the three "mortal crimes"[1] (crimina mortalia, Cyprian, "De Bono Patient." c. 14) of idolatry, murder, and adultery, committed after baptism. Tertullian adds "fraud" to the list of "graver and fatal crimes which cannot be forgiven" ("Pudic." 19); but, generally speaking, it was only the various forms of the three great sins which reduced a man to the rank of a penitent. Tertullian ("De Pœnit." c. 9) has left us a vivid picture of penance as he was accustomed to see it practised. He describes penance, which was generally known, even among the Latins, as "exomologesis," because it involved open confession of sins, as a "discipline by which a man was prostrated and humiliated." He speaks of the penitents as lying on sackcloth and ashes, of the unwashed body, the feeding on bread and water, the fasting and prayer, the grovelling at the feet of the presbyters and others who had a name for sanctity, the groans and tears. As yet there was no formal division of penitents into grades, and penance, though severe, did not always last long. The Apostolic Constitutions (ii. 16), in a passage which may be fairly taken as a picture of the penitential discipline in the first period, orders a great sinner to be excluded altogether from the Church; then the deacons are to admonish him and introduce him to the congregation; then penance is to be inflicted (στυβώσας αὐτὸν) "in proportion to his sin, for two, three, five, or seven weeks," at the end of which period the bishop is to receive him into communion, with imposition of hands (ib. 18. χειροθετήσας αὐτὸν ἔα λοιπὸν εἶναι ἐν τῷ ποιμνίῳ), accompanied by the prayers of the faithful. Here we see the germs of the later and more formal system, though the penalty contemplated is slight. Cyprian (Ep. lvii.) announces his intention of admitting to communion those who had fallen into idolatry in a former persecution and had done penance since. His reason for this indulgence was that fresh persecution was at hand.

But while penance was comparatively light, admission to it was often hard to obtain. For in this early period penance was looked on rather as a grace shown to sinners than as a penalty which they had to bear. It was in the difficulty of being admitted to penance, not in the penance itself, that the severity of the early Church appears. For a brief period, even the Roman Church refused absolution utterly and altogether in the case of the three "mortal crimes." This absolution was granted till the middle of the second century ("Pastor Herm." Mandat. iv. 1), but it must have been withdrawn, probably shortly after the "Shepherd" of Hermas was written (this is evident from the first chapter of Tertullian, "De Pudic." Compare also the words of Hermas, loc. cit., "Servis Dei pœnitentia una est," with Visio, ii. 2, where it is said that soon the opportunity of performing penance will expire). Zephyrinus (202–219) relaxed this severity in the case of adulterers (see the "De Pudic."), and his successor, Callixtus (219–222), admitted all sinners to communion after penance ("Philosophum." ix. 12), and this milder discipline became established. (See the "Epistle of the Roman Clergy," Cyprian, Ep. 30.) In Africa, too, the discipline had become milder, for Cyprian (Ep. lv. No. 21) mentions the opinion of bishops in his province that "peace was not to be granted to adulterers" as a thing of the past. The Spanish church continued to be more severe, for even after our period the Synod of Elvira, in 306, excluded great sinners from all hope of communion (see, e.g. canons 1, 6, 8). Moreover, in no part of the Church was communion given to those who had fallen a second time after baptism into mortal crime. It was Pope Siricius (Ep. 1, "Ad Himer." c. 5), towards the close of the fourth century, who insisted on a more indulgent course. So, again, it was the ordinary practice to refuse communion to the dying, if they had been previously excommunicated and had not done penance in health. We must remember, however, that sacramental absolution from guilt, canonical absolution from penitential discipline, censures, &c., and giving communion, are three distinct things, and the refusal of the first does not follow from that of the second or third. Hefele ("Concil." i. p. 155) and Frank ("Bussdisciplin," &c., 1867) believe that though canonical absolution and communion often were, sacramental absolution never was, refused to any sinner.

Second Period.—After the rise of the [1] We have used such expressions as "mortal crimes," "offences," &c., to prevent confusion with "mortal sin" in the modern sense.

Novatian heresy, the penitential system was fully organised. The Nicene Council, can. 13, established the principle that communion was to be given in the hour of death to penitents, however great their previous crime. We have seen that Pope Siricius extended this lenity even to relapsed penitents. St. Chrysostom, it is said (Socrates, "H. E." vi. 21), received penitents again and again, however frequent their relapses, and the Third Council of Toledo, in 589, speaks in canon 11 of a lax practice which permitted men to sin as often as they pleased, and present themselves anew to the priest for reconciliation. (See Hefele's note, "Concil." iii. p. 51.)

On the other hand, the list of "mortal offences" was enlarged. We find traces of such increase in the list of sins which subjected to penance, in the canons ascribed to Gregory of Nyssa and Basil. "Many Fathers," says Morinus (lib. v. cap. v.), "who wrote after Augustine's time, extended this [the necessity of public penance] to all crimes which the civil law punished with death, exile, or other grave corporal penalty"; and he proves this by many quotations—e.g. from Popes Pelagius II. and Gregory I. Further, in the East certain grades of penance came to be recognised. The three higher grades are mentioned or alluded to in the canonical epistle of Gregory Thaumaturgus (can. 1, 8, 9, on the last, in which the grade of συστάντες, or consistentes is alluded to but not mentioned by name, see the extract from the commentary of Zonaras in Routh, "Reli. Sacr." tom. iii. p. 279). The eleventh canon, which enumerates all four grades, is certainly spurious, and is much later than Gregory's time. (See Routh, loc. cit. p. 281.) Still, from the fourth century onwards, the Eastern Church divided penitents into four classes. They are thus described in the eleventh canon of Gregory in words which are quite accurate, and were probably added as a gloss to the authentic canons. "Weeping" (the προσκλαίοντες, or flentes, were the lowest class) "takes place outside the door of the church, where the sinner must stand and beg the prayers of the faithful as they go in. Hearing" (the ἀκροώμενοι, or audientes, were the second class) "is performed within the gate in the porch, where the sinner must stand while the catechumens are present, and then go out. For, hearing the Scripture," he says, "and the instruction, let him be expelled, and not be admitted to the prayer. Prostration" (the state of the ὑποπίπτοντες, substrati, the third class) "requires the sinner to stand within the church door, and to go out with the catechumens." (Before going, they prostrated themselves to receive the imposition of the bishop's hands with prayer, hence their name.) The consistentes (the last class—συστάντες, consistentes) "stand together with the faithful, and do not go out with the catechumens. Last comes participation in the sacraments (ἁγιασμάτων)." The two lower grades were little known in the West, and the Latin Fathers generally mean by "penitents" the substrati, or ὑποπίπτοντες. A severe course of life—fasts, shaving of the head, wearing a peculiar dress, abstinence from the enjoyment, and even sometimes from the business of life, were the hardships which penitents (under which term we do not include the consistentes) had to undergo. The penance lasted long years—e.g. the Canons of Basil, which represent the discipline of the whole East, impose fifteen years of penance for adultery, seven for fornication. Many canons of Councils speak of clerics as subjected to penance (e.g. Neocæs. can. 1; Illib. 76; I. Araus. 4; I. Arel. 29); but sometimes the degradation of a cleric was considered equivalent to the penance of a layman, and it was felt to be unfair that he should incur a double penalty for one crime. (So, e.g. Can. Apost. 25; and the letter of Pope Siricius to Himerius, "Pœnitentiam agere cuiquam non conceditur clericorum." Mansi, "Concil." tom. iii. col. 660.) With regard to the sick and dying, the rule varied at different times and in different churches. Cyprian (Ep. lv. 23) lays down the principle that great and notorious offenders, who had done no penance before their sickness, "were to be excluded entirely (omnino prohibendos) from the hope of communion and peace." The Synod of Arles (anno 314), which represented the whole of the Western Church, also debarred death-bed penitents from communion (can. 22); but the Council of Nicæa (can. 13) relaxed this stringent rule. Still less was communion refused to secret sinners who sought penance on their death-beds, or to such as were actually doing penance when sickness overtook them. After the organisation of the grades or stations of penance, a penitent who had received communion in dangerous sickness was usually sent back to do penance in case of recovery. Sometimes he returned to the grade in which he had been before; sometimes he was placed among the consistentes.

Third Period, from the Seventh till the Eleventh Century.—Before this time the laws of public penance had been altered very seriously in the East. The office of penitentiary had been abolished at the close of the fourth century at Constantinople (Socrates, "H. E." vii. 16; Sozomen "H. E." v. 19), and this led to the cessation of public confession and public penance for secret sins. The stations of penance are mentioned at the end of the seventh century in canon 87 of the Council in Trullo. But the Greek liturgies, except perhaps that of St. James and one used by the Abyssinians, contain no reference to the dismissal of penitents from the assembly of the faithful. About the beginning of the seventh century, as Morinus (lib. vii. 1) proves by citations from Bede, Egbert, Rabanus Maurus, &c., it was received as an axiom throughout the West that public penance was to be done only for public sins.

It must not be supposed, however, that the rigour of public penance had abated among the Latins. True, even public penitents no longer received the daily imposition of the bishop's hands, and they were no longer shut out from the very sight of the sacred mysteries. But all through this period a vast number of persons were to be seen in the churches "distinguished from [the rest of] the faithful by their dress, place [in the church], mourning, and whole manner of life" (Morinus, vii. 2). Some of them witnessed Mass at a distance from a spot inside the church; others took their place in a separate part of the church; a third class mixed with the rest of the congregation, but were forbidden to communicate (ib. 7). The bishop prescribed this penance, and the civil law compelled the offender to undergo it. Very often a man was forced to appear as a public penitent, though for one reason or other he had not been condemned or even tried by the civil court. It was enough if the ecclesiastical authorities had juridical proof of his guilt. In the early part of this period, the beginning of Lent, the "caput jejunii," as it was called, was looked on as the most fitting, though not the only time, for the solemn imposition of public penance (ib. vii. 19). Nor was private penance less severe. It differed from public penance only inasmuch as it could be imposed by a priest, whereas public penance was inflicted by the bishop or a priest specially empowered by him, and inasmuch as the solemn rites of public were omitted in private penance. The same long fasts and other austerities, the same long abstinence from communion, were the penalties of secret sin. Every priest who heard confession was bound to use a "penitential book"—i.e. a book which contained the penalties attached to particular sins by the canons, Popes, Fathers, or custom, along with the forms to be observed in confession, absolution, and the rest. The Roman Penitential, and those of Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury, and Bede, were those which had the highest repute in the West, but there were many others. These books were the guides of confessors down to the thirteenth century. A glance at the "Summary of Penitentials" given in Zaccaria's essay prefixed to the "Moral Theology" of St. Liguori will easily convince the reader of the severity which then prevailed. From the latter part of the tenth century flogging was added to the other penitential exercises, and at an earlier part of our period exile (mentioned in the Penitentials of Bede and in that known as the Roman) and perpetual retirement to a monastery were imposed as penances.

Fourth Period, Twelfth and Thirteenth Centuries (Morinus, lib. x. cap. 16 seq).—During this period the rigour of penance was greatly relaxed; public penance, except in certain cases, especially in that of heresy, almost disappeared, and on the whole we may note a transition to modern practice. The following were the chief causes of the change:—

(a) The Redemption of Sins.—Long before this time the practice had arisen of procuring exemption from canonical penance by giving alms, &c. This custom, indeed, is mentioned and condemned by an English council held in 747, and it was generally recognised in the ninth century. But such redemptions were at first partial, and only allowed when part of the penance had been done. This accorded with the spirit of the primitive Church, which remitted part of the penance to sinners who showed extraordinary sorrow and zeal. But from the end of the tenth or opening of the eleventh century penances due to sins were arithmetically computed—i.e. if seven years of penance were assigned for committing a sin once, twenty-one years were reckoned as the penalty due for committing it three times, and large alms, flagellation, recitations of the Psalter, were accepted as redemption of penance. Thus St. Peter Damian tells the story of a man who by cruel flagellation and frequent recitations of the Psalter accomplished a hundred years of penance in six days. The arithmetical computation of penance had made its performance in the old way impossible.

(β) Remissions of penance were freely granted for works of piety—e.g. contributions to aid in the building of churches, or even works of public utility, such as building bridges or the like. As a rule, those indulgences were partial, but a complete remission of penance was often obtained by performing several good works. Maurice, who succeeded Peter Lombard in the see of Paris, built his great cathedral and four abbeys by means of indulgences. It is right to add that the Fourth Lateran Council protested against the reckless freedom with which these indulgences were given.

(γ) The Crusades did more than anything else to relax penitential rigour, and this, in the opinion of Fleury, was the most important effect they produced. As early as 1087 Pope Victor II. offered a general remission of penance to those who took up arms against the Saracens of Africa, after they had spoiled the abbey of Monte Cassino. In 1095 Urban II. offered the same reward to those who joined in the crusade. Secret, as well as public, sinners availed themselves of the opportunity; and when for two hundred years penance had been remitted to vast multitudes who took part directly or indirectly in these wars, it became out of the question to think of restoring the ancient rigour. It is curious to observe that bearing arms was just one of the things which penitents in ancient times were strictly forbidden to do. But it was supposed that the prohibition only applied to war between Christians.

(δ) The Scholastics developed the opinion that absolution might be granted before the performance of penance, that the canonical penalties were arbitrary, or in any case might be remitted by the confessor, and not merely, as in former days, by the bishop.

(ε) The mendicant friars, who were constantly passing from place to place, became the favourite confessors, and it was impossible for them to defer absolution and stay to watch the progress of the penitent.

The Pontifical still contains an office for the expulsion of penitents from the church by the bishop on Ash Wednesday. The penitents are to approach in penitential garb, bare feet, &c.; ashes are to be placed on their heads, and the doors of the church shut against them till Holy Thursday. Such public ignominy is to be inflicted only for enormous crimes, and by the authority of the bishop, penitentiary, or other official to whom the power has been delegated. The Council of Trent, however (sess. xxiv. cap. 8), desires that public (but not solemn) penance be inflicted on public sinners, unless the bishop judge it to be inexpedient. St. Charles enforced this rule in his synods. But solemn or even public penance is now scarcely known. Still, in an English book published at Douay as late as 1743 with ecclesiastical approbation ("The Good Confessor," &c., by Samuel Marley, D.D., p. 522 seq.), the imposition of public penance for public sin is strictly enjoined upon the confessor. It is suggested, e.g., that the penitent kneel at the church door during the chief Mass, with a light in his hands, and beg pardon of the congregation. Drunkenness is given as an example of a sin which should be expiated in this way. It is evident from the whole chapter that penances of this kind were still frequently imposed. (Morinus is the great authority on the subject. Chardon, "Hist. des Sacr." tom. iii. iv., gives a clear and useful summary of the facts. A much shorter but very interesting summary will be found in Fleury, Discours iv. and vi. The writer has also read the articles in Kraus, "Real-Encycl.," and in Smith and Cheetham, but without finding much that had not already been given by Morinus. The work of Wässerschleben, "Bussordnungen der abendländischen Kirche," Halle, 1851, is only known to him from the references in Smith and Cheetham.)

PENITENTIAL PSALMS. A name given to seven psalms, which express sorrow for sin and desire of pardon. The psalms are 6, 31, 37, 50, 101, 129, 142 (in the Latin numeration). Innocent III. ordered their recitation in Lent; Pius V. fixed the Fridays in Lent after lauds as the time at which they should be said, but they are not said on Good Friday or on a feast of nine lessons. There is no obligation of saying them in the private recitation of the Breviary, though those who do so may gain an indulgence of fifty days. The name and arrangement of the Penitential Psalms is very ancient.

Possidius tells us that St. Augustine, when dying, caused the penitential psalms, which are few in number, to be fixed on the wall opposite his bed. Probably our penitential psalms are meant. Cassiodorus (d. 565) gives a mystical reason for the number seven—viz. that sin is remitted by baptism, martyrdom, alms, forgiving others, converting others, abundance of charity, and penance. They are also mentioned in the oldest Roman Ordines (Gavantus, tom. ii. § ix. cap. 4). The antiphon "Ne reminiscaris" from Tobias iii. 3, now attached to these psalms in the Roman Breviary, seems to have been added in the sixteenth century. (Maskell, "Monumenta Rit." vol. iii. p. 82.)

PENSIONS. At the Council of Chalcedon, Maximus, who had a short time before been substituted for Domnus as bishop of Antioch, requested the sanction of the Fathers to his assigning a pension out of the revenues of the see sufficient for the support of Domnus. The legates of Pope Leo, the other patriarchs, the entire synod, and the imperial judges assented to the request in principle, leaving it to Maximus to arrange the details according to his judgment of what was necessary.

Gregory the Great used to send clerks convicted of incontinence to various monasteries for penance, but required that the churches to which they belonged should supply them with adequate pensions, so that they should not be a burden on the monasteries.

An ecclesiastical pension is not canonical or permitted except under the following conditions: 1. The receiver must be an ecclesiastic, free from censure and irregularity; 2. The pension must be founded on a just cause; 3. He who creates the pension must have the faculty to do so, and such faculties are granted by the Pope, and may be, as some theologians think, by the bishops also; 4. The enjoyment of the pension ceases with the natural or civil death of the pensioner. (Thomassin, "Vet. et Nova Eccl. Disc." iii. 2, 29–31; Moroni, Pensione Ecclesiastica.)

PENTECOST.[1] The feast of Weeks (חַג שָׁבֻעוֹת) was one of the three great feasts of the Jewish law. It was the feast of the in-gathered harvest, and the later Jews regarded it as a solemn commemoration of the Mosaic legislation in the third month (Exod. xix. 1); but there is no trace of such a view in the Bible or even in Josephus and Philo. It was kept on the fiftieth day after the first day of the Passover, Nisan 16, the second day of the Paschal feast, being reckoned as the first of the fifty days (Lev. xxiii. 15, 16; cf. Ew. "Alterthüm," p. 399 seq.). Hence the Greek name πεντηκοστή, originally an adjective with ἡμέρα understood and then treated as an independent substantive (ἐν τῇ πεντηκοστῇ ἑορτῇ ἥ ἐστιν ἁγία ἑπτὰ ἑβδομάδων, Tob. ii. 1. There is nothing answering to this in the Chaldee or Hebrew versions as given by Neubauer, or in the Vulgate; but Sabatier's "Itala" has "in Pentecosten festo nostro qui est sanctus a septem annis"). To Christians the day became specially sacred, for on it at the third hour (i.e. about nine o'clock) the Holy Ghost descended miraculously on the Apostles. The ancient tradition that this Pentecost fell on a Sunday is confirmed by John xviii. 28, for if the Friday on which Christ died was the eve of the Passover, i.e. Nisan 14, then the 16th, the first of the fifty days, and the fiftieth day itself must both have been Sundays.

Pentecost was kept as a Christian festival from very early times. The word was used both for Whitsunday and for the whole period of fifty days after Easter. Irenæus in a lost work on the Pasch is said to have mentioned the custom of praying erect during this season (see the work falsely attributed to Justin Martyr, "Quæst. et Respons." 115, tom. iii. P. 2, p. 180, in Otto's edition); and Origen, the "Apostolic Constitutions" (v. 20), as well as the Council of Elvira (anno 306, can. 43), speak of the feast on the day itself. There was no fasting during the whole period, for even the fast on the vigil was not known in the early Church; indeed, Quesnel thinks the custom in the Roman Church is not older than the twelfth century, though Meratus and Benedict XIV. ("De Festis," 515) believe its introduction must be placed much earlier. The Vigil of Pentecost was one of the two days on which solemn baptism was conferred, and hence the Missal still gives a form for the blessing of the font on that day. Benedict XIV. also mentions as customs which prevailed in some places, the blessing of the candle, for which a form is given by Martene ("De Antiq. Ecclesiæ Rit."), the blowing of trumpets at the Veni, Sancte Spiritus, in the Mass of Whitsunday, the discharge of fire from the roof, the letting doves loose in the church, and the scattering of roses. The Sundays which follow till Advent are dated from Pentecost in the Roman Calendar.

[1] For the derivation of the word Whitsunday, see that article.

PERSECUTIONS (during the first six centuries). An exhaustive essay, "Christenverfolgungen," &c. on this subject has lately appeared in the "Real-Encyklopädie of Christian Antiquities," edited by Dr. Kraus. The limits of the present work permit us only to give a brief general outline of the principal facts.

During the first century Christianity was to a great extent confounded with Judaism in the eyes of the Roman officials, and since the latter was a religio licita, the former shared the same privilege. The persecutions under Nero and Domitian were local and occasional; no systematic design of extirpating Christianity dictated them. Gradually, partly because the Jews took pains to sever their cause from that of the Christians, partly because, in proportion as Christianity was better understood, the universality of its claim on human thought and conduct, and its essential incompatibility with pagan ideas, came out into stronger relief, the antagonism grew sharper, and the purpose of repression more settled. Charges, various in their nature, were brought against the Christians; they were treasonable men (majestatis rei) who denied to the emperors a portion of their attributes and dignity; they were atheists, who so far from honouring the gods of the empire declared that they were devils; they were dealers in magic; lastly, they practised a foreign and unlawful religion (religio peregrina illicita). Possessed by such conceptions, a high Roman official, especially if he were a man of arbitrary or brutal character, or if Christians were indiscreet, could not lack pretext in abundance for persecution, even before any general edict of proscription had appeared. The rescript of Trajan (98–117) directed the policy of the government for a hundred years. "Search," he said, "is not to be made for Christians; if they are arrested and accused before the tribunals, then if any one of them denies that he is a Christian, and proves it by offering sacrifice to our gods, he is to be pardoned." The implication was, of course, that those who avowed their Christianity and refused to sacrifice were to be executed, as the adherents of an unlawful religion. All through the second century, the popular sentiment, whenever a Christian was put on his trial, raged against the accused; the mob, still for the most part pagan, believed every wild and monstrous calumny that was afloat against the sect. "If the Tiber overflows," says Tertullian, "if the Nile does not overflow, if there is a drought, an earthquake, a scarcity, or a pestilence, straightway the people cry, 'The Christians to the lions.'" This popular aversion is noticed in the reports of the persecution in Asia Minor, in which St. Polycarp suffered (probably about 155, under Antoninus Pius), and of the terrible slaughter of Christians at Lyons and Vienne under Marcus Aurelius. In 202 Severus issued a formal edict forbidding conversions either to the Jewish or the Christian religion under heavy penalties. The persecution which ensued lasted ten or eleven years; but from about 212 to the reign of Decius (249–251) was a time of comparative peace, and Christians multiplied in every direction. Even upon the general population an impression was by this time made; and the attitude of the mob, in the persecutions of Christians which happened after the middle of the third century, was at first apathetic, then respectful, finally even compassionate. Under Decius, who was an enthusiast for the ancient glories of the republic and empire, the systematic general persecutions began, which aimed at stamping out Christianity altogether. Fabian, the bishop of Rome, and St. Agatha in Sicily, were among the victims of the Decian storm. Fortunately it was short; but when it had passed over, the number of the lapsi, or those who in various degrees had given way under the pressure, was found to be very great. Under Gallus there was peace, but Valerian (257) renewed the persecution. The martyrdoms of St. Lawrence, St. Cyprian, and St. Fructuosus of Tarragona, date from about this time. Again, from 260 (in which year an edict of Gallienus declared Christianity to be a legal religion), to 300, the government left the Christians undisturbed except for a few months (270) under Aurelian. In 303, the terrible persecution of Diocletian was ushered in by the destruction of the great church at Nicomedia. On the next day appeared an edict, ordering that all buildings used for religious worship by the Christians should be destroyed, and that their sacred books should be given up to the authorities and burnt. Christians themselves were declared to be outlawed and civilly dead; they were to have no remedy in the courts against those who did them wrong; and they were to be subject, in every rank, to torture. A second edict ordered that all bishops and priests should be imprisoned; a third, that such prisoners should be compelled by every possible means to offer sacrifice to the gods. The extreme violence of this persecution did not last beyond two years; but in that time the blood of martyrs flowed abundantly in Palestine, Italy, Gaul, Spain, and Britain. A detailed account of the sufferings of the Christians in Palestine may be read in the Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius. For some years after the abdication of Diocletian (305) civil war desolated the empire; but, after the fall of Maxentius, Constantine and Licinius, about the beginning of 313, published the famous edict of Milan, by which complete toleration was given to the Christians, and Christianity was placed on a footing of perfect equality with what had been till now the State religion. This edict was published some months later at Nicomedia, so that both in East and West the period of martyrdom was closed.

The persecution of Julian (361–3)—although martyrdoms were not wanting, e.g. those of SS. John and Paul—consisted rather in a studied exclusion of Christians from the favour of the Court and government, together with a prohibition of teaching rhetoric, literature, and philosophy, than in actual measures of coercion.

For a notice of the prolonged persecution of the Christians in Persia under the Sassanides, see Missions (fourth century).

The cruel persecution of the Catholics in Africa by their Vandal conquerors, under Geiseric (Genseric), Hunneric, and his successors (439–523), was motived partly by the hatred and contempt which these Teutons bore to all of Roman blood or nurture, partly by the inevitable antagonism between the Arian heresy which they professed and the Catholic creed, and partly by the policy of humbling and weakening those whom they could not hope to attach sincerely to their government.

The persecutions of the Spanish Catholics by the Arian Visigothic kings Euric and Leovigild, in the fifth and sixth centuries, were of no great intensity.

PERSON. [See Trinity.]

PETER'S CHAINS, FEAST OF. From the beginning of the seventh century, and how long before that it is impossible to determine, the festival of St. Peter ad Vincula was celebrated at Rome on August 1. The Greeks keep the corresponding feast on January 16; the Armenians on January 22. One of the lessons in the Roman Breviary for the day relates that the Empress Eudocia, wife of Theodosius the Younger, having obtained during a visit to Jerusalem the chains with which the Apostle had been bound by Herod's order, and from which he was miraculously set free (Acts xii.), brought them to Constantinople (439), and having deposited one of them in the church of St. Peter in that city, sent the other to Rome as a present to her daughter Eudoxia, who had married Valentinian III. Papebroch the Bollandist, who has a long dissertation on St. Peter's chains, under date June 29, and Baronius (a. 439), are both inclined to accept this story. There seems no means of fixing the date at which it first found its way into the Breviary.

But, besides these Palestinian chains, a very early tradition knew of other chains borne by St. Peter, those, namely, with which he was bound in the Mamertine prison at Rome during the Neronian persecution. The Acts of Pope Alexander, bishop of Rome, between 121 and 132, are believed by Papebroch to be genuine, and to have been compiled before 250. In these Acts a certain St. Balbina is spoken of as having sought and found the chains of St. Peter, which she gave in charge to Theodora, sister of Hermes, the Præfectus Urbis. These must have been the Neronian chains, for neither tradition nor probability permits the supposition of a transfer of the Palestinian chains to Rome at that remote date.

In a sermon "De Vinculis," attributed to Beda, it is said that this Pope Alexander instituted a feast on August 1 in honour of St. Peter, and built the church called ad Vincula, in which his chains were wont to be kissed by a devout people. Filings of the chains of St. Peter were from a very early period enclosed by Popes in rings or keys, and sent to friends or correspondents to whom it was desired to show special favour. To this practice, in the opinion of Papebroch, St. Augustine refers when he says that, "deservedly, through all the churches of Christ, the iron of those penal chains is esteemed more precious than gold."[1]

No Greek writer speaks of the removal of one of the chains to Rome, nor mentions Eudocia in connection with them. There is, however, a Greek oration, extant in MS. in several Italian libraries, on St. Peter's chains. Though commonly attributed to St. John Chrysostom, it is of uncertain date and authorship; Baronius would assign it to Proclus or Germanus, patriarchs of Constantinople in the seventh century; Papebroch sees no reason why it should not really have been written by Chrysostom. In this oration it is merely stated that the first Christian emperors brought a chain (not chains) from Jerusalem to Constantinople, and placed it in the church of St. Peter.

Two Roman churches at the present day recall the bonds of St. Peter; one, S. Pietro in Vincoli, is on the Esquiline Hill, the other, S. Pietro in Carcere, on the Capitol. In the former is preserved the chain said to have been given to Eudoxia;[2] the latter is on or near the site of the prison in which the Apostle was incarcerated.

The feast of this day was called by the Anglo-Saxons Lammas—i. e., Loaf-Mass;[3] solemn thanksgiving being made on it for the fruits of the earth, and offerings presented.

PETER'S PENCE (denarius S. Petri, Rom-gescot, Rom-scot). An annual tax of one penny for every house in England, collected at Midsummer, and paid to the Holy See. It was extended to Ireland under the bull granted by Pope Adrian to Henry II.[4] The earliest documentary mention of it seems to be the letter of Canute (1031), sent from Rome to the English clergy and laity.[5] Among the "dues which we owe to God according to ancient law," the King names "the pennies which we owe to Rome at St. Peter's" (denarii quos Romæ ad Sanctum Petrum debemus), "whether from towns or vills." It may hence be considered certain that the tax was deemed one of ancient standing in the time of Canute, but its exact origin is variously related. West Saxon writers ascribe the honour (for it was regarded as an honour by our forefathers) of its institution to kings of Wessex; Matthew Paris, who represents Mercian traditions, gives it to Offa, king of Mercia. Malmesbury makes Ethelwulf, the father of Alfred, the founder; so that the same king who instituted tithes would on this view have established "Peter's Pence." But a writer very little later than Malmesbury—Henry of Huntingdon—attributes the grant to Offa, king of Mercia, who "gave to the Vicar of St. Peter, the Bishop of Rome, a fixed rent for every house in his kingdom for ever." Matthew Paris, in his "Two Offas" (printed by Wats), gives the Mercian tradition in an expanded form. Offa, visiting Rome in great state, besides other munificent offerings, burdens his kingdom with the "Rom-scot," which is to be paid to the Roman Church for the support of the English school and hostel at Rome. It was to be one silver penny (argenteus) for every family occupying land worth thirty pence a year. On the other hand, Layamon, the poet (writing about 1209, among West Saxon traditions), ascribes the institution to Ina, a king of Wessex. No certain conclusion can be arrived at; but, on the whole, it seems probable that the "Rom-scot" owed its foundation to Offa, with whose prosperous and successful reign the initiation of the thing would be more in keeping than with the troubled times of Ethelwulf, although the latter may well have consented to extend that which had been before only a Mercian impost to the West Saxon part of his dominions.

The "alms,"[1] sent by Alfred to Pope Marinus, who then "freed" the English school at Rome, were probably nothing more than arrears of Peter's pence, the receipt of which made it possible for the Pope to free the inhabitants in the English quarter, and the pilgrims resorting to it for hospitality, from all tax and toll. Geoffrey Gaimar[2] is responsible for the curious statement, that in consideration of the Peter's pence (the "dener de la meison") given by Canute, the Pope made him his legate, and ordered that no Englishman charged with crime should be imprisoned abroad, or exiled, but should "purge himself in his own land."

[2] In one form of the martyrology of Usuard (Acta Sanctorum, June, vol. vii.) there is a legend to the effect that when the chain sent to Eudoxia from Constantinople was brought in contact with the Neronian chain, the two miraculously cohered. See also the lesson for the day in the Roman breviary.

It is probable that there was at all times great irregularity in the payment of the Romescot. It is recorded to have been sent to Rome in 1095, by the hands of the Papal nuncio, after an intermission of many years. Again, in 1123,[1] we read of a legate coming into England after the Romescot. From 1534 it ceased to be rendered.

The tribute, or cess, of 1,000 marks (700 for England, 300 for Ireland), which King John bound himself and his heirs to pay to the Roman see, in recognition of the feudal dependence of his kingdom, was of course wholly distinct from the Peter's pence. After being paid by Henry III. and Edward II., but withheld by Edward I. and Edward III., it was formally claimed with arrears, in 1366, by Urban V.

The Peter's Pence of modern days is a voluntary contribution made by the faithful, and taken up under the direction of their bishop, for the maintenance of the Sovereign Pontiff.

PETROBRUSIANS. An heretical sect of the twelfth century; the leaders of which, Peter de Bruys and Henricus, in so far as they attacked the hierarchy and preached simplicity of life, may be regarded as the forerunners of Arnold of Brescia. A letter of Peter the Venerable,[2] abbot of Cluny, is the chief source of information respecting them. Bruys propagated his opinions in Languedoc in the first twenty years of the twelfth century; he perished at the stake, through a movement of popular exasperation, in 1124. Henricus (who may perhaps be identified with the "Henricus hæreticus" mentioned by Matthew Paris under the year 1151), after a long career of success, partly in Maine, but chiefly in Southern France, was tried at the council held at Rheims, by Eugenius III., in 1148, and sentenced to perpetual imprisonment. He died in the following year. The following abstract of the Petrobrusian tenets is given by a Protestant writer:[3] "They were strongly opposed to infant baptism, saying that you could wash a young child's skin, but you could not cleanse his mind at that early age. They objected to the building and using of churches, declaring that God could hear us whether we prayed in a tavern or a church, in a market-place or in a temple, before an altar or before a stall. They maintained that crosses, instead of being held in reverence, should be destroyed and cast away; that the instrument by which Christ had suffered such agonies ought not to be made an object of veneration, but of execration. They denied the Real Presence in the Eucharist. Prayers and Masses for the dead they utterly ridiculed, and said that God was insulted by church singing; as He took pleasure only in holy affections, shrill voices and musical strains could neither win nor appease Him."

PHILOSOPHY. We are compelled from want of space to forego any attempt at a history of philosophy as pursued within the Church, and must confine ourselves to the accepted definition of philosophy, a brief sketch of its development, and a few words on its relation to faith. There was really no systematic philosophy in the Church[1] till the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, when the physical and metaphysical works of Aristotle became known in translations. Some of the Fathers condemned philosophy altogether (so, e.g., Irenæus, "Adv. Hær." ii. 14, 2; ii. 25, 5;

[1] Sax. Chron.

[2] Migne, Patrol. vol. 189.

[3] J. C. Morison, in his Life and Times of St. Bernard; not a very wise book, but never consciously unfair.

[1] Nor, of course, in the New Testament, where philosophy is only mentioned once, and then in a bad sense (Col. ii. 8). On the other hand, great attention has been given by recent scholars—e.g. Ewald and Delitzsch in Germany: Hookyas, Kuenen, and Tiele in Holland—to the "wisdom" of the O. T. writers. The "wise" men, or sages, were undoubtedly a recognised class among the Hebrews, distinct from the priests on the one hand and the prophets on the other (see, e.g., Jer. xviii. 18). Now, in the Hebrew Bible—specially in Proverbs, Job, and Ecclesiastes—we have the remains of this "wisdom literature," and it has this marked characteristic. The Jewish law, all the national prerogatives and peculiarities of Israel, fall into the background. So, on the other hand, does prophetic revelation (only once alluded to in Prov.—viz. xxix. 18). The wisdom is natural, and not dogmatic; cosmopolitan, not Israelite. Its main object is to regulate life by the data of experience. For this reason the prophets protest against some manifestations of this "wisdom," as being godless (Is. v. 21; xxix. 14; Jer. iv. 22; viii. 9; ix. 23), while they show at the same time the influence of this "wisdom," or gnomic, literature on their own style (see, especially, Is. xxviii. 23–29). So far, then, Proverbs, Job, &c., occupy the position of philosophy; but the Hebrew "wisdom" is not speculative, but practical. The Hebrew "sages" correspond, not to the Greek philosophers, but to the Greek "sages," the wise men who preceded the philosophers. (Sensible remarks on the whole subject are made by Kuenen—Onderzœk, vol. iii. p. 88—and Tiele has treated the matter admirably—Egypt. en Mesopotam. Godsdiensten. p. 629 seq.)

ii. 14, 5; Tertullian, "Præscr." 7; the author of the "Philosophumena," vii. 19). Tatian and Hermias, among the Apologists, are equally bitter. Theophilus ("Ad Autol." ii. 8, 12; iii. 3, 7, 17) qualifies blame with faint praise. St. Athanasius professes his ignorance of a common philosophical term, and Basil his dislike of philosophy in general (see Newman's note in the "Oxford Athanasius," p. 52). Aristotle was regarded with special aversion (Iren. ii. 14, 5; Tertull. "Præscr." 7; "Philosophum." vii. 19). Others found in the heathen philosophers an acknowledgment of Christian mysteries, and looked on philosophy as a preparation for Christ (so Justin, of the Stoics and Heraclitus, "Ap." 2, 8; of Socrates, ib. 10; Clem. Al. "Strom." i. 5, p. 331, 333; with reference to Plato, v. 13, p. 696; vi. 15, p. 802; v. 13, p. 697; v. 14, p. 714; Origen, e.g. "C. Cels." vi. 8, where he quotes a spurious passage of Plato to show that he knew the "Son of God"). Now, both these views, in spite of their opposition to each other, agree in this, that they conceive of philosophy as external to Christianity. To Clement and those who think with him, philosophy is a friendly power which, partly from the "light which lightens every man," partly by borrowing from the Hebrew Scriptures, leads men to Christ; to Irenæus and others it is a dangerous rival of the Church. The views are not really far apart, and the adherents of neither ever reached the scholastic theory that philosophy and theology are two independent sciences, each of which has a province of its own; Augustine, even, has no formal and complete system of philosophy; and though at the close of the patristic period logic was zealously cultivated, a philosophy in the strict sense had not begun to be. In the latter part of the eleventh century speculations on the nature of universal ideas began to excite attention in the Church, though the dispute was conducted in great measure with reference to the mysteries of the Trinity and Incarnation, so that it was half-theological, half-philosophical. Roscelin, canon of Compiègne (about 1089), propounded the Nominalist view that universals are mere abstractions from individual things; he was a Tritheist in theology, was condemned at Soissons in 1092, and opposed by the Realists William of Champeaux (d. 1121) and Anselm of Canterbury (d. 1109). Up to this time only a few of Aristotle's logical works were known in the West ("Categ." "De Interpret." besides Porphyry's "Isagoge"; after 1128, Aristotle's "Analytica" and "Topica"). About 1200, translations of Aristotle's metaphysical and physical writings appeared, and the influence of the great Arabic commentators on Aristotle (Avicenna, b. 980; the Pantheist Averroes, 1113–1198) began to tell. These metaphysical studies met with great opposition. A council of Paris in 1210 ordered Aristotle's metaphysical works to be burnt (Fleury, "H. E." lxxvii. 59); and the Papal legate, Robert of Courçon, in 1215 forbade the use of Aristotle's physical or metaphysical works, and this by order of Pope Innocent III. (Fleury, lxxvii. 39). This decree was modified by Gregory IX., and practically abrogated by Urban V., and soon the Aristotelian philosophy became supreme in the West. The Franciscan Alexander of Hales, born in Gloucestershire (d. 1245), was the first scholastic who was acquainted with all the works of Aristotle and knew something of the Arabian commentators. Albert the Great (1193–1280), St. Thomas of Aquin (1225 or 7–1274), Duns Scotus (d. 1308), differing as they did on many points, philosophical and theological, were all Aristotelians. All distinguished between the provinces of faith and reason, accepted the decisions of the Church as supreme in the former, and followed Aristotle as the great representative of human reason. A much freer position with respect to Aristotle was maintained by the later Nominalists. The first great leader of this school was the Franciscan Occam (provincial in England, theologian to Louis of Bavaria, d. 1347), who abandoned the Scotism of his order. He was followed by some Dominicans—e.g. by the Englishman Robert Holcott, by the great Frenchmen Peter d'Ailly and Gerson (d. 1429), and by Gabriel Biel (d. 1495), the last great Nominalist. The Aristotelian philosophy, on the whole, held its own within the Church till the time of Descartes. Jesuits like Suarez choose, indeed, between St. Thomas and Scotus, but they are professed Aristotelians.

To the Scholastics generally philosophy is the "science of things through their ultimate causes, so far as such science is attainable by the light of nature." We say by "ultimate causes," for, whereas lower sciences, such as mechanics, chemistry, &c., borrow principles from other sciences, philosophy borrows from no other science: it considers "being as being," the nature of things in their widest aspect.

It either deals with "being" in itself or with "being" as the object of and as ordered by reasoning, or with "being" as the object of and ordered by the will. The two latter classes (ens rationale and morale) are the subject-matter of two subdivisions of philosophy—viz. of logic and ethics. "Being" in itself—i.e. as ordered by God—may be considered as liable to sensible motion, and then it is the subject-matter of physics; or, again, we may consider "being" like that of God or the angels, which is superior to such motion, or, in our consideration of "being," abstract from sensible motion, then we get metaphysics (so Goudin, "Philosophia D. Thomæ"). Logic, metaphysics, physics, and ethics, therefore, are the four subdivisions of philosophy, psychology[1] being merely a branch of physics. Next, philosophy reasons only from the light of nature, and has no direct connection with revelation. It proves, e.g., the "being" of God, which can be done from his works; it does not investigate the doctrine of the Trinity, which is wholly beyond reason. Hence the marked difference between the scholastic philosophy and many modern systems, which latter claim to be a substitute for revelation, and to give, in the form of reason, that, so far as it is reasonable, which the uninstructed believe. Further, the scholastics taught that philosophy is the handmaid of faith: first, because it prepares the way for faith by establishing, e.g., the spiritual nature of the soul, the existence of God, &c.; next, because, though it cannot prove revealed truths, it can show that they are not evidently contrary to reason; thirdly, because, whenever the provinces of philosophy and theology touch, the philosopher must, if need arise, correct his conclusions by the higher and more certain truth of faith. It is a scholastic axiom that nothing can be true in philosophy which is false in theology. Observe, the Church does not teach philosophy; that is not her province. She merely declares a philosophy which rejects, e.g., the primary truths of morals or religion, to be false. The correction of the false reasoning she leaves, and must leave, to others.

After Descartes there was an increasing defection from scholastic philosophy among Catholics. The philosophy of Malebranche (d. 1715), bitterly opposed as it was by Bossuet ("Lettre 171, à un Disciple du P. Malebranche"), became very popular in France. The representatives of other Catholic schools of philosophy among Catholics hold a far lower place in the history of speculation. Such, during this century, were the Ontologists and Traditionalists in France; Hermes, Baader, Günther in Germany. Their systems were condemned on theological grounds by ecclesiastical authority, and are now all but forgotten. On the other hand, the philosophical works of Rosmini (1797–1855) and the Spanish priest Balmes still enjoy high repute.

A great revival of the Scholastic, or rather of the Thomist, philosophy began some thirty years ago. Protestants themselves showed a more generous appreciation of the Schoolmen, and Catholics reverted to their teaching, partly from impatience at the instability of modern systems, partly because of the close connection between the Scholastic philosophy and the language used in the definitions of the later Church, partly because of the security felt in adopting a philosophy which was in proved harmony with Catholic doctrine. The philosophical works of Liberatore and Sanseverino are perhaps the best known among those of the "New Scholastics;" and a man of much higher ability, the Jesuit F. Kleutgen ("Philosophie der Vorzeit," 1860), has written an elaborate defence of Thomist principles. The Thomist philosophy is now taught in almost every seminary, and the present Pope, in the Encyclical "Æterni Patris," has approved and urged the teaching of the philosophy of St. Thomas. It must be remembered, however, that Rosmini's works were recently declared, "after a most rigorous examination," free from all censure. Again, the physics of the Schoolmen, which no one thinks of defending, are yet an integral part of their philosophy. And, however high St. Thomas may rank as a philosopher, it is none the less true that a person who accepts his theories because they are his, thereby renounces the study of philosophy altogether and confuses the methods of philosophy with those of faith. It is fair to say that Kleutgen is very far from such unreasonable exaggeration, and the late Dr. Ward confesses himself utterly unable to understand the reasoning of persons who speak as if the most intellectually dutiful sons of the Church were those who accept every "philosophical proposition current among the Scholastics" ("Essays on the Church's Doctrinal Authority," p. 541)

[1] So, e.g., Goudin and the older writers generally.

(The best account of the history of the Scholastic philosophy will be found in Ueberweg's "History of Philosophy." It has been translated.)

PHOTINUS. A disciple of Marcellus of Ancyra and bishop of Sirmium, in Pannonia. He began to teach his heresy as early at least as 344, when he was condemned by an Antiochene synod. He distinguished between the Word and the Son. The former, in the strict sense (the λόγος ἀνώτατος), was not a Person, but the immanent reason of God. The Holy Ghost was merely the energy of God, and Christ no more than a man born miraculously of a virgin (so Hefele, "Concil." i. p. 635; but this is not certain), who could be called "Son" only in an improper sense, because the Word of God wrought in Him with special power. His opinions were very much those of modern Socinians, and for this reason Petavius speaks of the latter as "Photiniani." Photinus was condemned both by Semi-Arians and Catholics, but there has been great difference of opinion among Catholic scholars as to the number and dates of the synods which condemned him. Petavius and Sirmond disputed at length on the matter. Some account of the controversy will be found in Hefele ("Concil." vol. i p. 634 seq.). Photinianism was rejected as a heresy in the General Council at Constantinople in 381.

PHOTIUS. [See GREEK CHURCH.]

PIARISTS. By this name are known the regular clerks of the Scuole Pie (religious schools), an institute of secondary education founded at Rome by St. Joseph Calasanctius in the last years of the sixteenth century. This foundation was sanctioned as a congregation under simple vows by Paul V. in 1617, and as a religious order four years later by Gregory XV. The first children taught in the schools were collected from the streets, and the founder was content, after their religious education had been well provided for, to have them instructed in reading and writing only; but by degrees the programme was extended until, besides all the subjects of a good modern education, it embraced Latin and Greek and philosophy. Houses of the order were soon planted in various Italian towns, and in 1621 the Cardinal Bishop of Olmütz introduced the Fathers into Moravia. Alexander VII. in 1656 insisted that they should return to the status under which they could only take simple vows; but, thirteen years later, Clement IX. reinstated them in the full privileges of a religious order. The Piarists appear to have never entered France or Great Britain, or any country outside the limits of Europe. The chief centres of their activity have been, and are, Italy, Austria-Hungary, and Spain. About 1870 they numbered some 2,000 religious. (Hélyot; Wetzer and Welte.)

PICPUS, CONGREGATION OF. A deacon in the seminary of Poitiers, Pierre Coudrin by name, when the infidel government of France dispersed (1792) all students under training in the episcopal seminaries, resolving not to be false to his vocation, and hearing that the Bishop of Clermont was in hiding somewhere in Paris, went there, found him out, and received priest's orders at his hands. During the ten years of persecution which followed, Coudrin, who was of course one of the prêtres non assermentés, exercised his ministry in the midst of danger, hardship, and poverty, in the dioceses of Poitiers and Tours. Gradually he matured the plan of a new congregation which, while protesting in the most direct way against the prevalent unbelief by maintaining the Perpetual Adoration of the Blessed Sacrament, should undertake the preparation of candidates for the priesthood, and also the work of preaching the Gospel to the heathen. The Bishop of Mende, whose household he entered, sympathised in his projects and aided him to realise them. With the bishop's help Coudrin instituted (1805) his congregation in the buildings known as of Picpus, in the Faubourg St. Antoine, Paris. The approbation of the Holy See was given in 1817. Seminaries in various parts of France were confided to the Fathers of Picpus; and in 1825 the third fundamental aim of the institute began to be realised, when Leo XII. sent six of its members to preach the faith in the islands of the Pacific. From that time the missionary activity of the congregation has gone on with an ever-increasing development, chiefly in the regions of South America, Australasia, and Oceania. The history of the earlier congregation of Picpus, a reform of the third order of St. Francis founded by Vincent Mussart at Franconville in 1594, is given at considerable length by Hélyot, who was himself a member of it.

PILGRIM, PILGRIMAGE (peregrinus, peregrinatio; It. pellegrino; Fr. pèlerin.) The well-known line, "cœlum non animum mutant, qui trans mare currunt," contains but a half-truth, for universal experience attests the stimulating, recreative, and enlightening power which mere change of scene often exerts on the mind of man. These effects are likely to be enhanced when the change has a moral motive. "Movemur enim," says Cicero, "nescio quo pacto locis ipsis in quibus eorum, quos diligimus aut admiramur, adsunt vestigia" (we are inly stirred by the very spots where the traces exist of those whom we love and admire).

The pilgrimages of the Jews to Jerusalem at the time of the great festivals were matter of precept and obligation. The pilgrimages to Pagan shrines (of Jupiter Tyrius, or Melcarth, at Gades, of Jupiter Capitolinus at Rome, of Apollo at Delphi, Diana at Ephesus, &c.), and those flockings of innumerable worshippers to shrines of Rama and Crishna which take place in our own day, usually proceed on the assumption that the power of the divinity whose help is sought is locally circumscribed, but that within the limits of his own jurisdiction it is indefinitely great. The Christian creed, according to which "God is a spirit," to be sought and found not specially "on this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem," but wherever the true worshippers approach Him in spirit and in truth, might seem at first sight to afford little encouragement to pilgrimages. For, as St. Jerome [1] says—and other Fathers hold similar language—Christians "dare not confine the omnipotence of God to one narrow corner of the world. . . . From Jerusalem and from Britain the court of heaven is equally open." Nevertheless, so certain is it that religious impressions, blunted and weakened by the daily business of the market-place and the street, require in most minds to be often graven afresh (and that by means of impulses coming from without, for it would be vain to trust to the sufficiency of those coming from within), that the Church has from the first—while admitting the danger of abuses, and taking measures to prevent them—approved the use of pilgrimage to holy places as a very potent help and incentive to a devout life. She also favours the practice, because she recognises the undoubted fact, that God has often granted, and still grants, interior and exterior favours, graces, and miracles, at particular places or shrines, to honour certain mysteries, saints, &c.

A Protestant writer [2] in the "Dictionary of Christian Antiquities" (Smith and Cheetham) has collected with praiseworthy industry a multitude of facts bearing on the conditions under which pilgrimages were made in the first eight centuries. It would appear from the letters of Paula and Eustochium (included among those of St. Jerome), that from the date of the Ascension to their own day a continued stream of pilgrims had resorted to the Holy Places. The first recorded pilgrim is St. Alexander (third cent.), who is said to have visited Jerusalem in fulfilment of a vow. Of the devout journey of Helena, the mother of Constantine, whose faith and zeal are said to have been rewarded by the discovery of the true cross, we have a full relation from the pen of Eusebius. The French bishop Arculfus visited Jerusalem in the seventh century, and after his return told his story to Adamnan, abbot of Iona, who embodied the narrative in his tract, "De Locis Sanctis." In the eleventh century, Palestine having fallen into the hands of the Seljukian Turks, Christian pilgrims were subjected to many indignities, the report of which in Europe led eventually to the first Crusade.

The usual motives for a pilgrimage were: (1) the desire to realise the objects of faith and quicken religious feeling in the soul; (2) the fulfilment of a vow; (3) some special benefit—as when Chaucer's pilgrims went to Canterbury—

> The holy blissful martir for to seke,
> That hem hath holpen whan that thei were seke;

(4) the execution of some penitential task, whether self-imposed or enjoined by the clergy.

The more celebrated shrines, towards which the currents of pilgrimage have set strongly, are: (1) those of our Lord, in other words, the Holy Places in Palestine; [1] (2) those of the Blessed Virgin; (3) those of angels and saints. Among the sanctuaries of our Lady, which have been, or are, thronged by the resort of pilgrims, may be mentioned Walsingham (on the pilgrimage to which Erasmus wrote a tract), Einsiedeln in Switzerland, Chartres and Fourvières in France, Maria Zell in Germany, Loreto in Italy, and Guadaloupe and Montserrat in Spain. The grotto of Lourdes, since the event of 1858, has become the centre of attraction to an immense concourse of pilgrims. Among the sanctuaries of angels and saints may be named the "limina Apostolorum," or the tombs of SS. Peter and Paul on the Vatican hill, the church of St. Michael on Monte Gargano (the devotion of Norman pilgrims to which led to the Norman conquest of Naples), and the shrine of the English St. Thomas of Canterbury, a pilgrimage to which is the apt setting of the well-known "Tales" of Chaucer.

PISA, COUNCIL OF. Gregory XII. (Angelo Corrario) had been elected Pope in 1406, the Antipope Benedict XIII. (Peter de Luna) in 1395, and Europe was divided between the two "obediences." After much negotiation, both Gregory and Benedict were induced to promise to adopt the way of cession, in pursuance of which each would have withdrawn his claim to the pontificate. But misunderstandings arose, and the promises were not kept. The schism had now lasted thirty years, producing confusion and bewilderment throughout the Christian world. The leading cardinals on both sides, in view of this disastrous state of things, met together, and agreed, since no other way of restoring unity seemed feasible, to ignore the claims of both rivals, and themselves summon a general council, to meet at Pisa on March 25, 1409. The Council met on the day appointed; its twenty-third and last session was held on August 7 following. From first to last, twenty-four cardinals, four patriarchs, eighty bishops, a hundred and two proctors of bishops, eighty-seven abbots, two hundred delegates of abbots, besides a great number of generals of orders, doctors, deputies of universities, and ambassadors, attended the council. Within little more than four months the synod finished the business for which it was convened. It first cited the rival claimants to appear; on their failing to do so, it declared itself to be the lawful representative of the Universal Church, and to have power to judge all pontifical pretensions; it decreed that all Christians ought to withdraw their obedience both from Gregory and Benedict; it entertained an act of accusation against them; after hearing evidence, it pronounced the sentence of deposition against them both, and declared the Holy See to be vacant; it rejected the claim of Robert, Gregory's supporter to the imperial throne, and recognised Wenzel; lastly, it arranged for the holding of a conclave from which Card. Philargi came forth as Pope, and took the name of Alexander V.

Hefele says of this council, "Neither ecclesiastical authority nor the most trustworthy theologians have ever numbered it among the œcumenical councils." ("Conc." Introd.) Its unfortunate issue (Gregory and Benedict both refusing to yield, and there being thus three claimants for the papacy, down to the time of the Council of Constance) he attributes partly to the perversity of the temporal princes, but chiefly to the council itself; to the erroneous theory on which they based the deposition of Gregory XII. and Benedict XIII.—viz. that by their conduct they were heretical against the article "Unam Sanctam Cath. Ecclesiam"—a theory which no one believed in, and again to their violence and precipitation in resorting to extreme measures. ("Conciliengesch." vi. 901.)

Nevertheless Bellarmin calls it a General Council, and looks upon it as "neither clearly approved nor clearly rejected."[1] Not the former; for Martin V. would not absolutely call Alexander V. Pope, though recognising the validity of some of his acts; and St. Antoninus will not allow that either he or his successor was a true Pope. Not the latter; for many good theologians (e.g. Natalis Alexander, Raynaldus, and Ballerini) affirm that both the Council and the Pope whom it created were legitimate; nor would Alexander VI. have taken that title if it had been generally believed that Alexander V. was no true Pope. So far from that, "it may almost be called the common opinion," proceeds Bellarmin, "that both Alexander and John his successor were true Popes."

An English prelate, Robert Hallam, bishop of Salisbury, acted a conspicuous part in the proceedings at Pisa. [ANTIPOPES in Appendix.] (Wetzer and Welte, art. by Hefele.)

PISTOIA, SYNOD OF. Leopold, grand duke of Tuscany and brother of the Emperor Joseph II. began in 1780 to introduce many changes in the discipline, worship, &c., of the Tuscan Church. In 1782 he suppressed the Inquisition and he also interfered in doctrinal matters, recommended the "doctrine of St. Augustine" and the Biblical commentary of the learned Jansenist Quesnel. His chosen ally was Scipio Ricci, bishop of Pistoia and Prato, formerly vicar-general to Incontri, archbishop of Florence. In 1786 Leopold laid before the Episcopate of the Duchy fifty-seven articles for the "reform of the Church" in the Jansenist and Febronian sense. Only three bishops, of whom Ricci was one, accepted them. That same year (September 18), the Synod of Pistoia met. Tamburini was the promotor and 234 priests were present. The Jansenist doctrines on grace were approved. But besides this the principles of a spiritual democracy were asserted. God, it was said, had given power to the Church, and it was the Church which communicated it to the pastors, including even the Pope. Bishops were to be practically independent of the Pope, the priests in diocesan synods were to be judges of faith and discipline, &c., &c. Lastly, a multitude of decrees were passed condemning practices common in the Church—e.g. devotion to the Sacred Heart, missions, use of Latin in the Mass, the influence of Scholastic theology, multiplication of religious orders, feasts, &c., &c.

The destruction of altars, images, &c., under Ricci's direction, set the Tuscan populace in an uproar: they stormed his palace in 1787, and he had to resign his see. The bishops, with scarcely an exception, were firmly opposed to the Pistoian decrees, from which eighty-five propositions were condemned by Pius VI. in the bull "Auctorem fidei" of 1794. Solari, bishop of Noli, in the Genoese territory, was the only prelate found publicly to oppose the bull. Ricci himself in 1805 made a recantation, and was reconciled to Pius VII., though it appears from the bishop's letters that his sentiments were not really changed. Solari joined himself to the Constitutional bishops in France. (From Cardinal Hergenröther's "Kirchengeschichte," &c. The acts of the synod were printed at Pistoia, also Ticini 1789, Laibach 1791, Bamberg 1790. The "Auctorem fidei" may be read in Denzinger's "Enchiridion." Gelli edited the "Memorie" of Ricci "with documents," Florence, 1865.)

PLAIN CHANT[1] (cantus planus or firmus, canto fermo, chant d'église). The Church music introduced or perfected by Gregory the Great, and still dominant in Christian worship in all Western lands, is called by this name. By the epithet "plain" it is distinguished (1) from figured or florid music; (2) from part music, as admitting melody but not harmony; (3) from modern, Italian, or five-lined music of a sacred character. "Emanating from and probably embodying many of the sacred strains of David, the prophets, and Apostles, propagated by St. Ambrose, collected, enlarged, and improved by the illustrious Pope St. Gregory the Great, ever since the favourite music of the Church, it is now consecrated exclusively to her services, is written on a stave of four lines, and totally excludes those ostentatious displays and tawdry decorations which form so prominent a feature of secular music."[1]

When passages such as Mark xiv. 26, Eph. v. 19, are considered, it cannot be doubted that vocal music was employed from the first in the Church services, but we have little precise knowledge of the arrangements which were in use before the time of St. Ambrose. It was this saint, according to St. Augustine ("Conf." ix. 7), who brought to Milan the mode of chanting which he had learnt during his residence at Antioch. The ancient Greek music was adapted for auditors endowed with great sensitiveness of ear; it recognised three scales—the diatonic, in which the music ascends chiefly by intervals of a tone in length, the chromatic, in which it ascends by half-tones, and the enharmonic, in which it ascends by quarter-tones. But the development of musical science among the Greeks was fatally hampered by the adoption of a defective scale of only four notes, the tetrachord. St. Ambrose and St. Gregory confined Church music to the diatonic scale, but they extended this scale to seven sounds, distinguished by the first seven letters of the alphabet, agreeing apparently in this with the ancient Latin music.[2] The octave of the first, above or below, was the first or the last of a series of seven similarly related sounds, differing from the first series only in pitch. The first or key-note was either C (afterwards called Ut or Do) or F; no other key was employed. B flat was necessarily introduced, in order that the scale of F might correspond with that of C; but no other flat or sharp was permitted.

There are three points of prime importance in every description of music—rhythm, character, and notation. By comparing plain chant in each of these respects with modern music, we shall arrive at a clearer comprehension of it. 1. The rhythm of a piece of modern music is indicated by the signature, which tells us that it is either in common or triple time, or some variety of one of them; the music is divided into bars, or passages equivalent in length, and in each bar the rhythmical principle announced at the outset remains predominant. In plain chant there is no such division into bars equivalent in length. The rhythm of the music is derived rather from the metrical rhythm of the psalm or hymn to which it is set than vice versâ; whence in those pieces which, being in prose, have no rhythm of their own—e.g., the "Gloria" and the "Credo," the Gregorian tones to which they are set appear almost destitute of rhythm; they depend for their charm on the pleasing combination and contrast of sounds—i.e. on the melody. A rude artificial rhythm is, however, given to such pieces when the sentences are sung alternately by two choirs. 2. The character of a piece of modern music is shown by the Italian words (adagio, andante, &c.) prefixed to it, taken in connection with its rhythm and the key in which it is composed; it is also generally indicated by the known class of music (operatic, military, sacred, &c.) to which the piece in question belongs. The character of Gregorian music is shown in quite another manner—namely, by the mode in which it is written. In the time of St. Gregory the various musical styles which had prevailed among the principal Hellenic populations were not yet forgotten; the Dorian mode was still associated with grave and solemn, the Lydian with gay and cheering sounds.[1] Out of the various styles or modes St. Gregory selected eight—the Dorian (grave), the Phrygian (exultant), the Lydian (cheering), the Mixto-Lydian (angelical); these are the four authentic modes; the Hypo-Doric (mournful), the Hypo-Phrygian (harmonious), the Hypo-Lydian (devout), and the Hypo-Mixto-Lydian (sweet). The authentic modes are numbered 1, 3, 5, 7; the other four, called the plagal—i.e. collateral—modes, are numbered 2, 4, 6, 8. Each authentic has a plagal mode annexed to it; the tonic or final note of both being the same, but the dominant—i.e. the note "on which the tune chiefly turns, and to which the other notes refer,"[1] being always different. 3. The notation of a piece of modern music is effected by means of a stave of five lines, which, according to the clef used (Sol clef, Do clef, Fa clef), may be suitable to boys', tenor, or bass voices, but on which, when once determined by the clef, the value and position of a note never vary. The notation of Gregorian music is by means of a stave of four lines, on any one of which either of the two received clefs (C and F) may be placed, and determine thereby the sound of all other notes, above and below. The forms of note and other expedients employed on the five-line stave are such that the length of any sound can be either extended or abridged to an almost indefinite extent. In Gregorian music the notes were originally all of the same length; at present they are of three kinds, Longs, Breves, and Semibreves; the Long being equal to the Breve and Semibreve. The admirable invention of the stave was unknown to St. Gregory; it was introduced in the eleventh century by Guido d'Arezzo, a Benedictine monk, who also gave the names which in many countries they still bear to the notes of the diatonic scale, replacing the C, D, E, &c., of Gregory by the syllables Ut, Re, Mi, Fa, Sol, La, taken from the first verse[2] of the hymn in honour of St. John the Baptist sung at Vespers on the feast of his nativity. The five-line stave of modern music is merely a development of the four-line stave of Guido. Minor keys are unknown in plain chant. (See the "Choir Manual," quoted in the note on the preceding page; Martigny's "Dict. des Antiq. Chrét."; and the art. "Musik" in Wetzer and Welte.)

Persevering efforts have been made of late years, both in Germany and in this country, to banish all but pure Gregorian music from our churches. For ourselves we are inclined to adhere to a remark by the writer of the elaborate article in the Dictionary of Wetzer and Welte; it is to the effect that, although it must be admitted that during the decadence of the Gregorian chant the Christian idea has vanished from a great deal of modern Church music, still we can neither abandon the new elements, nor confine ourselves exclusively to the old; "these two elements must therefore be reconciled, and it is for the Church to solve the difficult problem."

PLURALITY OF BENEFICES. Among the canons of the Council of Chalcedon (451) is one forbidding the cumulation of two or more benefices in the same hands. The Council of Trent,[1] decrees that, whereas there are many who, "deceiving not God but themselves," seek by fraud or collusion to hold several benefices at once, no one for the future, whatever his rank in the hierarchy, shall be appointed to more than one ecclesiastical benefice, provided always such benefice be sufficient for his support. If it be not so, he may lawfully hold another along with it, provided the two be not incompatible. The incompatibility of benefices is a wide and intricate subject; for the purpose of this article it is sufficient to say, that one chief cause of incompatibility is the existence of an obligation to continuous personal residence in regard to both benefices, as in the case of two bishoprics, two parishes, two canonries, &c

Notwithstanding what has been said, the instances of Papal dispensations, authorising the same person to receive, and even to hold, several benefices together, are undoubtedly numerous. This is explained by Navarrus[2] in the following manner:—"If," he says, "his Holiness grants to one holding several benefices others in addition, it is not that he has the intention of dispensing in contravention of the decree aforesaid, but because he believes that all the benefices are necessary for the suitable maintenance of the petitioner, and that otherwise his confessor will not give him absolution, unless first he shall have resigned, or have the firm intention of resigning, such of the benefices as are not necessary for his suitable maintenance. There are, however, special cases, as to which canonists are agreed that, if the good of the Church so require, the Pope may grant a dispensation for validly holding two or more benefices, even though they are per se incompatible."

Important decrees against plurality were passed by the Third Council of Lateran (1179), and also by the Fourth Council (1215). (Ferraris, Beneficium, art. vi).

PONTIFICAL. A book containing the rites, some of which can be performed by a bishop only, others only by priests specially empowered by the bishop. Such books were compiled in the middle ages from the old Sacramentaries and Ordines by bishops for their own use and that of their successors. Pontificals probably came into use during the eighth century, the earliest extant being that of Egbert, archbishop of York from 732 to 766. The copy in the National Library at Paris seems to have been written in Egbert's life-time.[1] Ordinarium was another name for the Pontifical. It occurs in the gloss on the "Clementina Unica [of Clement V.] de Jurejurando," and in a necrology of Paris, both quoted by Catalani. Zaccaria ("Biblioth. Rit.") gives a list of MS. Pontificals of French and German dioceses. According to Mr. Maskell, there is an imperfect Bangor Pontifical (thirteenth century) in the possession of the dean and chapter, a perfect Pontifical of the Sarum use, and an imperfect Pontifical from Winchester in the Cambridge Library, three or four imperfect Pontificals in the British Museum, an Exeter Pontifical (twelfth century) in the cathedral there. It will be seen how very rare English MS. Pontificals are. Neither the Bodleian nor the British Museum has one perfect copy. MS. Pontificals were of course not multiplied like Missals or Breviaries.

The first printed edition of the Roman Pontifical was edited by A. P. Piccolomini, Bishop of Piacenza, in 1485. Albertus Castellanus dedicated another edition, in which, he says, he had made many changes, to Leo X. It was revised under Clement VIII., again corrected under Urban VIII., and the bulls of these Popes (1596 and 1644) require all bishops &c., strictly to conform to the Roman Pontifical so revised. This must be understood of bishops belonging to the Latin Church, for the Catholic Greeks, Maronites, &c., have their own Pontificals, of which Zaccaria gives a list. There is a learned commentary on the Roman Pontifical in three volumes by Catalani. This article has been compiled from the Prolegomena to Catalani's edition, from Zaccaria's "Bibliotheca Ritualis," and from Maskell's "Monumenta Ritualia."

[1] So Mr. Scudamore (art. "Pontifical," in Smith and Cheetham). But Mr. Maskell (Mon. Rit. vol. i. p. 132) says the MS. was written about the beginning of the tenth century.

POOR CLARES. This is the second order of St. Francis, called the Povere Donne, or, in French, Clarisses. Their founder was the virgin St. Clare, born at Assisi, of which St. Francis also was a native. When very young she heard of the seraphic life led by St. Francis in his little convent of the Portiuncula, and aspired to imitate it. Against much opposition she renounced the world, and was received by St. Francis at the Portiuncula in 1212. Her sister Agnes soon joined her; the church of St. Damian was assigned to them; and in a short time she had no lack of followers. Within eight years the order had spread into both France and Spain. The Cardinal Ugolino, who was protector of the whole order of St. Francis, placed St. Clare and her nuns temporarily under the rule of St. Benedict, adding some constitutions of great austerity. Under these they observed a perpetual fast, and on three days of the week in Lent fasted on bread and water; they lay on boards; their habit was rough and of coarse material; and they could not speak to one another at any time without the superior's leave. In 1224 St. Francis gave a written rule to St. Clare, which contained several mitigations of that which they had hitherto observed; they were now not to fast on Christmas day, nor ever on bread and water; moreover, the silence imposed was confined to certain hours of the day. Like the friars, they were not to possess any landed property. This rule was approved by Innocent IV. in 1246.

A Bohemian princess renounced the world in 1234 in order to serve God in this order, which by her means was propagated in Bohemia and in the German countries adjoining it. St. Clare died in the odour of sanctity in 1253. Various modifications of the rule given by St. Francis having found their way into several convents, Cardinal Cajetan, with the approbation of Urban IV., drew up in 1264 a rule, substantially agreeing with, but somewhat mitigated from that given by St. Francis, which was adopted by the great majority of the daughters of St. Clare. Some, however, particularly in Spain and Italy, preferred to follow the unmitigated rule. The order was thus divided into two branches, the larger being known by the name of Urbanists, the latter by that of Clarisses.

The reform of St. Colette (1436) consisted in bringing back a number of convents in France and Flanders to the exact observance of the rule of St. Francis.

The first monastery of Franciscan nuns or Minoresses founded in England (1293) was outside Aldgate, to the East of London; the house soon came to be called "the Minories," a name which the locality still retains. At the dissolution, besides this house, there were two other convents of Poor Clares, at Brusyard, in Suffolk, and Denny, in Cambridgeshire.

The government and direction of the order, being divided between a Cardinal Protector and the superiors of the Franciscans, were for a long time a subject of controversy and difficulty; until, early in the sixteenth century, Julius II. placed the Poor Clares entirely under the jurisdiction of the general and provincials of the Friars Minors.

In the time of Hélyot this order possessed 900 convents, with more than 2,500 religious. The French Revolution swept most of their houses away; but five or six have been restored in France, and a rather larger number exist in Austria. In England there are five convents,[1] four of which (Baddesley, Bullingham, Cornwall Road, and Levenshulme) follow the reform of St. Colette; in Ireland seven, at Ballyjamesduff, Galway, Harold's Cross, near Dublin, Keady, near Armagh, Kenmare, Newry, and Knock.

POOR MEN OF LYONS. [See VAUDOIS.]

POPE. The word (πάππας or πάπας, originally a childish word for father, Lat. papa) was given at first as a title of respect to ecclesiastics generally. Among the Greeks at this day it is used of all priests, and was used, as late at least as the middle ages, of inferior clerics. In the West it seems to have become very early a special title of bishops. Thus the Roman clergy (Cyprian, Ep. viii. 1) speak of the Bishop of Carthage as "the blessed Pope" ("Benedictum Papatem"). Even as late as the sixth century the title of Pope was sometimes given to metropolitans in the West. (See Hefele, "Concil." iii. p. 20 seq.) Gradually, however, the title was limited to the Bishop of Rome, and we find a synod of Pavia in 998 (Hefele, iv. p. 653) rebuking an archbishop of Milan for calling himself Pope. Gregory VII., in a Roman Council of the year 1073, formally prohibited the assumption of the title by any other than the Roman Bishop. It is of course in this last and most restricted sense that we use the word here. By the Pope we mean the Bishop of Rome, who is, according to Catholic doctrine, the successor of St. Peter, and as such the vicar of Christ, the visible head of the Church, the doctor and teacher of all the faithful. We propose to give some account (1) of the place St. Peter occupies in Scripture; (2) of the position of the Pope in the Ante-Nicene age; (3) of the testimonies of later fathers and councils; (4) to sketch the position of the Pope in the Church of the present time. Obviously, in a subject so vast we cannot do more than direct attention to the chief points.

(1) The Position of Peter in the New Testament.—Peter was first brought to Christ by his brother Andrew. "And Jesus, looking at him, said, Thou art Simon [i.e. "hearer"], the son of John (Ἰωάνου is the reading best supported), thou shalt be called Cephas," which is interpreted Peter—i.e. stone or rock. The three synoptic evangelists agree in putting Peter's name first in the list of the Apostles, and all note the change of his name from Simon to Peter ("He conferred on Simon the name of Peter," Marc. iii. 16. "Simon, whom also He named Peter," Luc. vi. 14, "first Simon, who is called Peter," Matt. x. 2), and later the reason for the change of name appeared. The change of name in itself must have been strange and significant in the ears of a pious Jew. He could scarcely fail to remember the depth of meaning which had lain in the change of Abram's name to Abraham, or how Jacob had won the glorious name of Israel, which was the pride and the joy of his descendants. And besides, "Rock"[1] was one of the most familiar names for that God who was at once the strength of his people, their impregnable fortress and refuge, their shelter in the noon-day heat of persecution. Christ Himself explained the reason for which he had changed Simon's name to Peter. Hitherto He had been the visible head of that society which He had gathered round Him and He needed no vicar. But soon his disciples were to see Him on earth no more, and He promised to provide his visible Church, after He had gone to Heaven, with a visible head. Peter had confessed that his Master was "the Christ the Son of the living God." Christ accepted and rewarded this confession, which sprang from divine faith. Peter had said Christ was the Son of God, "And I," Christ replied, "say to thee that thou art Peter (or rock),[1] and on this rock I will build my Church, and the gates of Hades shall not prevail against it. And I will give to thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth will be bound in heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth will be loosed in heaven" (Matt. xvi. 18–19).

Four promises to Peter "of power and pre-eminence in the Church" are contained in these words. In a sense all the Apostles became the foundation-stones of Christ's Church (Ephes. ii. 19, 20; Apoc. xxi. 14). But Peter was to be its chief foundation-stone. He is not to derive his strength from the Church; but, on the contrary, Peter is to draw his strength from Christ, and the Church from Peter. Next, the Church built on Peter cannot

[1] "Rock" (צוּר) is constantly used as a title of God (see, e.g., Deut. xxxii. 4, "The rock—perfect is his work;" 1 Sam. ii. 2; Is. xxx. 29; Ps. xviii. 32 (and so סֶלַע). Once only is God called a "stone" (אֶבֶן)—viz. in Gen. xlix. 24, "the shepherd, the stone of Israel." But probably we should point, with Ewald, Dillman, and others, רֹעֵה "the shepherd of the stone of Israel," with reference to Gen. xxviii. 18 seq.; xxxv. 14, &c. Keil, Kalisch, &c., maintain the Masoretic reading.

[1] It has often been urged that Peter does not mean "rock," but "stone," πέτρα being the word for "rock." Sound scholarship will not support this distinction or the inference drawn from it. Christ calls Simon Πέτρος, not πέτρα, simply because πέτρα could not stand as a man's name. This is fully admitted by Meyer, one of the most eminent N.T. scholars—perhaps the most eminent who has appeared in our own time. He quotes, to show how commonly πέτρος occurs in the classics with the meaning "rock," Plato, Ax. p. 371; Soph. Phil. 272; O. C. 19, 1591; Pind. Nem. iv. 46; x. 126. "Christ," he says, "declares Peter a rock because of his strong faith in Him;" and again, "The evasion often taken advantage of in controversy with Rome—viz. that the 'rock' means, not Peter himself, but the firm faith and the confession of it on the part of the Apostle—is incorrect, since the demonstrative expression, 'on this rock,' can only mean the Apostle himself." We may add that Cephas (כֵּיפָא) is a common word in the Chaldee Targums for "rock"—e.g. "in the shadow of the rock" (Targ. on Is. xxxii. 2. Other instances in Levy, Chaldäisches Wörterbuch). In the Syriac form it occurs very frequently in the Peshito, where it means, (1) "rock;" (2) "stone;" (3) "Peter." Thus, in the text before us (Matt. xvi. 18) we have the very same word for Πέτρος and πέτρα: "Thou art Cephas (ܟܐܦܐ), and on this Cephas I will build my Church."

fail. The gates of the invisible world, strong as they are, will not enclose and so prevail against the Church; nay, they themselves will at last be broken and will give up their dead; but the Church built on Peter will endure till death is "swallowed up in victory" (1 Cor. xv. 54), and even then the Church will not cease to be: only the Church which fights and struggles here will be changed into the Church which triumphs and reigns in heaven. Thirdly, while the Church lasts, Peter (and his successors) will hold its keys. Christ, who has the "key of the house of David," Christ, who opens and no man shuts, shuts and no man opens, continues to be the Master of the house; but Peter is the steward to whom the keys are committed. He admits to and excludes from the Church in his Master's name. In other words, he is the centre of the Church's unity. All, from the great Apostle of the Gentiles down to the most obscure of the Church's children, hold their place and exercise their functions in subordination to Peter. Fourthly, what he binds and looses on earth is bound and loosed in heaven—i.e. he is the ultimate earthly judge of what is lawful and unlawful. He is to lay down the laws and conditions on which communion with the Church and participation in its privileges depend, and the decisions of his tribunal here will be ratified in the heavenly court.[1]

Once more before his Passion Christ made a promise to Peter which brought the strength he was to have for his future office, and by virtue of Christ's help, into sharp contrast with his sin and frailty as a man. He was to deny his Master three times, but this denial was not to involve the loss of faith or to deprive him of his supernatural strength as the future rock of the Church. "Satan has sought for you [plural—i.e. the Apostles] to sift you as wheat, but I have prayed for thee [singular—i.e. for Peter] that thy faith may not fail, and thou, being once converted [when thou hast once turned to Me], strengthen thy brethren" (Luc. xxii. 31, 32). No intelligent reader can fail to notice the significant change of number here. Temptation is common to Peter with the other Apostles. Satan has "asked for" them all, that he may sift them by temptation and separate them like chaff from the wheat. But it is for Peter specially that Christ prays, because on him, the man of rock, on him and him alone the faith of the Church depends. It is his peculiar office to strengthen his brethren. Even so determined a Protestant as Bengel admits that "this whole speech of our Lord presupposes that Peter is the first of the Apostles, on whose stability or fall the less or greater danger of the others depended (quo stante aut cadente cæteri aut minus aut magis periclitarentur)." After the resurrection Christ graciously allowed St. Peter to atone for his threefold denial by a threefold declaration of love, and again, under a new metaphor, Christ committed to him the fulness of jurisdiction. Christ was, and ever is, the Good Shepherd, but in a few days his visible presence was to be withdrawn, and on earth Peter was to be chief shepherd of Christ's flock. "Feed my lambs." "Be the shepherd of my sheep" (perhaps "little sheep," προβάτια). "Feed my sheep" (perhaps προβάτια again). The Church was still Christ's flock ("my lambs," "my sheep"), but Peter is entrusted by Christ with the office of feeding both the old and the little ones of the flock. The duty of feeding the young and "the watchful care and rule over maturer Christians" (Westcott, ad loc.) are alike laid upon him. The gift of the Holy Ghost, the power of remitting and retaining sins, are bestowed on the other Apostles as well as upon St. Peter. But Peter alone receives the keys of the Church; he alone is the rock on which the Church is built; on the faith of him alone the faith even of the other Apostles depends; he alone is made the shepherd of the whole flock. This primacy of Peter after Christ's ascension clearly manifests itself even in the scanty records of the New Testament, though it must not be forgotten that the personal inspiration of the other Apostles and the fact that they were free to extend their missionary conquests throughout the earth made their relation to Peter very different from that between the Pope and bishops of later times, who have no gift of inspiration and whose jurisdiction is confined to the limits of a particular diocese. Still, as has been said, the subordination of the other Apostles to Peter does evidently appear. At his instigation steps were taken to fill up the vacancy in the [1] Usually, "binding and loosing" are taken to mean "retaining and remitting" sins. But "bind and loose" were the technical words with the Rabbis (see אָסַר הִתִּיר in Buxtorf, Lex. Chald. et Rabb.) for "prohibition and permission;" and it is very hard to see how Christ's words could have conveyed any other sense to his hearers.

Apostolic college, and he laid down the rules of the election. "The punishment of Ananias and Sapphira, the anathema on Simon Magus, the first heretic, the first visiting and confirming the churches suffering under persecution, were all his acts. If he was sent with St. John by the Apostolic College to the new converts at Samaria, he was himself member and president of that college. So the Jews sent their high-priest Ismael to Nero; and St. Ignatius ('Philad.' 10) says that the neighbouring churches in Asia had sent, some their bishops, some their priests and deacons" (Döllinger, "First Age of the Church"). He was indeed the Apostle of the Circumcision, in this following Christ, who had said, "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Matt. xv. 24), while St. Paul was the Apostle of the Gentiles (Gal. ii. 7). This, however, involved no more than a division of labour, and in no way derogated from St. Peter's position as chief of the Apostles and head of the whole Church. On the contrary, it was St. Peter who was taught by revelation "to call no man common or unclean," and who first publicly and solemnly opened the gates of the Church to the Gentiles by the baptism of Cornelius (Acts x.). "St. Paul did not enter upon his peculiar office of preaching to the Gentiles till after his fifteen days' conference with St. Peter" (Gal. i. 18), and this though he constantly insists on the fact that his doctrine and Apostolic authority came to him direct from heaven. About A.D. 51 an Apostolic council was held at Jerusalem to decide the controversy with the Judaisers. "Certain men coming down [to Antioch] from Judæa kept teaching the brethren, 'Unless ye are circumcised according to the custom of Moses, ye cannot be saved.'" It is often alleged that St. James's position in the assembly is quite inconsistent with St. Peter's primacy. The very contrary seems to be the case. No doubt St. James says (Acts xv. 19), "I judge"—i.e. "I give a decision for myself and my brother Apostles." But we cannot understand the history till we observe that there were two questions before the council: one a question of doctrine—viz. Is circumcision necessary for salvation? and then a question of expediency—What disciplinary decree will be most likely to promote peace between Jewish and Gentile converts? On the former question St. Peter pronounces authoritatively. He is the first to speak. He tells the assembly that God had ordained that the Gentiles should hear the Gospel "through my mouth," that God had "purified their hearts by faith," that He had made no difference between Jew and Gentile, that both were to be saved by the grace of Christ. Thereupon "the whole multitude was silent," and heard Paul and Barnabas recount their missionary experience (v. 12). St. James refers to and accepts St. Peter's doctrinal decision (v. 14), and proceeds to give his own judgment on the practical rules to be laid down—viz. abstinence from things offered to idols, things strangled, blood, &c. It was natural, on Catholic principles, that St. Peter should pronounce the doctrinal decision; it was also natural and fitting, in the circumstances, that St. James should give his judgment on the practical rules, for St. Peter and St. Paul were both parties in the dispute, already committed to the cause of freedom and spirituality; while, on the other hand, St. James, the head of the chief Jewish church, was just the man likely to conciliate the Pharisaic party. Further, in a famous passage (Gal. ii. 11), St. Paul says of himself that he "withstood Peter to the face, because he was condemned" (κατεγνωσμένος — i.e. "his conduct carried its own condemnation with it," Lightfoot, ad loc.). But there was no question of error in faith. St. Peter, when he went to Antioch, withdrew from eating with the Gentile converts and acted against the principles of Gospel liberty he had maintained at Jerusalem shortly before. This proves, no doubt, that St. Peter was capable of error in judgment and of vacillation. It is no argument against his primacy, nor does it show that he could teach the Church false doctrine, or cease to be the rock on which its faith is built. In short, the Gospels in plain and unmistakeable terms recount the Divine institution of the Petrine primacy. There is nothing to contradict and something to confirm the Gospel view of Peter's primacy in the Apostolic records, and the natural exposition of Christ's words remains in its rights.

(2) The Pope in the Ante-Nicene Age. —It is the constant tradition of the earliest Christian writers that Peter held the first place among the Apostles. Tertullian ("Præscr." 22; "Monog." 8) asserts that Peter is the rock on which the Church was built, and, again, that Christ left the keys to him and "through him to the Church" ("Scorp." 10), which last words exactly tally with the Catholic doctrine that Peter is the fountain-head of all spiritual rule and jurisdiction. Clement of Alexandria ("Quis Dives," c. xxi. p. 947) speaks of Peter as "the elect, the chosen one, the first of the disciples." Origen declares that Peter was "the great foundation of the Church, the most solid rock on which Christ founded" it, that he was "the prince of the Apostles" ("In Exod." Hom. v.; "In Luc." Hom. xvii).[1] It is impossible to give in full all or nearly all the passages in St. Cyprian which express his belief in St. Peter's primacy, for he is never weary of asserting it. We may quote, however, the following words: "Peter, on whom the Church had been built" (Ep. lix. 7); "One Church founded on Peter" (Ep. lxx. 3); "Peter, to whom the Lord entrusted the feeding and the care of his sheep, on whom He set and founded his Church" ("De Habit. Virg." 10); "One is the Church and founded on one, who also received its keys" (Ep. lxxiii. 11); "Peter, on whom He built his Church and from whom He instituted and showed the origin of unity" (Ep. lxxiii. 7). Cyprian has been sometimes understood to mean that St. Peter received his power as the representative of all; that he merely stood for the Apostles, who were all one in dignity and jurisdiction. But the words just cited go far beyond this. Christ, according to Cyprian, did not merely show the unity by giving the keys to Peter alone, but He "instituted" the unity of the Church from Peter—i.e. He made the Church one by giving it one visible head. We may also refer to Ep. lxvi. 8; "Ad Fortunat." 11; Ep. xliii. 5. It is true that in one of his letters (Ep. lxxi. 3) Cyprian argues that the controversy on the validity of heretical baptism must be decided "by reason, not custom," and urges that even Peter, "whom the Lord chose as the first (quem primum elegit; Peter, of course, was not chosen first in order of time), and on whom He built his Church, when afterwards Paul disputed with him about the circumcision, made no arrogant claim or insolent assumption, so as to say that he held the primacy and that those who were new and had come later should rather give way to him; nor did he despise Paul because he had been previously a persecutor of the Church, but he admitted the counsel of truth and easily agreed to the good reason which Paul asserted." But St. Cyprian here is not denying St. Peter's primacy; on the contrary, he implies his belief in it. What he says is that St. Peter did not assert his authority on that occasion, and this simple statement of fact would be accepted by all. Cyprian's works ("Sentent. Episc." 17) supply us with another testimony from one of his contemporaries and fellow-bishops to the general belief that Christ "built the Church on Peter." We conclude with another illustration, which has an interest of its own. The "Homilies" falsely ascribed to Clement of Rome betray their Judaising and heretical character in this among other ways, that they exalt the dignity of St. James, "the bishop of bishops," and of the Mother Church of Jerusalem. Yet even there we find St. Peter called "the foundation of the Church" (p. 10, ed. Dressel; p. 6, ed. Lagarde), "the firm rock which is the foundation of the Church" (Hom. xvii. 19; see also viii. 5).

St. Peter's connection with the Roman Church as its founder is proved by historical evidence which cannot be set aside, except by an extreme scepticism which would serve equally to undermine the historical character of the New Testament. The New Testament itself is silent about St. Peter's presence at Rome, except that St. Peter, in his first epistle, sends greetings from the Church in Babylon (1 Pet. v. 13), which all ancient writers, with, so far as we know, only one late and insignificant exception (that of Cosmas Indicopleustes), understand to mean Rome. Many internal arguments from the N. T., ably stated by Döllinger ("First Age of the Church," p. 97 seq.), support this view. But, apart from this, we have abundant evidence from the earliest ages and from every quarter of the globe. Dionysius, bishop of Corinth (about 170), in a letter to the Roman Christians (apud Euseb. "H. E." ii. 25), mentions the fact that both the Corinthian and Roman Churches were "planted" by Peter and Paul (τὴν ἀπὸ Πέτρου καὶ Παύλου φυτείαν), and that both died as martyrs there at the same time. About 190, Irenæus, bishop of Lyons, the disciple of St. Polycarp, who was the disciple of St. John, speaks ("Adv. Hær." iii. 3) of the Roman Church as "greatest, most ancient, known to all, founded and constituted by the most glorious Apostles Peter and Paul." "Having founded and built the Church [of Rome], the blessed Apostles entrusted to Linus the administration of the episcopacy." Caius, a Roman presbyter under Zephyrinus (200–218), says: "I can point out the trophies of the Apostles. For if you will go to the Vatican or to the Ostian road, you will find the trophies of those who founded this Church" (Euseb. "H. E." ii. 25). A little later, the African Tertullian tells us ("Adv. Marc." iv. 5) that Peter and Paul left to the Romans "the gospel sealed with their blood"; that Clement, bishop of Rome, was ordained by Peter ("Præscr." 32); that at Rome Peter suffered like his Master ("Præscr." 36). This early evidence from Greece, Gaul, Africa, and Rome itself is so certain and so sufficient that we do not care to dwell on evidence which is merely probable. The language of St. Ignatius, the disciple of St. John ("Rom." 4), as Bishop Lightfoot justly remarks (in his edition of Clem. Rom. p. 46), "seems to imply that they [Peter and Paul] had both preached in Rome," and the preaching and death of the two Apostles there appears to have been the subject of a very early work, "The Acts of Peter and Paul" (see Hilgenfeld, "Nov. Test. extra Canonem Recept." fascic. iv. p. 68). Against this uniform tradition nothing can be advanced on the other side. It was this connection of Peter with Rome which made "the Chair of Peter" an accepted name for the Roman see. Thus Cyprian (Ep. lix. 14) uses the following words of persons who had been concerned in the schism of Felicissimus and had gone to Rome: "They dare to sail to the see of Peter and to the chief church (ad ecclesiam principalem), from which the unity of bishops (unitas sacerdotalis) has arisen." The early Church thus believed in the primacy of Peter, and also held that the Roman Church is "the Chair of Peter."

Nor is direct testimony to the authority and supremacy of the Roman Church wanting. At the very beginning of patristic literature Ignatius describes the Roman Church as "presiding in the place of the region of the Romans," and again, as the Church "which presides over charity" ("Rom." ad init.) Hefele, in his edition of the "Apostolic Fathers," takes this latter phrase to mean a presidence over "the whole congregation of Christians," who are bound together by charity, and this interpretation is defended at length by Hagemann ("Römische Kirche," p. 681 seq.) In any case the primacy of Rome over the Christian world is acknowledged, for had Ignatius meant to confine the primacy of the Roman Church to Rome itself, the assertion would have come to this, that the Roman Church presided over itself, which has no meaning. "Presides" (προκάθηται) is the very word which St. Ignatius uses (e.g. "Magnes." 6) to describe the authority of the bishop in his own diocese; and this acknowledgment is all the more important because it comes from one who was himself bishop of Antioch, which also could boast of its connection with St. Peter. Tertullian makes communion with the Apostolic Churches—i.e. the Churches founded by Apostles—the test of Catholic unity ("Præscr." 21 et passim); but Rome alone he calls "the happy Church, into which the Apostles poured all their doctrine with their blood." ("Præscr." 36.) The words Tertullian wrote after his lapse into Montanist heresy disclose still more plainly the power claimed by the Pope in his day. For he ridicules the "peremptory edict" of Zephyrinus the Roman bishop and his pretence to speak as "bishop of bishops." "I want to know," he exclaims, "how you usurp this authority for the Church."[1] And at once he answers his own question by supposing that the Pope does so on the strength of the words, "On this rock I will build my Church." "To thee have I given the keys of the kingdom of heaven." "Whatsoever thou shalt bind or loose on earth, will be bound or loosed in heaven." (Tertull. "De Pudic." 21.) But the most important testimony to the authority of Rome in the first ages of the Church is that of Irenæus. He wrote the third book of his work against heresies, in which the words which we are about to quote occur, between 184 and 192.[2]

[1] I.e. for the Roman Church, because founded by Peter. "Idcirco præsumis et ad te derivasse solvendi et alligandi potestatem, id est ad omnem ecclesiam Petri propinquam."

[2] In iii. 21 he mentions Theodotion's version of the O. T., which was not published before 180 (see Field, Hexapl. Orig. tom. i. p. 38); and in iii. 3 he speaks of Eleutherus (177–190, according to Jaffé, Regest. Pontif.) as actual bishop of Rome. With the exception of a few fragments, the work of Irenæus only remains in a Latin version. Massuet (Diss. ii. § 53), Lachmann (N. T. Græce et Latine, Præf. p. x.), and Westcott (N. T. Canon, p. 280) consider that the version was known to Tertullian, and therefore nearly contemporaneous with the Greek. Massuet's conclusion was contested by

But he "is rightly included in what may be called the Apostolic family" (Newman, "Tracts Theological and Ecclesiastical," p. 200), for he was the disciple of St. Polycarp (Iren. ad Florin. apud Euseb. "H. E." v. 20), who was the disciple of St. John. He had singular opportunities of knowing the mind of the Church throughout the world, for he was brought up in Asia Minor, he was bishop of Lyons, and twice at least he came into intimate relations with Rome. Irenæus then appeals ("Adv. Hær." iii. 3), in attacking Gnostic error, to the Apostles. They, he insists, had perfect knowledge, and delivered the truth in its fulness to the Church. He points out that different churches are able to trace back the succession of their bishops to the Apostles, and, since it would be tedious to enumerate all these churches, he has recourse to the Church of Rome, founded by "two most glorious Apostles, Peter and Paul." "Pointing to the tradition which this Church has received from the Apostles, to that faith which has been announced to the whole world, and which has come even to us by the succession of bishops," we confound all who err from the right way. "For with this Church, because of its more powerful principality,[1] every church must agree—that is, the faithful[2] everywhere—in which[3] (i.e. in communion with the Roman Church) the tradition of the Apostles has ever been preserved by those on every side." Then he enumerates the series of Popes, beginning with Linus. According to St. Irenæus the faithful all over the world must agree with the teaching of the Roman see, in which the tradition of the whole Church is virtually contained. This assent is due because Rome has the "more powerful principality," and this principality rests on the Apostolic dignity of the Roman Church, as the whole context shows. When Irenæus wrote general councils had not been dreamt of. It was from the Apostles, not from them, that the Roman Church derived her supreme power. Nor, again, does Rome depend upon the assent of the faithful; on the contrary, it is the faithful all over the world who are bound to agree with her. This passage has been the crux of Protestant theologians. For two centuries and more they have been devising a variety of interpretations, no one of which has found general acceptance even among themselves. In the last Protestant book on St. Irenæus with which we are acquainted, the writer admits that the saint "passing, as it were in prophecy, beyond himself, anticipates the Papal Church of the future," that he marks out Rome "as the chief seat of Apostolic tradition, as the centre which sustains and unites the whole Church." (Ziegler, "Irenäus," 1871, p. 151.)[1]

We cannot expect many instances of the exercise of Papal power at this time. Time was needed to develop the principles contained in the Apostolic tradition on "the Chair of Peter," and, besides, the hand of the persecutor was heavy on the Church. Still, indications of Roman supremacy are not wanting in the facts of early history. "The heretic Marcion, excommunicated in Pontus, betakes himself to Rome." "The Montanists from Phrygia come to Rome to gain the countenance of its bishops; Praxeas from Asia attempts the like." "St. Victor, bishop of Rome, threatens to excommunicate the Asian churches." "St. Stephen refuses to receive St. Cyprian's deputation, and separates himself from various churches of the East; Fortunatus and Sabatier (Vetus Italica, Præf. n. 93) and the Benedictine authors of the Histoire Littéraire de la France, vol. i. "S. Irénée," § 2. In any case, the fidelity of the Latin is admitted on all hands. The Syriac Fragments published by Harvey in 1857 would prove this, "if a doubtful cause needed support" (Harvey's Irenæus, vol. ii. p. 431).

[1] "Principalitas" can only mean "principality" or "supremacy." It occurs: iv. 38, "God holds the principality;" ii. 30, God "is above every principality and domination." In eight other places it is used of the supreme God of the Gnostics. So, i. 26, 1, "the principality which is above all," "the principality which is above everything." It is used—as we know from the Fragments of the original Greek preserved in Philosophum. x. 21; Theodoret, Hæret. Fab. i. 15—to translate αὐθεντία, "authority" or "supremacy."

[2] "Undique" = "ubique," as Thiersch and Stieren admit. Cf. iii. 24, 1, "Prædicationem ecclesiæ undique constantem," with i. 10, 2, "Prædicatio veritatis ubique lucet."

[3] "In qua," "in which"—i.e. "in union with which," or "in the unity of which." Cf. "Salutem in eo dedit" (iii. 12. 4); "Quod perdideramus in Adam" (iii. 18, 1); and "In qua una cathedra [sc. Petri] unitas ab omnibus servareter" (Optat. Schism. Don. ii. 2).

[1] The interpretation given in the text is that of the Gallicans Natalis Alexander, Bossuet, Massuet, and Ceillier; also of Döllinger, Church History, Engl. Transl. i. p. 256, and Friedrich, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, i. p. 409. Interpretations mutually destructive will be found in Salmasius, De Primatu, p. 65; Grabe, ad loc.; Neander, i. p. 259; Gieseler, i. p. 175.

Felix, deposed by Cyprian, have recourse to Rome: Basilides, deposed in Spain, betakes himself to Rome." "The presbyters of St. Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, complain of his doctrine to St. Dionysius of Rome; the latter expostulates with him and he explains." (Newman, "Development," p. 157 seq.) No doubt the early Fathers spoke and acted at times in a manner inconsistent with their own utterances elsewhere on Roman authority. This was perfectly natural, seeing that they had indeed the tradition of the Church, but not formal definitions or even a developed theological system to guide them. It would of course be a monstrous anachronism were we to attribute a belief in Papal infallibility to Ante-Nicene Fathers. Our contention simply is that the modern doctrine on Papal power is the logical outcome of patristic principles. It is another and a very different thing to say that the early Fathers themselves saw all this, and they were of course furthest from seeing it when they were irritated by an unwonted interference on the part of Rome or opposed to Rome in theological controversy. And it deserves to be carefully remembered that there is no counter-theory to be found in the Fathers of the Ante-Nicene age. The external unity of the Church is their constant theme. But if the see of Peter was not the centre of unity, then what was? If two bishops anathematised and refused to communicate with each other, how were the faithful to know which of the two was in the unity of the Church? If we do not take the chair of Peter as the centre of unity, then the Ante-Nicene Fathers supply no answer to the question. They never mention general councils or appeal to a majority of the bishops throughout the world. Yet, if each bishop is to be independent and subject to God alone, we should have a thousand Popes instead of one, and the unity of the Church would be shattered into pieces.[1] Our opponents may complain that the early Fathers do not speak fully enough on the authority of Rome, that their acts and dicta are occasionally inconsistent with Roman claims. They cannot say with any show of reason that the drift of patristic teaching tends to any definite theory of church unity, other than that of the Catholic Roman Church.

(3) The Fathers of the Fourth and Fifth Centuries.—Here the difficulty lies, not in finding proofs that Papal supremacy was asserted and recognised, but in selecting typical instances from the mass of evidence. "More ample testimony," says Cardinal Newman, "for the Papal supremacy, as now professed by Roman Catholics, is scarcely necessary than what is contained" in a series of passages which he quotes. ("Development," p. 148 seq.) "The simple question is whether the clear light of the fourth and fifth centuries may be fairly taken to interpret to us the dim, though definite, outlines traced in the preceding"—i.e. the Ante-Nicene age. The following are among the most striking passages in which the Fathers maintain not only that the Pope holds a supremacy of jurisdiction by divine right, but also that communion with him is the necessary condition of Catholic unity.

Optatus, lib. ii. c. 2, 3: "You cannot deny that you know that in the city of Rome the episcopal chair was bestowed on Peter first, in which Peter, head of all the Apostles, sat, in which one chair unity was to be preserved (servaretur) by all, that the rest of the Apostles might not maintain each his own chair, that he might be at once a schismatic and a sinner who against the chair which stands by itself (singularem cathedram) set another." He then enumerates the Popes from Peter down to Siricius, the Pope of his own day. The Council of Aquileia, in which St. Ambrose took a chief part, begs in a letter to the Emperor Gratian that he will "not permit the Roman Church, the head of the whole Roman world and that sacred faith of the Apostles, to be disturbed, because from it the rights of venerable admonition flow forth for all." (Mansi, "Concil." tom. iii. col. 622.) St. Ambrose tells us ("De Excidio Satyri," i. 47) that his brother, in places where the schism of Lucifer prevailed, if he doubted the orthodoxy of a bishop, asked him, "if he communicated with the Catholic bishops, that is, with the Roman Church."

St. Jerome (Ep. 15) addresses these words to Pope Damasus: "Following none but Christ, I am associated in communion with your Holiness—that is, with the chair of Peter. On that rock I know the Church was built. Whosoever eateth the lamb out of this house is profane. If anyone is not in the ark of [1] Cyprian, indeed, does, in the stress of controversy, commit himself to a theory of absolute episcopal independence (Ep. lv. 21). But he distinctly contradicts himself even in the same Epistle (lv. 24) and lxiv. 1; lix. 9.

Noe he will perish when the floods prevail. . . . I know not Vitalis; I will have none of Meletius; Paulinus is strange to me. Whoso gathereth not with you scattereth; that is, he who is not on Christ's side is with Antichrist." "Come, my brethren," says St. Augustine to the Donatists ("Ps. contr. Don."), "if you wish to be grafted in the vine. . . . Reckon up the bishops even from the very see of Peter. . . . That is the rock which the haughty gates of hell do not overcome." In 416 a council of sixty-eight bishops at Carthage, and of fifty-nine at Mileve in Numidia, condemned Pelagius, whose doctrine had been anathematised five years before in another council at Carthage. Each of the two last councils sent letters to Pope Innocent, begging that Apostolic authority might be given to their decrees. ("Ep. Concil. Carthag. Const." Epp. Innoc. 26.) Another letter was sent to the Pope by Augustine and four other bishops, in which they tell him what had been done against Pelagianism. All these letters are full of deference to the Apostolic See, and the Bishops of the Council at Mileve tell the Pope that heretics were more likely to yield to his authority, which was "derived from the authority of Holy Scripture" ("auctoritati tuæ ex scripturarum sacrarum auctoritate depromptæ," Coust. Ep. 28). Innocent replied, commending them for following the old rule which prescribed that answers should come to all the provinces from the Apostolic fount Before Rome spoke, but after the provincial councils, St. Augustine (Ep. 178) admits that "Pelagianism was not yet fully excluded from the Church." After the councils had been confirmed by Rome, after the rescript came, he thought that by the letters of Innocent "the whole doubt had been removed" ("Contr. Ep. Pelag." ii. 3). Pelagius himself had promised "to condemn all which that see [the Roman see] had condemned" (August. "De Peccat. Orig." 7). We need not dwell on the claims made by the Popes themselves. "The canons themselves have decided," says Pope Gelasius (492–6) writing to Faustus, "that no one whosoever shall appeal from this see, and so provide that it shall judge the whole Church and itself be judged by none. . . . Timothy of Alexandria, Peter of Antioch, Peter, Paul, John, not one, but many, bearing the episcopal name, by the authority of the Apostolic see alone, were cast down. . . . Therefore, we are in no fear lest the Apostolic judgment be reversed, to which the voice of Christ, tradition, and the canons have given the decision of controversy throughout the whole Church." (Mansi, "Concil." tom. viii. 16 seq.) At an earlier date—viz. in the year 422—Pope Boniface had spoken of the Roman see as that "from which, if any divide himself, he becomes an outcast from the religion of Christ" (Coust. Epp. Bonifac. 14).

It may be objected that all this is Western evidence. But testimony quite as strong comes to us from the East. In 341 (or, as some think, 342) Pope Julius with a synod of fifty Italian bishops (see Athanas. "Apol. contr. Arianos," ad init., and the epistle of the synod of Philippopolis, Mansi, tom. iii. 130) restored two Eastern prelates, St. Athanasius and Paul of Constantinople, to their sees. "He" (Pope Julius), says the Greek historian Socrates ("H. E." ii. 15), "in accordance with the prerogatives of the Roman Church, established the bishops in outspoken letters, sent them back to the East, restored each to his own see and laid his hand upon those who had rashly deposed them." Eustathius, bishop of Sebaste, was reinstated on producing a letter of restitution from Pope Liberius. (Basil, Ep. 263.) Chrysostom and his persecutor Theophilus appealed to Pope Innocent. The latter also addressed himself to the Bishops of Milan and Aquileia, but that the appeal was made specially to Rome appears from the statement in a letter from Anysius, bishop of Thessalonica who was a friend of Chrysostom's—viz. "that he abode by the judgment of the Romans" (ὡς ἐμμένει τῇ κρίσει τῇ τῶν Ῥωμαίων). (See the life by Palladius, himself a contemporary of Chrysostom, cap. 3.) But it is in the proceedings of the two great Councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon that Roman supremacy, with its divine sanction, shines forth most clearly. Cyril did not dare to break off communion with Nestorius till he had consulted Pope Celestine. He begged the Pope to declare his mind on this point (Mansi, "Concil." tom. iv. 1011 seq.) The Pope told his legates to act, not as disputants, but as judges (Coust. Ep. Cel. 17.) The Fathers of Ephesus passed sentence on Nestorius, "compelled and constrained (ἀναγκαίως κατεπειχθέντες) by the sacred canons and the letter of our most holy Father and fellow-minister Celestine, bishop of the Roman Church." (Mansi, iv. 1207.) John of Antioch, after a schismatical resistance to Pope and council, returned to Catholic unity. Whereupon Sixtus III. reminds him that he has learned by experience "what it is to think with us. Blessed Peter, in the person of his successors, has handed down what he has received. Who would wish to cut himself off from the first of the Apostles, taught by our master Himself?" (Coust. Epp. Sixt. III. Ep. 6.) The Fathers of Chalcedon acknowledge that the Pope had presided over the council through his legates "as head over the members," that the Pope "is appointed for all (πᾶσι καθιστάμενος) interpreter of the voice of Peter;" they say that "Dioscorus had dared to restore Eutyches to the dignity of which he had been deprived by his Holiness," and had "turned in his madness against him to whom the Saviour had entrusted the guardianship of the vine." They mention the 28th canon, and ask its confirmation, that "the establishment of good discipline (εὐταξίας), as well as of faith, might be attributed" to Leo. Finally, they gave an account of all that had been done to the Pope, "that he might confirm it" (εἰς βεβαίωσιν, Mansi, tom. vi. 148 seq.). Next year the Emperor Marcian wrote to Leo that doubts had arisen in the minds of many whether his Holiness had confirmed the decrees of the council (τὰ τυπωθέντα ἐβεβαίωσεν). One more instance and we have done. The Formulary or Libellus of Pope Hormisdas was signed in 519 by the Bishop of Constantinople, and imposed by the Byzantine emperor upon all the bishops within his dominions. It contains the following words: "Whereas the sentence of our Lord Jesus Christ cannot be set aside, in which He says, 'Thou art Peter, and on this rock I will build my Church;' the above words are confirmed by the effects, since in the Apostolic see religion has ever been preserved without stain. Anxious, therefore, by no means to be severed from this hope and faith, and following in all things the constitutions of the Fathers, we anathematise all heretics, especially Nestorius, &c. . . receive and approve all the encyclical letters of Pope Leo, which he wrote concerning the Christian religion. Whence, as we have said before, following in all things the Apostolic see, and proclaiming all its constitutions, I hope I may attain" (we are not responsible for the grammar) "to be with you in the one communion which the Apostolic see proclaims, in which is the perfect and true solidity of the Christian religion." (Mansi, tom. viii. 407; Hefele, "Concil." p. 673, 694 seq.) This Libellus was also approved by the Eighth General Council.

Such was the tradition of East and West, long before the forgery of the False Decretals, long before schism rent the Eastern patriarchates from the obedience due to the Holy See. With good right, therefore, did the Council of Florence define "that the Roman Pontiff is the successor of blessed Peter, prince of the Apostles; that he is the true vicar of Christ; that he is head of the whole Church, Father and doctor of all Christians; that to him [in the person of] blessed Peter was given full power of feeding, ruling, and governing the universal Church, as also[1] is contained in the acts of œcumenical councils and in the holy canons." It is necessary to bear in mind that all Catholics, Gallican as well as Ultramontane, accepted the belief that the Roman Church is the centre of unity, and that communion with her is the test of Catholicity. "The Son of God," says Bossuet, "since He willed that his Church should be one . . . . instituted the primacy of St. Peter to maintain and cement it." The chair of Peter "is the common centre of all Catholic unity" ("Exposition de la Foi Catholique," 21. "The Catholic Church from her birth has had for a mark of her unity her communion with the chair of St. Peter, so that, remaining in it, as we do, without letting anything separate us from it, we are the body which has seen those who have severed themselves fall on the right hand and the left" ("Première Instruction Pastorale sur les Promesses de l'Église," n. 32). "We grant that in Church law there is nothing the Pope cannot do, when need requires it" ("Def." xi. 20). He looked on Archbishop Fénelon's submission to the Pope, who condemned his book, as a natural act of "ecclesiastical subordination," for "there is one chief bishop, there is one Peter appointed to guide all the flock, there is one Mother Church established to teach all the others; and the Church of Jesus Christ founded on that unity, as on an immovable rock, cannot be shaken" ("Relation des Actes et Délibérations" on Quietism, vol. xx. p. 505, in the new edition of Bossuet, par Lachat, Paris, 1864).

(4) The Vatican Decrees.—In two important particulars the last council went beyond the principles accepted by Gallicans. First it defined that the Pope has not only "the office of inspection and direction," but also "the whole fulness of supreme power" in discipline as well as faith, and that this power is "ordinary and immediate over all and each of the pastors and of the faithful." This is in no way meant to derogate from the rights of bishops, or to make them mere delegates or vicars of the Pope. On the contrary, the council teaches that they too have "ordinary and immediate jurisdiction" in their dioceses, that they have been "placed by the Holy Ghost," that they have "succeeded to the position of the Apostles," that they are "true pastors." It may be well to quote on this point two theologians whom no one will suspect of watering down the Ultramontane doctrine. Speaking of the allegation that Ultramontanes "consider the episcopate as the Pope's mere creation and vicegerent, just, e.g., as the Roman Congregations are," Dr. Ward replies that "every Catholic would repudiate such a tenet as erroneous and even heretical." So again Dr. Murray (author of the treatise "De Ecclesia," &c.), writes: "Christ established, not episcopal order merely, but episcopal jurisdiction. That is, He ordained that there should be for ever in the Church, besides the universal pastor, pastors having particular flocks, with power to teach, legislate, inflict censures," &c., &c. The Pope may for a just cause withdraw jurisdiction from a particular bishop, but he cannot destroy the corpus episcoporum (See Ward, "Essays on the Church's Doctrinal Authority," pp. 376, 377.) Such is the true sense of the Vatican decree, and plainly it is in perfect harmony with the exposition given above of Christ's words to St. Peter, "Feed my sheep," "Feed my lambs." The whole flock and each member of it are given to St. Peter's charge. His successors draw their authority over each Christian from Christ Himself. The Pope, in virtue of his office, has direct power over each Christian in any particular diocese; the bishop of that diocese has the same power attached to his office, but the bishop must exercise it in union with and subordination to the Pope. There is no difficulty in supposing that superior and inferior may both have ordinary jurisdiction in the same place. Thus the ordinary right which the constitution might give a sovereign to try legal cases by commission would in no way make it impossible for the appointed judges also to exercise ordinary jurisdiction.

Next, the Vatican Council teaches "that when the Roman Pontiff speaks ex cathedra—that is, when he, using his office as pastor and doctor of all Christians, in virtue of his Apostolic office defines a doctrine of faith and morals to be held by the whole Church, he by the divine assistance, promised to him in the blessed Peter, possesses that infallibility with which the Divine Redeemer was pleased to invest his Church in the definition of doctrine on faith or morals, and that, therefore, such definitions of the Roman Pontiff are irreformable in their own nature and not because of the consent of the Church" ("Pastor Æternus," cap. 4). The Pope in himself is subject to error like other men; his infallibility comes from the spirit of God, which on certain occasions protects him from error in faith and morals. He has no infallibility in merely historical or scientific questions. Even in matters of faith and morals he has no inspiration, and must use the same means of theological inquiry open to other men. He may err as a private doctor; nor is any immunity from error granted to books which he may write and publish. Even when he speaks with Apostolic authority he may err. The Vatican Council only requires us to believe that God protects him from error in definitions on faith or morals when he imposes a belief on the Universal Church.

So understood, the Papal infallibility follows by logical consequence from principles already illustrated in this article and that on the CHURCH. Our argument is not addressed to Protestants. They must understand and accept the infallibility of the Church, and the position of the Holy See as the foundation of faith and centre of unity, before they can understand or accept the Vatican definitions. It is against the Gallican theory that we are arguing now, and we therefore take for granted the Catholic principles which Gallicans held.

We have seen that from the earliest times the faith of Peter and his successors has been taken as the foundation of the Church; indeed, so much is implied in Christ's words to the chief of his Apostles. Peter, says Bossuet, by his confession of Christ's Godhead "attracts to himself that inviolable promise which makes him the foundation of the Church. The word of Jesus Christ, which makes what He wills out of nothing, gives such strength to a mortal. Let it not be said or thought that St. Peter's ministry ends with himself; that which is to serve as the support of an eternal Church can never end. Peter will live in his successors; Peter will ever speak in his chair; this is what the Fathers say, and 630 bishops at the Council of Chalcedon confirm" (Sermon à l'Ouverture de l'Assemblée-générale du Clergé). Now, if Peter and his successors are the foundation of an infallible Church, of a Church, moreover, unchangeable in constitution, they themselves must be infallible. If they were to impose a false belief on Christians, the faith and infallibility of the Church itself would be shaken.

Let us turn once again to Bossuet, and see how he expounds Christ's charge to Peter, "Confirm thy brethren." Christ, he says, "does not merely give a commandment to Peter individually: Peter receives "an office which [Christ] founds and institutes in his Church for ever." "There was always to be a Peter in the Church to confirm his brethen in the faith; it was the most fitting means of establishing that unity of sentiments which the Saviour desired above everything; and that authority was so much the more necessary for the successors of the Apostles, inasmuch as their faith was less stable than that of those from whom they sprang" (de leurs auteurs, "Méditations sur l'Evangile," lxxii.). But if the bishops are infallible because confirmed in the faith by Peter's successors, those who hold Peter's place must be themselves infallible. Further, if the see of Rome, which is by divine appointment the head of the Church and the centre of unity, solemnly and persistently made false belief a condition of communion, then one of two things must follow—either the body of the Church would accept the heresy which the Pope propounded and so forfeit its infallibility, or else would maintain the truth, and be left without the head and centre of unity given by Christ. Either consequence is a sheer impossibility on Gallican, no less than on Ultramontane, principles.

It must not be supposed for a moment that the Pope is an absolute monarch. He cannot, as we have already shown, annul the constitution of the Church ordained by Christ. His power of definition is limited by a multitude of previous definitions due to his predecessors, to the councils, to the ordinary exercise of the Church's magisterium through the pastors united to the Holy See. If the Pope obstinately rejected an article of faith which had already been proposed by the Church, and to which the Pope owes allegiance as much as the simplest of the faithful, he might be judged and replaced. "It has always been maintained," says F. Ryder ("Catholic Controversy," p. 30), "that for heresy the Church may judge the Pope, because, as most maintain, by heresy he ceases to be Pope." Bellarmin and Turrecremata maintain that he would cease to be Pope ipso facto; Cajetan and John of St. Thomas require formal deposition. Of course, we maintain that the assent of Christians is due to the Pope's decision in matters of faith and morals discussed in the Church. We refer only to the case of a Pope directly contradicting previous definitions, teaching, e.g., that Christ is not God, that the Blessed Virgin is equal to God, or the like. So that this admission is in no way contrary to our statement of Papal infallibility. In such a case (we may well think that Providence would prevent its occurrence) the faithful would be protected from error and the Church would not be left without a head.

(a) Rome and the Papacy.—As a matter of fact the Pope is and always has been Bishop of Rome, and, according to the common opinion, this connection between Rome and the Papacy exists by Divine law. According to others, however (e.g. Soto, apud Billuart "De Fide," diss. iv. a. 4), the Pope might choose another see, or might govern the Church without holding any special see at all.

(β) Papal Election.—In the first ages the Bishop of Rome was chosen, like other bishops, by the clergy and people, with the assent of the neighbouring bishops, and the person elected was consecrated by the Bishop of Ostia. The Christian emperors decided doubtful elections, while Odoacer and Theodoric the Great claimed the same right as kings of Italy. Felix III. was actually nominated by Theodoric, and other Italian kings received a sum of money for confirming Papal elections. After Justinian recovered Italy, the election of a new Pope was notified to the Exarch of Ravenna and confirmed by the Byzantine emperors. From the eighth century onwards the influence of the Eastern empire over Italy declined, and the Papal elections were disturbed by factions in the city. The canon in which Hadrian I. concedes the right of nomination to Charlemagne is spurious; still, as a rule, the election took place in the presence of commissioners from the Carlovingian emperors. After the deposition and death of Charles the Fat, the Papal elections became once more and for a long time an object of factious contention, till the Roman emperors began once again to exert their influence. The first German Pope, Gregory V., owed his nomination to imperial favour, and four German bishops were raised in succession to the Papal dignity by Henry III. The decree of Nicolas II. in 1059 marks a new era. The cardinal bishops [CARDINAL] were to elect, with the approval of the clergy and people, "saving the honour due to our beloved son Henry, who is now king and will be, as we hope, by God's favour, emperor, according as we have already granted to him and his successors, who have obtained this right personally from the Apostolic See." Gradually the influence of the Roman emperors fell away, and the election rested in the hands of the cardinals alone, no distinction being made between the cardinal-bishops and other members of the Sacred College. Something has been said on the present mode of election and the chief enactments on the subject in the article on CONCLAVES, and to this we refer our readers, adding, however, the following facts from Ferraris (art. Papa). Ecclesiastical and, as is commonly held, divine law, make it impossible for a Pope to nominate his successor. The election is in the hands of the cardinals. In the event of all the cardinals being dead, some think the right of election would pass to the Canons of St. John Lateran, others to the Patriarchs, others to a general council. The cardinals are not bound to choose one of their own body; a layman, and even a married man, may be lawfully elected. In modern times Austria, France, and Spain have been allowed to exclude any single candidate, provided they notify their objection before the election is made. This, of course, is a mere concession, not a right. Portugal and Naples have claimed to exercise the same power, but have never been allowed to do so.

(γ) The Insignia of the Pope are the pedum rectum, or straight crosier; the pallium, which he wears constantly; the tiara, or triple crown. [See TIARA; CROSIER; PALLIUM; KISS.] He is addressed as "Your Holiness," "Beatissime Pater," &c., and he speaks of himself as "Servus servorum Dei." [See the article.]

(δ) The Actual Exercise of Papal Power.—The Pope is Bishop of Rome, Metropolitan of the Roman province, the only real Patriarch in the West (see Hefele on the 6th Nicene Canon, "Concil." I. p. 397 seq.). Even these offices, as held by him, differ in this from the same offices as held by others—viz. that the Pope holds them without having to render an account of his administration to any earthly superior. No line of demarcation can be drawn between the Pope's exercise of Papal and Patriarchal power. The fulness of the latter is included in the former, and, as a matter of fact, the Pope for long did not exercise throughout the whole West the power which the Eastern Patriarchs wielded in confirming the election of bishops, &c. It is still true, however, that the Pope exercises more immediate power over bishops in the West, where there is no other Patriarch, than in the East, with Patriarchates of its own. We need not, however, consider here the Papal government in the East. The number of Greeks and Orientals who acknowledge the Pope's jurisdiction is very small, and enough has been said on the subject in other articles—e.g. in those on the various Eastern rites. We speak only of the Pope's power as exercised in the Latin Church, and we take as our guide Cardinal Soglia ("Institut. Juris publici Eccles." lib. ii. cap. 1).

The Pope, then, is the supreme judge in all controversies of faith, and he may and does exercise this power immediately or through the Sacred Congregations. Thus he may condemn or prohibit books, he may reserve to himself the canonisation of saints, he may alter the rites of the Church in matters which are not essential. Often, on such occasions, the Pope, though exercising his supreme power, does not speak ex cathedra or claim infallibility. To him the supreme direction of discipline belongs. He may enact laws for the whole Church, and dispense from the common Church law. It is his duty to see that the canons are observed, and to this end he may send legates and nuncios to distant provinces and receive appeals from all persons in all parts of the world. He reserves to himself the hearing of the "greater causes" —e.g. grave charges against a bishop. He can inflict censures, such as excommunication, on all Christians, and reserve to himself the power of absolving from certain sins. He alone can erect, suppress, and divide dioceses, translate or deprive bishops, and that without crime on their part if the general good requires it; he alone can confirm the election of bishops or appoint coadjutors with right of succession. Bishops are required at various intervals to visit the limina Apostolorum and give an account of their ministry. Lastly, the Pope alone can approve new religious orders, and exempt them, if he sees fit, from episcopal jurisdiction.

(Ballerini's "De Primatu" and "De Potestate Summ. Pontif." are among the most useful books on the subject. But theologians and canonists without number have treated of it, and it would be vain to attempt an account of the literature in the space at our command.)

PORTEFORIUM (portean, portuary, portius, portuasse, porthoos, portfory) was the common word in England for the Breviary. Originally the name was meant to denote that the book was portable, but the original meaning was forgotten and the word used of copies, however large. The word is as old as Breviarium, and though of constant occurrence in English documents and literature, does not seem to have been known on the Continent. (Maskell, "Mon. Rit." vol. i. p. xcviii. seq.)

PORTIUNCULA. This was one of the three churches, at or near Assisi, which were repaired by St. Francis. "The old little church, . . . like the holy chapel at Loreto, is inclosed in the middle of a spacious church, annexed to a large convent in the hands of Recollects or Reformed Franciscans; it is the head or mother house of this branch of the order."[1] Here, according to the common tradition (of which, however, there is no trace in the five oldest biographies of the saint), Jesus Christ appeared to St. Francis in 1221, and "bade him go to the Pope, who would give a plenary indulgence to all sincere penitents who should devoutly visit that church."[1] Two years later, Honorius III., at the request of St. Francis, granted the indulgence (commonly known in Italy as the "Pardon of Assisi"), confining it to the 2nd of August, and to the Church of the Portiuncula. Gregory XV. (1622) extended it to all the churches of the Observant Franciscans, including the Recollects or Reformed, between first Vespers and sunset on August 2. Innocent XI. (1678), in favour of the same churches, allowed this indulgence to be applied by way of suffrage to the relief of the souls in Purgatory. Finally, the indulgence of the Portiuncula can be gained in all churches in which the third order of St. Francis is canonically established. (Moroni; Wetzer and Welte.)

PORT-ROYAL. [See JANSENISTS.]

POSSESSION, DEMONIACAL. A state in which an evil spirit, by God's permission, inhabits the body of a rational being. The devil is able in this way to torture the body, to deceive the senses by hallucinations, and indirectly, because of the connection between soul and body, to torture the soul, to impair and pervert its faculties. He cannot, however, inhabit the soul, for this is a power which belongs to God alone; much less can he master the free will and force the possessed person to sin. But he may increase to a fearful extent the power of temptation, overpower the body and even produce insanity, in which last case the possessed person may of course commit actions outwardly sinful, for which he is not responsible. In obsession (also called circumcessio) the devil attacks the man in an extraordinary manner from without—by presenting, e.g., phantoms to the senses —but does not inhabit the body or exert an abiding and immanent influence. [See ENERGUMEN; EXORCIST.]

POST-COMMUNION. A prayer or prayers, varying with the day, said after the priest has taken the ablutions. In the Gelasian Sacramentary it was always followed by a prayer over the people, and this is still the case in the Ferial Masses in Lent, when the Post-Communion is still succeeded by the "Humiliate capita vestra Deo" and the "Oratio super populum."

[1] Alban Butler, Oct. 4.

All the Western liturgies conform in this part to the same type. The Ambrosian has a "Post-Communio;" the Gallican a "Collectio post communionem" and a "Consummatio vel ad plebem."

In the Mozarabic rite, however, the prayers after Communion are invariable. (Le Brun; Benedict XIV.; Hammond.)

POSTIL. Originally, a note or commentary on a passage of Scripture, the derivation being, post illa verba textus. Since such commentaries often took a hortatory or homiletic form, the word postilla came to be used for a short sermon. The sense of "commentary" appears in the title of the celebrated fourteenth-century work of Nicholas de Lyra, "Postilla in universa Biblia." [GLOSSA ORDINARIA.] A verb, postillare, "to compose a commentary," also came into use.

POVERTY. [See EVANGELICAL COUNSELS.]

POWER OF KEYS. [See PENANCE; EXCOMMUNICATION; POPE.]

PRAGMATIC SANCTION. By this term the mediæval lawyers understood a solemn edict, adopted and published with every formality by the sovereign of a country, with the advice of his councillors and of the estates of the realm. To the general reader the name is chiefly familiar in connection with the celebrated instrument by which Charles VI., emperor of Germany, endeavoured to secure for his daughter Maria Teresa the peaceable succession to all the dominions of the House of Austria. Among Pragmatic Sanctions which have dealt with ecclesiastical affairs, three are specially noted. The first, which is ascribed to St. Louis (1268), grants many liberties and privileges to the church of France. For an account of the second, passed at Bourges by Charles VII. (1438), see the articles GALLICANISM and CONCORDAT. The third (1446) preceded the concordat between Eugenius IV. and the German nation; on which see CONCORDAT.

PRAYER. [See MENTAL PRAYER; BREVIARY, &c.]

PREACHERS, ORDER OF. [See DOMINICANS.]

PREACHING. Christian preaching began with our Lord Himself, who entrusted the continuation of the work to his Apostles. At first the Christian congregations were instructed not only by "teachers" in the common acceptation of the term, but also by "prophets," to whom the counsels of God were revealed in an extraordinary manner—a gift which might include a knowledge of the future, though this was not necessarily the case. Later, the Fathers speak of preaching as a chief part of the bishop's office. In Africa, till St. Augustine's time, it was not usual for priests to preach ("Vita. Possid." 5), and this was also the case in the time of Socrates ("H. E" v. 22) at Alexandria. On the other hand, Origen preached in Palestine while only a layman or at least not a priest (Euseb. "H. E." vi. 19.). Even in the African church preaching by laymen, at the request of the clergy, became a permitted use (laicus præsentibus clericis nisi ipsis rogantibus docere non audeat, c. 98 of the so-called Concil. Carthag. iv. anno 398). According to a well-known statement of Sozomen ("H. E." vii. 19)[1] sermons had not been preached at all in the Roman Church till the middle of the fifth century, but possibly the truth is that down to St. Leo's pontificate there had been no great preacher or formal sermons in the Greek style at Rome. The preacher sat during his sermon; the people sometimes sat, sometimes stood. Sermons were delivered on Sundays and feasts, and Chrysostom's homilies on Genesis prove that sermons were delivered daily in Lent. In the East sermons were often very long. Chrysostom's discourse lasted sometimes for two hours. In the West they were generally short. Chrysostom, the two Gregories, Basil in the East, Ambrose, Augustine, Leo, Gregory the Great in the West, were the great preachers of the Patristic period.

For a long time they had no successors who came near them in eloquence. The Synod of Mayence in 847 (c. 2) requires each bishop to have a book of Latin homilies, and turn them "in linguam rusticam Romanam aut Theotiscam" for the good of the people. Peter Damian in the eleventh and St. Bernard in the twelfth century, were conspicuous preachers. A new era began with the rise of the mendicant orders. Tauler, Suso, in the fourteenth century, St. Vincent Ferrer (d. 1419) and Savonarola in the fifteenth, Louis of Granada in the sixteenth, were Dominicans; Bernardine of Siena and John Capistran in the fifteenth were Franciscans; John of Avila (d. 1569) a secular. Enormous crowds surrounded the great preachers of the later middle age, and sometimes persons actually died from the emotion which the sermon awoke in them.

Important regulations on preaching were enacted by the Council of Trent (Sess. v. De Reform.; Sess. xxiv. De Reform. cap. iv.). The council teaches that preaching is the "principal office of bishops," and requires bishops, parish priests, and all who have the cure of souls, to preach personally, or in case of lawful impediment by deputy, at least on Sundays and solemn feasts. Further, during the fasts, and particularly during Advent and Lent, the bishop is to provide sermons daily, or at least three times a week. Regulars preaching in their own churches must first be examined and approved by their superiors and must seek the bishop's blessing, nor are they to preach even there against the bishop's will. In other churches they cannot preach without episcopal licence. Bishops are to warn the faithful that they are bound to hear the word of God in their own parish church, if they can do so without inconvenience. The sermons are to be short and simple and of a practical character.

We can only mention a few of the great preachers of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, the golden age of preaching. In France the names of Bossuet, the Jesuit Bourdaloue (1632–1704), Massillon (1633–1742) will occur to all. De la Colombière, S.J. (d. 1682), and Fléchier, chiefly remembered for his funeral orations (d. 1710), are prominent in the second class. In Italy the great preacher was the holy Jesuit Segneri (d. 1694); in Portugal, Vieira, also a Jesuit (d. 1697). In our own century the great preachers have been the Italian Theatine Ventura, and in France the Jesuit Ravignan, the great Dominican Lacordaire, and the late gifted Bishop of Orleans, Dupanloup. Of Irishmen, one of the greatest as a popular preacher was the Dominican Thomas Nicholas Burke. Veith, at Vienna, Cardinal Diepenbrock and Förster, bishops of Breslau, the Jesuit Father Roh and others, have won high reputation. (The latter part chiefly from Kraus. "Kirchengeschichte.")

PREADAMITES. The first author of the Preadamitic system, as Zaccaria calls it, is said to have been Giordano Bruno, a Dominican (who abandoned his order and the Catholic religion), though there are traces of it in Rabbinical writers. It was developed by a French Calvinist, Isaac de la Peyreyre, in a book entitled "Præadamitæ, sive Exercitatio super versibus 12, 13, et 14, cap. v. Epist. ad Rom., quibus inducuntur primi homines ante Adamum conditi," in the year 1655 (not 1652 as Calmet has it). He held that Adam was the progenitor of the Jews only, and that the Flood, which was local merely, did not destroy the nations who had inhabited the earth long before Adam's creation. He appealed, e.g., to the words of Cain, Gen. iv. 14, "Every one who findeth me will kill me," to Cain's building a city, to the impossibility of supposing that the Antipodes were peopled in prehistoric times from Asia, &c., &c. Peyreyre became a Catholic, and retracted his system, which cannot be reconciled with the Catholic doctrine of original sin, at Rome (ad Philotimum Ep.) in 1657. He died with the Fathers of the French Oratory in 1675, aged 82. (Zaccaria, "Prolegom. in Petav. de Op. Sex Dierum.")

PREBEND (Lat. præbenda). The term is probably derived from the daily rations issued to soldiers. A prebend is the share in the revenues of a chapter [CHAPTER, CATHEDRAL] or collegiate church, enjoyable by each canon or prebendary. A capitulary of Charlemagne orders that no canon should hold a benefice along with a prebend; those found doing so were to be deprived of both. When the common life of canons was generally discontinued, in the course of the tenth century, a division was made of the Church revenues into episcopal and capitular, and each canon enjoyed his share of the latter, which was still called his prebend, together with—at least in the case of the senior members of the chapter—a prebendal residence. (Smith and Cheetham; Wetzer and Welte.)

PRECIOUS BLOOD. (1) Relics.—Beyrout, Bruges, Saintes, the imperial monastery of Weingarten, the English monasteries of Ashridge and Hailes, have claimed to possess relics of the precious blood. (Faber, "Precious Blood," p. 294.) St. Thomas says ("S." III. qu. liv. a. 2) that all the particles of blood which Christ shed in his Passion were reassumed by him in his resurrection, "but that blood which is kept in some churches as relics did not flow from Christ's side, but is said to have flowed miraculously from some image of Christ when struck"—i.e. it never was the blood of Christ at all. Observe, the saint makes no exception, and speaks doubtfully of the supposed miracles. Benedict XIV. ("De Fest." § 374) admits the possibility that some particles of Christ's blood may not have been reassumed, and may remain as relics. In this case they are not united to the God-head, and it would be the crime of idolatry to give them divine worship.

(2) Confraternities.—F. Faber mentions a very ancient one at Ravenna; one at Rome erected under Gregory XIII. and confirmed by Sixtus V., afterwards merged in the confraternity of the Gonfalone. Its members were priests and preached missions. An arch-confraternity was set up in the church of San Nicolo in Carcere by Albertini, bishop of Terracina, and Bufalo, canon of San Marco under Pius VII. A confraternity was founded at St. Wilfrid's, in Staffordshire, in 1847, and transferred to the London Oratory in 1850.

(3) Orders.—There was a Cistercian congregation of nuns, entitled Bernardines of the Precious Blood, at Paris in the middle of the seventeenth century. Bufalo, who died in 1837, founded a congregation of Missioners of the Precious Blood, and another congregation of Nuns of the Precious Blood. (See Faber, "Precious Blood," c. vi.)

(4) The Feast was instituted and fixed for the first Sunday of July by Pius IX. after his return from Gaeta. There was already a Mass and office for the Friday after the fourth Sunday in Lent, but only permitted for certain places.

PRECONISE (præco, a public crier.) When the preliminary inquiry at Rome, required by the Council of Trent and several Papal constitutions in the case of those nominated to the higher ecclesiastical dignities, has terminated favourably for the person designated, a report to that effect is made in secret Consistory by the Cardinal Protector of the nation to which the candidate belongs, and after the cardinals present have all given their opinions on his eligibility, the Pope—if the majority be in his favour—pronounces his solemn approbation of the appointment. This approbation is termed the "preconisation," and the Pope is said to "preconise" the archbishop, bishop, or other dignitary, whose cause has been brought before him. The approbation is posted up ad valvas ecclesiæ, and a bull of preconisation is expedited to the candidate. [See BISHOP, § iv.]

PREDESTINATION. St. Augustine's definition—viz. "God's prevision and preparation of benefits by which those who are freed [i.e. from eternal death] are most certainly freed" ("De Dono Persev." cap. 14)—is generally accepted by Scholastic theologians. They are all[1] agreed that God predestinates from all eternity the number of elect, that He bestows the grace needed to obtain eternal life without any respect to merits on their part, either before or after grace is conferred, so that life eternal is his free gift; and, on the other hand, that no adult enters heaven except because he has of his own free will corresponded to the grace of God, and none are lost eternally except by the perversity of their own will, since God sincerely desires all men to come to the knowledge of the truth and be saved. But if we ask why, seeing God gives grace enough to all, and desires the salvation of all, some are saved, others reprobate, theologians give different answers.

(1) According to the Thomists, "God's purpose of efficaciously conducting some rather than others to salvation has no reason on our part, but depends entirely on God's mercy and free will" (Billuart, "De Deo." diss. ix. a. 4). To those who are predestinated God gives grace efficacious in its own nature, and so orders it that they die in this grace; to others He gives grace which is merely sufficient [see the article on GRACE], and to which, as a matter of fact, nobody corresponds, though all have the power of doing so.

(2) A large number of Jesuit theologians, known as Congruists, hold, like the Thomists, an absolute predestination to glory, irrespective of merits foreseen. God gives to the predestinate the same grace as to the reprobate; but to the former in circumstances under which He foresees they will accept it, to the latter in those under which He foresees they will not do so. Such was the opinion of Suarez (after his return to Spain), of Bellarmin, Antoine, and many others. A decree of the Jesuit general Aquaviva made it the recognised teaching of the society, but the decree seems to have been practically inoperative. (See Schneemann, "Controv. de Divinæ Gratiæ Liberique Arbitrii Concord." cap. 16.)

(3) A large number of Jesuits—e.g.

[1] An exception, apparently, should be made of Catharinus, quoted by Petavius, and of Pighius, of whom something is said by Schneemann Both seem to graze Semi-Pelagianism.

Toletus, Maldonatus, Lessius, Vasquez, Valentia, and Suarez, while he taught at Rome (so Schneemann, loc. cit.), admit that predestination to grace, but deny that predestination to glory, is irrespective of merit foreseen. God decrees, they say, to give grace to all and predestinates those who, as He foresees, will correspond to it, the rest being reprobate.

It is to be carefully observed that the Thomists admit, just as much as Lessius, that God desires the salvation of all, and gives all sufficient means of attaining that end. Whether their theory is logical and consistent is another question, and one on which the Church has never pronounced. It is a matter of philosophy and logic rather than of faith. On the other hand, no Catholic may hold with Gottschalk, a German monk of the ninth century, or with Calvin in later times, that God willed the salvation of the predestinate alone, so that the reprobate perished necessarily.

The history of patristic opinion is given with his usual fulness of learning and critical discernment by Petavius ("De Deo," lib. ix. and x.). Augustine most certainly held and constantly asserted predestination not only to grace but to glory without respect to merits foreseen. (See, e.g., a decisive passage, "De Correptione et Gratia," cap. vii.) Nobody, says Petavius, who was himself of the contrary opinion on the theological question, nobody could doubt this unless "blinded by party-spirit" (loc. cit. cap. vi.). But the same great scholar shows how very different the opinion of the Greek and earlier Latin Fathers was; and Augustine, though he rightly exercised a mighty influence on the subsequent Church, has no claim to represent the whole of her tradition.

PREFACE. A prelude or introduction to the Canon of the Mass, consisting in an exhortation to thanksgiving made by the celebrant, in the answers of the minister or choir, and a prayer ending with the Sanctus, in which God is thanked for his benefits. The Greeks have only one Preface, which in the Clementine liturgy is extremely long. The Gallican and Mozarabic rites, on the other hand, are rich in Prefaces, and so originally was the Roman liturgy, which from the sixth till about the end of the eleventh century had a special Preface for nearly every feast. About 1100 the number was reduced in most churches of the Roman rite to ten—viz. the common one, found in nearly all the ancient Sacramentaries, and nine others named in a letter falsely attributed to Pelagius, predecessor of St. Gregory, and cited in the "Micrologus," &c.—viz. the Preface of Christmas, Epiphany,[1] Lent, Easter, Ascension, Pentecost, the Trinity, the Apostles, the Cross. Urban II. is said by Gratian, who lived fifty years later, to have added the Preface of the Blessed Virgin in 1095. The Sarum Use had "proper Prefaces" for the "Conception, Nativity, Annunciation, Visitation, Veneration, and Assumption of the Blessed Virgin." "The York Use added another for the days between Passion Sunday and Easter. The Hereford appointed the same Preface from Palm Sunday to Easter." (Maskell; the rest of the article is from Le Brun and Hammond.)

PRELATE (prælatus). A general name for an ecclesiastical dignitary, whether among the secular or the regular clergy, who has a jurisdiction inherent in his office, and not merely one transmitted to him as the delegate of a superior. The designation is extended in a wider sense to the prelates of the Pope's Court and household, as having a superiority of rank.

Prelature, or prelacy, is the status of a prelate. When the first Scotch Presbyterians raved against "Popery, Prelacy, and Erastianism," prelacy in their mouths was not exactly equivalent to "episcopacy;" they meant that they were in rebellion against canon law and ecclesiastical jurisdiction. It is true that they erected a new jurisdiction, far more burdensome and inquisitorial than the old one; on which see Buckle's "History of Civilisation," vol. ii. chap. v.

PREMONSTRATENSIANS. This celebrated order of regular canons was founded by St. Norbert in 1119, at a place called Prémontré (that is, "foreshewn"), a lonely valley in the forest of Coucy, near Laon. Several other sites had been offered to the saint in vain; but as soon as he saw this valley he said, "Here is the place which the Lord hath chosen." A monastery was built, which remained the mother house of the order till the French Revolution; it is now in ruins. St. Norbert was soon joined by thirteen companions, to whom he gave the rule of St. Austin to observe, with certain constitutions framed by himself. The habit of the Norbertines was white; hence they were commonly called in England the White Canons. Their founder imposed on them perpetual fasting, and an entire abstinence from meat; but, as in other orders, mitigations after a time crept in, followed by a general relaxation, which in its turn led to several remarkable reformations. The Abbot-General at Prémontré exercised a general supervision over the whole order down to 1512, when all the abbeys in England and Wales were subjected to the Abbot of Welbeck. There were at one time, according to Hélyot, a thousand Premonstratensian abbeys, many provostships and priories, and five hundred houses of nuns. In England, at or shortly before the Dissolution, there were thirty-five houses; the names are given below.[1]

[1] So Le Brun, tom. ii.; but the letter, as given in Leofric's Missal, omits the Preface for the Epiphany and substitutes one for the dead (Maskell, Ancient Liturgies of the Church of England, p. 103 seq.).

Lecuy, the last abbot of Prémontré, was a man of exceptional force and nobleness of character Driven from his abbey in 1790, he bore his unbent and undishonoured head through all the mournful or shameful scenes of the Revolution, and living far on into the present century died in his ninety-fourth year in 1834. A few months before his death, the old man compiled a short tract on the history of his order; from these touching and simple pages the reader will thank us for making the following extract:—

"Of this illustrious order, once so widely extended, the débris only are left. Its impoverishment began with the English schism. The Reformation caused it yet further losses by the suppression of a great number of houses in the countries which embraced it. The abbeys in Spain, about 1573, separated themselves from the body of the order in order to form a congregation apart, retaining however the habit and the statutes. Under the Emperor Joseph II., other suppressions took place in the hereditary provinces; still, besides the French abbeys of either observance, which numbered before 1789 about one hundred, there remained in Belgium and different parts of Germany some very fine establishments, distinguished by their regularity and love for ecclesiastical learning. Notably, Swabia, where the abbots were prelates of the empire, had lost nothing; and in spite of so many suppressions the order of Prémontré might still be called flourishing. At the Revolution all the French houses suffered the fate of other ecclesiastical institutions, enveloped in a common proscription. The invasion of Belgium by revolutionary armies extended to that country the measures of destruction taken in France; what the order still possessed in Germany perished along with the great sees and rich endowments of the German church, sacrificed to a system of indemnities, at the time of the formation of the Confederation of the Rhine. Of the splendid heritage of St. Norbert, subject to the crosier of Prémontré, there remained in 1805 ten abbeys, of which two, in Prussian Silesia, had been till then religiously maintained by the kings of Prussia, though Protestants. It was but natural, when the Catholic princes seized the property of religious, that those who were not so should follow their example, and these two abbeys ceased to exist. At present only eight remain, which are indebted for their existence to the piety and good will of the Emperor of Austria. Three of these are in Bohemia; the chief of them—Strahow, in the city of Prague—is the depository of the relics of the holy patriarch, the founder of the order."

We believe that these eight houses still exist, and that several others have arisen in Belgium. In England, two small Premonstratensian houses, cells apparently of some Belgian abbey, have been recently founded at Crowle and Spalding, in Lincolnshire.[1] Still more recently a community of French Premonstratensians has been established at Storrington, on land given by the Duke of PREMUNIRE. The statute of premunire (16 Rich. ii. c. 5), passed in 1393, was designed by the king and parliament of England to check evasions of the existing statutes against provisors—i.e. persons appointed to English benefices or dignities by Papal provision. The Holy See had employed various means, including excommunication or the menace of it, for the protection of persons whom it had "provided" to benefices, and for the punishment of all who might interfere with them. On this account a severe penal clause was inserted in the above-mentioned statute, to the effect that if any man should pursue or obtain in the court of Rome excommunications, bulls, or other things, against the king's crown and regality, or bring them into England, or receive or execute them, "such person or persons, their notaries, procurators, maintainers, abettors, fautors, and counsellors, shall be out of the king's protection, their goods and chattels, lands and tenements, shall be forfeited to the king, and their persons attached wherever they may be found."[1] Execution of process under this statute was by means of a writ called of "Premunire"—from the first words, "Premunire [præmonere] facias"—whence in time the statute itself was so called.

PRESBYTERA. The wife of a presbyter, especially a wife who had come under the operation of the rule which rendered the continence of clerics necessary. The position of such persons is dealt with by the canons of the Council of Tours (567). In these cases the presbytera usually went into a convent, but without taking the habit. (Smith and Cheetham.)

PRESBYTERIANS, SCOTTISH. The doctrine and discipline of Presbyterians, founded upon the teaching of Calvin and his management of ecclesiastical affairs at Geneva, were perhaps embraced as early in England as in Scotland, for Christopher Goodman, an Englishman, was associated with Knox when they were both in exile in Mary's time, and sat in the First General Assembly held at Edinburgh. But since the form of Protestantism which first prevailed in England and supplanted the Catholic Church there was that of the English episcopalian reformers [see ANGLICAN CHURCH], and Presbytery did not rise into importance until much later, we shall here almost confine our remarks to the subversion of Catholicity in Scotland, and the introduction of new ecclesiastical arrangements in its place.

Before the destructive fanatical outbreak which is associated with the name of John Knox, the Catholic Church in Scotland had thirteen sees—of which two, St. Andrew's and Glasgow, were metropolitan—and upwards of 100 monasteries large and small.[1] Of these, nineteen belonged to the Austin Canons; the magnificent establishments of Holyrood, Jedburgh, Scone, and St. Andrew's were among the number. The Franciscans had thirteen houses, the Dominicans eleven, the Cistercians ten; among these last were the abbeys of Melrose and Newbottle. The Benedictines had nine or ten abbeys and cells, including Dunfermline, Arbroath, and Lindores. Among the six Premonstratensian houses was Dryburgh, the ruins of which still charm the traveller by their incomparable grace. The rest were distributed among the other orders. That the Scottish clergy, both secular and regular, stood greatly in need of reformation, is an indisputable fact; but how far corruption had gone is a point which cannot be easily determined. If we attach credit to the rhetoric of Knox and his followers, we must believe that the whole clerical body in Scotland, with scarcely an exception, was stained with avarice and conscious hypocrisy, and sunk in gross immorality, sloth, and gluttony. But the interest which these men had in making such assertions believed would make us suspend our belief in them, even if there were no rebutting evidence. On the whole there seems good reason for accepting on this subject the contemporary testimony of Bishop Lesley.[2] The Bishop of Ross says that some of the bishops had been for a long time past engaged in political and diplomatic business, and that others lived too freely (liberius vivèrent), forgetting their sacred functions, so that the whole hierarchy had become lowered in popular esteem. The pernicious system of holding abbeys in commendam was in full vigour; thus Lord James Murray, a bastard son of James V., was commendatory abbot of St. Andrew's. As to the priests and monks, Lesley declares that most of them, in either order, were persons of piety and virtue; but he adds that there was one vice—licentious living—of which many of them, and another—great negligence in preaching—of which nearly all, were guilty. He mentions it as a deplorable circumstance that the people had not been provided with an elementary catechism, for want of which they often could not tell whether what the sectaries taught them was true or not.

"The Reformation," says a modern historian[1] of the Kirk of Scotland, "was baronial in Scotland, monarchical in England." Almost all the nobles who had been detained as prisoners in England after the battle of Solway Moss (1541) returned home Protestants. The English monasteries had been just dissolved, to the great enrichment of their brother aristocrats south of the Tweed; Lollard preachers were everywhere; and their denunciations of a wealthy and powerful priesthood, electric as was then the condition of the religious atmosphere, fell upon willing ears. A countryman of their own was soon found, who in extravagance and fluency of reviling left the English Lollards far behind. John Knox, born in Haddingtonshire in 1505, studied with some distinction at the universities of St. Andrew's and Glasgow, having attended the lectures of the eminent theologian John Mair, or Major. He probably imbibed Lollard opinions very early; if before his ordination, his voluntarily placing himself under the control of the canon law is a remarkable fact. The death at the stake in 1527 of Patrick Hamilton, who had studied at Wittenberg and brought home Lutheran opinions, seems to have made a deep impression on him. However, he became a priest, and thus was canonically bound to continence, an obligation which he set at nought by marrying, not once only but twice.

Not only was there a strong Lollard party in Scotland between 1530 and 1540, but several Franciscan and Dominican friars took up warmly the cause of ecclesiastical reform, and preached against abuses and superstitions. Of this there is ample evidence in the history which bears the name of Knox. As late as 1545 the bulk of the people were attached to the old faith;[2] Knox speaks of Edinburgh in 1546 as "drowned in superstition"; but in the fifteen years which followed a great change is said to have taken place.

George Wishart, a friend of Knox, was burned for heresy in 1545; and partly in revenge for this, Cardinal Beaton was assassinated at St. Andrew's by members of the reforming party in 1546. Knox hastened to St. Andrew's and made common cause with the assassins. He is supposed to have renounced his priesthood some time before,[1] and to have arrived at the conclusion that ecclesiastical functions could not be lawfully discharged but in obedience to a "call" from some reformed congregation. The men of blood to whom he had joined himself gave him the desired "call," and Knox became a minister. We hear of controversies between him and representatives of the Catholics. The volubility, earnestness, and audacity of the man were amazing; but we see that he "abounds in his own sense"; his incapacity for taking in any but the one narrow view of religion to which he had committed himself is manifest from the account of these disputes which he has himself transmitted; and when we find him resolutely maintaining that no rites or ceremonies are lawful, unless "God in express words hath commanded them,"[2] we are able to take the measure of his spiritual wisdom. Every Presbyterian at this day who countenances Dr. Lee's innovation of organs in the kirk, since organs are nowhere "expressly commanded," falls under the ban of the patriarch of his religion. In a sermon preached about the same time Knox defined the Roman Church to be "the last beast," and the head of it to be "the Man of Sin," the "Antichrist," and the "Whore of Babylon." This violence is easily accounted for. Knox intended to violate the canons and marry;[3] and he knew that if the Catholic Church and the canon law retained their ascendancy in Scotland, he, as a married priest, would not only lose the career to which his ambition urged him forward, but also be in danger of punishment. On the other hand, if he and his friends could overpower the Church and establish their own sect, the highest ecclesiastical rank, along with a commanding position in the State, was at once within his reach.

The French king sent an expedition which compelled the surrender of St.

[3] He did, in fact, marry Margery Bowes two years afterwards.

Andrew's, and Knox, being taken along with the garrison, was condemned to the galleys. For some years French and Catholic influences were in the ascendant; and Knox, after his release, deemed it best to retire to England. In 1549 a reforming council met at Edinburgh under Archbishop Hamilton, attended by six bishops and fourteen abbots, and enacted sixty-eight disciplinary canons. Two years later the Parliament passed an Act imposing severe penalties on any who should "contemptuously make perturbation in the kirk in the time of divine service." When Mary came to the throne (1553), Knox found his way to Geneva, and came under the influence of the powerful mind of Calvin. To this intercourse he chiefly owed the specific Presbyterian beliefs—viz. that some are predestinated to eternal life, and some—the greater number—to eternal damnation; that bishop and presbyter are two different names for the same office; and that, in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, although the faithful really and truly partake of the body and blood of Christ, yet that body and that blood are in heaven and not on earth, and the elements undergo no change. Superior as it is to the shallow commonplaces of Zuinglius, this doctrine can hardly be said to be less mysterious, though much less logical, than that of transubstantiation, which the Calvinists rejected with so much heat.

Between 1554 and 1560 Mary of Guise, the queen regent, mother of Mary Queen of Scots, administered the government in her daughter's name. During all this time a fierce struggle was going on between the men of the old and the new opinions. The Protestant noblemen, headed by the Earls of Argyle, Glencairn, and Morton, met together in 1557, and drew up the "First Covenant." They pledged themselves thereby to establish the "Word of God and his congregation," and to support these with all their strength against the "congregation of Satan," by which they meant the bishops and Catholic clergy. They were hence called the "Lords of the Congregation." The bishops did what they could to strengthen the hands of the regent, who, however, from political motives, desired to keep in with both parties. Walter Milne, an old man who had once been a priest, but gone over to the Reformers, was burnt at St. Andrew's in 1558.[1] But the bishops were not really strong; the tide was setting the other way; and Knox felt emboldened to return to Scotland. While the tension of feeling on each side was at its height, he went to Perth, the fair city on the Tay, then embellished with several religious houses of great beauty. He preached a sermon against "idolatry," after which there was a riot; images, altars, and pictures were destroyed and defaced; the Carthusian abbey was plundered and greatly damaged, and the monks ill-used; the Dominican and Franciscan friaries were destroyed. The ruin of Scone Abbey followed. Knox then went into Fife, and continued this line of preaching; more destruction of art monuments was the result. Defying the inhibition of the archbishop, he preached at St. Andrew's (1559), and immediately afterwards the magistrates and the mob "proceeded to destroy the Dominican and Franciscan monasteries, and to rifle and deface all the churches in the town."[1] The cathedral, which was at the same time the church of the Austin Canons, a building of rare beauty, was dismantled about the same time. There was now a state of actual war, and the Lords of the Congregation marched upon Edinburgh, "flushed with these victories over the monuments of idolatry and architecture" (sic).[2] Here is the true Puritan ring; it is not only against what he calls superstition, but against the "sublime and beautiful" that the Puritan revolts. Art withers under his tread, like grass beneath the hoofs of the Calmuck cavalry.

The struggle was marked by several sudden changes of fortune; the Scotch Protestants showed little courage, and their English allies little skill. The French troops who had come to support the regent and garrisoned Leith, were well handled and gained some remarkable successes; but they were foreigners, and this told heavily against them. In April 1560 the regent died; her death led to a negotiation, and indirectly to the triumph of Protestantism. The young queen, whose husband, Francis, had just succeeded his father Henry II., was absent in France; the Catholics were left without any natural leaders. By the treaty of Edinburgh (July 1560) made between the French envoys of Francis and Mary and English plenipotentiaries (Cecil and Sadler), acting on behalf of the Scotch nobility and people, it was agreed, inter alia, that the forces on both sides should be disbanded, and the French troops return home; that a parliament or convention of the three estates should meet on August 1, and that any complaints of wrongs done to them, made by bishops, abbots, or other churchmen, should be considered by the Parliament and redressed, "as they should find according to reason."[1]

The event soon showed that Cecil had over-reached the French envoys in the negotiation. The wrongs of which the churchmen had to complain were serious enough—e.g. while the hostilities lasted, the Bishops of Dunkeld, Dunblane, and Ross had been driven by the sectaries from their houses and dispossessed of all their property; the monasteries of Dunfermline, Melrose, and Kelso had been plundered, and the lands and moveables of churchmen seized upon in every part of the country.[2] It was the evident intent of the treaty that wrongs such as these should be redressed. But when the Parliament met, being composed, as to the great majority, of enthusiastic or deeply interested sectaries, it proceeded to pass bills for the subversion of the Catholic religion; after which, it is needless to say that they did not find it "according to reason" to give the bishops any compensation whatever.

Before these bills were adopted, a confession of faith in twenty-five articles, drawn up by Knox and his party, was read in Parliament, faintly opposed by the Catholic members, who seem to have been helpless and stupefied, and accepted by the Assembly. To a large extent the doctrine of these articles is sound; they err rather by exclusion than by inclusion. One capital error regards the Church Catholic, which (art. xvi.) is said to consist only of the elect. On the Eucharist, the Calvinistic doctrine described above is asserted (art. xxi.)

On August 24, 1560, the Parliament passed a bill, by which it was ordered that none should "say Mass, nor yet heere Mass, nor be present thereat, under the paine of confiscation of all their goods, and punishing of their bodies at the discretion of the magistrates." A second bill, dated the same day, declared that the Bishop of Rome had thenceforward no authority in Scotland, and decreed punishments against any who should recognise such authority. Such was the Scottish "St. Bartholomew's Day."

In Knox's "History" these bills are described as "Acts"; but they were not really so, for they required the royal assent or ratification; this Sir James Sandilands was sent into France to demand, but Mary steadily refused. They were first ratified by the Regent Murray in 1567. This single fact throws a sinister light on the conduct of the Protestant party towards the unhappy queen, before her flight to England and during her imprisonment there. But the new religion, in Knox's view, "from God hath full power, and needed not the suffrage of man;"[1] whether legal or not, it was forced upon the people of Scotland with all the power of the secular arm. When Mary (1561) returned to her kingdom, and required the liberty of her religion in her private chapel at Holyrood, Knox said, doubtless with perfect sincerity, that "one Masse was more fearfull to him than if ten thowsand armed enemies were landed in anie part of the realme."[2] This sentiment, according to the experiences of many of the saints, is precisely that of the devil on the same subject. The Lords controlled him on this point, nor did they pay much regard to his "Book of Discipline," calling many things in it, particularly the proposal to devote the Church property to the sustentation of the ministers of the kirk, "devout imaginations." What is called the "First General Assembly" was held in December 1560; it was attended by six ministers, among whom were Knox and Goodman, and thirty-six lay delegates.

Some doubt appears to exist on the question how many of the bishops joined the movement. Bishop Lesley distinctly states,[3] that in 1561 only one had done so, the Bishop of Galloway; according to Dr. Cunningham,[4] the Bishops of Caithness and Orkney also became Protestants.

All this time there was a party among the nobles favourable to the retention of episcopacy and the use of the English prayer-book; and in process of time, when James VI. grew to manhood, he became persuaded that bishops were a necessary support to the regal power, and maintained a small Protestant hierarchy side by side with the ministers and the General Assembly. Knox himself, who had declared against bishops many years before,[1] submitted shortly before his death (1572) to the introduction of episcopacy, "in order to secure the episcopal revenues."[2] The form of Presbyterian polity as now seen in Scotland was chiefly the work of a man of high ability and sincere conviction, Andrew Melville. He was the master spirit of the General Assembly of 1580 which absolutely condemned episcopacy, and the chief framer of the "Second Book of Discipline," in which the system of church courts and assemblies, one above another, and each strengthened by a lay representation—kirk session, presbytery, synod, general assembly—is minutely and skilfully laid down. In this able document the proper functions of the kirk and the state are distinguished with great judgment; and the separation of the two powers, and the exaltation of the kirk to the highest place, are asserted in language which strikingly recalls the definitions of the bull "Unam Sanctam." The Assembly of 1581 also adopted the famous "Negative Confession," chiefly directed against "all kinds of papistrie"; it is extremely curious, but our space does not permit of our giving an abstract of it. Every one of the Presbyterian kirks, large and small, among which the mass of the Scottish people is now distributed, regards this assembly with the highest veneration.

Negation, however, is a poor basis for a theology; and one need feel no surprise that the clerical intellect of Scotland, during the three centuries that have followed, has been stricken with sterility. The ministers have certainly written many books, but their theological discussions interest few outside their own country. Not one of the ecclesiastical sciences has been in any way advanced by Scotch Presbyterianism. The lay Scottish intellect, thanks to the natural endowments of the race, and a good system of primary education, has achieved great things; it has perfected the steam-engine and the steam-boat, developed political economy, composed the Waverley Novels, and borne more than its full share in the great governing and colonising enterprises of the English people. But who can prove that all this might not have been done, Scotland remaining Catholic? The clerical intellect pays the penalty of having submitted itself to such a patriarch as John Knox, with whom passion habitually took the place of reason, and frantic reviling was substituted for patient and equitable investigation.

(Knox, "Hist. of the Reformation," 1644; Calderwood, "Hist. of the Kirk of Scotland," 1843; John Lesley, "De Origine, Moribus, et Rebus Gestis Scotorum," 1578; Cunningham, "Church History of Scotland," 2nd ed., 1882; Dean Stanley, "Lect. on the Church of Scotland," 1879; Burton, "Hist. of Scotland," vol. v., 1870.)

PRESBYTERY (πρεσβυτέριον, assembly of the elders; senatus has the same meaning). The word is used twice in the N.T. for the Jewish Sanhedrim.[1] In the Christian Church it signified, perhaps from the first, the assembly of the entire clergy of the diocese, both presbyters (identified with bishops in 1 Peter v. 1) and deacons; it was such a body at Ephesus, the "celebrated presbytery"[2] of that Church, which consecrated Timothy to the episcopal office with the imposition of hands.[3] St. Cyprian convened a diocesan council of this kind continually, and did nothing important without its advice. That the Roman presbyterium in the fifth century meant such a synod—i.e. that it included the deacons and the clergy generally, as well as the presbyters, is plain from a letter of Pope Siricius (385) on the condemnation of Jovinian. It therefore seems reasonable to assign this same sense to the word when used by Pope Cornelius (251), who, writing to Cyprian, says "placuit contrahi presbyterium," to hear the recantation of Maximus. Finally, when St. Ignatius, about the beginning of the second century, exhorts the Ephesians to be "subject to the bishop and the presbytery" (Ad. Eph. c. 2), the word may well be understood to have the same meaning. (Ferraris, Presbyterium.)

2. "Presbytery" is often used among English Catholics to designate the priest's house. In this sense it is a translation of the French presbytère, so used (Littré) since the twelfth century; presbyterium (see Ducange) appears never to have had this meaning.

PRESCRIPTION. The acquisition of an object or a right on the strength of a long undisturbed possession. It is of three kinds—ordinary, extraordinary, and immemorial. By ordinary prescription jurists understand one which rests on a possession of three, or of ten, or of twenty years—three years in the case of moveable property; ten years in the case of a right, or of immovable property, inter præsentes; twenty years, in the same case, inter absentes. A just title must also be proved—i.e. the prescriptor must show that he obtained the property by purchase or gift, or some other mode in itself sufficient to constitute a title in the absence of an adverse claim. He must, moreover, have held the property during the time necessary to constitute prescription in good faith. One of whom it can be shown that he knew that he was detaining the property of another cannot plead prescription. The canon law is more strict on this head than the Roman, which only required that the prescriptor should have acted in good faith at the commencement of his enjoyment of the object. Extraordinary prescription, proof of which is required in many cases by the canon law, especially in regard to ecclesiastical or state property, is of thirty or forty years. Immemorial prescription is merely the presumption of a legitimate ownership, founded on the attestation of the fact of continuous and undisturbed enjoyment, made by old or elderly persons, during a period reaching back to the limits both of their own memory and that of aged persons with whom they had conversed in early life. (Wetzer and Welte, art. by Permaneder.)

PRESENTATION OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN. The story of Mary's presentation in the temple when three years old and her sojourn there till her marriage first appears in Apocryphal Gospels—viz. the Protevangelium and that of the Birth of Mary. The belief was adopted by later Fathers—e.g. St John of Damascus. Benedict XIV. ("De Fest." P. ii. § 178) considers the fact of the presentation certain, but the details of the story "altogether uncertain." The feast (εἰσόδια τῆς θεοτόκου) was kept by the Greeks as early at least as the time of the Emperor Emmanuel, who ascended the throne in 1143, and partially by the Latins on November 21 since 1374. Paul II. confirmed the feast, which was still not kept in all parts of the West, by "Apostolic authority." Pius V., on the contrary, abolished its celebration in the Roman Church itself, though this was permitted in other parts of the Latin world. Sixtus V. restored the feast in 1585 at the prayer of the Jesuit Turrianus. The present office was corrected under Clement VIII., who made the feast a greater double. (Benedict XIV. "De Fest.;" Gavant. "Thesaur." de Fest. mensis Novemb.)

PRESENTATION OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN MARY, ORDER OF THE. This order was founded by Miss Nano Nagle in 1777. In 1874 it possessed seventy-three houses, with 1,140 nuns and more than 20,000 pupils. Of these houses fifty-three were in Ireland, twelve in British America, chiefly in Newfoundland, one in India, four in different Australian colonies, and three in the United States. Nano Nagle belonged to a good Catholic family in the county Cork, and was born in 1728. From the time of her complete conversion to God, her intense devotion to spiritual and moral aims never faltered; unsparing of herself, she knew no personal satisfaction but that of giving her wealth and her time to the service of her sorely-tried countrymen. She established an Ursuline convent at Cork in 1771. But her object being the instruction of the poor, whereas the Ursuline order has for its main business the instruction of the rich, she was not yet satisfied. She built another convent near the first, and entered it, with three companions, towards the end of 1777. They were not enclosed, but were engaged in visiting and teaching the poor, and followed a rule drawn up for them by the curé of St. Sulpice. They took simple vows, renewed from year to year. Worn out by labour and austerities, Nano died in 1784. Her institute was confirmed by Pius VI. in 1791, with simple vows and no enclosure. But in 1805, at the request of Bishop Moylan, Pius VII. raised it to the rank of a religious order, with solemn vows and strict enclosure. A fourth vow was added, by which the nuns bind themselves to instruct young girls, especially the poor, in the precepts and rudiments of the Catholic faith. (See the "Life of Nano Nagle," by Dr. Hutch; Dub., 1875.)

PRIESTS, CHRISTIAN. The priesthood is the second in rank among the holy orders. It is the office of a priest, according to the Pontifical, "to offer, bless, rule, preach, and baptise." First, he is empowered to offer that sacrifice of the Mass which is the centre of all the Church's worship, because in it Christ, the great high-priest, continually offers Himself in a bloodless manner, and applies that one sacrifice consummated for our redemption on the cross. Next, the priest, standing between God and his fellow-men, blesses the people in God's name. It is his duty, if a flock is entrusted to him, to rule and to instruct it, and to administer the sacraments of baptism, penance, holy communion, and extreme unction, besides solemnising marriages, &c. His duties are much wider than those of the Jewish priests. The latter were to teach the statutes of the Lord in Israel (Lev. x. 11; Deut. xxiii. 10; Ezek. xliv. 23, 24), and their lips were to keep knowledge (Mal. ii. 7); but these moral duties were only hinted at and were not the subject of special regulation. On the contrary, though the offering of sacrifice is the chief, it is by no means the only duty of the Christian priest. He succeeds the Jewish "elder" as well as the Jewish priest. Hence he is called ἱερεὺς and sacerdos—i.e. "sacrificing priest," but also presbyter—i.e. "elder." Our Saxon ancestors had both words, "priost" and "sacerd." We have retained only the former, but always use it in the sense of the latter.

The word "presbyter" was familiar to every Jew. The "elders" (זְקֵנִים· πρεσβύτεροι) were the chief men in the old civil communities of Palestine, and the word exactly answers in meaning to the Arabic "sheikh." In later times the number and authority of these "elders" was definitely fixed, and even among the Jews of the dispersion there was a council (יְשִׁיבָה = consessus) which met in the synagogue and administered the discipline of the Jewish community.[1] No record remains of the institution of such a body among Christians; but in Acts xi. 30, when the persecution in which St. James was slain drove the Apostles from Jerusalem, we find the Church there provided with a senate of "presbyters." It was apparently at a later date that such "presbyters" appeared among communities of Gentile Christians, for they are not once mentioned by St. Paul, except in the pastoral epistles. They were "rulers" of the Church, and, though they might teach, if qualified to do so, this was no necessary part of their office (1 Tim. v. 17).[1] This ruling office, as we have seen already, is still prominent in the Pontifical, which compares presbyters to the "seventy elders" who assisted Moses. In ancient times they formed the council of the bishop, who for many centuries could take no important step without consulting them. (See, e.g., 2 Concil. Hispal. c. 7, anno 619.) The presbyters of the diocese are now represented by the chapter, which the bishop is obliged to consult in enacting statutes, &c. In one place the New Testament attributes the administration of a sacrament—viz. extreme unction, to presbyters (James v. 14).

The words "priest," "priesthoood" (ἱερεὺς, ἱεράτευμα) are never applied in the New Testament to the office of the Christian ministry. All Christians are said to be priests (1 Pet. ii. 5, 9; Apoc. v. 10). This recognition of the universal priesthood of Christians, however, involves no denial of the existence of a special priesthood, for the Israelites too were called a "kingdom of priests," though they had, of course, a special priesthood with prerogatives jealously guarded. Further, the Old Testament prophesies that priests would be taken from the Gentiles, and that the office of the priesthood was to last for ever (Is. lxvi. 21; Jer. xxxiii. 17, 18); and St Paul, so far, at least, brings the Christian ministry into connection with the Jewish priesthood that he justifies the claim of the former to support by a reference to the way in which the latter "lived by the altar" (1 Cor. ix. 13). Döllinger ("First Age of the Church," E.T. p. 222) also urges the liturgical character of St. Paul's language (Rom. xv. 16), where he describes himself as a "minister" (λειτουργὸν, cf. Heb. viii. 2) and as an evangelical priest (ἱερουργοῦντα τὸ εὐαγγέλιον). The argument does not seem to be of much account, and Estius is probably right in considering the language merely metaphorical. The Apostle was a minister appointed by Christ, "administering the gospel" like a priest, that the Gentiles might offer up themselves an oblation well pleasing to God, sanctified in the spirit.

The Apostolic Fathers also abstain from any mention of a Christian priest-

[1] Vitringa (De Synagog. Vet. lib. ii. cap. 4 seq.) is at great pains to show that in the early synagogues these "elders" directed worship as well as discipline. We cannot see that he proves his point.

[1] So Cyprian, Ep. 29, distinguishes the "presbyteri doctores" as a special class. The word "pastors" (ποιμένες, Ephes. iv. 11), which expresses the ruling office, is derived, like "presbyter" itself, from the language of the Synagogue, פרנסים). (See Vitringa, ii. 10.)

hood; at least the single reference in St. Ignat. (Phil. 9, καλοὶ οἱ ἱερεῖς) is very doubtful. Justin, in the middle of the second century (Dial. 116, 117) simply alludes to the general priesthood o Christians. In a curious letter to Victor of Rome (190–200) Polycrates says of St. John the Evangelist that "he was a priest, having worn the mitre" (ἐγενήθη ἱερεὺς τὸ πέταλον πεφορηκὼς, apud Euseb. "H.E." v. 24). The language can scarcely be anything but metaphorical (so Routh, "Rell. Sacr." tom. ii. p. 28). At the end of the second, or beginning of the third century the term "priest" was in common use. We find it in Tertullian ("Praescr." 41, "sacerdotalia munera"), in the Philosophumena (Proem. μετέχοντες ἀρχιερατείας), Origen (Hom. v. in Lev. iv.). In Cyprian the word (sacerdos) constantly occurs—usually for bishops, but sometimes also for presbyters ("De Zelo et Livore," 6).

We may distinguish three stages in the position of the priesthood.

(1) In the earliest times they ruled in concert with and in immediate subordination to the bishop. The bishop and priests said Mass conjointly, and the priests administered the sacraments independently only in the bishop's absence.

(2) The presbyters became more independent owing to the spread of Christianity and the gradual establishment of parish as distinct from episcopal churches. Innocent's letter to Decentius exhibits the change in actual progress. In towns, he says, the Eucharist is to be consecrated by the bishop only and sent to the parish-priests; in outlying churches the priests are to consecrate for themselves. Thus, separate replaced conjoint rule and administration of the sacraments.

(3) Gradually the rule became a separable accident of the priesthood. At first a priest, by the very fact of ordination, was attached to a particular church, and only in rare and exceptional instances a man of extraordinary merit was induced to submit to ordination on condition that he should not be bound to a particular church. In this way St. Jerome was ordained by Paulinus of Antioch. But from the eleventh century the custom began of ordaining priests who had no benefice, provided they had the means of honourable support (Juenin, "De Sacr." diss. viii. cap. 3). Further, the ordination of religious without cure of souls became the rule instead of the exception. And it is the capacity for rule, rather than the actual exercise of it, which we now associate with the priestly office.

PRIMATE (primas). In early times bishops were called primates who held any commanding position in the Church. Thus the Roman Pontiff was sometimes called the primate of the whole Church; and the Council of Chalcedon declared that the primacy, or first place before all (πρὸ πάντων τὰ πρωτεῖα), was to be accorded to "the Archbishop of Old Rome." (Sess. xvi.; cf. Hefele, "Hist. of Councils," E. T. iii. 427.) In Africa the metropolitans were called primates, or bishops of the first sees. Carthage, in the province of Africa strictly so called, was always the first see, though its bishop might be junior to others; in the other provinces the dignity of first see passed from city to city, as it depended on the priority of the date of consecration of the respective bishops.

In modern times those bishops only are properly called primates to whose see the dignity of vicar of the Holy See was formerly annexed. Such sees are—Armagh in Ireland, Arles and Lyons in France, Mentz in Germany, Toledo in Spain, Gran in Hungary, Pisa and Salerno in Italy, and some others. None of these retain any primatial jurisdiction except Gran, the archbishop of which has still the right of receiving appeals from all the other archbishops in Hungary. Changed circumstances– especially the great facility with which the most distant countries can now communicate with Rome—have made the jurisdiction of primates almost a thing of the past. [ARCHBISHOP; EXARCH; METROPOLITAN.] (Soglia, "Instit. Canon." lib. ii. § 48.)

PRIMICERIUS (primus, cera). The leading person, or foreman, on a list of the employés in a particular business or function; thus we read of the p. notariorum, the p. palatii, &c. "First on the waxed tablet" is the literal meaning of the word. In its modern use the term is only applied to the præcentor of a cathedral or collegiate choir, who is responsible for the due instruction of every member of the choir in ecclesiastical chant and other things proper to his function. But the word is now seldom heard; the "primicier" of St. Denis is among the few instances where it is still retained.

PRIOR, PRIORESS. It is doubtful whether the word "prior" was used in either of the senses which it has borne for many centuries past—that is, as signifying either the ruler of an indep[illegible]dent monastery, or the coadjutor and second-in-command of an abbot, before the pontificate of Celestine V. in the thirteenth century. The older term was præpositus, provost; thus Beda speaks of St. Cuthbert having been præpositus under the Abbot Eata, first at Melrose and afterwards at Lindisfarne.[1] Whenever the term "prior" occurs in relation to monks before the thirteenth century, it is said to be used in a loose sense, as signifying merely one who on account of greater age or other ground of superiority ranked above his fellows. The duties of a prior, or præpositus, are thus described by Isidore: "To the præpositus belongs the charge of the monks, the carrying on of lawsuits, the management of the estates, the cropping of the fields, the planting and cultivation of vineyards, acquaintance with the law, the erection of buildings, the work of the carpenters and the smiths."[2] The prior claustralis, being next to the abbot in the monastery, and appointed by him, generally for life, had the inspection and control of the decani, or deans [DECANUS], and was expected to maintain discipline firmly among the monks, for which purpose he might use the lesser excommunication. The prior conventualis was the master in his own house; under him there was generally a sub-prior. Yet there were several distinct positions, all of which might be described as priorates. For (1) in a place with a special history—e.g. Durham, where the mighty memory of the abbot-bishop St. Cuthbert coloured and modified all that was done for nine centuries—the bishop of the see might hold a quasi-abbatial position in the monastery out of which the see first arose; in which case the head of the monastery could only be a prior. But the Prior of Durham, modest as the name might sound, was a greater personage than most abbots. Secondly, a cell, or obedience, the offshoot of some larger monastery, was always governed by a prior. A conventual prior in this sense was often a person of little dignity or consequence, both from having a very small community to govern, and because the property with which the cell was endowed was small. Thirdly, the superiors of the houses of regular canons (Augustinians, Arroasians, and—originally—Premonstratensians) were always called priors, never abbots. St. Dominic, who adopted the rule of St. Austin for his friars, probably on this account put their houses under priors.

A prioress under an abbess held nearly the same position as a claustral prior, and prioresses governing their own houses were like conventual priors. (Thomassin; Smith and Cheetham.)

PRISCILLIANISTS. The followers of Priscillian, bishop of Avila in Spain (the birthplace of St. Theresa), in the fourth century. An Egyptian named Mark brought the Manichæan doctrines into Spain, and seduced by them the Bishops Instantius and Salvianus, besides other important or wealthy persons, of whom Priscillian was one. The sect was condemned by a synod held at Saragossa in 380; but even after this Instantius and Salvianus ventured to raise Priscillian to the see of Avila. The Emperor Gratian vacillated; but when the usurper Maximus came into power, he listened to the complaints of Idacius and Ithacius, the representatives of the majority of the Spanish bishops, and caused Priscillian and several of his adherents (384) to be tried before his own tribunal at Treves. St. Martin, who happened to be at Treves at the time, vainly endeavoured to dissuade Maximus from bringing a question of heresy before a secular court. Priscillian, the widow Euchrocia, and several others, were condemned and put to death. St. Martin was so grieved and shocked by this, that for a long time he refused to communicate with Ithacius, and would not go near the Court. The heresy lingered on in Spain during the fifth century, and was not entirely extinct at the date of the Council of Braga, 563.

PRIVATE MASSES. [See MASS.]

PRIVATION. [See SUSPENSION.]

PRIVILEGE. "A private enactment, granting some special benefit or favour, against or outside the law."[1] It differs from a dispensation in that this last usually refers to a single act, such as a marriage, or the reception of orders, whereas a privilege presupposes and legalises many acts done in pursuance of it. It differs from a grace or benefaction, because the latter is confined to the good which it operates once for all, whereas a privilege confers on its possessor immunity in regard to every act of the kind privileged, as much as if he had obtained the sanction of the law. A privilege may be granted by word of mouth as well as by deed. Privileges are either against the law (as when the duty of paying tithes, or that of submitting to the jurisdiction of the ordinary, is remitted to certain persons or communities), or it is beyond or outside the law—namely, when it authorises acts which the law does not forbid, but which are only allowable to particular persons, such as the power of absolving in reserved cases, or of dispensing, and the like. Again, privileges are divided into real, personal, and mixed; the first being primarily annexed to some thing (a place, or a building, or a dignity), and indirectly extended to the persons by whom the thing is owned or enjoyed; the second being primarily granted to some person, regarded as an individual; the third being granted to classes of persons—e.g. the privileges of clerics, or students, or soldiers. Many other distinctions are noted by the canonists. It is obvious that only that authority can establish a privilege which is competent to frame and enforce a law. Concession made by such an authority is the usual source of a privilege; it may, however, also be acquired by prescription. A third way is that of communication, of which the mendicant orders furnish a brilliant example, since every such order enjoys by communication, not only every privilege ever granted to any other mendicant institute, but also those granted to any of the non-mendicant orders.

The chief privileges appertaining to clerical or monastic persons have been incidentally stated in the articles BISHOP, ABBOT, DEACON, PRIEST, MONK, NUN, &c.; but there are two important privileges belonging to the entire clerical body, which may here be noticed. These are the privileges of the tribunal and the canon (privilegia fori et canonis). The first is the exemption of the clergy from the secular tribunals in criminal and civil causes: an exemption of the highest value in barbarous times, but less desirable in those more civilised, and now in point of fact hardly anywhere enjoyed. The privilege of the canon consists in the excommunication (under the fifteenth canon of the Second Lateran Council), with reservation of absolution to the Pope, of any one who has "laid violent hands on cleric or monk." (Ferraris, Privilegium; Soglia, ii. § iii.)

PRIVILEGED ALTAR. (1) An altar, such as the seven privileged altars in St. Peter's, by visiting which certain indulgences may be gained.

(2) An altar at which Votive Masses may be said even on certain feasts which are doubles. There are often altars of this kind at places of pilgrimage.

(3) Altars with a plenary indulgence for one soul in purgatory attached to all Masses said at them for the dead. The privilege continues, even if a new altar be erected, provided it be in the same place and under the same title. All altars are privileged on All Souls' Day. Sometimes the privilege is personal—i.e. a priest may have the privilege of gaining the plenary indulgence always, or on certain occasions, when he offers Mass for the dead, without respect to the altar at which he says it. The local privilege is only granted to fixed altars, the personal may be used even at portable altars. The Mass must be a Requiem Mass, if the rubrics permit it to be said on that day. This privilege is not withdrawn in the general suspension of indulgences during a jubilee. (Probst, art. Altar, in the new edition of the "Kirchenlexikon.")

PROBABILISM. [See MORAL THEOLOGY.]

PROCESSIONS. The word in its wider sense is used of the solemn entrance of the clergy to the altar for Mass, Vespers, &c., or of their return after service to the sacristy. The oldest Ordo Romanus, about the year 720, contains elaborate directions for a procession of this kind. At processions in a more restricted sense persons march together in public, that they may express their gratitude to God, beseech his mercy, or do honour to the living or the dead. Processions with the first of these objects are called processions simply, those with the second are also known as "Litaniæ," "Rogationes," "Stationes," "Supplicationes," "Exomologeses." Processions at the visitation, &c., of a bishop and at funerals are instances of the third class. Processions are also classified, according as they are made with or without the Blessed Sacrament, relics, statues of the Blessed Virgin or the saints. Lastly, there are extraordinary processions ordered by ecclesiastical authority for some special cause, and ordinary ones prescribed by the common ritual law of the Church. To the latter class the processions on Candlemas, Palm Sunday, St. Mark's Day, three Rogation Days, Corpus Christi, and at funerals belong. Each procession has a head, who walks last, those being nearest him who are highest in dignity and the juniors walking in front. The chief person, if a priest, wears biretta, stole, surplice, and sometimes also cope; if he bears the Blessed Sacrament, always a cope and humeral veil. A bishop wears his mitre and pastoral staff; but in procession with the Blessed Sacrament and with a particle of the True Cross (S.C.R. Sept. 2, 1690), the head must not be covered, and then the bishop's staff is carried behind, his mitre before him. The baldacchino always carried over the Blessed Sacrament may also be used, where it is the custom, with particles of the True Cross and other instruments of the Passion (S.C.R. 27 Maii, 1823). It is also used to honour the bishop—e.g. at his solemn entrance into a church. The colour of the vestments and the prayers said vary with the occasion of the procession. An out-door procession always starts from and ends by returning to the church, but sometimes several churches are visited in the course of the procession. The bishop may compel the attendance even of religious at processions under pain of censure, unless their rule obliges them to entire seclusion (S.C.R. 18 Martii, 1679).

Processions, at least in the case of funerals, were known in the Church during the time of heathen persecution. (See, e.g., "Acta Martyr. S. Cypriani"). The litanies or penitential processions are thought by some to be mentioned by Basil (Ep. 207, "Ad Neoc."; but see the Benedictine note). Festal processions are spoken of as an ancient custom by Ambrose (Ep. 40, § 16, ad Theodos.). The procession on St. Mark's Day was old and established in the time of St. Gregory the Great, and was perhaps a survival in a purified form of the procession on the same day in honour of the goddess Robigo (Ovid, "Fasti," iv. 906); processions with relics were common in the fourth century. (See, e.g., August. "Conf." ix. 7: Socrates, "H. E." iii. 18.) Gregory of Tours ("Hist. Franc." v. 4) mentions the custom of carrying banners in processions. Processions are in fact a natural means common to all religions of publicly expressing the feelings of the heart, and are taken by an obvious symbolism as a figure of the Christian journey through this life to the next. (For further information see FUNERALS; CORPUS CHRISTI; ROGATIONS, &c.).

PROCESSION OF THE HOLY GHOST FROM THE FATHER AND THE SON. The addition made to the Nicene Creed at Constantinople in 381 mentions only the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father, and this for a plain reason. The definitions of the Council were directed against the Macedonians, who denied the divinity of the Holy Ghost and supposed that he was created, like all else which is not God, through the Son. The Council, on the contrary, denied that the Third Person was to be placed in the category of creatures at all. It affirmed his procession from the Father, and so in effect denied that he was created through the Son or owed his existence to Him, in the same sense that creatures do. Whether the Spirit did or did not eternally proceed from the Son, was a question which did not come before the assembly. For a long time after, there was no controversy on this point. Theodore of Mopsuestia (Mansi, "Concil." iv. 1348) says of the Holy Ghost: "Neither do we regard him as the Son or as having received existence through the Son." And so Theodoret, criticising the ninth anathema of St. Cyril, declares he will admit the Spirit's procession from the Father, but by no means "that he has existence" (τὴν ὕπαρξιν ἔχον) from the Son or through the Son.[1] Great authorities—Bellarmin, Petavius, and Garnier—have seen in Theodoret's criticism the first rise of the famous controversy on the double procession. This view is very far from certain. In all probability Theodoret simply meant to separate the existence of the Spirit from that of creatures. (So Kuhn, "Trinitätslehre," p. 484 seq.)

However, the theology of the Church was forced to consider the eternal relations of the Second and Third Persons. If both alike proceeded from the Father, then how was the Spirit distinct from the Son? Why were there not two Sons? The difficulty met in West and East with two answers, different at least in form:—

1. The Latin formula is contained in the early creed falsely ascribed to St. Athanasius—"The Holy Ghost is from the Father and the Son." So Hilary, "De Trin." ii. 29; Augustine, "De Trin." iv. 20. These appear to be the oldest testimonies,[2] for Tertullian's "a Patre per Filium" ("Adv. Prax." 4) can scarcely be regarded as a direct and certain reference to eternal procession. There is no need to quote later writers. Petavius ("Trin." vii. 8) says he only knew of one single

[1] The text will be found in the works of St. Cyril, Migne's reprint, vol. ix. col. 432.

[2] Ambrose (De Spiritu S. i. 11) says the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father and the Son. But in this place "procedere" means "to be sent."

Latin author—viz. Rusticus the Deacon, who ever doubted the correctness of the current Latin formula. St. Augustine ("In Joann." Tract. xcix. and in many other places) proves the procession of the Spirit from the Son, from the fact that the former is called the "Spirit of the Son" (Gal. iv. 6), and again because the Son, while on earth, gave the Holy Ghost the temporal mission by, implying eternal procession from, the Son. St. Augustine clearly explains ("De Trin." v. cap 14)[1] that the Spirit proceeds from the Father and Son, not as from two principles, but as from one. St. Anselm, in his treatise on the procession of the Holy Ghost (cap. 18 al. 17), answers the objection of the schismatic Greeks, that the Latins asserted the procession of the Spirit from the Father and the Son as from two principles, by denying the alleged fact. The Spirit, he says, proceeds from the Father and Son, not in so far as they are distinct from, but in so far as they are one with, each other. St. Thomas argues (I. qu. xxxvi. a. 2) that if the Holy Ghost did not proceed from the Son, there would be no real distinction between them, since in the Trinity the Persons are only distinguished from each other by mutual relation. This is no more than the development of a principle laid down by St. Augustine and other Fathers. It was, however, rejected by the Scotists.

2. The Greek Fathers commonly expressed their belief by another formula—viz. "from the Father through the Son," intending by this mode of expression to guard the doctrine that the Father is the principle or ultimate source of the Godhead. This form was not unknown in the West, for it occurs, e.g., in St. Hilary ("De Trin." xii. "ex te," addressed to the Father, "per eum"), and implies, instead of excluding, the belief that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Son as well as from the Father. Moreover, some Greek Fathers actually use the Latin form. St. Epiphanius does so again and again (τὸ δὲ ἅγιον πνεῦμα ἐξ ἀμφοτέρων, "Haer." 74. 7; ἐκ τοῦ πατρὸς καὶ τοῦ υἱοῦ, "Ancorat." 8; ἆρα θεὸς ἐκ πατρὸς καὶ υἱοῦ τὸ πνεῦμα, ib. 9). So does St. Cyril of Alexandria, who says the Spirit is "the Spirit of Christ and his mind," and no mere minister, since He "knows without teaching all that appertains to Him from whom and in whom He is" ("In Joann." xiv. 25-26, p. 837, ed. Aubert). Other great Fathers of the Greek Church clearly express their belief in the double procession. Thus, St. Athanasius asserts "it is not the Spirit which knits the word to the Father, but rather the Spirit receives from the Word" (Orat. iii. "Contr. Arian." 24, p. 454 in the Benedictine edition); and again, "Such as we have found the proper relation (ἰδιότητα) of the Son to the Father, such we shall find is that of the Spirit to the Son, and as the Son says, 'All that the Father has is mine,' so we shall find all this through the Son and in the Spirit" ("Ad Serap." iii. 1, p. 552); and then he quotes the "Spirit of the Son" (Gal. iv. 6) and other places in which he is called both the Spirit of the Father and of the Son. Basil speaks of the Spirit as the "utterance" of the Son (ῥῆμα δὲ υἱοῦ τὸ πνεῦμα, "Contr. Eunom." v. p. 304, ed. Benedict.; see also ib. ii. 34, p. 271. In iii. 1, p. 272, the clause παρ' αὐτοῦ τὸ εἶναι ἔχον καὶ ὅλως τῆς αἰτίας ἐκείνης ἐξημμένον is spurious). A very late Father, St. John of Damascus, is the first to reject the Latin statement that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Son (ἐξ υἱοῦ δὲ τὸ πνεῦμα οὐ λέγομεν, "De Fide Orthodox." i. 8); and although St. Thomas and Petavius consider this an error on his part, Le Quien gives strong reasons for supposing that he only meant to deny that the Son is the ultimate principle of the procession or a principle of it at all, so far as He is distinct from the Father.

Up to this point, then, we meet with nothing but a difference of words, like that which divided the West from most of the Orientals on the use of the term hypostasis; and for a long time each part of the Church was allowed to go its own way in peace. Pope Hormisdas, in a letter to Justin in 521, states the double procession in the Latin form ("proprium Sp. S. ut a Patre et Filio procederet sub una substantia deitatis," Mansi, viii. 521), and met apparently with no opposition. Maximus ("Ad Marin." ed. Combefis, p. 70 seq.) shows that some Greeks (as Le Quien thinks, Monothelites) raised a difficulty on the matter; but Maximus shows that both formulæ expressed the same truth. So, on the other hand, Pope Hadrian, in a letter to Charlemagne, defends the Greek formula against the attack of some Latins (Mansi, xiii. 760 seq.). The Latin formula was violently denounced about the same time by John, a Greek monk, otherwise unknown, who charged the Latin monks on Mount Olivet with heresy,

but no great result followed. (See the documents in Le Quien, "Diss. Damasc." i. § xiii. seq.)

Unfortunately, the difference of words was used by Photius after his condemnation at Rome, and again when the schism was renewed by Cærularius, as a means of exciting hatred against the Latins. And the strife became more bitter after the addition of the "Filioque" to the Creed even in the local Church of Rome. Enough has been said on these subjects in the articles on the Greek Church and on the Creeds. But something remains to be added here on the doctrine of the Schismatic Greeks.

Had they merely anathematised the Latin formula because they thought it implied two principles of spiration, had they merely denied the right of the Pope to permit the addition to the Creed, all this would have been proof of a schismatical spirit, but would not in itself have involved heresy on the doctrine of the Trinity. In fact, however, the Greeks, beginning with a factious opposition to the Latin terminology, ended in a denial of the Catholic doctrine. Although the Greek Fathers, says Le Quien, and St. John of Damascus, to whom the Greeks constantly appealed, taught the eternal procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father through the Son, the schismatics with one consent, from Cærularius to Beccus (i.e. till about 1274), denied any eternal procession of the Spirit through the Son, and simply admitted that the gifts or temporal manifestation of the Holy Ghost came through the Son. (Le Quien, loc. cit. § xlviii.) Here of course is an absolute opposition, not of terminology, but of doctrine.

A new opinion was devised in a council held against the Patriarch Beccus, who became Catholic. Examination showed that the form in St. John Dam., "from the Father through the Son," referred to eternal procession. Thereupon Gregory of Cyprus, the schismatical successor of Beccus, advanced the theory that the Holy Ghost proceeded from the Father through the Son, not in respect to existence, but to effulgence (εἰς ἀΐδιον ἔκφανσιν). There was, according to him, an eternal effulgence, improperly called the Spirit, produced by the Father through the Son, or rather by all three Persons (Le Quien, § xlix. l.). This was a prelude to the notion of the Palamites, the kernel of which consisted, as Combefis puts it, in this, that they considered the ἐνεργήματα and gifts of the Spirit to be eternal and uncreated (Combefis apud Mansi, xxvi. 211).

At Florence, Mark of Ephesus began by a simple objection to the insertion of the "Filioque" in the Creed; but later on he asserted that "through the Son" meant "with the Son," denying any other relation between the second and third Persons. Many more instances of Greek theologians who knowingly and of set purpose opposed the Catholic doctrine will be found in Petavius ("De Trin." vii. 15). (A very full and accurate account of the whole history of the controversy is given in the first of the dissertations prefixed by Le Quien to his edition of St. John of Damascus. We have also derived much help from Petavius, "De Trinitate," and Kuhn, "Trinitätslehre.")

PROCURATOR. The authorised agent or representative of another (Fr. procureur). Thus it answers to a "proxy," when the question is of a marriage which one of the parties contracts through a representative, and to a "sponsor," when the question is of a baptism where one or both of the god-parents are not able to be present. In either of the above senses, a procurator contracts spiritual affinity not to himself, but to his principal. A procurator is such either in respect of lawsuits entered upon, or in respect of business transactions; in the first case he is judicialis, in the other extra-judicialis. The procurators or official agents of monasteries of nuns should not hold office more than three years. (Ferraris, Procurator.)

PROFESSION OF FAITH. [See CREEDS.]

PROFESSION, RELIGIOUS. A religious or regular profession is "a promise freely made and lawfully accepted, whereby a person of the full age required, after the completion of a year of probation, binds him- (or her-) self to a particular religious institute approved by the Church."[1] The full age required is sixteen years, reckoned from the day of birth.[2] The year of novitiate or probation must have been continuous; so that if the novice had interrupted it even for so short a time as two hours, e.g. by leaving the monastery with the intention of entering some other order, the year would have to be begun de novo, from the date when he renewed his resolution of seeking admission to the order. Moreover, the year of probation must be spent in the religious habit, and in a monastery or other house designed for the purpose or approved by the Holy See.

[1] Ferraris.

[2] Conc. Trid. sess. xxv c. 15, De Reg. et Mon.

By being "freely made" is meant, with entire personal liberty, with the free command over one's own property, and without prejudice to the rights of third parties Thus neither a slave, nor a married person (without the consent of the other spouse), nor a bishop already consecrated (without a Papal dispensation), can be validly professed.

The matter of the promise is, the three essential vows of religion, poverty, obedience, and chastity, and any other vow or vows peculiar to the institute which the candidate is entering.

The following is an outline of the manner of profession of a nun, as prescribed in the "Pontificale Romanum:"—

"The Pontifical office is recited as far as the Gospel. The novices, habited as during their probationary year, each accompanied by two veiled religious, are led from the convent into the church, and go up two and two into the sanctuary; there they kneel; and the priest, officiating in the character of archpriest, requests of the bishop, seated on his throne before the altar, that they may be consecrated. The bishop asks whether they are fit and worthy, and being assured that they are, bids them come up. They obey, and range themselves in a semicircle round the bishop, who, after a short exhortation, says to them in a loud voice, 'Are you willing to persevere in the observance of holy chastity?' Each of them declares her willingness aloud, and after placing her joined hands between those of the bishop, pronounces her perpetual vows. They return to their former place, and kneel down, with heads bowed to the ground; the bishop kneels in front of the altar, and the choir sings the Litanies. After the sentence, 'Ut omnibus fidelibus defunctis,' &c., and the response, the bishop rises, and with his mitre on, and the crosier in his hand, solemnly blesses the newly-professed, saying, 'Vouchsafe, O Lord, to bless and consecrate these Thy servants.' The response is made, 'We beseech Thee, hear us.'

"After the Litanies the professed rise, 'Veni, Creator,' is sung, and they withdraw into a robing-room to change their dress. The bishop blesses the different articles of their future costume, and first of all the habit, which they immediately put on. They reappear, two and two, and again form a semicircle round the bishop, who, after the prayers, &c., set down in the ritual, puts the veil on the head of each, the ring on her finger, and the bridal wreath on her head. After several solemn benedictions the Mass continues. At the Offertory the professed come up to lay their offerings on the altar, and at the Communion the bishop imparts to them the sacred particles which he has consecrated for them."[1]

With regard to the rite of profession, as also the minimum of age and length of probation, there is considerable diversity in the various approved rules of different orders.

The effects of profession are, first, that nothing short of a Papal dispensation, which would only be given in extremely rare and altogether exceptional cases, can warrant the professed in returning to the world. A religious in any other order can pass into that of the Carthusians, on account of its great austerity. To pass from one order into another which has an easier rule is not permitted without a Papal dispensation. A valid profession secures to its subject the right of maintenance in the convent during life, and the enjoyment of all the rights and privileges of the ecclesiastical state. It annuls any simple vow previously contracted which could not be made compatible with the exact observance of the rule. It cancels a promise of marriage, and even a marriage itself, if not consummated. It releases its subject, so far as ordination is concerned, from the irregularity consequent on illegitimacy; finally, it invests the convent with the ownership of any property belonging to the professed at the date of profession, and also of any subsequently acquired. (Ferraris, Regularis Professio.)

PROMOTION PER SALTUM. [See ORDINATION.]

PROMULGATION. That a law should bind, it is necessary that it should be adequately promulgated or published. From and after the date of such promulgation those whom the law concerns are presumed to be acquainted with it, and become liable to the penalties which disobedience entails in case of any infraction of it. Papal rescripts are promulgated by proclamation in acie campi Floræ,[2] and by being affixed to the gates of the Vatican; whence came the expression "Publicatio urbi et orbi facta." The diocesan ordinances and pastorals of bishops are, in general, transmitted by them to the rural deans, who forward copies to the parochial clergy under them; but where the number of the clergy is not very large, they receive such missives direct from the bishop. In either case, the parish priest (or missionary rector, as the case may be), completes the promulgation by reading from the pulpit those portions which concern the laity, and affixing the document to the doors of his church.

Among the pernicious doctrines of modern bureaucracy is that which, while denying validity to Papal or episcopal constitutions unless specially promulgated, makes such promulgation dependent on the consent of the civil government. The exercise by the Pope and the hierarchy of their divinely-conferred function of ruling the flock of Christ is thus circumscribed, and may at any time be rendered nugatory by a hostile government.

PROPAGANDA. The sacred congregation of Cardinals de propaganda fide, commonly called the Congregation of Propaganda, which had been contemplated by Gregory XIII., was practically established by Gregory XV. (1622) to guard, direct, and promote the foreign missions. Urban VIII. (1623–1644) instituted the "College of Propaganda" as part of the same design, where young men of every nation and language might be trained for the priesthood, and prepared for the evangelic warfare against heathenism or heresy. The management of this college the Pope entrusted to the Congregation. Urban caused the present building to be erected, from the designs of Bernini. The College possesses a library of 30,000 volumes, among which are the translations of a great number of Chinese works, and a large collection of Oriental MSS. Attached to the library is the Museo Borgia, which contains several interesting MSS., service-books, and autographs, and a collection of objects sent home by the missionaries from the countries where they are stationed, including an extraordinary assortment of idols. "The annual examination of the pupils, which takes place in January (on the day before the Epiphany), is an interesting scene, which few travellers who are then in Rome omit to attend; the pupils reciting poetry and speeches in their several languages, accompanied also by music, as performed in their respective countries. The number of pupils was, by the last return, 142."[1] [See CONGREGATIONS, ROMAN.]

PROPERTY. [See CHURCH PROPERTY.]

PROPHECY. (1) Twelve lessons from the Prophets are sung after the blessing of the Paschal candle and before the blessing of the font on Holy Saturday. They were meant originally for the instruction of the catechumens. It is evident from the Sacramentaries and mediæval writers on ritual that the number varied very considerably in different places and at different times (Merat. on Gavant. Tom. I. p. iv. tit. 10).

(2) Lessons from the Prophets at Mass are mentioned by Justin, and were a regular feature in the Gallic, Ambrosian, and Spanish Liturgies. In Rome and Africa, as a rule there was no lesson in the Mass from the Old Testament (Le Brun, tom. iii. diss. 1). Still, instances of such lessons occur, e.g. on the Ember Saturday in Whitsun week, and occasionally, e.g. on Friday in the same week, a lesson from the Prophets replaces the Epistle.

(3) "Prophetia" was the name in the Gallican Mass for the Benedictus. It was followed by a "Collectio post prophetiam." (Le Brun, Tom. III. diss. iv. a. 3.)

PROPOSITIONS, CONDEMNED. From the earliest times the Church has condemned heretical propositions. The First General Council, for example, anathematised certain propositions of Arius. But the Church also condemns propositions which are not indeed heretical, but are opposed in some lesser degree to soundness in the faith. Thus in 1418 Martin V. (bull "Inter Cunctas") proposed thirty-nine articles for the examination of persons suspected of agreement with Wyclif and Huss. Of these the eleventh puts the question whether they hold that of the forty-five propositions of Wyclif and Huss, condemned at the Council of Constance, all are uncatholic, and of these, some heretical, "some erroneous, others rash and seditious, others offensive to pious ears." Such condemnations have been very common in the modern Church. Sometimes, as in the bull "Unigenitus," the propositions have been condemned in globo—i.e. a number of propositions have been condemned as respectively heretical, false, scandalous, &c. Sometimes, as in the "Auctorem fidei" against the Jansenist synod of Pistoia, each proposition has a particular censure attached to it.

[1] Murray's Handbook for Rome, 1867.

We may thus explain the meaning of the terms of censure. A proposition is "heretical" when it is directly opposed to a truth revealed by God and proposed by the Church; "erroneous," when it is contradictory to a truth deduced from two premises, one an article of faith, the other naturally certain; "proximate to error," when opposed to a proposition deduced with great probability from principles of faith; "hæresim sapiens," when it is capable of a good sense, but seems in the circumstances to have an heretical meaning; "evil sounding" or "offensive to pious ears," when opposed to piety and the reverence due to divine things according to the common mode of speaking; "scandalous," when it gives occasion to think or act amiss; "rash," when opposed to the common sense of the Church in matters of faith and morals. This account is taken from Viva, "De Fide;" but Melchior Canus ("De Loc. Theol." lib. xii. cap. x.) shows that opinions have varied much on the precise import of the minor censures. There is a well-known work on the "Propositiones Damnatæ" by the Jesuit Viva.

PROTESTANT. The origin of the name was as follows. At the first Diet of Spires (1526) a decree was agreed to, to the effect that, pending the convocation of a general council, every prince of the German Empire should be free to execute the imperial edict of Worms (1521, by which Luther and his doctrine had been condemned) in such a manner as was consistent with his being prepared to answer for his conduct to God and the Emperor. The adoption of this decree led in practice to much discord and confusion, the princes of the different states being emboldened by it to make and enforce within their own territories any arrangements about religion that might be agreeable to them. Thus, in states and cities where the Lutheran opinions prevailed, the Catholic worship was often forbidden. At the Second Diet of Spires (1529) the majority adopted a new decree to this effect: that those states which had hitherto observed the edict of Worms should continue to observe it; that the other states, in which the new opinions had been introduced, should not, pending the meeting of the council, make any fresh changes in regard to religion; and that, in these last-named states, no preaching against the Sacrament of the altar should be permitted, the Mass should not be abolished, and, if Lutheranism had gained the upper hand, the Catholics were not to be prevented from hearing Mass. Against this decree the Lutheran minority in the Diet (chiefly Duke Frederic of Saxony, the Landgrave of Hesse, and Albert of Brandenburg) protested; the meaning of the protest being that the dissentient princes did not intend to tolerate Catholicism within their borders. The followers of Luther objected to being called Lutherans; the name of "Evangelical," which Luther approved, the Catholics would not concede. Hence the name "Protestant," which implied nothing positive, and might be used indifferently by all who rejected the authority of the Church, came easily into use by common consent. (Möhler, "Kirchengeschichte," vol. iii.)

PROTONOTARY (πρῶτος, notarius). In early times this title, which seems to have been first used at Constantinople in the eighth century, meant "the chief of the notaries," and corresponded to primicerius notariorum, the term then in use at Rome. After 800, the title of protonotary was introduced in the West, and for a long time past it has designated, not the chief, but any member of the important and dignified College of Protonotaries Apostolic in the Roman Curia. Their great and varied privileges are described by Ferraris. Tradition assigns to St. Clement in the first century the institution of the notaries, seven in number; Sixtus V. raised the number to twelve. They are of two grades, a higher and a lower, P. de numero participantium and P. titulares seu extra numerum. Their function is to register the Pontifical acts, make and keep the official records of beatifications, &c., &c. (Ferraris; Smith and Cheetham.)

PROTOPRESBYTER. The protopapas, or chief of the clergy of the second order, was anciently so called in the Eastern Church. In the acts of the Synod of the Oak (401), Arsacius, the protopresbyter of the Church of Constantinople, figures as a witness against his own archbishop, St. John Chrysostom. Apparently the term was equivalent to "archpriest." (Smith and Cheetham.)

PROVINCE. The territory, comprising usually several dioceses, within which an archbishop or metropolitan exercises jurisdiction. In rare cases—e.g. Glasgow and Olmütz—there is an archbishop without suffragans.

A modern theory derives the provincial councils and metropolitans of the primitive Church by direct imitation from those assemblies and their presidents by which civil affairs were conducted in the various provinces of the Roman Empire.[1] The president of such an assembly (κοινόν, concilium) was, it is said, called the sacerdos provinciæ; the members were called σύνεδροι or legati; here we have the original type of a metropolitan and bishops sitting in council But till it can be shown that these σύνεδροι were, as Christian bishops were from the first, invested with permanent powers of government and administration within certain local limits, the resemblance of the two institutions cannot be said to be very close. Of course there can be no doubt that the boundaries of many ecclesiastical provinces merely conformed themselves to those of the civil provinces; the convenience of such an arrangement would be obvious. [See ARCHBISHOP; METROPOLITAN; DIOCESE.]

PROVINCIAL. The religious who, being appointed either by the general of the order or by the chapter, has the general superintendence of the affairs of the order within the limits of a certain province. These provinces have a greater or less geographical extension according to the number of monasteries established within them; when the monasteries are numerous, cæteris paribus the provinces will be small. In 1580 the residences and colleges of the Society of Jesus [JESUITS] were distributed among twenty-one provinces; this implies the existence of the same number of provincials.

PROVISION, CANONICAL. By this is meant the regular conferring of, and induction into, ecclesiastical functions. It has three principal parts, or stages—designation, collation or institution, and installation. [See BISHOP, IV.; NOMINATION; COLLATION TO A BENEFICE; and INSTALLATION.]

PROVOST (præpositus). Professor Cheetham has collected six different senses in which the word præpositus was used in the first eight centuries: (1) as the president or chairman of any meeting; (2) as the chief of a body of canons; (3) as the second in authority under an abbot, or the head of a subordinate house [see PRIOR]; (4) as that member of a chapter who manages the estates; besides two senses of minor importance. Referring to (2), the provost of a cathedral chapter was anciently the archdeacon; the provost of a collegiate chapter was the first dignitary among the canons. At the present day, in Austria, Prussia, Bavaria, and England, the cathedral chapters are presided over by provosts; in France and other parts of Germany by deans. In Austria the provost of a cathedral has the title and privileges of a prelate; the Provost of Munich has the right of wearing the mitre in processions. Provosts in Austria are nominated by the Emperor; in England and the other countries named, by the Pope. (Smith and Cheetham; Wetzer and Welte.)

[1] Art. "Bishop," by Mr. Hatch, in Smith and Cheetham.

PSEUDO-ISIDORE. [See FALSE DECRETALS.]

PULPIT. The old custom was to preach from the altar or episcopal chair. But apparently even in St. Augustine's time the ambo originally meant for readers and singers, and large enough to hold several persons easily, was used for preaching, and so was raised and narrowed into the form of the pulpit. It should be placed on the Gospel side (S. C. R., February 20, 1862), unless that side is already occupied by the bishop's throne. The bishop, according to the "Cær. Episc.," should preach, if possible, from the throne or from a faldstool at the altar. If this is inconvenient he should be accompanied to the pulpit by the two canons who assist at the throne. (Montault, "Traité de la Construct., etc., des Églises.")

PURGATORY. A place in which souls who depart this life in the grace of God suffer for a time because they still need to be cleansed from venial, or have still to pay the temporal punishment due to mortal sins, the guilt and the eternal punishment of which have been remitted. Purgatory is not a place of probation, for the time of trial, the period during which the soul is free to choose eternal life or eternal death, ends with the separation of soul and body. All the souls in Purgatory have died in the love of God, and are certain to enter heaven. But as yet they are not pure and holy enough to see God, and God's mercy allots them a place and a time for cleansing and preparation. At last, Christ will come to judge the world, and then there will be only two places left, heaven and hell.

The Councils of Florence ("Decret. Unionis") and Trent ("Decret. de Purgat." sess. xxv.; cf. sess. vi. can. 30, sess. xxii. "De Sacrific. Miss." c. 2 et can. 3), define "that there is a Purgatory, and that the souls detained there are helped by the prayers of the faithful and, above all, by the acceptable sacrifice of the altar." Further the definitions of the Church do not go, but the general teaching of theologians explains the doctrine of the councils, and embodies the general sentiment of the faithful. Theologians, then, tell us that souls after death are cleansed from the stain of their venial sins by turning with fervent love to God and by detestation of those offences which marred, though they did not entirely destroy, their union with Him. St. Thomas and Suarez hold that this act of fervent love and perfect sorrow is made in the first instant of the soul's separation from the body, and suffices of itself to remove all the stain of sin. (See the quotations in Jungmann, "De Novissimis" p. 103.) Be this as it may, it is certain that the time of merit expires with this life, and that the debt of temporal punishment must still be paid. The souls in Purgatory suffer the pain of loss—i.e. they are in anguish, because their past sins exclude them for a season from the sight of God, and they understand in a degree previously impossible the infinite bliss from which they are excluded and the foulness of the least offence against the God who has created and redeemed them. They also undergo "the punishment of sense"—i.e. positive pains which afflict the soul. It is the common belief of the Western Church that they are tormented by material fire, and it is quite conceivable that God should give matter the power of constraining and afflicting even separated souls. But the Greeks have never accepted this belief, nor was it imposed upon them when they returned to Catholic unity at Florence. The saints and doctors of the Church describe these pains as very terrible. They last, no doubt, for very different lengths of time, and vary in intensity according to the need of individual cases. It is supposed that the just who are alive when Christ comes again, and who stand in need of cleansing, will be purified in some extraordinary way—e.g. by the troubles of the last days, by vehement contrition, &c., but all this is mere conjecture. In conclusion it must be remembered that there is a bright, as well as a dark, side to Purgatory. The souls there are certain of their salvation, they are willing sufferers, and no words, according to St. Catherine of Genoa, can express the joy with which they are filled, as they increase in union with God. She says their joy can be compared to nothing except the greater joy of Paradise itself. (See for numerous citations, Jungmann, "De Noviss." cap. 1, a. 6.)

This may suffice as an account of theological teaching on the subject. It must not be supposed that any such weight belongs to legends and speculations which abound in mediæval chronicles (see Maskell, "Monument. Rit." vol. ii. p. lxxi.), and which often appear in modern books. The Council of Trent (sess. xxv. Decret. de Purgat.), while it enjoins bishops to teach "the sound doctrine of Purgatory, handed down by the holy Fathers and councils," bids them refrain "in popular discourses" from those "more difficult and subtle questions which do not tend to edification," and "to prohibit the publication and discussion of things which are doubtful or even appear false."

Scripture, it may be justly said, points to the existence of Purgatory. There is no fellowship between the darkness of sin and selfishness and God, "in whom there is no darkness at all," so that the degree of our purity is the measure of our union with God here on earth. Perfect purity is needed that we may see God face to face. When God appears "we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is." "Every man who hath this hope in him purifieth himself, as he is pure" (1 John iii. 2, 3). Without holiness "no man shall see the Lord" (Heb. xii. 14). This work of inner cleansing may be effected by our correspondence with grace. We sow as we reap: deeds of humility increase humility; works of love deepen the love of God and man in the soul. Often, too, God's mercy in this life weans the soul from the love of the world, and affliction may be a special mark of his compassion. "Whom the Lord loves He disciplines, and He scourges every son whom he receives (Heb. x. 6). He disciplines us "for our good, that we may participate in his sanctity" (ib. 10). Now, it is plain that in the case of many good people this discipline has not done its work when death overtakes them. Many faults, e.g. of bad temper, vanity and the like, and infirmity consequent on more serious sins of which they have repented, cleave to them still. Surely, then, the natural inference is that their preparation for heaven is completed after death. By painful discipline in this world or the next God finishes the work in them which He has begun, and perfects it "unto the day of Jesus Christ" (Phil. i. 6).

We would appeal to those general principles of Scripture rather than to particular texts often alleged in proof of Purgatory. We doubt if they contain an explicit and direct reference to it. St. Paul (1 Cor. iii. 10) speaks of some who will be saved "yet as through fire," but he seems to mean the fire in which Christ is to appear at the last. He himself, he says, has established the Corinthian church on the only possible foundation—viz. Jesus Christ. Others have built it up from this foundation, or, in other words, have developed the Christian faith and life of its members. These teachers, however, must take care how they build, even on the one foundation. "Each man's work will be made manifest, for the day will show it, because it [the day of judgment] is revealed in fire, and the fire will test each man's work of what kind it is: if any man's work which he has built up [on the foundation] remains, he will receive a reward; if any man's work is burnt down he will suffer loss—[i.e. he will forfeit the special reward and glory of good teachers], but he himself will be saved, but so as through fire." The man who has built up with faulty material is depicted as still working at the building when the fire of Christ's coming seizes it and he himself escapes, but only as a man does from a house on fire, leaving the work which is consumed behind him. St. Paul, if we have caught his meaning, speaks of the end of the world, not of the time between death and judgment, and so, we think, does our Lord in Matt. xii. 32. The sin against the Holy Ghost, he tells us, will not be forgiven, either "in this age" (ἐν τούτῳ τῷ αἰῶνι)—i.e. in the world which now is, or in the future age (ἐν τῷ μέλλοντι)—i.e. in the new world, or rather new period which is to be ushered in by the coming of the Messias in glory. There is no hope of forgiveness here or hereafter for the sin against the Holy Ghost, but it does not follow, and, granting our interpretation, it would be inconsistent with Catholic doctrine to believe, that other sins may be forgiven in the age to come. Thus, "the age to come" would have precisely the same sense as the corresponding Hebrew words (הָעוֹלָם הַבָּא—see, e.g., "Pirke Avoth," cap. 4, and for many other instances Buxtorf, "Lex Rabbin. et Chald. sub voc. עוֹלָם), which is in itself a strong argument, and the meaning we have given is fully supported by New Testament usage (see particularly τοῦ αἰῶνος ἐκείνου τυχεῖν, Luc. xx. 35, and συντέλεια τοῦ αἰῶνος, Matt. xiii. 39, 40, 49, xxiv. 3, xxviii. 20—decisive passages, as we venture to think). Maldonatus decidedly rejects the supposed allusion to Purgatory in Matt. v. 25, 26. "Be well-disposed to thine adversary [i.e. the offended brother] quickly, even till thou art on the way with him [i.e. it is never too soon and never, till life is over, too late to be reconciled], lest the adversary hand thee over to the judge, and the judge hand thee over to the officer, and thou be cast into prison. Amen, I say unto thee thou shalt not go out thence till thou shalt pay the last farthing." Maldonatus follows St. Augustine in the opinion that the "last farthing" will never and can never be paid, and that the punishment is eternal. Just in the same way it is said of the unmerciful slave (Luc. xviii. 34), that he was to be handed over to the tormentors "till he should pay all the debt." Yet a slave could never pay so enormous a sum as 10,000 talents. "Semper solvet, sed nunquam persolvet," "He will always pay, but never pay off," is the happy comment of Remigius (and so Chrysostom and Augustine; see Trench, "Parables," p. 164). The reader will find the various interpretations of these texts fairly discussed in Estius and Maldonatus or in Meyer. Döllinger, however ("First Age of the Church," p. 249), sees an "unmistakable reference" to Purgatory in Matt. xii. 32, v. 26.

In two special ways, writers of the early Church, as Cardinal Newman points out ("Development," p. 385 seq.), were led to formulate the belief in Purgatory. In the articles on the sacrament of Penance, we have shown the strength of primitive belief in the need of satisfaction for sin by painful works, and in the article on Penance the rigour with which satisfaction was exacted. Indeed, the belief in Purgatory lay dormant in the primitive Church to a certain extent, just because the fervour of the first Christians was so vehement, just because the severity of penance here might well be thought to exclude the need of purifying discipline after death. But what was to be thought of those who were reconciled on their death-bed, before their penance was ended or even begun, or in whom outward penance for some cause or other had failed to do the whole of its work? Clement of Alexandria supplies a clear answer to this question: "Even if a man passes out of the flesh, he must put off his passions, ere he is able to enter the eternal dwelling, . . . through much discipline, therefore, stripping off his passions, our faithful man will go to the mansion which is better than the former, bearing in the special penance which appertains to him (ἰδίωμα τῆς μετανοίας) a very great punishment for the sins he has committed after baptism" ("Strom." vi. 14, p. 794, ed. Potter). He speaks of the angels "who preside over the ascent" of souls as detaining those who have preserved any worldly attachment (iv. 18, p. 616), and with at least a possible reference to Purgatory, of fire as purifying sinful souls (vii. 6, p. 851). The genuine and contemporary Acts of St. Perpetua, who suffered under Septimius Severus at the very beginning of the third century, plainly imply the belief in Purgatory. The saint, according to a part of the Acts written by herself, saw in a vision her brother who was dead, and for whom she had prayed. He was suffering and she went on praying. Then she beheld him in another and more cheerful vision, and "knew that he was translated from his place of punishment" (de pœna; Ruinart, "Act. Mart. S. Perpet." &c., vii. viii.). Cyprian (Ep. lv. 20), in answer to the objection that the relaxation of penitential discipline in the case of the lapsed would weaken the courage and stability which made martyrs, insists that after all the position of one who had fallen away and then been admitted to martyrdom would always be much less desirable than that of a martyr. "It is one thing for a man to be cast into prison and not to leave it till he pay the last farthing, another thing to receive at once the reward of faith and virtue; one thing to be tormented long with sorrow for sins, to be purified and cleansed for a long time by the fire, another to purge away all sins by martyrdom." Cardinal Newman urges that these words, especially "missum in carcerem," "purgari diu igne," "seem to go beyond" a mere reference to penitential discipline in this life, and the Benedictine editor is of the same mind.

Next, we can prove the early date of belief in Purgatory from the habit of praying for the dead, a habit which the Church inherited from the Synagogue. The words in 2 Macc. xii. 42 seq. are familiar to everybody. Judas found ἱερώματα, or things consecrated to idols, under the garments of those who had been slain in battle against Gorgias. Whereupon he made a collection of money and sent to Jerusalem, "to offer sacrifice for sin, doing very well and excellently, reasoning about the dead. For unless he had expected those who had fallen before [the others] to rise again, it would have been superfluous and absurd to pray for the dead. Therefore, seeing well [ἐμβλέπων] that a most fair reward is reserved for those who sleep in piety, his design was holy and pious, whence he made the propitiation for the dead that they might be loosed from sin."[1] This passage implies a belief both in Purgatory and the efficacy of prayers for the departed, and takes for granted that this belief would be held by all who believed in the resurrection. This is not the place to discuss the canonical or even the historical character of the book. It represents a school of Jewish belief at the time, and we know from xv. 37 that it was written before the destruction of Jerusalem. Second Maccabees was composed in Greek, but we have the fullest evidence from Hebrew and Chaldee sources that the later Jews prayed for the dead and recognised the need of purification after death. Weber ("Altsynag. Paläst. Theol." p. 326 seq.) thus sums up the Rabbinical doctrine: "Only a few are sure of [immediate] entrance into heaven; the majority are at their death still not ripe for heaven, and yet will not be absolutely excluded from it. Accordingly, we are referred to a middle state, a stage between death and eternal life, which serves for the final perfecting." Those who were not perfectly just here suffer "the pain of fire, and the fire is their penance." The "Pesikta," a very ancient commentary on sections of the law and prophets, composed at the beginning of the third century after Christ, describes the penance as lasting usually twelve months, of which six are spent in extreme heat, six in extreme cold. The common Rabbinical doctrine that Israelites, except those guilty of some special sins, do at last enter heaven, and the fantastical shapes which the Jewish doctrine of Purgatory has assumed, do not concern us here. But it is well to observe that the Jews have never ceased to pray for their dead. The following is from the prayer said at the house of mourners, as given in a modern Jewish prayer-book, issued with authority:—"May our reading of the law and our prayer be acceptable before Thee for the soul of N. Deal with it according to the great mercy, opening to it the gates of compassion and mercy and the gates of the garden of Eden, and receive it in love and favour; send thy holy angels to it to conduct it, and give it rest beneath the Tree of Life." (שִׂיחַ יִצְחָק "Meditation of Isaac," a Jewish prayer-book according to the German and Polish rite, p. 336–7).[1]

Against the Jewish custom and doctrine Christ and his Apostles made no protest, though both custom and doctrine existed in their time. Nay, "St. Paul himself [cf. 2 Tim. i. 16–18 with iv. 19] gives an example of such a prayer. The Ephesian Onesiphorus, mentioned in the Second Epistle to St. Timothy, was clearly no longer among the living. St. Paul praises this man for his constant service to him, but does not, as elsewhere, send salutations to him, but only to his family; for him he desires a blessing from the Lord, and prays for him that the Lord will grant he may find mercy with Christ at the day of judgment." The words in inverted commas are from Döllinger's "First Age of the Church," p. 251; but many Protestant commentators, among whom we may mention De Wette and Huther, who is eminent among recent commentators on the Pastoral Epistles, lean to the same interpretation.

All this considered, it cannot seem strange that every ancient liturgy contains prayers for the dead. To understand the strength of this argument we must remember that these liturgies are written in many different languages, and represent the practice in every part of the ancient world. The very first Christian who has left Latin writings, speaks of "oblations for the dead" as a thing of course (Tertull. "De Coron." 3). It is often said that prayers for the dead do not necessarily imply belief in Purgatory, and this is true. The words, e.g., in the Clementine liturgy, "We offer to Thee for all thy saints who have pleased Thee from ancient days, patriarchs, prophets, just men, apostles, martyrs, confessors, bishops, presbyters, deacons, subdeacons, readers, singers, virgins, widows, laymen, and all whose name Thou knowest," do not imply that those for whom the sacrifice is offered are in a state of suffering. But Tertullian ("Monog." 10) connects prayer for the dead with Purgatory when he says of a woman who has lost her husband that "she prays for his soul, and supplicates for him refreshment [refrigerium], and a part in the first resurrection, and offers on the anniversaries of his death [dormitionis]." So, too, St. Cyril of Jerusalem ("Mystagog." 5): "If when a king had banished certain who had given him offence, their connections should weave a crown and offer it to him on behalf of those under his vengeance, would he not grant a respite to their punishments? In the same manner we, when we offer to Him our supplications for those who have fallen asleep, though they be sinners, weave no crown, but offer up Christ sacrificed for our sins, propitiating our merciful God, both for them and for ourselves." Still the doctrine was not fully established in the West till the time of Gregory the Great. Some of the Greeks conceived that all, however perfect, must pass through fire in the next world. So, e.g., Origen, "In Num." Hom. xxv. 6, "In Ps. xxvi." Hom. iii. 1. St. Augustine had indeed the present doctrine of Purgatory clearly before his mind, but had no fixed conviction on the point. In his work "De VIII Dulcitii Quæstionibus" (§ 13), written about 420, he says it is "not incredible" that imperfect souls will be "saved by some purgatorial fire," to which they will be subjected for varying lengths of time according to their needs.

A little later, in the "De Civitate," he expresses his belief in Purgatory as if he were certain (xxi. 13), or nearly so (xx. 25), but again speaks doubtfully (xxi. 26, "forsitan verum est") and in the "Enchiridion" (69). Very different is Gregory's tone: "ante judicium purgatorius ignis credendus est" ("Dial." iv. 39).

PRYMER. The Prymer was a name given in England to a popular manual containing the Hours of the Blessed Virgin, the dirge, penitential and gradual psalms, Pater, Ave, Creed, Commandments,

It is one of the few prayers in the Ritual which are in Chaldee instead of Hebrew, but there are internal signs that it comes from a lost Hebrew original.

Litany, commendations, and other occasional prayers. It is only when different parts of the offices, prayers, &c., are translated into English that the word Prymer is used. Thus the title runs, "The Prymer of Salysbury Use," "The Prymer in Englysshe," "The Prymer in Englysshe and Latin," &c. Prymers were published by the authority of King Henry VIII. after he had asserted the royal supremacy, and again by the Reformers, who published Prymers to suit their own way of thinking. We owe to Mr. Maskell a most learned and interesting edition of the English Prymer from a MS. now in the British Museum, not later than 1410. The MS. has no title, but the contents answer to those of the Prymer, and Mr. Maskell traces the word back to the fourteenth century. (From Mr. Maskell's Dissertation on the Prymer, "Monument. Rit." vol. iii.).

PURIFIER. [See MUNDATORY.]

PYX. A vase in which the Blessed Sacrament is reserved. The word occurs in this sense in a decree of Pope Leo. IV., who reigned from 847–885 (Mansi, "Concil," xiv. 891). The pyx should be of silver, gilt inside, and covered with a silk veil. It is not consecrated, but the Missal gives a form for the blessing of a pyx by the bishop or priest with episcopal faculties ("Manuale Decret." p. 76 note). [See also RESERVATION OF THE BLESSED SACRAMENT.]

Q

QUÆSTORES. Persons appointed by the Popes and bishops who announced the indulgences for those who joined or supported the Crusades, contributed to the building of churches, to monasteries, &c., and collected the alms given for these objects. The Fourth General Council of the Lateran (in 1215) enjoined the Quæstors to be modest and discreet. They were not to be received unless they could produce letters of authorisation, and were only to propose to the people what these letters contained. Similar regulations were made by the Council of Vienne in 1311. The Council of Trent (sess. xxi. De Ref. cap. 9) declared that these Quæstors had occasioned intolerable scandal, that the proposed remedies had been inefficacious, and abolished the office altogether.

QUIETISM is a name given to a dangerous tendency rather than to any definite system, for persons called by the common name of Quietists have differed seriously from each other, and have advanced to different degrees of delusion. The common tendency consists in making perfection here on earth consist in a state of uninterrupted contemplation (see Bossuet, "Etats d'Oraison," liv. 1) during which the soul remains quiet or passive under the influence of God's Spirit, without forming the ordinary acts of faith, hope, love, &c., without desiring heaven or fearing hell.

Molinos, a Spanish priest, born at Saragossa in 1627,[1] was the first Quietist of modern times. He spent a great part of his life at Rome, and, while there, published in Spanish his "Spiritual Guide" which was translated into Italian, Latin, French, German, and other languages. He maintained not only the merits of passive contemplation without hope or desire, but also that the soul in this state neither gained by the practice of good works nor suffered by gross sins, which last only affected the lower part of the nature and could not tarnish the purity of a contemplative soul. In 1685 the Inquisition censured 68 propositions of Molinos and condemned the author to perpetual imprisonment, in which he died, having recanted his errors, in 1696.[2]

Quietism crossed the Alps, stripped, however, of its gross and directly immoral part. It was propagated by Malaval at Marseilles in his "Pratique facile pour élever l'Ame à la Contemplation." This book also was condemned at Rome, and Malaval submitted. But Quietism found a much more talented and engaging defender in Madame Guyon. This lady, originally Jeanne Bouvier de la Motte, had contracted an unhappy marriage at 16 and was left a widow at 28. She went to the diocese of Geneva at the bishop's request to help in the instruction of converts, and at a convent in Gex met the Barnabite Father Lacombe, with whom she travelled from town to town. At Grenoble she published her "Moyen court et facile pour faire l'Oraison." Some time before, P. Lacombe had issued his "Analyse de l'Oraison Mentale." Lacombe was imprisoned at Paris, where he died in 1699, and for eight months Madame Guyon herself was confined to a convent. After regaining her freedom, she published a book on the "Mystical Sense of Canticles"[1] (Lyons, 1688), and she contrived to win over Fénelon, then tutor to the grandson of Louis XIV., and she sent her works, printed and MS., to Bossuet. But with Bossuet she could make no way. His profound learning, his common sense, his manly and simple piety, made him proof against the charms of delusion, and he could see nothing in Madame Guyon's works except "a mass of extravagances, illusions, and puerilities." He has fully justified this verdict in his "Relation sur le Quiétisme." A commission in which Bossuet was the leading member met in 1694 and 1695, and issued thirty-four articles in which the condemnation of Quietism was implied.

Fénelon was made archbishop of Cambray in 1695, and soon after (Feb. 1697) published his "Explication des Maximes des Saints sur la Vie intérieure," He defended the Quietist idea of "holy indifference," in which the soul loses all deliberate desire of its own bliss or fear of its own woe. Fénelon, who was censured by sixty doctors of the Sorbonne and refuted by Bossuet, appealed to Rome, and there twenty-three propositions of his book were condemned as rash, scandalous, &c., in a brief of Innocent XII. dated 1699. Fénelon made a most edifying submission, publicly burning his own book "It is not I who have conquered," Bossuet said in reply to the congratulations offered to him; "it is the truth." (Chiefly from the new edition of Bossuet.)

QUINQUAGESIMA, Sexagesima, Septuagesima, the first, second, third Sundays before Lent. The words are ancient (Septuagesima occurs in the Gelasian and Gregorian Sacramentaries); but it is hard to divine their meaning. Alcuin proposed two solutions to Charlemagne (Thomassin, "Traité des Festes," p. 308 seq.)—one that there are seventy days from Septuagesima to "Pascha clausum"—i.e. the Octave of Easter. This leaves the names Sexagesima and Quinquagesima unexplained. His other solution is adopted by Thomassin ("Traité des Jeunes," p. 231). Quoting a passage from the "Regula Magistri," Thomassin says: "It clearly shows that the names Quinquagesima and Sexagesima are not intended to denote the numbers fifty or sixty. They have been formed on the [false] analogy of Quadragesima—i.e. Lent—being one and two weeks before the first Sunday in Lent. In the same rule the second week of Lent is called Tricesima, the third Vicesima." The custom of beginning the fast on Septuagesima, &c., and the reasons for it, are given in the article on LENT.

REASON AND FAITH. [See FAITH.]

RECEPTION OF CONVERTS INTO THE CHURCH. We speak here only of converts who are supposed to have received valid baptism. For adults who have never been baptised a longer form of baptism is provided. But in the U. S., at least, leave is usually given by the bishop to use the shorter form.

A baptised person who has previously belonged to an heretical sect has incurred the censures of the Church, and cannot therefore be restored to the sacraments or receive sacramental absolution till he has been absolved from censures. It may be that his error was no fault of his, and, if so, he was not a formal heretic. Still, he is treated as such in the external court of the Church, and the Pope reserves to himself the power of removing the bar of excommunication. In many countries, however, bishops receive power as delegates of the Holy See in their extraordinary or quinquennial faculties to absolve from the censure in question, and in the U. S. they communicate this power to all their priests who have faculties for hearing confessions.

When a priest is satisfied that a person desiring to be a Catholic is sincere and steadfast in his desire and sufficiently understands the tenets of the Catholic religion, he may admit him into the Church.

The reception of converts is as follows: 1. If the convert belongs to an heretical sect and has been baptized, and there is doubt of the validity of his baptism, he first makes the Abjuration, or Profession of Faith, of Pope Pius IV., is then conditionally baptized, and is released from the censures. Finally he makes his sacramental confession and receives absolution from the priest, and the plenary indulgences. 2. If his former baptism is held to be valid, the same order is followed, omitting the conditional baptism. 3. If the neophyte has never been baptized, baptism simply is administered and he is henceforward a Catholic. [If the convert, whether conditionally baptized, or already validly baptized, does not belong to an heretical sect the Abjuration is omitted.]

The reception of a convert may take place publicly in a church, or, as is more often the case, in private, according to circumstances and the wish of the convert.

RECLUSE. The life of a recluse is still more solitary and austere than that of a hermit; it implies that the persons practising it "live for ever shut up in their cells, never speaking to anyone but to the superior when he visits them, and to the brother who brings them necessaries. Their prayers and austerities are doubled, and their fasts more severe and more frequent."[1] St. Romuald allowed reclusion to such of his hermits [CAMALDOLI] as desired and seemed to be fitted for it, as the highest and most difficult stage of monastic discipline. Female recluses were usually called inclusæ. [See INCLUSI.]

RECOLLECTS. A branch of the Franciscan order has borne this name (derived from the detachment from creatures and recollection in God which the founders aimed at) for nearly three centuries. From the time of the Minister-General Elias, who succeeded St. Francis, the Franciscans have been divided into two branches, Conventuals and Observantins, or of the Observance, the former living in great convents and following a mitigated rule, the latter adhering to the intention of the founders in letter and spirit, especially as to poverty. The Observantins in France were commonly called Cordeliers. Several distinctions appeared in course of time among those of the Observance, which Leo X. endeavoured to check by fusing all the subdivisions into one, under the name of the Reformed Franciscans. Before this a saintly Spanish friar, B. John de Puebla, had founded (1489) a house of "Strict Observance" on the Sierra Morena, in Spain. The friars of the Strict Observance soon became a separate congregation; they passed into Italy (where they received the name of "the Reformed") in 1525, and established themselves at Nevers, in France, in 1597. The French filiation increased rapidly; the friars were called "Recollects;" Henry IV., Louis XIII., and Louis XIV. loved and favoured them; and it was arranged that in every French province of the Observance a certain number of houses should be given up to the Strict Observance. The Recollects were uninfected by Jansenism, and when the commission on the regular orders (1768) put it in their power to relax the austerities of the rule, they did not do so. Recollects and Reformed differ only accidentally, and are subject to the same Minister-General at Rome. There are the two families of Friars Minor of the Strict Observance. Both have convents in the U. S. Ever since the Crusades the Holy Sepulchre and the other Catholic sanctuaries of Palestine have been in charge of the Franciscans. [See FRANCISCANS.]

RECONCILIATION OF PENITENTS. [See PENITENTIAL DISCIPLINE OF CHURCH; CEMETERY, &c. See EXECRATION.]

RECTOR. 1. The ecclesiastic who has charge of the government of a congregation or a college is often called the Rector.

2. In England there is a certain number of missions in each diocese, important either on account of their having been long established or because of the size of the congregation, the priests in charge of which are styled "Missionary Rectors."

[1] Alban Butler, Feb. 7.

3. In the United States the term "Missionary Rector" is applied to a priest assigned by the bishop to the charge of a parish.

REDEMPTORISTS. The congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, the members of which are commonly known as Redemptorists, and in some countries as Ligorians, was founded by St. Alphonsus Maria de Liguori in the year 1732. Born of a noble Neapolitan family in 1696, Alphonsus, after giving promise of a brilliant career at the bar, abandoned its honours at the age of twenty-seven to embrace the ecclesiastical state. His first desire was to join the Congregation of the Oratory; being unable to do this on account of the opposition of his father, he devoted himself to evangelising the poor in the city of Naples, and to the duties of preacher and confessor, residing first in his father's house, afterwards in the college of the Chinese, founded by Father Matthew Ripa, the famous Chinese missionary. He also joined a secular congregation of missionaries called the Propaganda, and with them gave several missions in the provinces. By this means he came to know the spiritual destitution of the poor peasants and shepherds, and felt a strong desire to devote his life to the succour of the rural populations. He was confirmed in these thoughts especially by the advice of Monsignor Falcoia, bishop of Castellamare. This prelate had long desired the establishment of an institute of apostolic men, who should strive in all things to copy the life of our Lord Jesus Christ, and after his example to evangelise the poor. He had founded at Scala a community of ladies, called Nuns of the Most Holy Saviour, who prayed continually for the same intention. It was while giving the spiritual exercises to these nuns that St. Alphonsus at last resolved, under the direction of Bishop Falcoia, to gather some companions, who should on the one hand seek their own perfection by the obligations and rules of a religious life, and on the other devote themselves to apostolic work among the most neglected and forsaken souls. The work was solemnly begun at Scala on November 9, 1732, St. Alphonsus being then thirty-six years old.

In carrying out this design the saint encountered innumerable obstacles, first on the part of good men who looked on him as misled by enthusiasm or spiritual ambition, and afterwards from the civil authorities. The times were indeed most unfavourable to such a project, and it is one of the miracles of the saint's life to have founded and maintained a new religious congregation at the time when the Marquis Tanucci was all-powerful in Naples. In spite, however, of these obstacles, St. Alphonsus succeeded in establishing several houses in different parts of Naples and Sicily, and before his death saw his institute spreading in the Papal States, and already transported beyond the Alps.

On February 25, 1749, Pope Benedict XIV. approved the rules and confirmed the new Institute by a solemn approbation. St. Alphonsus had called his Congregation by the name of the Most Holy Saviour; but to prevent confusion with the canons regular of that name in Venice, the Pope himself changed the title to that of the Most Holy Redeemer. The members of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, besides the three simple but perpetual vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, bind themselves by a vow of perseverance until death in the Institute, which they confirm by a promissory oath. They are bound by their vow of poverty to refuse all benefices, offices, or dignities outside their Congregation. Whenever a Redemptorist has been raised to a bishopric it has been by command of the Sovereign Pontiff, and by his dispensation. It was in this way that St. Alphonsus himself was obliged to accept the bishopric of St. Agatha of the Goths. In order also more effectually to pursue the principal end of the Institute, which is to succour the most ignorant and neglected souls, St. Alphonsus forbade his Fathers to undertake such works as the instruction of youth, the government of seminaries, the direction of nuns. Their main occupation is the apostolic ministry in the preaching of missions and retreats to all classes of persons, but with a preference for such as are most neglected, especially those who live in remote villages and hamlets. As, however, in many countries the most neglected souls are to be found in the great cities, the intention of the founder is carried out in labouring for them. It is on record that St. Alphonsus, about the time of the establishment of his congregation, seriously debated the question of going himself to the savage heathen in South Africa, and that he welcomed an invitation that had been made to him to send out missionaries for the conversion of the Nestorian heretics in Asia. It was also his wish that the members of his congregation who should have reached the age of thirty should bind themselves by vow to give missions to the heathen, as soon as they should receive the command of the Sovereign Pontiff, or of the Superior-General. This vow was, however, considered superfluous by the cardinals who examined the rules for approbation. It need scarcely be said that a founder whose pre-eminent science has gained him a place among the nineteen doctors of the Church could not be indifferent to learning among his disciples. He insists, therefore, in his rule on the duty of continual study, so that his priests "may be of use and profit to the Church on all occasions."

St. Alphonsus died on August 1, 1787, in his ninety-first year. Before his death he foretold the spread of his Congregation beyond the Alps, and rejoiced when he heard that two Germans had asked admission from the superior of the Roman house. One of these, the Venerable Servant of God Clement Maria Hofbauer, established the order in Poland, Austria, and Switzerland, and since his death, in 1820, it has spread through most of the countries of Europe, in North and South America, the West Indies, and Australia. It was introduced into England by Dr. Baines, vicar-apostolic of the Western District, in 1843, shortly before his death. The British Isles at present (1883) form one Province, with houses in London, Liverpool, Perth, Teignmouth, Limerick, and Dundalk. In 1832 the first establishment of Redemptorists in the U. S. was made at Detroit, and in 1841 another colony arrived and was settled in the diocese of Baltimore, where is now the mother-house of their Eastern Province. The mother-house of the Western Province, including great part of the Southern States, is at St. Louis. These zealous missionaries have convents and churches in many of the principal cities.

The Congregation is under the Government of a superior-general, called the Rector Major, who is elected for life by a general chapter, and is assisted by six consultors. His residence is in Rome. The superiors of the various provinces (Provincials) and of the houses (Rectors), with their consultors, are appointed for a term of three years by the Rector Major. Their term of office may be renewed at his discretion. The nuns already mentioned, commonly called Redemptoristines, form the Order of the Most Holy Redeemer, as distinguished from the congregation of missionaries. They are under the jurisdiction of the bishops in whose dioceses they reside. They are strictly enclosed and contemplative, assisting the missionaries by their prayers. They have monasteries in several parts of Europe. That of Dublin was founded by Cardinal Cullen.

REFECTORY (refectorium, place of refreshment). [See CONVENT.]

REFORMATION, THE. Since the conversion of the Barbarians, who broke up and divided amongst them the Western Empire, wealth in every form had been lavishly poured upon the Church; and a relaxation of discipline—against which great pontiffs, saintly bishops, and the founders or reformers of religious orders, unceasingly strove—had been too frequently the result. Through the operation of this and other causes—such as wars of ambition, national rivalries, the growth of commercial and other purely secular interests, &c.—the sense of the essential unity of the Church, which was so strong throughout Christendom in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, was considerably weakened at the beginning of the sixteenth. On the rise and progress in Germany of the series of conflicts and changes which go by the name of "the Reformation," see the article LUTHER AND LUTHERANISM. The subversive doctrines of the German reformer found a willing disciple in Gustavus Vasa who, on the dissolution (1523) of the Union of Calmar became king of Sweden. Aided by the brothers Peterson and by Lawrence Anderson, archdeacon of Strengness, whom he made Chancellor, Gustavus (1527) induced the estates of the realm, in the Diet of Westerås, to sanction the confiscation of the property of the monasteries. The work of change then went rapidly on. Lawrence Peterson was appointed by the king (1531) archbishop of Upsala, and married. The king declared himself supreme in matters ecclesiastical, and, setting aside entirely the authority of the Holy See, deposed or appointed bishops at his will. The last remains of Catholic usages were abolished at a second Diet of Westerås in 1544. Under the reign of King John (1569) there seemed to be some hope of a Catholic reaction; an envoy was sent to the court of Gregory XIII., and the Jesuit Possevin was received at Stockholm; but a sudden change in the sentiments of the king restored things to their former state. The system adopted in Sweden, in organizing which Lawrence Peterson was mainly instrumental, was Lutheranism; but, as in England, bishops were nominally retained. The episcopal authority of Lawrence Peterson, the head and fountain of the new hierarchy, appears to have been derived solely from the king; according to Rohrbacher ("Hist. de l'Egl." xxiii. 303), there was a true Archbishop of Upsala, Olaus Magnus, alive at the time, though in exile; he did not die till 1544.

In Denmark the tyrant Christian II., before his deposition in 1623, had brought to Copenhagen a Wittenberg preacher, a follower of Luther, favoured the marriage of the clergy, and in various ways sought to tamper with the faith and laws of the Church. His successor, Frederick I., instigated by his son Christian, who had studied in Germany and become a zealous Lutheran, established by degrees his own supremacy in religious matters, and, by favouring heretical preachers, and discouraging and punishing all who stood up for the ancient faith, prepared the way for its ruin. At a diet held in 1536, at which no representative of the clergy was admitted, he induced the assembly to decree the abolition of the Catholic worship in all the Danish dominions; the bishops were required to cease from opposing Lutheranism, and the beneficed clergy to embrace it. The nobles and people acquiesced with a singular apathy in all these changes. The king then invited Bugenhagen, a friend of Luther, into Denmark, appointed him court preacher, and commissioned him to re-organise the Danish church. Bugenhagen crowned the king afresh, as if to show that his previous coronation with Catholic rites had been invalid; he also consecrated superintendents in the place of the deposed Catholic bishops. As these last successively died out, the superintendents assumed the title of bishop; and this is the origin of the present Danish episcopate.

On the Reformation movement in England, Scotland, and Ireland, see the articles ANGLICAN CHURCH; ENGLISH CATHOLICS; PRESBYTERIANS; and IRISH CHURCH.

In France the Protestants, there called Huguenots, became very numerous; civil war broke out in 1562, and was renewed at frequent intervals during more than thirty years, till the abjuration of Protestantism by Henry IV. in 1593. By the edict of Nantes (1598) liberty of worship was granted to the Huguenots, and certain cities, of which the chief was Rochelle, made over to them. In the eighteen flourishing provinces of Holland and Belgium the reforming party, owing to the neighbourhood of France, adhered to the system of Calvin. Under the rule of Charles V., and afterwards of his son, Philip II., the designs of the innovators were severely repressed. The seizure of Brille by the Gueux, in 1572, was the commencement of the long civil war which ended in the disruption of the seven northern provinces from the eleven provinces of Belgium, and the consolidation of the former into a Republic. The necessity of providing a rallying point and symbol of union caused the adoption by the Dutch, in the Synod of Dordrecht (1574), of the "Belgic Confession," drawn up by Gui de Bres, a Walloon, a few years before. This confession is Calvinistic. In 1582 the provinces of Holland and Zeeland proscribed the Catholic worship, and the wholesale plunder and desecration of churches followed. The final success of the revolt was the signal for a series of penal enactments which had for their object the extirpation of Catholicism from the Republic. This, however—since the Belgian provinces, conterminous in their whole breadth with those of Holland, had remained Catholic—was found a task impossible of achievement.

"In Switzerland the Reformation arose, independently of Luther, by the exertions of Zwinglius, in Zurich (who fell October 11, 1531, at Cappel, in a battle with the Catholics). It spread rapidly; in 1528 it had been adopted, altogether or partially, by the cantons of Zurich, Bern, Basle, Appenazel, Glarus, and Schaffhausen. A separation from those [the Lutherans] who followed the confession of Augsburg grew in 1525 out of the . . . difference of opinion respecting the sacrament of the Lord's Supper; and thus originated the Reformed party, which was first fully developed in Geneva, through Calvin, 1536–1564. . . . . The forms and discipline of the Reformed church were here fully developed. By means of the university, founded in 1539, under the direction of Calvin, and supported by his exertions and those of Beza, Geneva became the principal school of theology for the professors of these opinions, and in those days the only one where the French language prevailed." (Heeren, "Political System of Europe,"

I. 76.) By the "Consensus Zigurinus," arranged in 1549 between Calvin and Bullinger, of Zurich, a concord, at least external, was brought about between the Calvinist and Zwinglian factions.

The true and Catholic reformation, long desired but delayed by many difficulties, was taken up and successfully accomplished by the Council of Trent (1545–1563); see that article.

REGALIA. The right claimed by kings of receiving the revenues of a bishopric during a vacancy, and of appointing, pending the election of a successor, to all benefices in the bishop's patronage, not involving the cure of souls, which might fall vacant in the interval.

In England, as is well known, the Norman and Angevin kings exercised this right, and were accustomed to keep the sees vacant for years in order that they might enjoy the revenues. After the martyrdom of St. Thomas, Henry II. (1176) promised the Pope that he would in future not keep any vacant bishopric or abbey in his hands for more than a year, unless it were required by the evident necessity of the case.[1]

In France the regalia was introduced about the end of the eleventh century,[2] at first with reference to certain provinces only; but there was a tendency to extend it further and further. The Council of Lyons (1274) in its fifth session sanctioned the right in cases where ancient custom could be pleaded for it, but forbade on pain of excommunication its extension to churches hitherto free.[3] In spite of this the kings of France, supported by the lawyers, went on developing and extending the regalia, until by three edicts of Louis XIV. (1673, 1674) it was declared to be applicable to all the provinces of the French monarchy. The patronage which it conferred was now declared to be inherent in the crown until such time as the new bishop should sue out his temporalities in the Parliament of Paris and pay certain fees; and to this clause a retrospective effect was given, so that any beneficiary appointed by a bishop who had not complied with these formalities might be dispossessed in favour of a royal nominee.

Most of the French bishops, seeing the overwhelming power of the crown, submitted to these innovations; but the bishops of Aleth and Pamiers (Pavillon and Caulet) resisted them; and when royal nominees were inducted by the secular arm into canonries to which these bishops had already made appointments, they excommunicated the intruders. The struggle began in 1675 and lasted several years. The excommunicated ecclesiastics appealed to the metropolitans (Archbishops of Toulouse and Narbonne) of the two bishops, and obtained from them decisions nullifying the episcopal censures. The bishops then appealed to Rome; Innocent XI., regarding the question as one in which the liberties of the Church were involved, espoused their cause, and annulled the decrees of the metropolitans. Great confusion and excitement followed.

The king's interpretation of the regalia was supported against the Holy See, not only by the Parliament and the Archbishop of Paris (Harlay), but also by the Jesuits. The explanation of this remarkable fact is found in a complication of the question connected with the spread of Jansenism [JANSENISM.] The Bishops of Aleth and Pamiers were known to be favourable to Arnauld and his party, and they had appointed to canonries in their gift persons more or less imbued with these opinions. If the regalia were maintained, and in the extent now claimed for it, these men might be ejected, and ecclesiastics nominated by the King's confessor, the Père la Chaise, with whom the Jesuits were on a thoroughly good footing, might be put in their place.

This united opposition neutralised the efforts of the Pontiff; and when, in 1682, the assembly of the French clergy issued its celebrated Four Articles [see GALLICANISM], the question of the regalia, in view of this fresh subject of solicitude, fell into the background. (Ferraris, Regalia; Wetzer and Welte, art. by Döllinger.)

REGIONARIUS. Pope Fabian, it is said, divided Rome into seven regions, founded no doubt on the fourteen known since the Augustan age, and he assigned each to the charge of a deacon, who was responsible for the distribution of alms, care of hospitals, &c. These regionary deacons were the seven chief deacons of the Roman Church; they were subject to the archdeacon, while the "titular" deacons—i.e. deacons of the parochial churches—were placed under the arch-priest of each church. From the time of Honorius II. Rome had twelve regionary deacons, and six with the name of Palatinales.[1] The regionarii sang the Gospel when the Pope officiated at the stations, the Palatinales when he did so at the Lateran. There was a similar division of subdeacons and acolytes. Sixtus V. fixed the number of cardinal deacons at fourteen. (Mabillon, "Museum Italicum," vol. ii. p. xi. seq. and p. 567 seq.)

REGULARS. Persons of either sex observing a common rule of life, bound by the three vows of religion, and obeying, with regard to dress, food, and the employment of their time, the statutes of the particular order or congregation to which they belong. (See the articles ORDERS, RELIGIOUS; PROFESSION, RELIGIOUS; EXEMPTION.)

RELICS. The word includes the bodies of departed saints, fragments of their bodies, articles or portions of articles which they have used, such as clothes, vestments, rosaries, and the like. The Church also venerates relics of Christ and his Blessed Mother. Such are the holy nails, lance, spear, or fragments of the True Cross, the girdle, veil, &c., of the Blessed Virgin. The devotion to relics, solemnly approved by the Council of Trent (sess. xxv. De Invoc. Sanct.) rests on two great principles of Catholic belief.

First, the Church honours the bodies of the dead who sleep in Christ. Our Lord has opened the kingdom of heaven, and given us the pledge and assurance of the resurrection of the body. Hence, Christians have lost that horror of dead bodies which was characteristic of heathen and even of Jews. But the Church specially venerates the bodies of the martyrs and other saints; because, while they were on earth, their bodies were the temples of the Holy Ghost and they themselves living members of Christ. Their souls are already in heaven, their glorious resurrection is a matter of certainty, and therefore the Church joyfully anticipates the glory which God will give to these remains at the last day. She testifies at once the firmness of her belief in the resurrection and her love of the virtues which shone forth in the saints. For these were not virtues of the soul only, they were proper to the whole man, body and soul, which toiled and suffered together. The same reasons which make the resurrection of the body credible also tell in favour of the veneration due to relics. And so Christians have felt from the very infancy of the Church. They gathered the bones of St. Ignatius of Antioch (anno 107) and placed them in linen, "as a priceless treasure, being left to the Holy Church by the grace which was in the martyr" ("Act. Mart." 6). When Polycarp's body was burned in 167 the Christians exhumed the bones they could find "as more precious than costly stones and more valuable than gold." The Jews suggested that the Christians would leave Christ and worship Polycarp, ignorant that Christians could "never leave Christ or worship another" ("Act. Mart." 17, 18). When in 258 Cyprian was about to be beheaded, the Christians cast towels and napkins before him, clearly that they might be soaked in his blood ("Act. Procons." 5). So baseless is the statement that devotion to relics came into the Church from Pagan influences after Constantine's conversion.

Next, Catholics believe that God is sometimes pleased to honour the relics of the saints by making them instruments of healing and other miracles, and also by bestowing spiritual graces on those who with pure hearts keep and honour them. For this principle the Fathers (e.g. Cyril of Jerusalem, "Catech." xviii.) appeal to the Old Testament, which relates the resurrection of a dead body which touched the bones of Eliseus (IV. Reg. xiii. 21), and to the New, which tells us that the sick were healed by towels which had touched the living body of St. Paul (Acts xix. 12; cf. v. 15). "There is a power, says Cyril (loc. cit. p. 293), latent [ἔγκειται] even in the bodies of the just." No proof is needed that, after the heathen persecution was over, the Christians sought and believed that they obtained graces through the relics of the saints. St. Ambrose, St. Augustine, and, indeed, the Fathers of the fourth and fifth centuries generally, are witnesses to the belief. A catena of passages will be found in Petavius, "De Incarnat." xiv. cap. xi. (See also Newman's "Development," ch. x. § 1, Resurrection and Relics.)

Abuses no doubt have occurred in all ages with regard to relics. In 1215, canon 62 of the Fourth Lateran Council, inserted in the "Corpus Juris" forbade relics to be sold or to be exposed outside of their cases or shrines, and prohibited the public veneration of new relics till their authenticity had been approved by the Pope (Mansi, "Concil." tom. xxii. 1049–50; see also Fleury, "H. E." livr. lxxvii. 54). The Council of Trent (sess. xxv. De Invoc. Sanct.) renews these prohibitions and requires bishops to decide on the authenticity of new relics after careful consultation with theologians, or, if necessary, with the metropolitan and other bishops of the province assembled in council.

Relics are usually venerated in public by being exposed in their cases, with burning lights, upon the altar. They are often placed there at High Mass and incensed. They are carried in procession and the people are blessed with them. A special Mass and office are permitted to churches which have an "insignis reliquia" of a saint named in the Roman Martyrology. (See the decrees at the beginning of the Breviary and Missal.)

RELIGIOUS (religio, prob. from relego; relegens, attentive, studious, would be the opposite of neglegens, careless[1]). The religious state is "a stable manner of living in common, approved by the Church, adopted by believers endeavouring after the perfection of Christian charity, who have taken the vows of perpetual obedience, poverty, and chastity."[2] The term "religious" in this sense is coextensive with "regular," since all persons belonging to a particular "religio" are bound by some rule, and all those living by rule are members of some religious community.

REQUIEM. [See Mass.]

RESERVATION OF BENEFICES. Mandates and favours in expectation (mandata, gratiæ expectativæ), by which Popes had been accustomed to require that bishops and others having the right of conferring benefices should, as soon as they fell vacant, confer them upon particular persons—and mental reservations, by which a Pontiff announced, but without mentioning their names, that he had reserved certain benefices, when they should fall vacant, in favour of particular persons—were all abolished by the Council of Trent.[3] With other Papal reservations the Council did not interfere.

The reservation of benefices is desirable for many reasons: it is a practical means of giving effect in widely separated countries to the supreme pastorate of the Roman Pontiffs; it links the different national Churches more closely, by personal ties of gratitude and affection, to the Apostolic See, and through it to each other; and it provides the Pope with the means of rewarding those who have laboured meritoriously in his cause and that of the Church.

Considered with reference to the legal foundation on which they rest, reservations are divided into four classes—(1) those which are contained in the "Corpus Juris;" (2) those which are found in the "Extravagants," outside the "Corpus;" (3) those specified in the constitutions of later Popes; (4) those specified by the rules of the Chancery. Another classification, founded on differences in the quality of reservations, is suggested by Cardinal Soglia. According to this arrangement, reservations are fivefold:—

(1) Benefices are reserved on the ground of their own quality; thus the second rule of the Chancery reserves to the Pope all vacant bishoprics, and the abbacy or headship in any monastery of men, the revenues of which exceed a certain amount. The fourth rule reserves the greater dignities in cathedral churches, and the principal dignities in collegiate churches possessing a certain revenue. One such dignity only in each church is understood to be affected by the rule. With regard to all the reservations under this head, it should be remembered that they do not take effect in countries where there is any pact or concordat regulating the course of patronage, for it is a maxim that pactum præstat juri.

(2) Benefices are reserved on the ground of their being held by particular persons—e.g. by cardinals, members of the Curia, and officials of the Holy See.

(3) The third ground of reservation is connected with the manner in which a benefice has become vacant. Thus a benefice may be vacated on account of heresy, or collusive simony (simonia confidentialis), or informality (as in the case of parishes, in appointing to which the concursus ordered by the Council of Trent has been neglected), or deposition proceeding from a particular cause; in all these cases, under constitutions emanating from St. Pius V. and other Pontiffs, reservation takes effect.

(4) The fourth ground is connected with the place where the vacancy has occurred. The benefice of any ecclesiastic dying at the court of Rome is a familiar instance; this is mentioned in the "Corpus Juris," and is the most ancient of all reservations.

[1] Skeat, Etymol. Dict.
[2] Ferraris, "Religiones Regulares."
[3] Sess. xxiv. c. 19, De Ref.

(5) The fifth ground depends on the time at which the vacancy has occurred. The ninth rule of the Chancery reserves all benefices strictly so called (not being in lay patronage), whether with or without cure of souls, which fall vacant in eight months of the year—viz. in January, February, April, May, July, August, October, and November. In the case of bishops, however, who reside continuously in their dioceses, and who apply for the privilege, the above rule is modified to this extent, that the Papal reservation only takes effect in alternate months, the patronage being thus equally divided between the Pope and the ordinary.

It should be observed that the rules of the Chancery have no legal force during a vacancy of the Holy See; each Pope renews them immediately after his election. Reservations, therefore, which depend only on a rule of the Chancery, and not also on a Papal constitution, do not take effect in the case of benefices vacated in the interval between the death of one Pope and the election of another. (Soglia, "Instit. Canon." III. 2, § 20.)

RESERVATION OF THE HOLY EUCHARIST. The doctrine of the Church on this subject has been explained under the word EUCHARIST. In this article we propose to give a brief history of the reservation of the holy Eucharist in the Church.

a. Causes of Reservation.—In all ages, of course, the Blessed Sacrament has been reserved for the sick, and the first Christians, in the times of persecution, kept the Eucharist at home and gave communion to themselves. But, besides this, (1) the Eucharist was sent from bishop to bishop as a sign of charity. Irenaeus (apud Euseb. "H. E." v. 24) testifies that the bishops of Rome sent the Eucharist to other bishops, and although the Council of Laodicea (canon 14) forbade the sending of the Eucharist at Easter into strange dioceses, and this prohibition found general acceptance, still a supposed decretal of Pope Innocent to Decentius proves that the Bishop of Rome sent the fermentum or consecrated host "per titulos"—i.e. to the chief churches of the city. (2) In Rome, as we know from the earliest Ordo, a Host consecrated at one Mass was placed on the altar at the Mass of the next day, to signify the unity of the sacrifice. A similar custom prevailed in Gaul under the first dynasty. (3) The Eucharist was carried by lay persons, or even catechumens (see Ambros. "De Excid. Sat." i. 43), as a protection against danger. This custom must have lasted, at least in the case of clerics, till late in the middle ages, for St. Thomas à Becket carried the Eucharist with him when he went to meet Henry II. St. Louis of France carried the Eucharist with him beyond the sea, but by permission of the Papal legate, and from about this time the privilege seems to have been reserved to the Pope, though one or two instances of priests carrying it for their own protection occur in later times—e.g. in the life of Savonarola. Among the Greek monks it was still maintained when Arcudius wrote—i.e. in the seventeenth century. (4) In Rome and France, as appears from the Ordo Romanus and Alcuin, a bishop at his consecration kept a part of the Host presented to him by the consecrator and consumed it during the next forty days. The same usage obtained in some parts of France at the ordination of priests. (5) Many councils reprove the custom, which must have been widely spread, of giving communion to the dead (Concil. Hippo. c. 4; Auxerre, c. 12; Statut. Bonifac. 20). (6) The Host was buried with the dead. This was done on one occasion, according to St. Gregory the Great, by St. Benedict ("Dial. ii. 24), and, according to an ancient author, in the case of St. Basil at the saint's own desire. (7) The pen was sometimes dipped in the Communion under the species of wine in subscribing decrees of councils, &c. Pope Theodore, for example, signed the condemnation of Pyrrhus in this way. (8) In dedicating churches three portions of the Host were put in the altar and sealed up with cement. This rite was followed by Pope Urban II. in dedicating the abbey church of Marmoutier (Martene, "De Rit." tom. i. c. 5, a. 4; quoted by Chardon).[1]

b. The Case or Tabernacle in which the Blessed Sacrament was Reserved.—The oldest tabernacles had the form of a tower. According to Anastasius, Constantine presented St. Peter's Church at

[1] In modern times the Holy Eucharist is also reserved for exposition and benediction, and in order that the faithful may be able throughout the day to adore Christ present on the altar. See BENEDICTION; EXPOSITION; VISITS TO THE BLESSED SACRAMENT.

Rome with a tower of pure gold adorned with jewels and with a dove upon it, while Innocent I. and Hilarius I. gave towers of the same kind to the Churches of SS. Gervase and Protase and of St. John Lateran. Such a tower existed in Chardon's time (the middle of the last century) at Marmoutier. Their turrical form was succeeded in many churches by tabernacles in the shape of a covered cup; in others by small boxes suspended over the altar. The custom, so common in France, of suspending the Blessed Sacrament in a tabernacle made like a dove has been described elsewhere (art. Dove). Tabernacles were of very various material, of precious metal, of precious stone such as onyx, of glass or even wood.

c. The Place of Reservation.—The most ancient use was to reserve the Holy Eucharist in παστοφόρια or thalami—i.e. in chambers at the side of the church. Jerome, in cap. 40 Ezech. (quoted by Chardon), alludes to this custom. This custom of reserving the Eucharist in the sacristy was not extinct in France even during the last century. In the middle ages the Eucharist was often reserved in an awmry or press in the corner of the building or in a pillar, such a press as we now use for the holy oils. The modern Greeks reserve the Eucharist for the Mass of the Presanctified, whence it is carried in procession to the altar. For the sick they keep it, according to Goar, in a place called ἀρτοφόριον behind the altar, with a lamp burning before it. Such no doubt is their rule, but M. Nointel, ambassador from the French king to the Sultan, gives an interesting account (printed in the "Perpétuité de la Foi") of the different ways in which he saw the Eucharist reserved among the Greeks. Sometimes the box which held it was on the altar, very often it was put in a silk bag and hung on a nail.

Gavantus approves the custom which exists in many Catholic Churches, of placing the tabernacle on the altar in a side chapel; but in most American churches the tabernacle with the Blessed Sacrament is placed over the chief altar. (From Chardon, "Hist. des Sacrements," tom. ii. "De l'Eucharistie," tom. ii. § 3, ch. viii.–x.)

RESERVED CASES. Certain sins, power to absolve from which is reserved by the superior to himself and not imparted to inferiors, who have ordinary or delegated jurisdiction over other sins. Papal cases are reserved to the Pope, episcopal cases to the bishop, the reserved cases of regulars to the prelates of the order. Jurisdiction given by a superior is, as has been shown in the article on Penance, necessary for the validity of absolution. But a superior may either confer the whole of the jurisdiction which he himself holds, or only a part of it, just as in England the Crown empowers magistrates to try petty cases, but not the more serious crimes. Hence, the Council of Trent (sess. xix. De Pœnit. can. 11) defines that bishops have the power of reserving cases, and that absolution from them cannot be validly given by an ordinary confessor. The object of the reservation is to increase the shame of the penitent, to impress the serious nature of the offence upon him, and to give the superior, who is likely to have more experience than the ordinary confessor, the opportunity of prescribing a fitting remedy. This power of reservation, however, is given for edification not destruction. Clement VIII. warns prelates[1] only to reserve "the more atrocious and grievous crimes," and it is generally assumed that the reserve falls only on sins which are grievous, external, certain, and complete in their kind. The reserved sin may also have a censure attached to it, and this is almost always the case in Papal reserves. Absolution from a reserved sin may be given by the superior who reserves it, by his successors, by those whom he delegates, by his own superiors. For full information we refer to the common treatises on moral theology; only adding that in the dioceses of the U. S. very few sins, and those of most rare occurrence, are reserved either to the Pope or ordinary.

The practice of the modern is consonant with that of the ancient and mediæval Church, which usually "reserved to the bishops the absolution of public penitents" (Chardon, "Hist. des Sacrem." tom. ii. ch. vii.). Some of the cases quoted by Chardon scarcely seem to the point—e.g. the direction of ancient Rituals that priests are to hear the confessions of those who present themselves, and take them, if they seem well disposed, to the bishop for absolution; or the statement of Peter the Cantor in his "Sum of the Sacraments," that formerly monks used to hear confessions and the abbot alone to absolve. But he quotes from the Acts of a Benedictine, St. Redon, who lived in the tenth century, and from Constitutions of [1] He actually limited the power of reservation on the part of religious superiors.

Richard, bishop of Salisbury, clear cases of Papal reserve. In 1171, Pope Alexander III. wrote to the Archbishop of Upsala, that women guilty of child-murder and other abominations were to be sent to Rome for absolution. "This," says Fleury ("H. E." lxxii. 35), "is the beginning of Papal reserves for more atrocious crimes;" but the instances just given show that this is scarcely correct. Mr. Maskell[1] ("Monum. Rit." vol. i. p. 97) gives some account of reserved sins in the old English Church. Thus, a Council of Durham in 1250 lays down the principle that greater sins are to be reserved to those higher in office. The penitent is to go to the bishop or the penitentiary with a letter from his confessor stating the nature and circumstances of his sin, or else the confessor is to accompany him. In 1367, Moresby, archbishop of York, reserved thirty-seven sins to himself or his penitentiary.

RESIDENCE. Before the Council of Trent the non-residence of ecclesiastics, even of bishops, had long been a crying evil. In the sixth session, the Fathers adopted a decree of reformation, which provided that any patriarch, metropolitan, or bishop, who should remain without legitimate cause for six months together absent from his church, should forfeit a fourth part of the revenues. A still more protracted and contumacious absence was eventually to be reported to the Pope, who would meet it by appropriate measures. Finding that this decree had been by some perversely understood, as if a bishop might without incurring censure be absent five months in the year from his diocese, the Council in the twenty-third and twenty-fourth sessions returned to the subject, and declared that "all the rulers of patriarchal, metropolitan, and cathedral churches, under whatsoever name or title, even if they be cardinals of the Holy Roman Church, are bound to personal residence in their own church or diocese, where it is their duty to discharge the functions of their office, and cannot be absent, except for the causes and under the circumstances hereunder specified." There are many legitimate causes of absence, but these must be approved in writing either by the Pope or the metropolitan; except in the case of some urgent political exigency, the occurrence of which, being usually sudden, and at the same time notorious, dispenses the bishop from the necessity of notifying his absence. As a rule, the period of absence in the course of a year, apart from the urgent causes above noticed, "ought on no account to exceed two or at most three months; and care should be taken that there be a sufficient cause, and that the bishop's flock suffer no harm; judgment on which point [the Council] leaves to the conscience of those absenting themselves, hoping that it [their conscience] will be scrupulous and full of fear, since hearts are open before God, whose work they are bound at their peril not to do deceitfully."[1]

Canons in cathedral and collegiate churches are ordinarily bound to residence during nine months in the year.[2] But where a foundation possesses a privilege, confirmed by the Pope, in virtue of which the canons are permitted to be absent for a longer time, it is held that the conciliar decree does not derogate from that privilege.[3] In the case both of bishops and canons the period of absence ought not to comprise the times at which the great festivals (Christmas, Easter, Pentecost, Corpus Christi) are celebrated, nor the days of Lent or Advent. The obligation on individual canons to reside does not bind when they have a lawful excuse for not doing so. Such excuses are—illness, permitted sojourn in a foreign country for the purpose of study or teaching, and employment in the immediate service of the bishop.

Parish priests and other beneficiaries having cure of souls cannot be absent from their cure for more than a week without the bishop's permission. Two months in the year is the period beyond which the bishop's permission of non-residence to his clergy is not ordinarily extended.

Diocesan statutes, concordats, and the civil law in certain countries, contain a great variety of particular regulations respecting the residence of ecclesiastics.

RESIGNATION. The resignation or renunciation of a benefice is, "the spontaneous relinquishment of an ecclesiastical benefice, made before the lawful superior, and accepted by him."[4] It is either tacit or express. A resignation is tacitly or ipso facto made of any church preferment held by the resigner in the following cases: by one who, already having one benefice, is nominated to another incompatible with the first; by a clerk in minor orders who enters into a contract of marriage; by a clerk becoming professed in a religious order [PROFESSION, RELIGIOUS]; and by a clerk becoming a soldier or a strolling player. An express resignation is made either in words or in writing, and is either pure or conditional. A pure resignation is an unqualified absolute surrender of the preferment; a conditional resignation is made sub conditione, and is of five kinds; according as it is made—(1) in favour of a third person; or (2) with the reservation of a pension out of the revenues; or (3) with the right of resumption, if the resignatary should die before the resigner; or (4) with the right of resumption at some given date in the future; or (5) in pursuance of an arrangement for an exchange of benefices. But these conditional resignations, the status of the clergy relatively to the civil power being so different from what it formerly was, are now of rare occurrence.

Publicity is necessary to the validity of a resignation, and the mode of publication under varying circumstances is minutely regulated by canon law.

Reserved benefices, the collation of which belongs to the Pope alone, cannot be resigned into the hands of any ordinary lower than the Pope.

According to a decretal of Innocent III.,[1] a bishop can only resign his see for one of six causes, which are summed up in the memorial lines:—

Debilis, ignarus, male conscius, irregularis,
Quem mala plebs odit, dans scandala, cedere possit.

The lawful causes therefore are physical infirmity; ignorance, or a want of the knowledge necessary for the discharge of his office; the consciousness of some crime, such as heresy, which, even after penance done, would impede him in the performance of his duties; irregularity (see that article); great personal unpopularity, and some grave scandal, which nothing short of his resignation could remove. (Ferraris, Resignatio.)

RESPONSORIES. Verses said after the Lessons, so called according to Isidore because part of it is said by one reader or singer to whom the choir answer with the rest of the responsory. "Historia" is the name given in the Micrologia, because they mostly refer to the history in the Lesson or commemorated on the day. (Probst, "Brevier und Breviergebet," p. 107 seq.)

RESURRECTION OF THE BODY. The doctrine of a general resurrection of the dead, both good and bad, is nowhere taught in the Hebrew Bible. The Book of Isaias, xxvi. 19, certainly expresses faith in a resurrection. The prophet expresses the disappointment of the Jewish nation when their land was restored to them and they were not numerous enough to people it. But they must not lose heart. "Thy dead shall live: thy dead bodies shall arise. Awake and shout, ye who lie in the dust, for thy dew is a dew of lights, and the earth shall bring forth the shades"—i.e. the power of God shall descend like dew, instinct with the light of life; the corpses shall arise, and the departed spirits from the nether world will quicken them into their old life. We have in Osee vi. 2 ("He will quicken us after two days: on the third day He will raise us up and we shall live in his sight"), and in Ezech. xxxvii. 11–14 allusions to a resurrection, but only in an allegorical sense. In Daniel xii. 2, as in Isai. xxvi. 19, it is a literal and not a metaphorical resurrection which is intended, and the writer, who has the verse of Isaias in his mind, goes further, and teaches a resurrection to shame as well as to joy. "Many of them that sleep in the dusty earth shall awake, some to eternal life and some to eternal reproach and horror." The character of the book makes it likely that the "many" who are to rise are all Israelites, some of whom have been faithful to the law, others apostates; but in any case it is a resurrection of many, not of all, which is predicted. We have still to consider the famous passage in Job xix. 27. We venture to give the following as an exact translation of the Hebrew:—"I know that my avenger liveth, and at the last [lit. as the last one—i.e. to speak the last decisive word] he shall rise up on the dust. And after my skin has been thus destroyed [lit. which they have thus destroyed] and [away] from my flesh I shall see God, whom I shall behold for myself, and mine eyes shall have seen [a preterite of confidence] and not another: my reins waste [with longing] in my breast." There are very strong grounds for believing that Job here asserts his expectation of immortality, and this interpretation is held by critics, such as Ewald and Dillmann, who cannot be suspected of dogmatic prejudice. The confident hope of immortality shines forth clearly, just when Job's desolation, when the absence of all human comfort is most complete. The poem leads us up naturally to this expression of confidence. There is a gradual advance from the doubts of ch. xiv. to the sublime prayer and trust of xvi. 18 ad fin. All this culminates in the passage before us; nor does Job fall back again to the depth of his former despair. But, on the other hand, "from my flesh" may quite well, according to Hebrew usage, mean "away from my flesh." This use of the particle is very common in Hebrew (see, e.g., Gen. xxvii. 29, Jer. xlviii. 45), and a striking instance of the double sense of "from" in English will be found in "Richard III." act iv. scene 4.[1] In Second Maccabees we find the doctrine of the resurrection strongly asserted, but even there nothing is said about a resurrection of all men. And although the resurrection of the dead (תְּחִיַּת הַמֵּתִים) is the thirteenth article of the Jewish creed, the doctrine of a resurrection of both good and bad, says Weber ("Altsynag. Theol." p. 372), cannot be proved from the Talmud or Midrashim; and he quotes the dictum of Maimonides, "The resurrection of the dead is a fundamental article of Moses our teacher . . . but it only belongs to the just." Heathen, or Jews who are to be reckoned as heathen, have no part in it. We may add that David Kimchi on Ps. i. 5 ("the wicked shall not rise in judgment") denies the resurrection of the wicked, and on Ps. civ. 30 he says "it is disputed among our sages" whether the resurrection will be general; but adds that the "ways" or style of the Talmud favours the belief that it is the just only who will rise. This doctrine of the most orthodox Jewish doctors is by no means to be confounded with the Sadducee denial that the bodies of just or unjust rose again.

The New Testament, however, clearly teaches that the wicked also will rise again (see, e.g., Matt. v. 29, x. 28.) In it the resurrection of the just assumes a new prominence, and the "resurrection of the flesh" became an article of the Apostles' Creed, and one of the most characteristic[2] doctrines of Christianity. St. Paul insists that as death came by sin (Rom. v. 15), so Christ completes his redeeming work by raising to new life the bodies of those who sleep in Him (1 Cor. xv. 54 seq.) From the very first the doctrine was an object of Pagan ridicule (Acts xvii. 32), and the Fathers down to the end of the fourth century were constantly employed in answering Pagan and heretical objections. (See, e.g., Athanag. "De Resurrect." c. 4; Iren. "Adv. Hær." v. 3; Tertull. "Apol." 48; "De Carne Christi," 15; "De Resurrect." 3; Minuc. Felix, 11; Cyril Hieros. "Cat." xviii; August. "Enchirid." 26.) We cannot wonder at the objections which Pagans and heretics such as the Gnostics felt. Plato, the noblest of heathen philosophers, had regarded the body as the prison-house of the soul, and death as an escape from the bonds of matter. It was long before the world could accept the deeper view of the Christian Church—viz. that the body is a constituent part of human nature, that man, body and soul, is the work of God, and that both are precious in his sight. The Christians, on the other hand, during times of persecution comforted themselves with the thought of the resurrection. The symbols of it—e.g. the tree, the eagle, the egg, the peacock—occur on the oldest monuments; and so also the types of the resurrection—the three youths in the furnace, Job, Ezechiel, Daniel in the lion's den, the ascent of Elias, &c. (See Kraus, "Encycl. Archäol." art. Auferstehung.)

All the Creeds confess the resurrection of the body, but the fullest definition is that of the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215 (cap. i. "Adv. Albig."): "All will rise with their own proper bodies which they now wear." St. Thomas ("Supp." lxxix. a. 2) says it is heretical to deny the numerical identity of the body which dies and rises again; and the opinion attributed to Durandus (see Jungmann, "De Noviss." cap. iii. a. 2), viz. that the body will be the same in this sense only, that it will be informed by the same soul, does not seem to satisfy the terms of the Lateran definition. But this identity must not be pressed too strictly. Our bodies remain the same, though the atoms of which they are composed are in constant change. Jungmann (loc. cit.) lays it down as the common teaching of all Catholic theologians that we may suppose part of the elements of the risen body to be supplied by the power of God without in any way denying the truth of the resurrection. He admits that modern writers "of the best reputation" mention (and apparently hold) opinions which go much further than this.

We learn from St. Paul that the bodies of the just will rise incorruptible, glorious and spiritual—i.e. subject no longer to animal wants, but entirely dominated by the spirit (so Estius, ad 1 Cor. xv. 44). The Schoolmen have expanded this Pauline doctrine into the theory that the risen body will have four gifts or endowments, impassibility, claritas or splendour, the glory of the soul shining forth in the body, subtlety—i.e. the power of penetrating other bodies, as Christ passed through the closed doors, agility—i.e. the power of moving and acting swiftly at the will of the spirit.

RITUALE. A book which contains the forms to be observed by priests in the administration of the sacraments (communion out of Mass, baptism, penance, marriage, extreme unction), in churchings, in burials, in most of the blessings which they can give by ordinary or delegated authority. Such a book (under the title "Manuale") is mentioned in the year 1279 in the synodal statutes of Odo, Archbishop of Paris. It was known by many names—"Manuale," "Sacerdotale," "Agenda," "Institutio," "Baptizandi," "Pastorale," "Obsequiale," "Sacramentale," &c. "Manuale" seems to have been the common name in England ("Rituale" and "Manuale" in France), and the last edition of the "Sarum Manual" was printed at Douay in 1610. The contents of these books agree on the whole, but not in all details; some, for example, contain the order of confirmation, the blessing of bells, a few Masses, and the like, which are not in our Roman Ritual. A Sacerdotale was edited by Castellanus and printed at Rome in 1537. Previously the different dioceses were free to follow their own Rituals, but in 1614 an edition with the title "Rituale" was drawn up under Paul V., who in the bull "Apostolicæ Sedi" exhorted all prelates, secular and regular, to conform to it exactly.[1]

(From Zaccaria, "Bibliothec. Rit." tom. i. There is an edition of the Roman Ritual, with an elaborate commentary by Baruffaldius, 3rd Venetian ed., 1763, which is useful for practical purposes, but gives hardly any historical information. The commentary of Catalani is also well known. Zaccaria also mentions one in Italian by Mariscandolo, Lucca, 1742.)

ROCHET. A vestment of linen, fitting closely, with close sleeves reaching to the hands, proper to bishops and abbots. The use of it is also granted to certain other dignitaries (e.g. to some canons in virtue of privilege). The length and closeness of the sleeves distinguish it from the surplice. Priests who are allowed to wear it are to regard it as a choir vestment, and are not to use it in the administration of the sacraments. Bishops, on the other hand, wear it in giving confirmation.

Our word rochet is from the French, the French from the Low Latin rochettus, and that again from the old High German hroch, rocch, which is the same as the modern High German Rock, a coat. (So Littré, "Dict. Franç.") From the instances given in Ducange it appears to have been first an upper garment of common life, then a clerical dress. Lyndwood, our great English canonist of the fifteenth century ("Ad Prov. Eccles. Cant." lib. iii. tit. 27, quoted by Ducange) speaks of it as sometimes used by clerics serving Mass, or priests baptising, because it left their arms free, usages now strictly forbidden (see "Manuale Decret." art. v.), so that the modern limitation of the rochet to dignitaries recognised by Urban VIII. cannot have been old in that Pope's time.

The mozzetta and uncovered rochet are signs of plenary jurisdiction. Hence, a bishop may wear his rochet uncovered within his own diocese even in the churches of religious who are exempt, but not beyond its limits (Gavant. P. II. tit. iii.).

ROGATION DAYS. The Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday before Ascension Day are observed by all Catholics of the Latin rite as days of solemn supplication, and are called Rogation days because the Litany of the Saints is chanted in the procession which takes place on each of the three days, rogatio being the Latin equivalent for the Greek word litany. Those who are bound to recite the breviary, are also bound to say the litany privately, if not in procession. These litanies are called lesser, by comparison with the more ancient and solemn chanting of the litany on St. Mark's Day. [LITANIES.]

[1] The bull says "hortamur" merely; but the Cong. of Rites declared (Sept. 7, 1850) that the laws of the Roman Ritual "affect the universal Church," and (October 5, 1652) that all regulars "were bound" to follow it exactly.

The Rogations began in the kingdom of Burgundy, where they were instituted, or at least made solemn and public, by Mamertus, bishop of Vienne, at a time when the province suffered from earthquake and other troubles (Sidon. Apollinar. Ep. vii. 1). Thence they passed into the kingdom of Clovis, where the Council of Orleans (c. 27), in 511, requires the faithful to rest from servile work and to fast, or, as Thomassin thinks, to abstain, on these days.[1] In England the synod of Cloveshoe in 747 prescribes processions and fasting till none on the three days before Ascension, "according to the way of our fathers." A Spanish council (Concil. Gerund. can. 2) in 517 recognises Rogations with abstinence, but on the Thursday, Friday, and Saturday after Pentecost. The ancient custom at Milan, enforced by St. Charles Borromeo, was to hold the Rogations and to fast on the Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday after the Ascension. At Rome, according to Anastas. Bibliothec., it was Leo III. who introduced the Rogation days. But the obligation of fasting and rest from work which still existed in the French church[2] of Thomassin's time was not imposed at Rome. (From Thomassin, "Traité des Jeûnes," 1 P. ch. 24, 2 P. ch. 21.)

ROME. [See POPE.]

ROOD-BEAM AND ROOD-SCREEN. The rood-beam separates the choir from the nave, and is surmounted by a cross. There is no proof that any such thing was known in the early Church (see the article "Rood" in Smith and Cheetham), but it is common in modern churches, and was introduced as early at least as the twelfth century. Other figures besides the crucifix were often placed on it (e.g. those of the B. Virgin and St. John), and lights were burnt on it. Ducange quotes a mediæval writer who mentions fifty candles being placed on the tables or rood-beam. A veil used to be suspended from it during Holy Week. (Ducange, art. Trabes; Viollet le Duc, "Dict. de l'Architecture," art. Trabes.)

Screens separating choir from nave were introduced in French cathedrals towards the close of the thirteenth century, and the richest examples date from the fifteenth and sixteenth. It was not till the seventeenth and eighteenth that the heavy stone screens were replaced by grilles. (Viollet le Duc, art. Clôtures.)

ROSARY. A form of prayer in which fifteen decades of Aves, each decade being preceded by a Pater and followed by a Gloria, are recited on beads. A mystery is contemplated during the recital of each decade, and the rosary is divided into three parts, each consisting of five decades, and known as a corona or chaplet. In the first chaplet the five joyful mysteries are the subjects of contemplation—viz., the Annunciation, Visitation, the Birth of our Lord, his presentation in the Temple, his being found after the three days' loss. The sorrowful mysteries contemplated in the second chaplet are the Agony in the Garden, the Scourging, the Crowning with Thorns, the Carrying of the Cross, the Crucifixion. The glorious mysteries, which are allotted to the third chaplet, are the Resurrection of Christ, his Ascension, the Descent of the Holy Ghost, the Assumption and the Coronation of the Blessed Virgin. The word rosary first occurs in Thomas Cantipratanus, who wrote in the latter part of the thirteenth century ("De Apibus," ii. 13[1]—quoted by the Bollandists, "Vita S. Dominici"). The original meaning is very doubtful. We think it most likely that the word was used in a mystical sense and meant Mary's rose-garden. (So the writer of the article Rosenkranz in Herzog, "Encycl. für Protestant. Theol.") It was also called "Psalterium Marianum" because of the number 150. Catholics of the humbler class still speak of a pair of beads, thus preserving a pure and ancient mode of speech, "pair" meaning "set," as in "pair of organs"—i.e. a set of organ pipes, or, in other words, an organ.

The practice of using beads, &c., as a help to memory in reciting a set number of prayers is not distinctively Christian, but it has long existed in the Church. Palladius, a writer of the fifth century

[1] The Council of Tours in 567 (can. 17) requires monks to fast on the Rogation days.

[2] English Catholics were bound to abstain from flesh-meat on the feast of St. Mark and the Rogation days, till they were dispensed by Pius VIII. in 1830 (Conc. Prov. West. III. Appendix II.).

[1] As a title, however; not in the text.

("Hist. Lausiac." cap. 23), tells us that the Egyptian monk Paul in Pherme put 300 pebbles in his lap and flung away one as he finished each of the three hundred prayers he said. The English synod of Cealcythe (Mansi, "Concil." tom. xiv. 360) in 816 orders "septem beltidum Paternoster" to be sung for a deceased bishop. We can only guess at the meaning. But Spelman's conjecture that it means belts or circles of Paters is plausible. William of Malmesbury ("De Gest. Pont. Angl." iv. 4, quoted by the Bollandists, loc. cit.) says that Godiva, who founded a religious house at Coventry in 1040, left a circle of gems strung together, on which she used to tell her prayers, that it might be hung on a statue of the Blessed Virgin.

So far we have only considered the general question of reciting prayers on beads, &c. From the eleventh century the Bollandists produce the following instances of a fixed number of Aves addressed to the Blessed Virgin. Herimannus, at the close of the century, mentions a person who recited sixty Aves daily. The monk Albert, who lived about 1005, said 150 every day; so did St. Agbert, who died in 1140.

Thus we find early traces of the use of something corresponding to beads, and we can trace the 150 Aves back farther than St. Dominic's time, but no instance presents itself of 150 Aves, much less of 150 Aves and 15 Paters said on beads, before the lifetime of that saint. The notion that the Venerable Bede introduced the rosary is founded on an absurd etymology ("Bead," from "Beda"), and the statement of Polydore Virgil, who lived in the middle of the sixteenth century, that Peter the Hermit instituted the rosary, comes too late to have any weight. The common story that St. Dominic learnt the use of the rosary from the Blessed Virgin by revelation, and propagated it during the crusade against the Albigenses, has been accepted by later Popes—viz. Leo X., Pius V., Gregory XIII., Sixtus V., Alexander VII., Innocent XI., Clement XI. This belief rests, according to Benedict XIV. ("De Fest." § 160), on the tradition of the order; no contemporary writer vouches for it. But the Dominican Friar Nicolas (Quetif and Echard, "Script. Ord. Præd." tom i. p. 411) gave in 1270 to the B. Christina a Paternoster, "quod personaliter iv annis portaverat." Dominicans too are represented on a tomb of Humbertus Delphinus, who became a Dominican about 1350. with rosaries in their hands, so that the rosary in the strict sense cannot be much later than St. Dominic.

But, of course, the Ave of those days was not identical with the modern form. It was simply "Hail, Mary, full of grace, the Lord is with thee; blessed art thou amongst women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb." Further, the great Dominican writers Quetif and Echard show that the meditation on the mysteries is much later than St. Dominic. It began with a Dominican, Alanus de Rupe (De la Roche), born about 1428 ("Script. O. P." tom. i. p. 852). (The authorities consulted for this part of the article are the Bollandist dissertation on the Rosary, in the first vol. for August; Quetif and Echard; Benedict XIV. "De Fest." For Feast of the Rosary, see MARY, FEASTS OF.)

According to Benedict XIV., a Confraternity of the Rosary at Piacenza was indulgenced as early as 1254 by Alexander IV. The Living Rosary, in which fifteen persons unite to say the whole rosary every month, was approved by Gregory XVI.

A popular manual by Labis, translated by an English Passionist, enumerates the following rosaries besides the Dominican—viz. that of St. Bridget, 7 Paters and 63 Aves, in honour of the joys and sorrows of the Blessed Virgin and the 63 years of her life; that of the Seven Dolours, a Servite devotion; that of the Immaculate Conception, approved by Pius IX. in 1855; the Crown of our Saviour, attributed to Michael of Florence, a Camaldolese monk in 1516, and consisting of 33 Paters, 5 Aves, and a Credo; the Rosary of the Five Wounds, approved by Leo XII. in 1823 at the prayer of the Passionists.

ROSMINIANS. That is, the Fathers of the Institute of Charity, a congregation founded by the Italian philosopher Antonio Rosmini in 1828. According to the design of the founder, the members of the new society were to "embrace with all the desire of their souls every work of charity, without arbitrary limitation to any particular branch, undertaking all that should be required of them of which they should be capable."[1] The first house of the institute was built on the Monte Calvario, near Domo d'Ossola. In 1831 a branch of the society was established at Trent, and another at Verona two years later. In 1835, Fr. Gentili, over whose impulsive and unequal character, as may be seen in his biography,[1] the unwavering majesty of virtue seen in Rosmini had gained, after a long struggle, a complete and salutary ascendancy, was sent by the founder on a mission to England. After a short stay with the Trelawney family in Cornwall, Gentili was settled by Bishop Baines in the college of Prior Park, near Bath; before long he began to preach missions with signal success in the large towns, and died at Dublin while thus engaged in 1854. The variety of work done by the society in the first ten years of its existence was fully in accord with its declared aim; it consisted in giving retreats, preaching, sick-visiting, taking care of prisons and hospitals, teaching, missions abroad, literary work, and almsgiving. In 1838, on the report of the Congregation of Bishops and Regulars, the Institute of Charity and its rule were approved by the reigning Pontiff, Gregory XVI., who had a singular affection and admiration for Rosmini. Three months afterwards the founder and all his followers took the vows required by the rule, and in 1839 the Pope, by letters Apostolical, nominated Rosmini Superior-General of the Institute for life. It is well known that two of his smaller works, one of which was "Delle Cinque Piaghe della Santa Chiesa," were condemned by the Congregation of the Index in 1850. Rosmini's submission to the decree was absolute and unreserved; but a far more serious matter was behind, even the general examination of all his philosophical works, including the "Nuovo Saggio sull' Origine dell' Idee." After a severe and protracted scrutiny, the decision of the Congregation was given in 1854, "Dimittantur opera Antonii Rosmini-Serbati," the effect of which was to declare his works undeserving of censure on theological grounds. Meantime a novitiate had been opened on the side of the hill above Stresa, on the Lago Maggiore; and here Rosmini chiefly resided in the last years of his life. Insensible to the lustre of a genius destined permanently to influence European thought,[2] and to be one of the imperishable glories of the Italian mind, the Piedmontese Government, some years after Rosmini's death, which was in 1855, confiscated the house at Stresa, and converted it to some secular purpose. There are at the present time nine houses of the Institute in England and Wales: at Cardiff (2), London (Ely Place), Loughborough, Market Weighton, Newport, Ratcliffe, Rugby, and Wadhurst.

[2] A new Life by Mr. McWalter is announced (1883): an English version of the Nuovo Saggio is in course of publication. Rosmini's philosophy was described by a Protestant or free-thinking critic in the Contemporary Review in 1883 in terms of high appreciation.

RUBRICS. Directions for the order to be followed in Mass and other sacred rites. The word is taken from the Roman law, in which the titles, maxims, and principal decisions were written in red. Juvenal's words—"Causas age, perfice rubras majorum leges" (Sat. xiv.)—refer to this. MS. and even the first printed Missals have scarcely any rubrics. These were contained in Directories, Rituals, Ceremonials, Ordines. It was Burchard, Master of Ceremonies under Innocent VIII. and Alexander VI., who first set out at length both the words and the ceremonies of the Mass in his Roman Pontifical, printed at Rome in 1485, and again in his Sacerdotale, printed a few years later and reprinted under Leo X. After this the ceremonies were joined to the Ordinary of the Mass in some printed Missals and were finally arranged under their present titles by Pius V. The same course has been followed in the authoritative editions of the Pontifical, Ritual, &c. (Le Brun, tom. i. "Traité Prélim." a. 3.)

RULE, RELIGIOUS. At the time when Ferraris wrote, about the middle of the seventeenth century, it was considered that there were four principal rules of the religious life—the Basilian, the Benedictine, the Augustinian, and the Franciscan—under which, or some modification of which, the majority of the existing orders and congregations were ranged; while, in a few isolated cases, rules unconnected with any of these four were observed. So great a number of religious institutes, especially of women, has subsequently arisen in the Church, and obtained the approbation of the Holy See, that the classification of Ferraris is far from accurately corresponding to the present state of things.

The rule of St. Basil, founded by that saint about 360, besides being that generally observed by cœnobites in the Eastern Church, was followed, down to the recent secularisations, by a number of monasteries in Sicily, Italy, and Spain.

The rule of St. Augustine (390), according to the computation adopted by Hélyot, was followed by no less than ninety-seven congregations, including military orders. Among these were the Lateran Canons, the Canons of Arouaise, the Hermits and Regular Canons under the name of St. Austin, the Premonstratensians, the order of Preachers, the Servites, the Theatines, and the Barnabites. Connected with every general congregation following this rule were nuns of corresponding observance.

Hélyot enumerates sixty-seven congregations (including the monks of Camaldoli, the Cluniacs, the Cistercians, the Brigittines, &c.) as under the rule of St. Benedict (500), besides military orders.

The rule of St. Francis (1208) was and is professed, with more or less of rigour, by the various branches of the Franciscan order; of which the principal are the Observants, the Conventuals, the Poor Clares, and the Capuchins.

Among the religious following independent rules were the Carthusians, the Carmelites, the Discalced Carmelites of St. Teresa, and the Society of Jesus.

Many of the institutes contained in Hélyot's enumeration are now extinct; on the other hand, if we consult the Abbé Badiche's continuation of Hélyot, or turn over the pages of "Terra Incognita,"[1] we find that in the last eighty years an extraordinary number of new institutes, for the most part with determinate practical aims, under carefully adapted rules, and with simple vows, has arisen in the Church. Such are the Marists, the Faithful Companions of Jesus, the Rosminian Fathers, the Little Sisters of the Poor, the Sisters of Providence, the Nazareth Sisters, &c. &c.

RURAL DEANS (decani rurales). In the article DEAN it was explained how that title, which originally arose in the monasteries, was introduced into cathedral and collegiate chapters. The institution of rural deans appears to have commenced in Italy in the following manner. The first parishes, owing to the thinness of the population, were very large; as the population increased, the inconvenience of their size was felt; and Alexander III. ordered that new churches should be built in places where they were required, and endowed out of the revenues of the parish churches. The new churches would naturally be dependent on the church within the district of which they were built; this would be their matrix ecclesia, and its rector would appoint priests to them. Such larger districts came to be called plebes and the ecclesiastic in charge of one was named plebanus, or archipresbyter, or decanus. The practice grew up of monthly meetings of the priests in each plebs or rural-deanery, under the presidency of the plebanus. An archpriest in this sense differed entirely from the cathedral archpriest, who was at the head of the clergy serving a cathedral church. The rural deans were always subject to the archdeacon; nevertheless, by deputation from the bishop, they gradually drew to themselves a considerable jurisdiction, of which in later times they have been deprived. (Thomassin, "Vet. et Nova Eccl. Disc." i. 2, 6; Ferraris, Decanus.)

RUSSIAN CHURCH. According to the Russian legend, St. Andrew first preached the gospel in Russia and planted a cross at Kiev, but the truth is that Christianity came to Russia from Constantinople in the latter part of the ninth century. At that time the Russian Slavs had been united under the rule of Scandinavian princes, and Ruric founded the great Russian monarchy in 864. Soon after, however, two other princes, Ascold and Dir, also of Scandinavian origin, founded an independent kingdom at Kiev, so that Russia was divided into two kingdoms, both under Scandinavian rulers—viz. a northern monarchy with Novgorod, and a southern with Kiev, for capital. In 866 Ascold and Dir attacked Constantinople, and are said to have been converted by miracles, variously reported; but the fact is certain that their expedition led to the sending of missionaries from Constantinople to Russia. The exact chronology, which has a curious interest here, is hard to fix. According to Constantine Porphyrogenitus, the mission from Constantinople was sent in 867, when Ignatius, the lawful and Catholic Patriarch, was in possession, so that the first Russian Christians were Catholics, united to Rome. If, on the other hand, Nestor, the father of Russian history (d. 1113), is to be believed, the mission was sent in 866, and therefore under Photius, the schismatical Patriarch, so that the first Russian church was not in union with Rome. In any case, the impression made on the mass of the people at this time was very slight.

In 882 Russia was again subject to a single ruler, Oleg, Ruric's successor; Kiev, however, being the capital. In 955, Olga, the Russian Helena, was baptised at Constantinople; and in 988 her grandson

[1] By J. N. Murphy (Longmans, 1873).

Vladimir the Apostolic also became a Christian, and strove successfully to Christianise his people. Vladimir, whose life had been stained by infamous cruelty, sent ambassadors to examine the rites and doctrines of the Latins, Mohammedans, and Greeks, and attached himself to the latter because their worship was the most imposing. He sent missionaries through his dominions, destroyed idols, and though there were heathen Russians even in the twelfth century, still Vladimir may fairly be considered to have made the mass of the nation Christian. So far then, whatever the date of the first mission may have been, Russia, like the Mother-church of Constantinople, was in communion with Rome. The union was severed in the middle of the eleventh century by the schism of Michael Cærularius. But for a time the Russian church was in schism unawares, and knew little of the anti-Roman bitterness which prevailed at Constantinople. Even to this day, the Russians, in their liturgical books, written in Old Slavonic, assert the primacy of the Roman See. Pope Sylvester is called the "Divine head of the holy bishops;" Pope Leo, "the successor on the highest throne of St. Peter, the heir of the invincible rock and the successor in his kingdom." Martin, Pope in the seventh century, is thus addressed: "Thou didst adorn the divine throne of Peter, and, holding the Church upright on this rock which cannot be shaken, thou didst honour thy name;" and Leo III. (about 800): "O chief shepherd of the Church, do thou represent the place of Jesus Christ." The feeling was changed, though the liturgy still witnessed to the past, under Vladimir Monomachus[1] (1113). He was filled with hostility to Rome by Nicephorus, who came from Constantinople and was metropolitan of Kiev. This spirit was fostered by successive metropolitans from Constantinople, and has lasted ever since.

Unsuccessful attempts to unite the Russians with the Papacy were made by Alexander III., who corresponded with John III., metropolitan of Kiev (since 1164); by Innocent III. during the Latin occupation of Constantinople; by Clement III., who tried to engage Russia in the third crusade; by Innocent IV., when the Russians were groaning under Mongol domination (Mongol supremacy, 1238–1462). Gallicia, however, which had fallen under Hungarian rule, became Catholic, retaining its Slavonic rites, under Pope Honorius III. But there were causes which favoured the success of Catholicism in part of Russia. First, the Russians, weakened by Mongol oppression, could not cope with their enemies on the West—viz. the Poles and Lithuanians, and of these the Poles were Catholics; the Lithuanians, at first heathen, were won over to a great extent by the zeal of Dominican and Franciscan friars, in 1386 they became dependent on the Polish kingdom, and in 1387 all Lithuania except the Ruthenian provinces declared itself Catholic. The Lithuanian prince Vitolt seized strips of Russian territory, and was averse to the connection between his Ruthenian subjects and the Russian metropolitan. Next, the metropolitan see of the Russian church had been transferred to the city of Vladimir in 1299, to Moscow in 1328, though the title "Metropolitan of Kiev and all Russia" was retained. This weakened the hold of the Russian church in the South-West. In 1414 seven Russian bishops renounced allegiance to the metropolitan at Moscow and chose one of their own, resident at Kiev. After a vacancy of some years this metropolitan see of Kiev was occupied by Isidore, a Greek of Thessalonica, who at the Council of Florence in 1438 warmly supported the cause of union. To this union the church of Northern Russia and the temporal ruler, Vassili II., were from the first bitterly opposed, but it was accepted at Kiev and in the nine suffragan dioceses. All subsequent attempts at the conversion of Russia Proper—e.g. under Sixtus IV., Leo X.. and Clement VII.—proved fruitless. Russia, freed in 1462 from the Mongol yoke, won and converted vast provinces in the North and East. Even the union of Kiev and its suffragan sees to the Catholic Church was neither real nor lasting; though, as we shall see in a subsequent article on the RUTHENIAN CHURCH, it was afterwards renewed in a much more solid way.

The discipline of the Russian church has undergone many changes. In the middle ages the Metropolitan of Russia was nominated by the Duke and consecrated by the Patriarch of Constantinople. Once consecrated, the metropolitan had immense power even in secular matters; it was seldom, even in the fifteenth century, that the Duke dared to resist him.

[1] He was the first prince who was called "Czar" (= "Upper King"); but the title was not usual till the middle of the sixteenth century.

The other archbishops and bishops—in whose election the Prince, the clergy and people, and the metropolitan all took part—were placed in the strictest subjection to the metropolitans. Yet the bishops, on their part, had great influence. They were well supported by tithes, and held secular jurisdiction in their own lands. They had, moreover, the privilege of interceding for condemned persons; and no prince could engage in war till a bishop had given his blessing; if the blessing was withheld, no soldier would follow the banner. Thus, in spite of much ignorance and superstition, wretched disputes on the right way of making the sign of the cross, controversies whether processions should move from east to west or west to east, ready belief in grotesque miracles, still the influence of the bishops, who were taken from the monastic orders and were superior both in knowledge and character to the rest of the clergy, was a beneficent one on the whole. They did much to temper the barbarism of the times. At the end of the middle ages the power of the Crown was consolidated, that of the nobles and clergy declined, and the Czars began to act more and more as the heads of the church. Ivan IV. (1533–84) deposed and even murdered bishops, confiscated Church property, and forced the prelates to confirm his fourth marriage, which was against the Greek canon law, and to endure without protest his frequent divorces, his fifth, sixth, and even seventh marriage. In 1589, Jeremias II., Patriarch of Constantinople, consecrated Job, the metropolitan of Moscow, Patriarch of the Russias, and recognised him as the third Patriarch of the Eastern Church, inferior only to those of Constantinople and Alexandria. The metropolitan gained nothing by his change of title, but it suited the policy of the Czars to make the church national and independent. The strife of the Patriarch Nicon with the Czar Alexis Michaelovitz ended with the deposition of the latter at a council of Moscow in 1667, and early in the following century the entire subjection of the ecclesiastical to the imperial power was completed. For Peter the Great left the Patriarchal See vacant for twenty years, and then, in 1721, with the consent of the Eastern Patriarchs, placed the whole government of the Russian church in the hands of the "Holy Synod," which depended entirely on the Czar. Catharine II. seized all the Church property, and since then the prelates have had a regular salary apportioned to them by the State.

The synod consists of twelve members, though the number has varied at different times. The members are nominated by the Czar, who may remove them at will.[1] The synod in 1881 was made up of the Metropolitan of Novgorod, president, four other metropolitans, the Emperor's confessor, and the grand chaplain of the army and fleet. The two last are secular priests. To these is attached a chief procurator as representative of the Czar and other lay officials. This procurator, who in 1770 was a brigadier, may put his veto on any measure, till it has been laid before the sovereign. Further, each member on entering office swears that he recognises the Czar "as supreme judge in this spiritual assembly." But if on the one side the synod is entirely subject to the Crown, on the other the centralising system of the Russian Government gives the synod enormous power in the church. It proposes suitable candidates for vacant sees to the Czar, it translates and deposes bishops, it can with the Czar's formal approval make new laws for the church, it gives dispensations, it watches over doctrine and ritual, sees to the printing of liturgical books, examines relics and the evidence for alleged miracles, has the control of ecclesiastical colleges, receives appeals from the bishops, it decides on the money to be given for building churches and monasteries, and superintends the payment of the clergy. Nay, since 1809 the bishops must transmit to the synod the money made in their dioceses by sale of candles, use of churches, sale of bridal crowns, collections in churches, &c. The whole sum is then apportioned to the different dioceses according to their needs.

Bishops are really all equal, except so far as they are divided into three classes, and receive more or less support from the Government. Since the time of Peter the Great, metropolitan and archbishop have become mere titles of honour given by the Czar and not attached to any diocese, except that the Bishops of Kiev and of Novgorod and St. Petersburg are always archbishops, while Siberia is always placed under a metropolitan. If a see is vacant, the Holy Synod recommends two candidates to the Czar, who, however, often takes the first step and names a person whom the synod have to choose. The bishops are all unmarried, and therefore chosen from the monks. They cannot leave their dioceses on any account without leave from the synod. They must make a complete visitation at least every three years. They are urged to be zealous in establishing schools, and they may enforce discipline in the case of the secular clergy by punishment, not however in that of the regulars, unless they are armed with a decree from the synod. The bishop is assisted by a Consistory composed of the most experienced and distinguished secular and regular clergymen. The bishop presents them to the synod, but cannot remove them when once approved. The Consistory watches over orthodoxy, prepares returns on the state of the diocese for the synod, and for this purpose has a body of officials in Government pay at its disposal. Appeal lies from the Consistory to the bishop, thence to the synod. In very large dioceses—e.g. Novgorod and Moscow—a district is placed under a vicar who is in episcopal orders, but differs in this from other bishops that there is an appeal from him to his metropolitan. Vicars were also appointed in 1832 for countries where the people are mostly Catholic or Protestant. The number of those who compose the bishops' household is settled, and each official fed and paid by the Government. There are three prelates of the first class—viz. the Metropolitans of Kiev, of Novgorod and St. Petersburg (united since 1764), of Moscow and Colomna. There are seventeen bishops of the second class, thirty of the third, nine vicars. Since 1801 Georgia was incorporated within the Russian Empire, and there the Metropolitan of Tiflis is Exarch, and there are five bishops. There is also, since 1858, a Russian bishop at Jerusalem. The classes of bishops have, of course, nothing to do with their jurisdiction, for in that respect all, except the vicars, are on one dead level under the synod. The classes simply refer to the amount of their allowance from the Government.

The "white" or secular clergy must all be married, and are mostly sons of priests. They begin their education at the parish school, continue it at the district school and diocesan seminary, and finish at one of the four ecclesiastical academies—those of St. Petersburg, Kiev, Moscow, and Kasan. Three or four years are spent at each of these stages. The benefices are all conferred by the bishop, except that landed proprietors have often a right of patronage in country churches —so far, at least, that they can put a veto on the nomination of a cleric whom they do not wish to have. The Government supports a certain number of clergymen in churches which had more than twenty serfs before the confiscations of Catharine II. There are numerous officials at the cathedrals, and even small country churches are supposed to have a deacon as well as a priest. Each regiment has a priest, reader, sacristan, door-keeper, and sometimes also a deacon. In peace, military chaplains are subject to the bishop of the place; in the field, to a Proto-Pope who is set over them. A canon of the fifteenth century required a priest who lost his wife to live like a layman in a monastery. This law of enforced seclusion was set aside by Peter the Great. A widowed priest may now get leave from the synod to officiate as before; and even in the case of second marriage an edict of Peter the Great in 1724 permits a priest to be employed as rector of a seminary, or in the episcopal chancery, if he has applied himself diligently to study and especially to preaching.

The Russian religious follow the rule of St. Basil. Men must not be professed till they are forty, women till they are fifty. The noviciate lasts three years, and is followed by another period of probation. The discipline is strict, and only a few monks receive holy orders. Regular priests never have parishes, but the naval chaplains are taken from monks educated in the Monastery of St. George at Balaclava; and not only the bishops, but also many preachers, confessors, and prelates generally, are supplied by them. According to the synodal report of 1838, there were 225 monasteries and 100 nunneries receiving support from the State in place of confiscated property, besides 161 monasteries and thirteen nunneries maintained by themselves or by the people. Only seven religious houses are stauropegia —i.e. exempt from episcopal rule and subject immediately to the synod.

The great symbolical book of the Russian church is Ἔκθεσις τῆς τῶν Ῥώσων Πίστεως ("Exposition of the Faith of the Russians") drawn up by Mogila, metropolitan of Kiev, and his suffragans between 1630 and 1640. At the desire of the Patriarch of Constantinople, it was examined by a commission of delegates from Constantinople and Kiev, received the title of "Confession of Faith of the Catholic and Apostolic Eastern Church"

(Ὁμολογία τῆς Πίστεως τῆς Καθολικῆς καὶ Ἀποστολικῆς Ἐκκλησίας τῆς Ἀνατολικῆς), was approved by the four Eastern Patriarchs, and again by the Synod of Jerusalem in 1672. There are authoritative translations into Slavonic, and it has been edited with a Latin version by Kimmel ("Libri Symbol. Eccles. Orientalis," 1843). The Little Catechism brought out by order of Peter the Great is merely a compendium of the "Exposition" or "Confession."

This Confession shows that except on a very few points the Russians believe as the Catholic Church believes. Their Confession teaches the necessity of good works for salvation; that Scripture and tradition are the two sources of faith; the intercession and invocation of the Blessed Virgin, the saints, and the angels; that the faithful departed are helped by prayers, alms, and the sacrifice of the Eucharist; the Seven Sacraments, transubstantiation (μετουσίωσις), &c. The commandments of the Church—such as fasting, hearing Mass on Sundays and feasts, &c.—are much the same as those in Catholic Catechisms. But the Russians deny the Pope's supremacy, and the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Son; further, they hold that marriage may be dissolved on account of adultery, and maintain that baptism by sprinkling is invalid. On this last point they differ from the Greeks. On Purgatory, their doctrine is less sharply defined than ours, but they hold all which we hold as of faith.

Such is the formal teaching of the Russian church. But since the latter half of the last century education has made great strides, and Western, but especially German, theology has exercised a marked influence on the more educated members of the clergy. Prelates in high place have shown their leanings to Protestant views, and this tendency has appeared in books printed with the approval of the Holy Synod. The Catechism of Plato, archbishop of Moscow and tutor to Paul I., differs essentially from the old Catechism in the doctrine of the Sacraments, and especially that of the Eucharist. In 1805, Archbishop Methodius, of Tver, published in Latin, with the approval of the synod, a work on the first four centuries of the Church, founded chiefly on Bingham. Philaret, the late patriarch of Moscow, a man of talent and of cultivated mind, formed a school of theologians imbued with the spirit of German Protestantism. He issued a Catechism, and a Review of the Controversies between East and West. While Germans like Neander and Schleiermacher have been read and studied, Catholic theologians are little known, and there is a constant tendency to soften the points of difference between Russians and Protestants, and to accentuate those which separate Russians from Catholics. At the same time, the interest in the Greek Fathers and in the old Russian orthodoxy has been revived in a certain section of the younger clergy.

(The historical account and the sketch of doctrine are from Hefele's "Essay on the Russian Church," 1864; the statistics from Silbernagl, "Kirchen des Orients," ch. iii., 1865. An article by Professor Lamy, of Louvain, in the "Dublin Review" for April 1881, has also been consulted.[1])

RUTHENIAN CATHOLICS. The name is given to Christians who use the Greek liturgy translated into Old Slavonic, but own obedience to the Pope. They are descendants of converts from the Russian Church, who have kept their old rites and discipline.

The metropolitan see of Kiev and its suffragan dioceses were united to the Catholic Church, as has been said in the article on the Russian. The union was never satisfactory, and the last trace of it had disappeared early in the sixteenth century. But the cause of union was zealously promoted by the Jesuit school established at Vilna by Father Possevin and by the Polish king Calixtus III. In 1595 the Metropolitan of Kiev and seven suffragans were at their own request received by Clement VIII. into the Catholic communion. Thus, the Ruthenian province arose; the metropolitan was chosen by the bishops and all were placed under Propaganda, which was represented by the Polish nuncio. But at the partition of Poland all the Catholic Ruthenian dioceses, except Lemberg, Przemysl, and part of Brezk, became Russian dominion. In 1795 Russia suppressed all the dioceses except one; in 1798 three dioceses were tolerated, a fourth in 1809, two only by Nicholas in 1828. In 1839 three bishops joined the schismatic Russians, and there was till lately only one see of the United Ruthenians in Russian Poland—viz.

[1] The reader will find a vivid and interesting account of the Russian church in a work of Mr. Palmer, recently edited by Cardinal Newman.

Chelm and Belz—immediately subject to the Pope. At present there is another bishopric—viz. Minsk—suffragan to Mohilew. There were in 1865 about 250,000 Catholics of the Ruthenian rite in Russian Poland. The see of Suprasl was erected in 1799 for the Ruthenians in Prussian Poland; they numbered about 40,000.

In the Austrian territory the see of Lemberg, with its suffragan sees of Przemysl, Sanek, and Sambor belongs to the Ruthenian Church of Poland, and the history of its union with the Catholic Church has been just given. The metropolitan see of Lemberg was erected for the two millions of Ruthenian Catholics in Gallicia by Pius VII. in 1807, Kalik and Kamenek being united to it. But besides this, many schismatical Slavs in Hungary followed the example set by their Polish brethren in 1595. The union only lasted till 1627, and though a bishop of Munkacs became Catholic in 1649, the population remained schismatic. More was done for the Catholic cause by the Ruthenian bishop De Camillis at the end of the seventeenth century, and in 1771 the diocese of Munkacs was properly constituted by Clement XIV. The Catholic population amounts to 360,000 souls. From the diocese of Munkacs that of Eperies was divided in 1816. It contains 160,000 souls. Munkacs, Eperies, and Creis (apparently a new see) are under the Latin Archbishop of Gran. In Croatia the Ruthenians had one diocese, that of Kreutz, with 20,000 souls, erected in 1777, and subject to the Latin Metropolitan of Agram. But the see, though it existed very lately, is omitted in the latest official lists.

The Ruthenians have a married secular clergy and religious who follow the rule of St. Basil. The bishops are usually taken from the monks. The Ruthenians are under the laws made by Propaganda for Catholics of Greek rite living among Latins. Their bishops at their consecration make the profession of faith prescribed for the Greeks by Urban VIII. (Silbernagl, "Kirchen des Orients.")

SABELLIANISM. A name given to two very different forms of doctrine, which, however, agreed in this that they denied any real distinction of Persons in God. The Catholic Church teaches that there are three divine Persons really distinct from each other, and yet one God. The Sabellians confessed with Catholics the numerical unity of God, but denied the mystery of the Trinity by explaining away the real distinction of the Persons.

(1) The earliest form of the heresy was Patripassianism. Praxeas, who came from Asia Minor to Rome under Pope Eleutherus (175–189), Noetus of Smyrna, who was excommunicated in his own province about 230, Epigonus and Cleomenes, who transplanted the doctrine of Noetus to Rome, all held that God the Father of all is the only God and that this one God became man, suffered and died. Thus Praxeas held "that the Father came down into a virgin, that He himself was born of her, that He himself suffered: finally, that He himself is Jesus Christ" (Tertull. "Adv. Prax." 1, and so 28, 29, 30). Pressed to explain how it was that Father and Son could be said on this theory to exist at all after the Incarnation, Praxeas replied that Christ so far as He was flesh was Son, and so far as He was spirit or God was the Father (ib. 27). The tenets of Noetus were precisely the same (Hippolytus, "C. Noet." ed. Lagarde, "Philosoph." ix. 7–10). And such also was the original doctrine of Sabellius, a Libyan, who came to Rome under Zephyrinus, was banished from the Roman Church by Callistus, and took refuge in the Libyan Pentapolis. The testimonies as to the original teaching of Sabellius are too early and express to be set aside. "He" (Sabellius) "blasphemes," says Dionysius, bishop of Rome, in the middle of the third century, "saying that the Son himself is the Father, and vice versâ." (The Epistle of Dionysius is contained in Athanas. "De Decret. Nicen. Syn." and edited by Routh, "Rell. Sacr." vol. iii. p. 373 seq.) Novatian, another author, nearly contemporaneous, speaks of Sabellius as one "who calls Christ the Father" (Novat. "De Trin." c. 12). The Macrostich, a Semiarian creed of the Eusebians (apud Athanas. "De Synod." 26), refers to those whom the Latins call the Patripassians and we the Sabellians. So also Athanasius, iii. 36; and Cardinal Newman ("Oxford Translation of St. Athanas." p. 529) quotes on the same side Euseb. "Eccl. Theol." i. p. 91; Basil. Ep. 210, 5; Rufin, "In Symb." 5; August. "Hær." 41; Theodor. "Hær. Fab." ii. 9.)

(2) The doctrine of the Sabellians, and perhaps of Sabellius himself, underwent a complete transformation, and resolved the mystery of the Trinity into three manifestations of God to man. It was difficult for Sabellianism, in its original form, to assume even the appearance of conformity to the traditional teaching, embodied in the form of baptism, on the Holy Ghost. A very early author, Dionysius of Alexandria (apud Euseb. "H. E." vii. 6) reproaches the Sabellians with this very thing, "that they had no idea of the Holy Ghost" (ἀναισθησίαν τοῦ ἁγίου πνεύματος.) It was conceivable that the Father should have been incarnate in Christ, but there was no room for such an incarnation, and therefore on Sabellian principles for a real existence of the third Person in the Trinity. Hence Sabellius, or at least the Sabellians, came to hold that the same Person is the Holy Ghost so far as He manifests Himself in the Christian Church, and by parity of reasoning Son so far as He appeared in Christ. The same Person or Hypostasis (so Theodor. "Hær. Fab." ii. 9, reports the doctrine of Sabellius) was Father when He gave the law, Son when He became flesh in Christ, Holy Ghost when He descended on the Apostles, being "one person with three names" (ἓν τριώνυμον πρόσωπον.) He compared the three πρόσωπα or characters of God (Epiphan. "Hær." 62, 1) to the spherical form, light and heat of the one sun. Such late authorities are not decisive for the supposition that Sabellius himself held this view, but undoubtedly the Sabellians did. Patripassianism was thus avoided altogether; but on the other hand the Incarnation, no less than the Trinity, was in effect denied, for the manifestation of God in Christ could differ in degree only, and not in kind, from his union with other holy men. This Sabellian doctrine, which takes πρόσωπον or persona in its original meaning of mask, character, &c., has been maintained by many Protestant divines—e.g. by Archbishop Whately in his "Logic." It is of course completely incompatible with Catholic belief, and is contrary, e.g., to the first chapter of St. John's Gospel

(3) Closely akin to the later Sabellianism is the doctrine of Marcellus of Ancyra. He was a strenuous defender of the Nicene definition against the Arians, and this and the obscurity of his doctrine account for the fact that he was defended by Pope Julius, the Synod of Sardica, and Athanasius himself (Athanas. "Apol. c. Arian." 23, 32; "Ep. ad Monach. et Hist. Arian." 6.) He made the Λόγος a mere attribute of God like the reason of man, manifesting itself in the creation, in the incarnation, and in the sanctification of Christians. (Theodor. "Hær. Fab." ii. 10). In Christ the Word dwelt with extraordinary power, to retire from him at the consummation of all things, when the manhood of Christ would no longer reign. (Euseb. "Adv. Marcell." ii. 2–4; "Eccl. Theol." iii. 8–17.)

(Newman, "Notes on Athanasius"; Petavius, "De Trinitate"; Kuhn, "Trinitätslehre"; Döllinger, "Hippolytus and Callixtus.")

SACRAMENTALS. We shall show in the article on SACRAMENTS that the word, not only by Fathers like St. Augustine, but even by mediæval theologians, was widely used for the most sacred and solemn rites of the Church. We have seen that St. Augustine, like the Roman Rituale in present use, called the salt in baptism a sacramentum, while mediæval writers use the word of religious profession, holy water, &c. After Peter Lombard, when the use of the word and its definition became restricted and fixed, the name "sacramental" was given to rites which have some outward resemblance to the sacraments, but which are not of divine institution. The word sacramentalia occurs in the "Summa" of St. Thomas (iii. 713), but he does not, so far as we know, enumerate or classify them, and with him sacramentalia seems only to mean ceremonies accompanying the sacraments.

The sacramentals are enumerated in the following line—

Orans, tinctus, edens, confessus, dans, benedicens;

—i.e. the prayers of the Church—above all the Lord's prayer—and alms (however, to be called "sacramentals," prayer must be said or the alms given in the name of the Church or in a consecrated place; otherwise, as Billuart says, they do not differ from other good works), blessed bread, the confession at Mass and in the Office, the blessing of bishops or abbots, holy water (with which we may class blessed ashes, candles, palms, &c.). If the "sacramentals" are used with pious dispositions they excite increased fear and love of God, detestation of sin, and so, not in themselves, but because of these movements of the heart towards God, remit venial sins. They have a special efficacy, because the Church has blessed them with prayer, and so when, e.g., a person takes holy water, accompanying the outward act with the desire that God may cleanse his heart, the prayer of the whole Christian people is joined to his own. The opinion that "sacramentals" remit venial sins by a power given them by God over and above the good dispositions with which they are used, is held by some, but rejected by Juenin, and even by Billuart, as destitute of warrant in Scripture or tradition.

SACRAMENTARY (or Liber Sacramentorum.) A book containing the rites for Mass and the sacraments generally—e.g. holy orders, baptism, &c.; also for various sacramental rites—e.g. dedication of churches, consecration of nuns, &c. It is represented by our Missal, Pontifical, and Ritual. On the other hand, the Sacramentary had few rubrics.

An imperfect Roman Sacramentary, without Ordo or Canon, was published by Muratori in his "Liturgia Romana Vetus." It is known as the Leonine, though some of the Missæ are probably later than Leo I. The Gelasian Sacramentary was published from a ninth-century MS. in the Vatican by Cardinal Thomasius. The Gregorian is a revision of the Gelasian Sacramentary. Three Gallican Sacramentaries (Missale Gothicum, Gallicum, Francorum) were published by Thomasius, and reprinted by Mabillon and Muratori. Another known as Bobbiense was discovered by Mabillon at Bobbio, and printed by him in his "Museum Italicum." (See LITURGIES; MISSAL; ORDO; RUBRICS.)

SACRAMENTS OF NATURE AND OF THE JEWISH CHURCH. If we define a sacrament as "a sign of a sacred thing, which thing sanctifies men," we are able to include the sacraments of nature, the old law, and the Christian Church in one common class. All are outward signs; all were instituted by God; and hence distinguished from "sacramentals." But they do not all confer grace ex opere operato. It was the primary and direct object of the Jewish sacraments to typify the mysteries of the Christ who was to come. Moreover, the grace which most at least of the Jewish sacraments effected was not grace in the proper sense, but an outward and legal status, a position as members of the Jewish Church. We lay down these principles provisionally, for there is scarcely a question in theology which has occasioned a greater variety of opinion.

The existence of grace given by sacraments before Christ does not seem to have occurred to anyone previous to St. Augustine. His clear apprehension of the doctrine of original sin led him to believe that some remedy for it must have been prescribed before Christ came, and this remedy he found in circumcision ("De Nupt. et Concupisc." ii. 11; "Adv. Donat." iv. 24). This explanation, however, did not touch the case of children born before Abraham received the covenant of circumcision. He thinks it incredible that those under the law of nature had no sacred sign of the Mediator (sacramentum) by which they "helped their little ones," though he does not profess to know what this sign was ("Adv. Julian." v. 11). Subsequent Latin Fathers, and the Schoolmen generally, adopted St. Augustine's theory, and the term "sacraments of the old law" has been adopted by the Councils of Florence and Trent. The latter council anathematises (sess. vii. De Sacr. can. 2) the view of Calvin ("Instit." iv. 14)[1] that there is no difference except in the outward rite between the sacraments of the old law and the new; but this is all the Church has decided in the matter. It is agreed that the statement of Eugenius IV. in the Council of Florence ("Instructio pro Armen.")—viz. that the sacraments of the old law, unlike those of the new, did not confer but only typify grace—is not a definition of faith. (See Tournely, "De Sacr. in Gen." qu. 3, a. 3.)

We have to distinguish between the sacrament or sacraments of the law of nature and circumcision on the one hand and the many sacraments of the Mosaic law—e.g. the paschal lamb, the ordination of priests and Levites, legal purifications, &c.—on the other. The opinions of the School divines are thus given by Tournely

[1] He of course admitted this difference, that the sacraments of the old law shadowed forth Christ who was to come, while those of the gospel "bear testimony to Him as already come."

(1) With regard to the Mosaic sacraments excluding circumcision. The Master of the Sentences denied that anyone was justified by them, even if they were performed in faith and charity. Durandus believed that grace was given by some of the Mosaic sacraments—at least by ordination to the priesthood. Hugo of St. Victor and Bonaventure, followed by Estius, hold that the old sacraments gave grace ex opere operato, not indeed in themselves and primarily, but so far as they were signs by which men confessed their faith in the Redeemer. St. Thomas and many others have thought that the sacraments of the old law gave grace not ex opere operato, but ex opere operantis—i.e. because of faith in the minister and recipient. (2) As to circumcision. The Master of the Sentences, Bonaventure, and many of the most celebrated Schoolmen —e.g. Alexander of Hales, Scotus, Durandus, held that circumcision was primarily and directly instituted as a remedy for original sin, and of itself sufficed to remove it. We may notice in passing that neither Scripture nor Philo and Josephus, nor the Rabbins, attribute any such efficacy to circumcision. Lastly, St. Thomas holds that circumcision did indeed remit sin and confer grace, not, however, in itself, but as a type of Christ's Passion, the faith of the recipient if an adult being requisite, and in the case of an infant the faith of others in his behalf. On these conditions it remitted original and actual sin if the latter had been committed. In the case of children who died before the eighth day (or, we may add, of female children) he suggests that some other sign of faith on the part of the parents sufficed. But he points out that circumcision did not, like baptism, impress a character which incorporates a man with Christ; nor did it give a title to the immediate possession of heaven, nor bestow such abundant grace as baptism (iii. 70, 4.)

SACRAMENTS OF THE GOSPEL. 1. Definition and General Opposition between Catholic and Protestant Doctrine. —The Roman Catechism (P. II. cap. i. n. 4), following the Council of Trent (sess. xiii. cap. 3) defines a sacrament as "a visible sign of invisible grace instituted for our justification." There must be a visible sign. Constantly, indeed, is grace bestowed without sign at all; God justifies at once the sinner who turns to Him with sorrow and love, and his grace is continually descending on the hearts of the just, but in all these cases there is no sign, and therefore no sacrament. This sign is efficacious—i.e. it really effects the grace which it signifies. Moral and spiritual dispositions, it is true, are required in order that those who have come to the use of reason may receive the grace of the sacraments; but these dispositions are the condition and not the cause of grace, the grace given is far beyond the pious feelings which the mere sign awakens, and herein lies the difference between sacraments such as baptism and sacramental rites instituted by the Church, such as sprinkling with holy water. Lastly, it is beyond the power of man to make earthly things the channels of divine grace; the Church may bless holy water and hope that her prayers for those who use it will be heard; she cannot make water "the laver of new birth." Such power belongs to Christ, the author and the finisher of our salvation, and therefore the institutor of the sacraments.

Very different was the Protestant doctrine against which the definitions of Trent were framed. According to the Lutherans, the sacraments did not produce grace, but were pledges and seals of God's promises to us. Thus Melanchthon says God invites us to his table in order to remove all doubt from our minds that He has forgiven us, and the Augsburg Confession describes the sacraments as "signs and testimonies of God's good will towards us." Calvin's teaching is substantially the same, while Zwingli made the sacraments signs, not of God's fidelity, but of ours. We receive the sacraments to show that we believe: they are merely the badges of Christian profession. Several consequences followed from the Lutheran definition. It became necessary to reduce the number of the sacraments, for it could not be said—e.g. of marriage and holy order—with any show of reason that their primary and direct object was to excite faith. Next, the Lutheran doctrine of the sacraments was out of all harmony with Lutheran belief in consubstantiation. Why should Christ work a miracle and place his true body and blood under the bread and wine, if He did but mean to confirm and renew his promises? A simple feast of bread and wine received in his name and at his bidding was surely enough, and so Luther's doctrine naturally led to that of the Sacramentarians, which he so bitterly opposed. Further, the Anabaptists were fully justified by the Lutheran definition of a sacrament in rejecting infant baptism, since a sacrament cannot possibly excite faith or assurance in an unconscious child. Equally logical were the Society of Friends and other small sects which abandoned the sacraments entirely; the perfect believer might fairly plead that to him God's word was enough, and needed no confirmation by outward signs or seals. So it happened that while the Calvinists, Zwinglians, Anabaptists, &c., advanced on the path of negation, the later Lutherans retreated and almost accepted the Catholic doctrine. The "Apology" admits that a "promise of grace" is annexed to the sacraments ("sacramenta vocamus ritus, qui habent mandatum Dei et quibus addita est promissio gratiæ." For references on the Lutheran and Reformed doctrine, see Möhler, "Symbolik," book i. ch. iv.)

The fact is that the differences between Catholics and Protestants on the doctrine of the sacraments springs from the still more radical difference between them on redemption and justification. The Reformers held that man's nature was wholly and incorrigibly bad; he could only appropriate Christ by faith and have the merits of another set down to his account. The Church, on the contrary, teaches that Christ's grace purifies man within, really makes him just, and ennobles his whole earthly life by imparting to it a divine and heavenly character. And just as Christ appeared in flesh, just as virtue went forth from that body which He took, just as He saved us by that blood which He willingly shed in love for us, so He continues to make sensible things the channels of that grace by which our lives are elevated and sanctified. In baptism we are born again; in confirmation we grow up to perfect men in Christ; communion is the daily bread by which the life of the soul is maintained; in penance God "heals the soul which has sinned against Him"; when death is near, unction comes to remove the last remnant of infirmity and prepare the soul for final glory. But man has a social as well as an individual nature. Marriage is given that natural impulses which have often proved the source of corruption and crime may become the fountain of blessing, that the young may be brought up in God's love and fear, and the Church be the fruitful mother of children. Order is instituted that the Church may be ruled by those whom God has set over her, may be fed by the word of life and with the other sacraments. (St. Thomas, III. qu. lxv. a. 1.)

(2) The Number of Sacraments.—We have already touched on this division of the subject, for we have just given a rationale of the Seven Sacraments from the "Summa" of St. Thomas. The Catholic Church has defined that there are seven sacraments of the new law, and seven only. That there are seven sacraments is proved by the arguments given in favour of each from Scripture and the perpetual tradition of the Church, while, on the other hand, as we shall presently show, there is no other rite which can claim a place in the same category. Again, though it is quite true that the enumeration of seven sacraments was unknown for nearly twelve centuries of Church history, this is explained by the fact that the word sacramentum has various senses, and till its sense had been definitely fixed, or some other word found as a substitute, the enumeration of seven sacraments was impossible. Indeed, the history of this enumeration furnishes an argument on our behalf. How was it that when once Peter Lombard had fixed the number and names of the seven sacraments, his view was at once and universally, or all but universally, accepted? The answer is, because he supplied the complete and correct formula for the doctrine which the Church already held. His statement came like a right word which exactly expresses a man's meaning, but which he has been long searching for in vain. Once more, the Greeks separated from the Catholic Church before the list of sacraments had been made. Yet they, too, reached the same conclusion. The "Orthodox Confession of the Eastern Church," solemnly accepted by all the Eastern Patriarchs and used by the Russians, gives (ad Qu. 97) the number of sacraments as seven, corresponding to the Seven Gifts of the Holy Ghost, and names the same seven which we confess (Confirmation being called τὸ μύρον τοῦ χρίσματος). So, too, the Confession of Dositheus, schismatical patriarch of Jerusalem, accepted in the Council of Jerusalem in 1672, declared that there were seven sacraments, and that it was a sign of "heretical madness" to say there were more or less. The Protestant Confessions, with scarcely an exception, deny that there are more than two. But such a denial had never been made before, except by some of the mediæval heretics. And even the Protestants were not sure of their ground. The 'Apology" of Melanchthon, subscribed by the chief Lutherans, acknowledges that "baptism, the supper, and absolution, are three true sacraments." And it adds a fourth, since "no difficulty need be made against putting Order in this rank, if it be taken to mean the ministry of the word, because it is commanded by God and has great promises." Confirmation and Extreme Unction are said to be "ceremonies received by the Fathers," which have no express promise of grace. In Marriage they recognise divine institutions, but with promises of temporal blessing only. "As if," says Bossuet, "it were a temporal thing to bring up children of God for the Church, and to be saved by begetting them in this fashion (1 Tim. ii. 15), or as if it were not one of the fruits of Christian marriage to cause the children born in it to be called holy, as being destined for sanctity" (Bossuet, "Variations," livr. iii. ch. 51).

In tracing the history of the numeration within the Church, we may distinguish four different stages. Till about the end of the fourth century, we find usually two, and sometimes three rites placed together as sacraments. Tertullian, for example, speaks in the same place of Baptism and the Eucharist ("De Corona," 3), and he calls the latter a "sacramentum"—though nothing can be made of this, for he uses sacramentum for the oath or obligation of Christian service, for a mystery, and for a sign of any kind which conceals a sacred meaning. This use of the words sacramentum and μυστήριον is common to the New Testament, the Old Latin, the Vulgate, and all the Fathers, and is still retained in Greek and Latin. A century before, Justin (1 Apol. 61 seq.) had explained together the two sacraments of Baptism and the Eucharist, and, long after, Chrysostom ("In Joann." Hom. 84), preaching on the water and blood which flowed from Christ's side, said, "Thence the sacraments [μυστήρια] take their origin"—viz. Baptism and the Eucharist—"which the initiated know." On the other hand, Cyprian (Ep. 73) classes Baptism and Confirmation ("signaculum dominicum") together, clearly making each a channel of sacramental grace in the strict sense; and in like manner Pacian ("De Baptism." 6) speaks of the sacrament or mystery of the laver and of chrism ("lavacri et chrismatis et antistitis sacramentum"—meaning only two rites, not three, for the action of the prelate is common to both sacraments). Further, Ambrose ("De Virgin." cap. 10) seems to attribute a sacramental efficacy to the washing of the feet. And here we add, for the sake of convenience, that the author of the famous treatise "De Sacramentis" (iii. 7) long attributed to St. Ambrose, but really written in our second period, eagerly adopts this theory, though he owns the practice of the Roman Church was against him.

Augustine sometimes (see e.g. "Contr. Faust." xix. 14, "Pro baptismo Christi, pro eucharistia Christi, pro signo Christi") classes Baptism, Confirmation, and the Eucharist together, and this was the prevailing classification down to the end of the tenth century. Thus, Isidore of Seville ("Etymolog." vi. 19) writes, "A sacramentum consists in a certain rite, when a thing is so done that we understand something to be signified which must be received with holy dispositions. Now, the sacramenta are baptism, and chrism, the body and blood." Aytho, bishop of Basle, in his capitulary: "They are to be taught to know what the sacramentum of Baptism and Confirmation is, and of the Body of the Lord, how, in these same mysteries [mysteriis], the visible creature is seen and still invisible grace is supplied for the eternal life of the soul." Rabanus Maurus ("De Universo," v. 11) repeats Isidore almost verbally. So the writers of this period generally, when they enumerate the sacramenta, though they often speak of two "principal sacramenta," two which flowed from the side of Christ, &c., &c. We, of course, lay no stress on the mere use of the word sacramentum, else we might have noticed, e.g., that St. Augustine ("De Peccat. et Remiss." ii. 26; "De Catech. Rud." 50) calls the salt in baptism by that name.

From the end of the tenth century to the time of Peter Lombard (d. 1164), we find a long list of sacramenta in vogue. Peter Damian (Serm. 69) says there are "twelve sacramenta in the Church." Hugo of St. Victor ("De Sacr." ix. 7) counts (α) two necessary sacramenta—viz. Baptism and the Eucharist; (β) sacramenta useful for sanctification—e.g. sprinkling with holy water, blessed ashes, &c., &c.; (γ) those which prepare us for other sacred rites—e.g. ordination, &c. St. Bernard (Serm. "In Cœna Domini") tells his hearers there are many sacramenta, but he will only speak then of three—viz. Baptism, Eucharist, and the washing of feet.

The first distinct and certain mention of seven sacraments occurs in Peter Lombard ("Sentent." IV. dist. ii). "Let us now come to the sacraments of the new law, which are seven in number." It has been said that the Master of the Sentences was anticipated by Otto of Bamberg, the Apostle of Pomerania (1124–28). The question is of little moment, but the statement rests on the word of a biographer, not on any writing of Otto himself. A work of Hugo of St. Victor, often referred to—viz. "De Cærimoniis"—is not his, but later than Peter Lombard. To sum up: In the earliest ages, Baptism and the Eucharist—the two sacraments most clearly and directly instituted by Christ, and most necessary for all—were classed together. Then Confirmation, long given along with Baptism, was added to the number. Next—as this number of three did not seem to rest on any fixed principle—various writers chose various rites of the Church and put them together under the common name of sacramenta. At last, theological reflection, just when systematic theology was beginning to be, led Peter Lombard to the conclusion that there were seven rites, with this in common, which separated them from all others—viz. that they were the ordained means of grace. He called them, and them only, sacraments. The Schoolmen at once perceived the accuracy of his doctrine and the convenience of his nomenclature, and, finally, the number of the sacraments was defined to be seven, in 1274, at the Second Council of Lyons ("Prof. Fidei Mich. Palæolog."), at Florence ("Decret. pro Armen."), and under anathema at Trent (Sess. vii. "De Sacr." c. 1).

(3) The Matter and Form of the Sacraments.—Eugenius IV. ("Instr. pro Armen.") states that the sacraments are effected by the things which stand for the matter ("tanquam materia"), by the words which stand for the form, and by the person of the minister; and that if any one of these three things be wanting, there is no sacrament. The terms "matter" and "form" are borrowed from Aristotle, matter being the indeterminate element which form stamps with a definite character. Thus, water may be used for the washing of the body, as drink, and for a thousand other ends. But when the minister, as he sprinkles the water on the catechumen, adds the words, "I baptise thee," &c., the end and meaning of his action is apparent, and we have the three constituents of the sacrament—viz. the person of the minister, the washing with water, which is the matter, and the words, which are the form. The special difficulties about the matter and form of particular sacraments—e.g. Penance, Order, Marriage, &c.—have been discussed under these titles; but we may say in this place that theologians distinguish a double matter in the Eucharist. While that sacrament is being produced, the matter is bread and wine; after consecration the matter consists in the outward appearances or accidents of bread and wine. The difficulty arises from the fact that the Eucharist, unlike all the other sacraments, continues to exist after the words have been spoken. Its duration is not transitory but permanent, so long as the species last.

This terminology began with the Aristotelian or Scholastic theologians. It is unknown, says Juenin (diss. i. cap. 2), not only to the Fathers, but to Lanfranc, Anselm, Bernard, Hugo of St. Victor, and Peter Lombard, all of whom wrote formal treatises on the sacraments, and it first appears in William of Auxerre about 1215. In early times, the "form" of a sacrament means something quite different—viz. the whole rite. The Fathers commonly distinguish between the "sign," which includes both matter and form, and the invisible thing, between "things" and "words" and between the sacramentum, which includes all the outward part, and the res sacramenti, the invisible part. This last distinction is of capital moment for the right understanding of patristic texts.

The Council of Trent defines that though the Church may change rites and ceremonies, it cannot alter the "substance" of the sacraments. This follows from the very nature of a sacrament. The matter and form have no power in themselves to give grace. This power depends solely on the will of God, who has made the grace promised depend on the use of certain things and words, so that if these are altered in their essence the sacrament is altogether absent. The custom of the Church in different ages and countries shows that the form is not fixed in its particular words. It is often very hard to determine what change in the form would render the sacrament invalid. Common sense makes the decision turn to a great extent on the intention with which the change is made. Thus to baptise "in the name of the Father, the Son, the Holy Ghost and the Blessed Virgin," would always show gross ignorance or gross perversity; but if the intention were to baptise in the name of the Blessed Virgin, as if she were one of the divine Persons, or as if her name were operative in the sacrament, the baptism would be null (St. Thomas, III. qu. lx. a. 8).

We first hear of a conditional form ("I do not rebaptise thee, but if thou art not," &c.) in the Capitularies of Charlemagne (lib. vi. cap. 181, quoted by Juenin). The expediency of expressing a condition was not universally admitted till it was approved by Gregory IX. ("Extra. de Baptism." cap. 2, apud eundem). Till about 1600 the conditional form was only used in the three sacraments which imprint character (Juenin, a. 2). Even now it is not usual to express the condition in the other sacraments, and a sacrament must never be reiterated under condition expressed or implied, unless the minister, after diligent examination, is unable to satisfy himself as to the validity of the previous act.

(4) The Author of the Sacraments.—The Council of Trent defines that the seven sacraments were all instituted by Christ Himself, and this for a reason already given. But the Council does not say that Christ instituted them directly and immediately. Some of the older Scholastics held that some sacraments were instituted by the Apostles. Tournely quotes, for this opinion, Peter Lombard ("IV. Sent." dist. 23), Hugo of St. Victor ("De Sacr." ii. 2), St. Bonaventure ("In Lib. IV. Sentent" ad dist. 17, a. 1, qu. 3), and Alexander of Hales ("Summa," p. iv. qu. 24, 1), the last of whom believed that Confirmation was instituted in 845 at the Council of Meaux. This last opinion must certainly be rejected. But although Tournely holds it to be "true and certain" that Christ immediately and directly instituted each of the sacraments, he by no means agrees with Becanus, Bellarmin, and Vasquéz in accepting this as an article of faith or considering that it is now heresy to attribute the institution of some sacraments to the Apostles, acting with power granted them by our Lord. He quotes, on his own side, these "most grave theologians" Sotus and Estius, the former of whom was a leading theologian at Trent. Indeed, Estius goes further than Tournely, for he is inclined to admit that something may be said for each opinion—that of St. Bonaventure and that common among Post-Tridentine theologians—though more for the latter ("ut aliquid probabilitatis habeat, majori tamen probabilitate diversæ sententiæ superatur"). Juenin likewise denies that the immediate institution by Christ is of faith. Billuart tends the other way, but speaks doubtfully.

(5) The Minister of the Sacraments.—Little need be said here about the personal holiness required in the dispensers of the mysteries of Christ. "Holy things are to be handled in a holy manner," and the minister is guilty of sacrilege if he confers the sacrament on others while he himself is at enmity with God. But at the same time the Church held against the Donatists that the validity of the sacraments does not depend on the worthiness of the minister, since in any case Christ is always present as the invisible dispenser of grace. A person may even be justified in seeking the sacraments from one whom he knows to be unworthy, if he cannot obtain them otherwise. Neither schism nor heresy deprives a man of the power of Holy Order (see ORDERS, HOLY). But a great difficulty remains. The Council of Trent (sess. vii. De Sacr. can. 11) requires us to believe that the minister of the sacraments must have "the intention of doing that at least which the Church does." This definition has been the occasion of much controversy within and without the Church. Protestants have attacked it as making the effect of the sacraments uncertain. Catholics have interpreted it variously.

Intention is "an act of the will, by which a man chooses a particular thing." This intention may be actual—i.e. present at the time; habitual—i.e. once present and never recalled, but not actually present, or even present in effect; virtual—i.e once present and still surviving as the cause or motive of a man's acts. Thus, if I make up my mind to take a journey, my intention is actual; I set out and continue walking, though the purpose is not at the moment present to my mind, then my intention is virtual. I make up my mind to take a journey next day, and meantime go to bed; while I am asleep my intention is habitual. All theologians agree that a virtual intention is needed for the validity of the sacraments. St. Thomas, indeed, pronounces an habitual intention enough, but only because habitual meant then what virtual meant later.

So far, all is plain. But what must the object of my intention be? Several answers are conceivable. The minister (α) may intend to perform the outward rite, but as an open mockery, or as children might do in play, actors on the stage, &c. (β) He may intend to perform the outward rite seriously. (γ) He may intend to confer the grace of the sacrament, to regenerate, e.g., the child whom he baptises, &c. The first and third solutions are inadmissible. A performance of the sacramental rite in open mockery is allowed by all to be invalid, and on the other side, no one doubts that an infidel or Calvinist may baptise, or, if he is a priest, may say Mass, anoint, &c., &c., validly. We will give the words of Tournely ("De Sacr." qu. vi. a. 1): "Whatever a man's opinion may be about the sacrament, its effect and end, or about the Church itself, whether he rejects all these things or admits them, makes no difference to the substance of the sacrament." "He need not intend to produce the effect of the sacrament or to perform the rite of the Church as a sacrament, or to do what the Catholic and Roman Church does; it is enough that he should intend in some general way to do what the Church does, whatever his notion about the Church, the sacrament, its effect and object may be." Unless the Church held this, she would not, as she certainly does, recognise the validity of many sacraments given by heretics, infidels, and even Pagans. Protestants sometimes urge that bishops have been secret infidels, Jews, &c., and that therefore on Catholic principles the orders and other sacraments given by them must have been invalid; but it is evident that they have utterly failed to grasp what the doctrine of intention, as held by any Catholic, is.

But is it enough for validity if the minister merely perform the external rite in a serious manner, even if internally he withhold his intention—i.e. even if from malice or impiety he says to himself, "I don't mean to act as the minister of the Church, I don't intend to baptise, consecrate, or the like, but merely to deceive the people"? We follow the opinion of those who answer in the affirmative, and we give our reply in the words of Bossuet ("Sententia Episcopi Meldensis, on the 'Cogitationes Privatæ' of Leibnitz"). "It is a most common opinion among Catholics that the intention necessary for the validity of the sacraments consists in this —viz. the will on the part of the minister seriously to perform the rites prescribed by the Church, and to do nothing which is calculated to show a contrary intention, which intention he himself cannot make void by any secret intention whatsoever." This clear explanation removes, as we believe, every difficulty. The people are in no possible danger of deception. The serious performance of the exterior rite is all that is required. The difficulty that there is no mention of the necessity of intention in Scripture or tradition falls to the ground. The sacraments are to be given by men—by men acting, in St. Paul's words, as the ministers of Christ and dispensers of the mysteries of God (1 Cor. iv. 1.). We only ask that they be given by conscious, human action. For example, in some Masses the words of consecration occur in the Gospel, while the bread and wine are on the altar. Will any one maintain that the consecration takes place there and then? Does any one suppose that the ancient Church thought so? Scarcely. Yet, if not, then the ancient Church admitted the whole doctrine of intention which every Catholic is bound to maintain.

This opinion which we have been defending was propounded by Catharinus, a Dominican theologian present at the very session in which the doctrine of intention was defined. Some time after the definition the work of Catharinus was reprinted at Rome in 1552 by Baldus, printer to the Apostolic Chamber. (So Tournely.) Cardinal Pallavicino, in his "History of the Council," ix. 6, allows that the Fathers of Trent did not suspect, much less condemn, the doctrine of Catharinus.[1] The great Jesuits Salmeron and Becanus, and the celebrated Dominican Contenson, espoused it. So in the last century did the learned Oratorian Juenin. It was defended in the Sorbonne in 1685 by Harlai, afterwards archbishop of Paris. We have seen how Bossuet speaks of it. It has never been censured by any competent authority, for a proposition condemned before Alexander VIII. by the Roman Inquisition in 1690 was, as Juenin shows, quite different. F. Ryder, in his recent book on "Catholic Controversy," admits that the question is still quite open, though he himself holds the contrary opinion. It is quite true that the majority of school theologians believe that secret withholding of the intention is enough to invalidate the sacrament. Our objection to this, the common theory, is grounded, not so much on the difficulties which follow from it, as on the fact that its advocates can adduce no proof from Scripture or tradition (neither Billuart nor even Tournely gives a single argument from the Fathers [1]), while we fail to see the force of the argument from reason. Reason no doubt requires us to look on the valid administration of the sacraments as a human act distinguished by the outward circumstances from possible combinations of the same words and acts which have no sacramental character. But this does not carry us beyond the opinion of Catharinus and others whom we follow.

(6) The Subject or Suscipient of the Sacraments.—The sacraments are meant for the whole race of mankind; but in order that they may be received with profit by adults, certain dispositions are indispensable. To the sacraments of the dead—i.e. Baptism and Penance—the recipient must come at least with faith and hope, sorrow for sin, and purpose of amendment; the sacraments of the living—i.e. the other five—must be received by those who are already in the grace and love of God, the living members of Christ.[2] Otherwise the sacraments only add to the condemnation of those who receive them. As regards mere validity, the sacrament of the Eucharist is always the same, in whatever state it is received, because in any case it remains the true body and blood of our Saviour. In order that the other sacraments may be valid, some intention is necessary on the part of the recipient as well as of the minister. But whereas the latter must have an actual or virtual intention, it suffices for the validity of Baptism, Confirmation, Penance, and Extreme Unction if they are received with an habitual or interpretative intention of accepting the rite of the Church. This is plain from decisions of early councils. For example, the First Council of Orange in 442 (c. 12) ordains that Baptism or Penance may be given to a man who has fallen into phrensy. At the time, he has no intention of receiving the sacrament, but he is to receive it, so the council directs, if others give "testimony to his past desire." There is a special difficulty, however, with regard to Penance, for many theologians, believing that sorrowful confession by word or other sensible sign is the matter of the sacrament, are obliged by their theory to hold that the actual presence of some such sign is always necessary for the validity of absolution. The Scotists who make absolution both the form and matter of Penance, are able to consider the mere desire of absolution in the past enough, even if the penitent is unable to express it ever so indistinctly at the moment. Again, the mere purpose of living a Christian life involves the intention requisite for Baptism, Confirmation, and Extreme Unction. It is different with Matrimony and Holy Order, states of life the desire of which is no way implied in the general resolve to live like a Christian; and it is usually said that a definite desire is also needed for Penance (so Billuart, "De Sacr." diss. vi. a. 1). We have the same disputes here as in the previous section on the necessary object of the intention. The common opinion is that it must be an internal one of receiving the sacred rite; while Juenin thinks it likely that a man "who withheld his intention," and did but mean to submit to the rite with external seriousness, would still receive it validly. The whole doctrine of intention on the part of the recipient, interpret it as we will, is not without historical difficulties. History furnishes several instances in early times of men ordained and supposed to be validly ordained, in spite of their struggles and resistance. Generally, it may be said that such persons did give a final, though reluctant, consent; and Augustine speaks ("Ad Donat." Ep. 173) of those who were made bishops after being imprisoned and severely handled, "until they consented to undertake a good work." No such explanation will fit the case of the hermit Macedonius, concerning whom Theodoret ("Hist. Relig." cap. 13) relates that he was ordained priest by the celebrated Flavian without the least knowledge of what was going on, and was furious when he learnt what had occurred. The only answer, so far as we can see, is to say that Flavian was mistaken, and the ordination good for nothing. It may be asked wherein does the validity of a sacrament consist if no inward grace accompanies the outward sign? We reply, first, that three sacraments confer character which is always bestowed, even if no grace accompany it; and, next, that Baptism certainly, Confirmation, Order, Marriage, Extreme Unction probably, confer grace which revives when the recipient enters into due dispositions, even if his malice impeded the grace at the time they were received. Some even suppose that this holds good of Penance and a few of the Eucharist. (Liguor. "Theol. Moral." vi. Tract. i. cap. 1.)

[1] Innocent III. is the earliest authority they quote. Their text from St. Paul certainly proves the necessity of intention, but only as Catharinus understood it. For a priest who behaves with exterior seriousness always acts as a minister of Christ.

[2] Accidentally, however, the sacraments of the living may restore a soul to the grace of God; e.g. if a person has attrition—i.e. sorrow—for his mortal sins, which is supernatural, but imperfect, and a firm purpose of amendment, believing erroneously, but in good faith, that he is already justified.

(7) The Grace of the Sacraments is twofold. They increase that sanctifying grace which is the supernatural life of the soul, and they bestow a sacramental grace —i.e. one which is special and singular, and proper to each sacrament. A person, e.g., who receives Confirmation worthily obtains besides the character and the increase of sanctity a title to special assistance from God when he is tempted to forsake the faith, has occasion to confess it by word or deed, &c. The Thomist opinion is that the sacraments cause grace physically, which means, not of course that sensible things have power in themselves to produce it, but that they become instruments in the almighty hand of God. A brush is powerless to paint a picture, but it is the instrument of painting in the artist's hand. The Scotists look on the sacraments as merely moral causes of grace. When the outward signs are present and the other conditions fulfilled, then God directly and without any instrumentality of the sacraments infuses grace. Each opinion has found many advocates outside of the Thomist and Scotist schools.

(It would be vain to attempt a list of writers on the sacraments, which would be in fact a list of nearly all Catholic theologians. But we would call particular attention to the excellent work of the French Oratorian Juenin, "Commentarius Historicus et Dogmaticus de Sacramentis" [Lyons, 1717]. We have also derived great assistance from a learned treatise of the Protestant Hahn, "De Numero Sacramentorum Septenario rationes historicæ" [Breslau, 1859]. The references, as the writer of this article knows by painful experience, are frequently inaccurate, and the general statements require sifting, but the work is one of learning and merit, and much may be learned from it. Chardon's "Histoire des Sacrements" [Paris, 1745], has no treatise on the sacraments in general. But we take this opportunity of expressing our great obligations to this admirable work. Gibbon—we quote from memory—eulogises it as containing all that can be known on the subject, and this praise is due. The author was one of the most learned men in the Benedictine Congregation of Vannes.)

SACRÉ CŒUR. This cloistered order of nuns was founded at Paris in 1800 by Fr. Varin (afterwards well known in the Society of Jesus) and Madame Barat. Their main object is the education of girls whose parents are in easy or wealthy circumstances. They have three or four houses in England and as many in Ireland, the chief being Roehampton in one country and Roscrea in the other.

SAINTS, INTERCESSION AND INVOCATION OF. The Council of Trent (sess. xxv. De Invoc. Sanct.) teaches that "the saints reigning with Christ offer their prayers for men to God; that it is good and useful to call upon them with supplication, and, in order to obtain benefits from God through Jesus Christ, who alone is our Redeemer and Saviour, to have recourse to their prayers, help, and aid." The prayer which we may address to the saints is of course wholly different from that which we offer to God or Christ. "We pray God," says the Roman Catechism (p. iv. ch. 6), "Himself to give good or free us from evil things; we ask the saints, because they enjoy God's favour, to undertake our patronage and obtain from God the things we need. Hence we employ two forms of prayer, differing in the mode [of address]; for to God we say properly, Have mercy on us, Hear us; to the saints, Pray for us." Or, if we ask the Blessed Virgin or the saints to have pity on us, we only beseech them to think of our misery, and to help us "by their favour with God and their intercession;" and "the greatest care must be taken by all not to attribute what belongs to God to any other" ("Cat. Rom." ib.). Two points, then, are involved in the Catholic doctrine —the intercession of the saints and the utility of invoking them.

(1) Intercession of the Saints.—The whole of the New Testament enforces the principle that we are members of Christ, and so bound to each other as members of the same body (see, e.g., 1 Cor. xii. 12 seq.). God might, had it pleased Him, have made us solely and directly dependent on Himself, but He has chosen to display his own power by giving great efficacy to the intercession of the just (James v. 16). He taught us to go to Him with the wants of others as well as with our own, and He has deepened charity and humility by making us dependent to some extent on the prayers of others. Everybody knows the store St. Paul set on the prayers of his fellow-Christians (Eph. vi. 18, 19; 1 Tim. ii. 1). Prayer even for enemies was a duty enjoined by Christ Himself (Matt. v. 44). Now, it is hard to imagine a reason why souls which have gone to God should cease to exercise this kind of charity and to intercede for their brethren. The Old Testament plainly asserts the intercession of angels, as has been proved already (see MEDIATOR), and it seems at least to imply the intercession of departed saints in Jeremias xv. 1; and undoubtedly the later Jews believed in the merits and intercession of the saints of Israel (Weber, "Altsynagog. Theol." p. 314). We find an explicit statement of the doctrine just where we should reasonably expect it. The Apocalypse was written later at least than the death of Nero (June 9, A.D. 68), and the writer is filled with the thought of his martyred brethren who had gone before him to God. He believes that they still sympathise with and intercede for those whom they had left behind. "I saw beneath the altar the souls of them that were slain because of the word of God and the witness which they had, and they cried with a loud voice, How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not avenge our blood from them that dwell on the earth. And there was given to each of them a white robe, and they were told to rest a little, until their fellow-servants and their brethren be completed [in number," or else, according to the reading συμπληρώσωσιν, "complete the number] "who are to be killed even as they" (vi. 9 seq.) So again, in v. 8 (cf. viii. 3), the elders before the heavenly altar are represented as falling "before the Lamb, having each a harp and golden vials full of perfumes, which are the prayers of the saints." It matters nothing for our present purpose whether the "saints" mentioned were or were not still on earth. In either case their prayers are offered to God by the elders in heaven, so that the imagery inplies that the saints before God offer up our prayers and so help us by their intercession.

But if Scripture were silent, tradition witnesses to the doctrine so universally and so constantly as to remove all doubt of its Apostolic origin. The genuine "Acts" of the early Martyrs abound in testimonies. Thus, the contemporaries of St. Ignatius, St. John's disciple, tell us that some saw the martyr in vision after death "praying for us" ("Act. Mart." 7). The "Acts" of the Martyrs of Scilla (anno 202) speak of them as interceding after death before our Lord (Ruinart, "Act. Mart." ed. Ratisb. p. 132). Theodotus, before his death, says: "In heaven I will confidently pray for you to God" (ib. p. 384). "Pious men" built the Martyrium of Trypho and Respicius, "commending their souls to the holy patronage of the blessed martyrs" (ib. p. 210). Fresh evidence comes from the early Fathers. Cyprian, writing to Cornelius (Ep. lx. 5), thus exhorts those who may be martyred first: "Let our love before God endure; let not our prayer to the Father's mercy cease for our brethren and sisters" (see also "De Habit. Virg." 24). Origen ("In Cantic." lib. iii. p. 75, ed. Bened.) thinks it no "unfitting" interpretation of a passage in the Canticles if we take it to mean that "all the saints who have departed this life care for the salvation of those who are in the world, and help them by their prayers and mediation [interventu] with God." It is useless to add passages from later Fathers. A long list of them will be found in Petavius.

(2) Invocation of the Saints.—If it is the will of God that the saints should help us on the road to heaven by their prayers, we may be sure that He makes the communion between the Church militant and the Church triumphant perfect on both sides; that He enables us to speak to them in order that they may speak for us. Our Saviour tells us that the angels rejoice over repentant sinners (Luc. xv. 7), and a passage already cited from the Apocalypse shows that the martyrs in heaven are aware of what happens on earth. The inscriptions in the Catacombs recently brought to light witness to the confidence with which the Church invoked the prayers of departed saints. We select a few instances from those given by De Rossi (in the "Triplice Omaggio" and "Collection of Epitaphs," as quoted in Kraus, "Real-Encycl." art. Gebet):

'Ask for us in thy prayers, because we know thou art in Christ" (n. 15); 'Beseech for thy sister" (n. 19); "We commend to thee, O holy [Domina] Basilla Crescentius and Micena, our daughter" (n. 17). The great Fathers of the fourth century directly invoke and bid others invoke the saints. St. Gregory Nazianzen begs a martyr, St. Cyprian, to "look down from heaven upon him with kindly eye, and to direct his discourse and his life" (Orat. xxiv. ad fin.). So he invokes his friend St. Basil (Orat. xliv. ad fin.). St. Gregory Nyssen, fearing the Scythian invasion, attributes past preservation to the martyr, and not only invokes him, but begs him in turn to invoke greater saints, Peter, Paul, and John (Orat. in S. Theodor.). St. Ambrose ("De Vid." cap. 9, n. 55) exhorts Christians to supplicate (obsecrandi) their guardian angels and the martyrs, especially those whose relics they possess. "Let us not only on this feast day but on other days also keep near them; let us beg them to be our patrons," are the words of St. Chrysostom on the martyrs Berenice and Prodoce. In his verses the early Christian poet Prudentius habitually invokes the saints; and St. Augustine (Serm. 324) tells a story to his people of a woman who prayed to St. Stephen for her dead son, "Holy martyr . . . give me back my son," and was rewarded by the miracle she asked. It must be remembered that these passages are but samples out of many which might be adduced. They come to us from every part of the Christian world, and the devotion which they attest cannot have sprung up as if by magic at once and in every quarter. We may add that then, as now, Catholics were charged with idolatry because they venerated the saints. Such accusations were made by the heathen generally, and in particular by Julian the Apostate, by the Manicheans, Eunomians (extreme Arians), by Vigilantius, &c. (See Petavius, "De Incarnat." xiv. 14.) St. Augustine's reply is well known—viz. that the sacrifice of the Mass and supreme worship of every kind was offered, not to the martyrs, but to God who "crowned the martyrs" (so, e.g., "Contr. Faust." lib. xx. cap. 21).

The fact that the saints hear our prayers was held by the Fathers as certain; the way in which they do so is a matter of philosophical or theological speculation, about which neither they or we have any certainty. In some way, unknown to us, God reveals to them the needs and prayers of their clients, and Petavius warns us against curious speculation on the matter. The very uncertainty of the Fathers on this point throws into relief their unshaken confidence in the intercession of the saints and the advantage of invoking them. Augustine, Jerome, and others, suggest that sometimes departed saints may actually be near those who are calling on them. Modern theologians have generally thought that the blessed beholding God see in Him, as in a mirror, all which it concerns them to know of earthly things. Whatever theory we adopt, the knowledge of the saints depends entirely on the gift of God. We should be idolators indeed were we to think of them as omnipresent or omniscient.

An account has been given of the institution of the Feasts of the Saints in a previous article [FEASTS]. The devotion of the Church has turned chiefly to the saints who died after Christ. The ancient liturgies do indeed commemorate the Patriarchs and prophets. Abel, Melchisedec, and Abraham, are mentioned in the Roman Mass, and more than a score of Old Testament saints in the Roman Martyrology. Abel and Abraham are invoked by name in the Litany for the Dying prescribed in the Roman Ritual. The list of feasts given by Manuel Comnenus mentions one feast of an O.T. saint, that of Elias; but the Church of Jerusalem had many such feasts, and at Constantinople churches were dedicated to Elias, Isaias, Job, Samuel, Moses, Zacharias, and Abraham. But the Maccabees are the only O.T. saints to whom the Latin Church has assigned a feast.[1] The reason, as Thomassin thinks, for the exception is, that the mode of their martyrdom so closely resembled that of the Christian martyrs, and that their date was so near to the Christian period. (The chief authority followed has been Petavius, "De Incarnat." lib. xiv., which treats the subject exhaustively, and for the last paragraph Thomassin's "Traité des Festes," lib. i. ch. 9.)

SALT. [See BAPTISM.]

SALVE, REGINA. The antiphon said after Lauds and Compline from Trinity Sunday to Advent. Some, with Durandus ascribe its composition to Peter of Com-postella in the tenth century, but Cardinal Bona, with better reason, attributes it to Hermannus Contractus, a Benedictine monk of the eleventh century. St. Bernard, according to the Chronicle of Spires, added the last clause "O clemens, O pia, O dulcis Virgo Maria." Gregory IX., in 1239, is said to have ordered the recitation of the "Salve" after Compline, and it is certain that the four antiphons of the Blessed Virgin now in use among us were said daily by the Franciscans after Compline as early as 1249. "But even the 'Salve, Regina' which was the earliest antiphon of the Blessed Virgin commonly recited in the Church, did not find a place in the Breviary till it was put there by Cardinal Quignon, and was thence transferred to the Roman Breviary of Pius V." (Probst, "Brevier und Brevier-gebet," p. 134.)

SANCTUARY. The part of the church round the high altar reserved for clergy. Euseb. ("H. E." x. 5) speaks of the altar in the church built by Constantine at Tyre as enclosed with wooden rails. In ancient times, says Morinus ("De Pen." vi. c. 1, n. 10), both the Latin and Greek Churches were divided into two parts, the atrium or court for the laity and the sanctuary (called by the Greeks ἱερατεῖον, but most commonly βῆμα, from its raised position, also ἅγιον τῶν ἁγίων, ἄδυτα, ἱλαστήριον, ἀνάκτορον) for bishop, priests and deacons. The porch, or νάρθηξ, is not mentioned till 500 years after Christ. The Latin word sanctuarium occurs in the thirteenth capitulum of the Second Council of Braga, in 563, which forbids any lay person to enter the sanctuary for the reception of communion. (Le Brun, tom. iii. diss. i. a. viii.)

SANCTUS, THE, also known as the Tersanctus, as the angelic hymn among the Latins, as the triumphal hymn (ἐπινίκιος ὕμνος) among the Greeks, forms the conclusion of the Preface in all the liturgies. It is composed of the words, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Sabaoth," from Is. vi. and a fragment of Ps. cxvii. 26 (Heb. cxviii.), "Blessed is he who cometh in the name of the Lord. Hosanna in the highest." In the Roman rite, except in the Pontifical chapel and during exposition of the Blessed Sacrament, a small bell is here rung. But Benedict XIV. says he could not discover when this custom began. It is to be observed that the Missal here follows the old Latin version, which retained the word Sabaoth, while the Vulgate has exercituum. This, no doubt, is the right translation, but scholars are not agreed as to the original reference. Ewald believes the reference is to the armies of angels (Ps. ciii. 21, cxlviii. 2; 1 Kings [3 Reg.], xxii. 19, "the camp of God"; Gen. xxxii. 2.) Schrader suggests, which is very unlikely, that the hosts of Israel are intended, while, probably, the opinion of many other critics, Kuenen, Bandessin, Tiele, Delitzch, is the right one—viz. that the original reference was to the stars. These are constantly spoken of as the "host of heaven," and in Is. xl. 26 as the host which God musters. The title never occurs in the Pentateuch, Josue, or Judges. But it is constantly employed in the historical books from Samuel onwards, in Psalms, in the Prophets, but not in Osee, Ezechiel, or in Micheas, except iv. 1–4.

SANDALS form part of the bishop's liturgical dress. The fact is interesting, as one of many proofs that Church vestments are derived from the dress of daily life, and had originally no connection with the garb of Jewish priests, who officiated barefoot.

Sandals are first mentioned as part of the liturgical dress by Amalarius of Metz ("De Eccl. Offic." i. 25 and 26). He distinguishes between the sandals of the bishop, which were fastened with thongs, because he had to travel, and those of priests. The deacon's sandals were the same as those of the bishop whom he had to accompany; those of the subdeacons were again distinct. Rabanus Maurus is the next to mention sandals ("De Cleric. Institut." i. 22); he sees a reference to them in Marc. vi. 9, Ephes. vi. 15, and, as they covered the under but not the upper part of the foot, he sees here a symbol of the teacher's duty of revealing the Gospel to the faithful and concealing it from infidels. Pseudo-Alcuin in the tenth century ("De Div. Offic." 39) copies the authors just named. On the other hand, Hugo of St. Victor ("De Sacram." ii. iv. 14), Innocent III. ("De Altaris Myster." i. 10, 34, 48), Honorius of Autun ("Gemma Animæ," i. 210), show that in their time the sandals of bishops only, not of priests, belonged to the liturgical dress, as is the case still. Innocent mentions the stockings of bishops (caligæ,[1] also tibialia), which since the twelfth century have been of silk. (Hefele, "Beiträge," vol. ii. p. 219 seq.)

SCAPULAR (from scapulæ, shoulders). A dress which covers the shoulders. It is mentioned in the rule of St. Benedict as worn by monks over their other dress when they were at work, and it now forms a regular part of the religious dress in the old orders. But it is best known among Catholics as the name of two little pieces of cloth worn out of devotion over the shoulders, under the ordinary garb, and connected by strings.

It was through the Carmelites that this devotion began, and the following is the story told of its origin: The Blessed Virgin appeared at Cambridge to Simon Stock, general of the Carmelite order, when it was in great trouble. She gave him a scapular which she bore in her hand, in order that by it "the holy [Carmelite] order might be known and protected from the evils which assailed it," and added, "this will be the privilege for you and for all Carmelites; no one dying in this scapular will suffer eternal burning." Another marvel is related by John XXII. in the famous Sabbatine bull. The Blessed Virgin, he says, appeared to him, and, speaking of the Carmelites and those associated to them by wearing the scapular, promised that, if any of them went to Purgatory, she herself would descend and free them on the Saturday following their death. "This holy indulgence," says the Pope, "I accept, corroborate, and confirm, as Jesus Christ for the merits of the glorious Virgin Mary granted it in heaven." To gain this privilege it is necessary to observe fidelity in marriage or chastity in the single state. Those who read must recite the Office of the Blessed Virgin, unless already bound to the Divine Office; those who cannot, must abstain from flesh meat on Wednesdays and Saturdays, unless Christmas falls on one of these days. So the Sabbatine bull, as given in the Carmelite "Bullarium."

Two statements, then, have to be examined. Is there any proof that the Blessed Virgin appeared to St. Simon Stock and made the promise related above? Is the Sabbatine bull genuine, and the story it tells true?

We take the latter question first because it may be despatched very quickly. Launoy, in a dissertation of wonderful learning, to be found in the second volume of his collected works (the edition we have used is dated 1731, "Coloniæ Allobrogum"), proves by a superabundance of reasons that the bull of John XXII. is a clumsy forgery, and that of Alexander V. another forgery made to cover the former. The autograph has never been found, nor has it any place in the Roman "Bullarium." Its authenticity is unhesitatingly denied by the great Bollandist Papebroch in his reply to the attacks made upon him by the Carmelites and by Benedict XIV. ("De Fest." lxxiv. lxxvii.). The latter says it is as hard, perhaps harder, to believe in this bull than in the story of the chapel built on Mount Carmel in honour of the Blessed Virgin during her life. He says he could give more reasons against it than he cares to produce, and arguments drawn "from things [in the bull] which want all appearance of truth." He alludes, we suppose, to the style of the bull, which, as Launoy points out, betrays in many ways the hand of the impostor.

As to the fact of the apparition to Simon Stock, it is accepted by Benedict XIV., Papebroch, and Alban Butler on the faith of a "Life" of the saint by Swaynton, who was his secretary and wrote the story of the apparition at his dictation. A fragment of this "Life" was produced from their archives at Bordeaux and printed by one of the Carmelites—viz. Cheronensis. We may observe that the Carmelites refused a sight of this "Life" to Papebroch. (See Bollandist "Acta SS. Maii," tom. iii.) Next, to understand the force of Launoy's arguments for regarding this passage in the "Life" if it be authentic, as an interpolation, we must remember that the miracle is represented as gaining immediate notoriety. These are Swaynton's or pseudo-Swaynton's words: "The story running through England and beyond it, many cities offered us places in which to live, and many nobles begged to be affiliated to this holy order, that they might share in its graces, desiring to die in this holy habit." If so, the silence of Carmelite authors for more than a century after is remarkable. Simon Stock died in 1250. Ribotus, provincial in Catalonia (about 1340), in his ten books "On the Institution and Remarkable Deeds of the Carmelites," ignores it. So does Chimelensis in two books specially designed to glorify the order ("Speculum Historiale" and "Speculum Ordinis Carmeli"), and so do three other authors of similar books quoted by Launoy. Strangest of all, Waldensis, a Carmelite, an Englishman, and writing in England ("De Sacramentalibus"), tries hard to prove the religious habit a sacramental, and speaks particularly of the Carmelite habit and the form which it is given. Nothing could have been more to the point than Swaynton's story, but he never alludes to it. The vision is mentioned, apparently for the first time, so far as is known for certain, by Grossus, a Carmelite of Toulouse, in his "Viridarium" (1389), then by Paleonidorus ("Antiq. Ord. Carm." vi. 8, apud Launoy), published in 1495. It is right to add, however, that the Carmelites claimed the support of an anonymous MS. in the Vatican said to have been written early in the fourteenth century.

Many of the later Popes have granted numerous indulgences to the Confraternities of the Scapular, and no Catholic, Launoy as little as anyone, doubts the utility and piety of the institution. "The scapular," says Bossuet, "is no useless badge. You wear it as a visible token that you own yourselves Mary's children, and she will be your mother indeed if you live in our Lord Jesus Christ" ("Sermon pour le Jour du Scapulaire," vol. xi. p. 369, in the last edition of Bossuet). Benedict XIV. speaks in a similar tone, but he admits that too many abuse these symbols and badges by a misplaced confidence in them.

There are four other scapulars used in the Church: that of the Trinity, of white linen with a red cross, given by the Trinitarians or priests delegated by them; the Servite scapular of the Seven Dolours, which is of black woollen stuff; that of the Immaculate Conception, of light blue woollen cloth, propagated by Ursula Benincasa in the sixteenth century, and given by the Theatines, who governed the congregation to which this nun belonged; the red scapular of the Passion, originated by a Sister of Charity at Paris, who is said to have received a revelation on the matter in 1846, and given by the Vincentian Fathers. All these Confraternities are designed to promote prayer and other good works in their members.

(This article has been compiled from Benedict XIV. "De Festis"; the Bollandists, Maii, tom. iii.; Launoy, "Dissertat." tom. ii. Swaynton's "Life" does not seem to have been published entire. At least, we have searched in vain for a copy at the British Museum. There is nothing in Alban Butler which had not been already stated by the authors quoted. The brief notice on the other scapulars is from a little book of Labis, "Notices et Instructions sur les Scapulaires," &c. It is merely practical, and has no historical worth.)

SCHISM (σχίσμα). A tear or rent (Matt. ix. 16; Marc. ii. 21); a division of opinion (John vii. 43; ix. 16; x. 19); party spirit in the Christian Church (1 Cor. i. 10; xi. 18; xii. 25); and then, in Fathers and theologians, a technical word to denote formal separation from the unity of the Church. "Schismatics," says St. Thomas ("2 2ndæ," II. qu. xxxix., a. 1), "in the strict sense, are those who of their own will and intention sever themselves from the unity of the Church." This unity of the Church, he continues, consists in the connection of its members with each other, and of all the members with the head. "Now, this head is Christ, whose representative in the Church is the Supreme Pontiff. And therefore the name of 'schismatics' is given to those who refuse to be under the Supreme Pontiff and to communicate with the members of the Church subject to him." Further, he thus explains the difference between heresy and schism. Heresy is opposed to faith, schism to charity; so that, although all heretics are schismatics, because loss of faith involves separation from the Church, all schismatics are not heretics, since a man may, from anger, pride, ambition, or the like, sever himself from the communion of the Church and yet believe all that which the Church proposes for our belief. Still, a state of pure schism—i.e. of schism without heresy—cannot continue long—at least, in the case of a large number of men. The words of St. Jerome (on Titus, cap. 3), quoted by St. Thomas, are to the point: "Schism, at the beginning, may be understood as something different from heresy, but there is no schism which does not invent some heresy for itself, in order to justify its secession." History abundantly confirms this observation. Bodies which at first separate from the Church merely because they think their personal rights have been infringed are sure, in the end, to deny the Church's unity and to lose the spirit of faith. And so St. Thomas remarks that, as loss of charity is the way to loss of faith, so schism is the road to heresy.

Schismatics do not, of course, lose the power of order; their priests can say Mass, their bishops confirm and ordain. But they lose all jurisdiction, so that "they cannot either absolve, excommunicate, or grant indulgences, or the like; and if they attempt anything of the kind the act is null" (loc. cit. a. 3). Whether pure schismatics do or do not cease thereby to be members of the Church is a question controverted in the Schools. Many theologians consider that all who retain integrity of faith are members of the Church. But all agree that they are not united to the Church by charity—that, if members, they are dead members—so that the question is of no great moment.

SCHOLASTICUS (Fr. écolâtre). An ecclesiastic attached to, but generally not a member of, a cathedral or collegiate chapter, to whom the administration of its schools was entrusted. The scholasticus is also called, in charters of the eleventh century, capischolus, caput scholaris, and magister scholarum. The office seems to have arisen along with the schools which the Capitularies of Charlemagne order with such earnestness and reiteration to be erected in all the Frankish dioceses. Those who held it often combined teaching with the superintendence of teachers; this was the case with St. Bruno, the founder of the Carthusians, appointed in 1056 Scholasticus in the Church of Rheims. The Council of Trent ordered that the Scholastici of a diocese and others who were bound to lecture or teach should, if competent, themselves give instruction in the seminaries of which the Council decreed the erection in all dioceses; and that in future the office of a Scholasticus (scholasteria) should only be conferred on doctors, masters, or licentiates in theology or in canon law, and other fit persons capable of teaching; the collation otherwise to be void.[1] (Thomassin, i. 3, 70.)

SCHOOLS. A boy is usually sent to school in order that he may obtain, with greater ease and fewer interruptions than would be possible at home, knowledge which will be serviceable to him in after life. This is a motive which acts on parents independently of State instigation; it filled the school of Flavius at Venusia with "big boys, the sons of big centurions,"[2] and took Horace to that superior establishment at Rome which received the sons of "knights and senators." To these voluntary schools, which doubtless existed in every part of the Roman empire, and were closely connected with the movement of Pagan society, it does not appear that Christian parents in the first three centuries sent their sons. The earliest Christian school of which we have a distinct account—that of Pantænus at Alexandria (A.D. 180)—was one for religious and catechetical instruction (ἱερῶν λόγων κατηχήσεων).[1] The earliest State provision for secondary instruction was made by the Emperor Vespasian,[2] who established a group of "imperial schools" at all the great provincial towns; Besançon, Arles, Cologne, Rheims, and Treves are particularly mentioned. In these schools rhetoric, logic, and Latin and Greek literature were well taught, and many a Christian apologist owed to them the mental culture which he employed after his conversion in the service of Christ. When the empire had become Christian, these schools still retained the old methods and subjects of instruction, and even, to a great extent, the old spirit. St. Jerome, who had himself been educated in one of them, was alive to the perilous nature of this influence, and interdicted the reading of the Pagan authors to all those under his direction who were in training for the religious life. Every bishop's residence was from the first more or less definitely a school, in which clerics were trained for the ecclesiastical life. Similarly, after the commencement of the monastic life under St. Antony and St. Hilarion, the monastery, besides subserving the ends of self-discipline and continual intercession, became a school for training monks. This was especially seen in the monasteries in Gaul which followed the rule of the abbot Cassian of Marseilles. Early in the fifth century the invasions of the barbarians began; for four centuries Western Europe weltered in chaos, and the institutions of civilised life perished. In the cities of Gaul, as the Franks pressed southwards, the old municipal schools—the schools of the Rhetoricians and the Grammarians—dwindled and were dispersed. Lay life became barbarous; and the arts of barbarism—which are chiefly fighting, destruction, and coarse indulgence—do not stand in need of schools. But in the wreck the episcopal and monastic schools survived, and, through the degradation of lay life, became ever more attractive. In the island of Lerins, the abbot Honoratus, about 400, founded a celebrated monastery, the school of which was known as the Studium Insulanum. Ireland, soon after its conversion by St. Patrick, was dotted over with monastic schools, in which such learning as was then accessible was prosecuted with remarkable success.

The suppression of the schools of Athens by order of Justinian (529) sounded the knell of the educational institutes of antiquity. These schools were, in fact, a university, although that name was of later introduction. They had never been able to shake off the Pagan modes of thought which gave birth to them, and now the advancing tide of Christian ideas engulfed them, without being able for a long time to supply their place. A few months after the suppression St. Benedict founded the abbey of Monte Cassino, and the schools for the erection of which his rule provides were soon spread over Western Europe. These gradually produced a race of teachers and students whose higher and wider views suggested the resuscitation of academic life. It is sufficient to mention the names of Iona, Lindisfarne, Canterbury, York, Fulda, Rheims, Corbie, Fleury, and Seville—not as being all of Benedictine origin, but as among the best schools to be found in the troubled period from the fifth to the tenth century.

The great organising mind of Charlemagne endeavoured to make use of education, as of all other forces within his reach, for restoring civilisation in the West. He invited Alcuin, the Scholasticus of York, as the best known teacher in Europe, to his Court at Aix-la-Chapelle, and gave into his charge the palace school. Conscientious and painstaking, Alcuin was yet essentially borné; there is something cramped and unsatisfactory in his way of handling all the subjects of his narrow curriculum. The age of universities was not yet. Charlemagne, and his son after him, were perpetually urging the bishops to improve their schools. Rabanus Maurus, a pupil of Alcuin, made the school of Fulda illustrious; that of Corbie, in the same age, produced Paschasius Radbert. The trivium and quadrivium—the invention of which is ascribed by some to Martianus Capella, a Carthaginian professor of rhetoric, by others to St. Augustine—supplied the cadre of the most advanced instruction for several centuries. Between 850 and 1000, the inroads of the Normans and Danes again made havoc of all that had been hitherto done in France and England to promote education. The Normans, however, when once solidly converted, became the most active propagators of all civilising ideas that the world has ever seen. The Norman school of Bec, founded in the eleventh century by the Abbot Herluin, numbered among its teachers Lanfranc and St. Anselm. In schools of this class, where knowledge was sought at first hand and philosophy disdained conventional methods, university ideals began to emerge. In the twelfth century, at Paris, commences the history of modern universities. [UNIVERSITY.] After the establishment of these foci of superior teaching, the secondary school became, in theory, on the one hand a stage of preparation for the university, on the other a place of final training for those who had to begin work early. But for a long time the first of these two aspects of a secondary school overpowered the other. William of Wykeham, bishop of Winchester, founded there, in 1373, the school which still exists, expressly in order to feed the college (New College) which he was establishing at Oxford. The Winchester foundation was for a warden and ten fellows, three chaplains and three clerks in orders, an informator or head master, a hostiarius or second master, seventy scholars who were to be "poor and in need of help," and sixteen choristers.[1] Imitating this example, Henry VI. founded the school at Eton in 1440, as a nursery to King's College, Cambridge. The later public schools of England—Westminster, Rugby, Harrow, &c.—have been founded, speaking generally, upon the model of these two, but without the same close connection with the universities.

Towards the end of the seventeenth century, the necessity of separating primary or elementary instruction from secondary began to make itself felt. The greater complexity and variety of employments, and the increased application of science to all the useful arts, made it desirable, if not indispensable, that the labouring class also should at least be instructed in letters and in the art of calculation. Primary instruction on a large scale was first tried (1684) by the Ven. De la Salle, the founder of the Christian Brothers. [See that article.] The new grade had its two aspects—that by which it was a stage of preparation for the secondary school, and that by which it gave a final training. Up to very recent times the former aspect was little regarded; but, at present, the advantage of making free and easy communications by which the best scholars can pass from the primary to the secondary, and from that to the superior grade of instruction, is clearly perceived by educationists.

All English schools before the Reformation had a Catholic character. That being withdrawn from them by the change of religion, and the laws prohibiting the erection of new schools under Catholic teachers, those who adhered to the old faith were put to great straits for several generations in order to get their children educated under any tolerable conditions. A single sample of Protestant legislation will show what difficulties had to be faced. By the 11 and 12 Will. III. c. iv. "if any Papist, or person making profession of the Popish religion, shall keep school, or take upon himself the education or government or boarding of youth, he shall be adjudged to perpetual imprisonment in such place within this kingdom as the King by advice of his Privy Council shall appoint."[1] Unless foreign education were sought, obscure private schools, such as those of which we obtain a glimpse in the accounts of the early life of Pope, were the only available resort. The first school of a higher class was that established at Sedgley Park (it had previously existed in a humble way at Newcastle-under-Lyne) by Bishop Challoner in 1763. Ushaw, which, as Crook Hall, was founded in 1794; Stonyhurst, dating from the same year; St. Edmund's, founded in 1795; Downside, in 1798; Oscott, in 1808; and Edgbaston, in 1858—with Ampleforth, Beaumont, and Woburn Park—are our principal Catholic secondary schools at present.

The monitorial system of Bell and Lancaster, by means of which it was considered that primary instruction could be much extended at little expense by setting the elder children as "monitors" to teach the rudiments to the younger, was brought out in 1797. The primary schools of Prussia, organised under Hardenberg with great skill and thoroughness, drew general attention; and in 1833 the first public grant, 20,000*l.*, in aid of the elementary education of the people, was voted by Parliament, and its administration confided to a Committee of the Privy Council. The system of aiding local efforts thus introduced has received an enormous development and undergone numerous changes of detail, but in its substantial features it remains unaltered to the present day. In the Anglican communion, the organ through which State help was dispensed was the "National Society for the Education of the Poor in the Principles of the Established Church," founded in 1812. The corresponding organ for the Dissenters was the "British and Foreign School Society." For Catholics was established, in 1847, the "Catholic Poor School Committee," which, by maintaining efficient training-schools for masters and mistresses, enables Catholic managers to obtain their fair share of the Parliamentary grant for elementary education.

In Ireland the penal laws rendered the erection of Catholic schools impossible until about a hundred years ago, when the ill-success of the war against the American colonists compelled certain relaxations. A secondary school for forty boarders was founded at Borrell's Hall, Kilkenny, in 1783, under Drs. Lanigan and Dunne.[1] It throve exceedingly, and was transformed in 1836 into St. Kieran's College, under which name it still exists. Of more recent foundation are Carlow and Thurles Colleges, and the Jesuit Colleges of Clongowes and Tullabeg. These institutions, though without State aid or inspection, are already more flourishing than the Royal and Charter Schools—founded in the bad times in order to preserve and extend Protestant ascendency—could ever boast of being.

The National Board of Education—in the schools of which a combined literary instruction was to be given to children of all creeds during certain hours in the day, while separate religious teaching might be given to those whose parents desired it before or after those hours, and also on one particular day of the week—was organised through the exertions of Mr. Stanley, Chief Secretary for Ireland (afterwards Earl of Derby), in 1831. The bishops accepted this arrangement, not as the best, but as the best obtainable, measure; and under it, notwithstanding the difficulties caused by extreme poverty, elementary school training has penetrated into every corner of Ireland.

of School Boards, and the levying of rates, in all places where voluntary effort shou'd appear to be insufficient for the need, was brought in by Mr. Forster in 1870, and became law. Great efforts have been made by the Catholic body in England, and hitherto with a large measure of success, to provide schools under certificated teachers (and therefore qualified to participate in the educational grant) sufficient for the reception of all the Catholic children in the country. Whether these efforts will prevail, or the Board schools, from which definite religious teaching is excluded, will more and more bring the elementary instruction of the people under their control, is a question still uncertain.

In most parts of the U. S. Catholics, though taxed for the support of the public-schools—which formerly were distinctively Protestant in their teaching and now are fast becoming as distinctively Agnostic—have yet, by great self-denial, succeeded in establishing a system of parish-schools. But Catholics still have no technical schools, either of the primary or "trade-school" class, or of the higher or polytechnic. Secondary education, however, is flourishing. As was stated in the article on EDUCATION, the Divine and irrefragable right of the Church to share in the control of all schools in which her children are taught, with the corresponding right and duty of parents, can never be surrendered by Catholics.

SCOTCH COLLEGE. In the time of Henry VIII. the Scotch possessed an ancient church and hostel at Rome. Mary Stuart, soon after she assumed the government of Scotland, put the institution on a sound footing; but in consequence of her long imprisonment in England it was abandoned. Clement VIII., by the bull "In Supremo," founded in 1600 a college for training natives of Scotland to the sacred ministry near the Church of St. Mary of Constantinople; whence, in 1604, he removed it to a site opposite the Palazzo Barberini, granting to it at the same time the neighbouring Church of St. Andrew. In 1616 the college was made over by Paul V. to the Jesuits, who had the management of it down to their suppression in 1773. It was revived in 1820 by Pius VII., and placed under the charge of a Scotch secular priest as rector. The college is under the Propaganda. The students, like those of the Irish College, pursued their university course in the Collegio Romano, before the iniquitous confiscation of that establishment by the Italian Government.

SCOTISM. Scholastic philosophy, as has been shown in other articles, was the philosophy of Aristotle interpreted, developed, and reconciled with the Christian faith. In the latter part of the middle ages, scholastic theology, accepting the data of Catholic faith, occupied itself in arranging, defending, and drawing deductions from them on the principles of the scholastic philosophy. Of this scholastic philosophy and theology, there were two great schools, of which the Thomist found its home in the Dominican, the Scotist in the Franciscan, order. The Nominalist school found adherents in both of these orders and in the Church generally, but never exercised an influence like that of the older systems, and really marks the decay of Scholasticism as a whole.[1]

Very little is known about the life of Scotus. His full name, Joannes Duns Scotus, has been variously interpreted. In the early middle ages Scotia and Scot always means Ireland and Irishman. Not till later were these terms used of the Irish colony and its people in Caledonia. Joannes was probably a native of Down (in Irish Dun, whence the Latin Dunensis). Though foolishly claimed by some Scotch and English writers, he could not, as Wadding, the Franciscan annalist, shows, have been an Englishman, since his epitaph runs, "Scotia me genuit, Anglia suscepit;" not a Scotchman, since Bonaventure, in a list of the Franciscan provinces, mentions that of "Scotia, or Ireland." The date of his birth is given by some as 1265, by others as 1274. When he made his noviciate is quite uncertain. Of the names of his teachers one only has been handed down —that of William Varo, or Ware, whom he succeeded in the chair of theology at Oxford. He went to Paris in 1304; to Cologne in 1308, where he died suddenly the same year and was buried in the Franciscan church. His works consist of commentaries on the logical works of Aristotle and the "Isagoge" of Porphyry, a commentary on Aristotle's "De Anima," two commentaries on Aristotle's "Metaphysics," besides a shorter work, [1] We refer to Nominalism in its later form, as represented by Occam and his followers.

"Conclusiones ex xii Libris Metaphys. Aristot.," "Grammatica Speculativa," "Tractatus de rerum Principio" and "De Primo Principio," "Theoremata," "Collationes," "Quæstiones Miscellaneæ," "Quæstiones Quodlibetales," and an unfinished "Tractatus de Cognitione Dei." All these books, except the "Collationes" and "Quodlibetica," were written at Oxford. There, too, he wrote his "Opus Oxoniense," a commentary on the "Four Books of the Sentences," which contains his whole philosophical and theological teaching in a collected form. The "Reportata Parisiensia" is an abridgement by Scotus himself of the "Opus Oxoniense." At the end of book iii. dist. 18, Scotus was called to Cologne, and left the work incomplete. The "Quodlibetica" consists of twenty-one questions on which Scotus disputed in public when he took the degree of doctor at Paris. In general chapters of the order, and, as Wadding thinks, soon after his death, decrees were passed requiring the Scotist doctrine to be taught in all the Franciscan schools. His works were collected by the Irish Franciscan Wadding in twelve folio volumes (Lyons, 1639). Commentators on Scotus appear in the latter half of the fifteenth century.[1] Such were the Irishman Mauritius a Portu (d. 1513), professor at Padua, afterwards archbishop of Tuam; Francis Lychetus of Brescia (d. 1520), minister-general of the order; Joannes Poncius (d. 1550), an Irishman and professor at Rome; Hugo Cavellus, professor at Rome and Louvain, minister-general of the order, finally archbishop and primate in Ireland; Antonius Hiquæus, also an Irishman. Among Scotist theologians the best known are Albergoni ("Resolutio Doctrinæ Scotisticæ," Lyons, 1643); Baro on the Scotist philosophy (Cologne, 1668); Frassen ("Scotus Academicus," Paris, 1680); Hieron. de Monte Fortino, who arranged, in a very convenient manner, the teaching of Scotus in a "Summa" which corresponds question for question to that of St. Thomas ("Summa ex Scoti operibus concinnata juxta Ordinem et Dispositionem Summæ S. Thom. Aq." Romæ, 1728, 5 vols. fol.). In the middle of the last century Ferrari undertook the defence of Scotist against modern philosophy ("Philosophia Peripatetica adv. veteres et recentiores præsertim firmioribus propugnata rationibus Joannis Duns Scoti," Venice, 1746).[1]

Scotists no less than Thomists were, in the strictest sense of the word, Scholastics. The one as well as the other accepted the whole tradition of the Church as it was collected by Peter Lombard; to Scotus no less than to St. Thomas the "Pope is the supreme guardian and divinely-instituted exponent of the deposit of faith left to the Church, the highest guide and ruler of the Christian commonwealth, the supreme representative of the Church's judicial power" (Werner, p. 497). Again, to Scotus as well as to St. Thomas Aristotle is the representative of human reason, the decisive authority in philosophical discussion.[2] Hence, the differences between the two schools, numerous as they are, move between very narrow limits. Far wider, far more interesting and important, questions arose in the conflict on the power of the Pope begun at Constance and Basle and prolonged in the learned French church, on a multitude of questions after the rise of scholarship and historical criticism, in the war between the old and the new philosophies. Probably just because the limits of opinion were so narrow, it came to pass that Thomists and Scotists fought on so many points which have little interest for us. So numerous are they, that we can but make a selection from them here.

(1) Both Thomists and Scotists were Realists, but the Realism of the latter was more pronounced. To St. Thomas no universal exists as such. The essence is only actually found in the individual; it is by a process of the intellect—viz. abstraction—that we separate humanity in general from humanity as it manifests itself in this particular man and reach the idea of humanity in general. "Universale, dum intelligitur: singulare, dum sentitur." At the same time, St. Thomas, unlike the Nominalists, held that the universal has a "foundation in reality," because the species exists with identical qualities in a number of individuals. It has precisely the same character, though

[1] But long before this Scotus had distinguished disciples—e.g. Antonius Andreæ, the "Doctor Dulcificus" (d. circ. 1320); Franciscus de Mayronis, the "Magister Abstractionum," or "Doctor Illuminatus" (d. circ. 1325); Walter Burleigh, "Doctor Planus et Perspicuus" (1275—circ. 1337). (Ueberweg, p. 457.)

[1] There is also a handy work (not, however, Scotist) by Joannes de Rada, Controversiæ inter Thomam et Scotum, Venice, 1599.

[2] Still, Scotus adopted many Platonic and Neoplatonic conceptions, with which he became familiar through Avicebron's (Ibn Gebirol's) Fountain of Life (Ueberweg, Hist. Phil. Engl. Transl. i. p. 455).

it is not numerically one. But this numerical unity was just what the Scotists maintained. To them the nature in all individuals of the same species was numerically one. The obvious difficulties of this theory led later Scotists to modify it till it was scarcely distinguishable from Thomism, or else to take refuge in unintelligible subtleties (Kleutgen, "Philos. der Vorzeit," p. 278 seq.). (2) The Thomists made matter the principle of individuation, so that, e.g., in spiritual beings like the angels there could only be one individual in each species. The Scotists believed that in individuals there was an "hæcceitas," something which made them individual apart from matter. (3) St. Thomas held that second causes, including the will, only move so far as they are moved by the first cause. God moves the will to act, gives the action as well as the power to act, in such manner, however, as to leave the freedom of the will unimpaired. So, at least, the Dominicans—rightly, as it seems to us—understood their master. Scotus, on the contrary, held that "the created will is the total and immediate cause of its volition, so that God in respect thereto has no immediate but only mediate efficacy." The will is like a "free horse," grace like the rider, and the horse can throw its rider; otherwise, the will could not be free, and there would be no possibility of sin. Observe that both Scotus and St. Thomas argue on general philosophical grounds. Very different from either is St. Augustine's position. To the first man, he says, a grace was given "without which he could not abide [in grace] if he willed; but to will was left in his own power." After the fall, God gives "to those on whom He sees good to bestow it an assistance so great and of such a nature that we do will." "The first freedom of the will consisted in the power not to sin (posse non peccare); the last is to be much greater, not to be able to sin (non posse peccare)." "One is the help without which a thing is not done [i.e. grace of perseverance before the fall], and another the help by which a thing is done" ("De Corrept. et Gratia," cap. xi. xii.). But, clearly, Scotus is far further removed from St. Augustine. Kindred to his teaching on the freedom of the will is the tenet of Scotus that "man without grace may avoid all mortal sin" against the natural law. Again, whereas St. Thomas places final beatitude in the intellect which knows God, Scotus attributes it to the will which loves God.[1] (4) Scotus, against St. Thomas, denies that the immortality of the soul can be proved by reason; and he separates, by a much sharper line than St. Thomas, natural from supernatural theology. (5) Scotus held it "more probable" that the Blessed Virgin never contracted original sin, and he proved this belief consistent with the fact that she was redeemed by Christ. (6) He taught that the Word would have become man, even had there been no fall; that the merits of Christ were not infinite in themselves and from the union of his human nature with the Word, but only from the acceptation of them as infinite on the part of God. Consequently, he denied the infinite value of the sacrifice of the Mass. (7) With respect to the Sacraments, his treatment of the mystery of the Eucharist differs on a multitude of subtle points from that of St. Thomas (Werner, p. 283 seq.). It is more interesting to observe that he rejected the Thomist doctrine of physical, and admitted only a moral, efficacy in the Sacraments. [For an explanation of this, see SACRAMENTS; and for the Scotist doctrine on the matter and form of Penance, see the article.] (8) On moral points, two doctrines of Scotus may be noted here. St. Thomas denied that any deliberate action, however indifferent in itself, could be really indifferent at the time it was done. Either the action was referred to a good end and so morally good, or not so referred and therefore evil. Scotists rejected this reasoning, and held that the end, and therefore the action, might be indifferent. The other point is connected with the principles of toleration. Scotus, against St. Thomas, held it lawful to take away the children of Jews by force, baptise, and educate them as Christians.

The Scotist philosophy and theology are now, we believe, abandoned, or all but abandoned, in his own order. But many of his opinions have been adopted —e.g. by the eclecticism of some Jesuit theologians (e.g. on the moral efficacy of the sacraments; on grace, to a certain extent)—and have exercised an enduring influence. His opinion on the Immaculate Conception finally prevailed, and his theory on the Incarnation has recommended itself, as a philosophical view of that mystery, even to writers of name outside the Church. His differences from St. Thomas served the useful purpose of maintaining intellectual life and preventing a servile adherence to that great author.[1]

(This article is drawn chiefly from Werner, "Johannes Duns Scotus," Wien, 1881. It forms the first volume of his "Scholastik des späteren Mittelalters.")

SCOTTISH CATHOLICS. The Gospel was originally announced in Scotland by three principal teachers, St. Ninian, St. Kentigern, and St. Columba. The first, a Briton, who had been carefully instructed at Rome,[2] fixed his see at Whithern in Galloway, and thence evangelised the Southern Picts. His death is placed in 432. St. Kentigern or Mungo, a Strath-Clyde Briton, became the first bishop of Glasgow, and in the course of a long episcopate planted the faith firmly in Strath-Clyde, and helped to root out paganism, dying about 603. St. Columba (Colmcille), an Irish monk, founded Iona (563), and planted Christianity among the northern Picts—i.e. in the Hebrides, and in the Northern and Western Highlands. For more than a thousand years only one religion was known in Scotland, that taught by the Catholic Church, and the immense good done by it is acknowledged even by enemies. A Protestant historian[3] draws a glowing picture of the state of the country before the Reformation, covered over as it was by a network of well-planned institutions, and adorned with magnificent ecclesiastical and monastic buildings, where learning was prized and art encouraged—where the hungry were fed and the miserable consoled. One special service which the land owed to its clergy was the removal or mitigation of slavery. "The priesthood set the first example of mitigating domestic slavery—that curse and disgrace of the middle ages—having emancipated all the bondmen belonging to their estates, before the lay proprietors could be taught either the advantage or the obligation"[1] of doing so.

In the art. PRESBYTERIANS the religious revolution of 1560 was described. The perfervidum ingenium of the Scotch was not content with the establishment of the Knoxian system, unless the old faith was proscribed at the same time. Tytler[2] describes the anti-Catholic legislation of 1560 as consisting mainly of three acts. "The first abolished the Papal supremacy in the realm; the second repealed all previous acts in favour of Popery; the third enacted that any person hearing or saying Mass should suffer for the first offence confiscation of his property, for the second, banishment, and for the third, death." Surprise has often been expressed at the feebleness of the resistance offered. But we may assume that the bishops knew their countrymen, and felt that resistance would no longer avail. The pride and overweening self-confidence of the Scottish character had become irrevocably engaged on the wrong side: and the great majority of the active spirits were favourable to change. For men so obstinate, so self-satisfied, so intensely and enthusiastically bent on having their own way, after they had once turned out of the path of Catholic obedience, it was impossible, humanly speaking, to return to it. Error must take its course; the Scottish people must test to the very utmost the system which it had preferred to the Catholic faith; and not till the proud edifice of Presbytery had been shivered to pieces, and its ambitious discipline become a laughing-stock, would the possibility of a Catholic reaction arise.[3]

[1] The Sacred Congregation, by order of Pau. V., declared the doctrine of Scotus free from censure, and forbade anyone to presume to prohibit the printing of any book known as his (Viva, Disp. 59, 6, n. 5; Franzelin, De Deo Trino et Uno, thesis 40). Scotus, as Ueberweg points out, was a critical rather than a creative genius. His early mathematical training made him impatient of demonstration which was not rigorous; and, accepting the Church's doctrine, he dismisses many Thomist arguments in its favour. Just in the same way, Kant accepted the convictions of the moral sense and of the "religious consciousness," while he rejected the proofs which Leibnitz thought valid.

[3] Mr. Hill Burton (Hist. of Scotl. v. 204) says that Scottish Presbyterians at the present day are split up into a number of sects, all tracing their descent from the Kirk of 1580, "of which every Presbyterian communion in Scotland"—and there are some that "count their adherents by hundreds"—"professes to be the representative, and the only legitimate representative, all others who profess that title being impostors." Some of these sects are—besides the Established Church and the Free Church—the United Presbyterians, the Free Presbyterian Church, the United Original Secession Church, the Reformed Presbyterian Church of Scotland, the "John Knox" Church of Scotland, &c. (See Edinburgh and Glasgow Directories.)

The head of the Scottish hierarchy, Archbishop Hamilton, of St. Andrew's, was executed by order of the Regent Lennox in 1571. The last survivor of the bishops dispossessed in 1560 was James Betoun, archbishop of Glasgow; he died at Paris, in his eighty-sixth year, in 1603. Till 1623 the Scottish clergy were subjected to the jurisdiction of the archpriests of England, and afterwards to that of local prefects of the Mission. From 1653 to 1694 Church affairs were administered by three prefects-apostolic, W. Bannatyne, A. Dunbar, and J. Walker. The first vicar-apostolic was Thomas Nicholson, who was consecrated in 1695, and arrived in Scotland in 1697, finding only twenty-five priests in the whole country.

The names of twelve or thirteen Scottish noblemen are recorded in 1583, and again in 1592, as belonging to the Catholic party; the chief of these was the Earl of Huntly. The contemptible character of James VI. suggested various plots and enterprises to turbulent men of all parties during the twenty years preceding his succession to the English crown. In these affairs the Catholic party was mixed up, but with no permanent result. About 1590, the state of things was this: All the northern part of Scotland, including the counties of Inverness, Caithness, Sutherland, and Aberdeen, with Forfarshire on the east, and Wigtonshire and Nithsdale in the south, were for the most part in the interests of the Catholic party, and led by noblemen professing that faith.[1] Negotiations were opened between Huntly, Erroll, Angus, and others on the one side, and Philip II. on the other; Jesuit missionaries were the intermediaries; even after the failure of the Armada it was hoped that a Spanish army of 30,000 men might be landed on the south-west coast of Scotland, and, covered by a force of cavalry to be raised by the Scotch Catholic lords, march south into England to put down the government of Elizabeth.[2] This was known as the affair of the "blanks," because Huntly, Erroll, &c., put their names to blank sheets of paper, on the understanding that above their signatures the particulars of the enterprise should be inserted, according to what might be agreed upon between the King of Spain and Fr. W. Creighton, the Jesuit rector of Louvain.

The General Assembly never ceased to press upon the Government the execution of the penal laws against Catholics. Ordinary intolerance might be passed over, but one of their proposals, made to James I. in 1608, calls for some remark. It was "that the sons of noblemen professing Popery should be committed to the custody of [such of] their friends as are sound in religion."[1] The penal legislation of England and Ireland, bad as it was, never so absolutely ignored parental authority as it was proposed to do on this occasion.[2] Among the many forms of oppression which Catholics had to bear, not the least intolerable was that which was described as "planting wise pastors." A Catholic family was compelled to give hospitality to a minister, who of course constituted himself a spy on all their movements, and was empowered to "catechize their families twice a day." (Chambers, "Domestic Annals of Scotland," i. 351.)

About 1612 the Jesuits and other missionaries were very active; many conversions were made and apostasies repaired. The Government and the Protestant clergy, both Episcopalian and Presbyterian, were somewhat disturbed. Two Jesuit missioners, Fathers Moffat and Ogilvie, were arrested: the former, after a term of imprisonment, was banished; the latter, being plied with entangling questions on the Pope's deposing power by the King's order, and not answering satisfactorily, was condemned to be hanged, drawn, and quartered (1615); and the sentence was carried out. However, it is only just to the General Assembly to say that they appear to have been averse to shedding blood; especially after experience had proved that modes of persecution which just stopped short of killing were more effectual than death itself. Banishment from Scotland, with threat of death or perpetual imprisonment in case of return, was the usual penalty both for priests and laymen. Being joined to a greater or less confiscation of property, and rigorously carried out year after year, this policy of banishment brought the Catholic party to a state of extreme weakness and distress. In 1641 Father Mambrecht was the only priest left in all the South of Scotland; whereas in England, for years before that date, the penal laws had been slackly executed, and Catholics were going openly to Mass in London down to the meeting of the Long Parliament. The same unrelenting bigotry pursued and hunted down every symptom of the revival of Catholic worship till far down in the eighteenth century. As if all truth had come into the world with John Knox, and existed not outside of their own sect, the ministers rejected with indignation the "toleration" and "liberty of conscience" preached by the Independents, and reminded the lukewarm English that their Parliament had joined in the same covenant with the Scots for the reform of religion, "with the extirpation of Popery, Prelacie, and all belonging to that hierarchie."[1] In 1685 James II. vainly besought the Scottish estates to relax the penal laws against the Catholics. He then suspended these laws by an exercise of the prerogative, brought over several Jesuits to Edinburgh, and ordered the chapel of Holyrood to be fitted up for the celebration of Mass. This transient gleam was soon extinguished by the Revolution. Under Anne the magistrates must in some places have been tolerant; for we find the General Assembly in 1713 complaining that the Catholics had set up "openly in divers places their idolatrous worship, notwithstanding the penal laws which stand in force against them."[2] With no little effrontery, considering that they and their predecessors had allowed no Catholic to live in peace in Scotland for a hundred and fifty years past, the ministers attribute to their victims "the hellish design of extirpating the Protestant religion, under the name of the Northern heresie." The son and grandson of James II., in the risings of 1715 and 1745, found great support in the more ardent loyalty of those Highland clans which had retained the ancient faith. The failure of the attempt of 1745 was disastrous to Catholic interests in Scotland. At that time, says Archbishop Strain,[3] "not only individuals, but many entire families fell away from their religion." Deep inroads were made in the Catholicity of the North through the fall of many heads of clans and great landholders, whose example was usually imitated in good faith by their simple followers. "The territory inhabited by the western Celts was portioned off, like a chess-board,"[1] into Catholic and Calvinist districts. In the South the resolution of those holding authority to repress any Catholic manifestation was so well known that the attempt was seldom made. There were but seven Jesuits in all Scotland when the order was suppressed. Aberdeenshire was perhaps the county in which religion was least persecuted; the noble house of Gordon (Earls of Huntly) always "gave ready shelter to priests"; and we read of "an inaccessible college of priests living like a band of robbers in the wilds of Glenlivet."[2] A storm of reviling swept over Scotland when it was announced (1778) that the Government, which the turn that events had taken in America had seriously alarmed, was bringing in a bill to relax the penal laws. A multitude of addresses, protests, declarations, and overtures, from every kirk-session, presbytery, and synod in the kingdom, poured in upon the Parliament at Westminster, in order to arrest them in their wild career. These were collected in a neat volume of 350 pages;[3] in the introduction to which the existence of an "insidious design" to tolerate Jesuits and seminary priests was deplored, and the legal safeguards were declared insecure which forbade "the very dangerous privilege of Papists' enjoying heritable property." In 1731 the Vicariate which had been established in 1694 was divided into two districts, the Lowland and Highland. A Papal rescript of 1827 erected three Vicariates—the Eastern, the Western, and the Northern. "This last arrangement remained in force till the re-establishment of the hierarchy by the Apostolic letter 'Ex supremo,' March 4, 1878." ("Cath. Dir. for Scot.")

In the article on ENGLISH CATHOLICS it was mentioned that the shock of the rioting and destruction at London in 1780 was more than the aged frame of Challoner could bear. Bishop Hay, vicar-apostolic for Scotland, had a rather narrow escape at the same time. He had lately completed a chapel and house, from the exterior of which, however, every mark of their ecclesiastical use was carefully banished, in Chalmers' Close, High Street, Edinburgh. In the February of 1779 the excitement against the Catholic Relief Bill was at its height. Returning from a journey the bishop found the High Street occupied by an enormous crowd. He asked a woman what it meant; she replied, "Oh, sir, we are burning the Popish chapel, and we only wish we had the bishop to throw him into the fire."[1] The bishop after a time succeeded in obtaining some compensation for the property burnt and destroyed; but he did not venture to rebuild the chapel; that was only done by Bishop Cameron, three years after Dr. Hay's death, in 1814.

During the last half century the Catholic population of Scotland has been largely augmented by an Irish immigration, consequent on the demand for labour arising at great industrial centres like Glasgow and Paisley. In 1878 the Holy See judged in its wisdom that the time had arrived for restoring to Scotland some of those ancient sees which had been vacant for nearly three hundred years. The mitre of St. Andrew's was now conferred on Bishop Strain, of the Eastern district, with the title of "Archbishop of St. Andrew's and Edinburgh." The archdiocese of Glasgow, which formerly had four suffragan sees, was committed to Mgr. Eyre, translated from the Western district. The sees of Aberdeen, Dunkeld, Galloway, and Argyll, which had all been vacant since the Reformation, were resuscitated at the same time, and made suffragan to St. Andrew's. Bishop J. Macdonald was translated to Aberdeen from the Northern district; to Argyll the old see of "The Isles" was annexed. The number of priests, secular and regular, having cure of souls in Scotland rather exceeds three hundred. The Catholic population appears to number about 320,000 souls.[2]

SCRUTINY (scrutinium). An examination of those who were about to receive baptism as to their faith and dispositions. They were taught the Creed and the Lord's Prayer, exorcised, &c., during those scrutinies. The days appointed for the different scrutinies varied in different places. At Rome the Creed was given to the catechumens on the Wednesday of the fourth week in Lent (traditio symboli), and they made profession of faith (redditio symboli) on Holy Saturday. In the Roman Church, under Pope Siricius, there were apparently three scrutinies only; at a later date, seven; then, when baptism was seldom given except to infants, the number fell again to three, and from the beginning of the twelfth century—as infants were baptised soon after birth, even if there was no apprehension of death, and not, as formerly, at Easter and Pentecost—the ceremonies of the scrutiny were joined, as in our present Ritual, to the actual baptism. The Gelasian Sacramentary contains four Masses "pro scrutiniis electorum." (Chardon, "Hist. des Sacr." tom. i.; "Baptême," P. I. ch. vii. viii.)

SEAL OF ALTAR. [See ALTAR.]

SEAL OF CONFESSION. The obligation of keeping absolutely secret knowledge gained through sacramental confession. It rests on the natural law which binds us to keep secrets communicated in confidence, and on the ecclesiastical law, which, as we shall see, forbids, under most severe penalties, any revelation of sins confessed sacramentally. But it also arises from the positive divine law, and, as Suarez points out, the obligation of the seal is probably connatural, and belongs to the very essence of the sacrament of Penance. In other words, Christ did not impose the obligation of confessing mortal sins committed after baptism and then add a protective law binding the priest to secrecy, but the obligation of the seal follows necessarily from the nature of confession as instituted by Him; otherwise, Penance, which is the ministry of mercy and reconciliation, would become a burden intolerable to mankind. What the priest hears in sacramental confession, he hears not as a mere man, but as one who stands in God's place. He must not by word, or look, or change of conduct remind the penitent himself of anything he has heard, much less convey such knowledge to others. To do so is sacrilege, excusable by no advantage to himself, to the public, or even to the penitent. The law admits of no exception, except where the penitent freely gives the confessor leave to use his knowledge. Not only sins however slight, but moral or natural weaknesses, sins of accomplices all that may bring the penitent into trouble, or contempt, or suspicion of any sort, fall, if known through confession, under the sacramental seal. A priest might break the seal, in certain circumstances, merely by admitting that a person has confessed to him; or, again, even if there be no danger of suspicion fixing itself on any individual, by revelations which might bring bad repute or suspicion on a community or a certain number of men

The first express mention of the seal of confession, so far as we know, occurs in Canon 20 of the Armenian Synod at Dovin, in 527. It anathematises any priest who breaks the seal (Hefele, "Concil." vol. ii. p. 718). In the West, there is no mention of penalties for breaking the seal till very late; probably because such a sacrilege was scarcely thought possible. There is a decree attributed to a Pope Gregory (as Morinus conjectures, Gregory VII.), and quoted by the Master of the Sentences and Gratian (Can. "Sacerdos," 2, causa 33, qu. 3, dist. 6), which sentences a confessor guilty of this crime to deposition and to perpetual and ignominious pilgrimage. The Fourth Lateran Council ("Extra. de Pœnit. et Remiss.;" Const. "Omnis utriusque sexus") condemns such a priest to deposition and perpetual imprisonment in a monastery. The sanctity of the seal is further recognised by all the Oriental sects (Denzinger, "Rit. Orient." vol. i. p. 101), and their canon law threatens with the most severe punishments those who break it. True, a law of Peter the Great requires Russian confessors to reveal the confessions of those who are guilty of treason or of palming off fictitious miracles, unless they desist; but such a law only proves how completely the Russian church has become the slave of the State.

In one respect, modern are stricter than mediæval theologians with respect to the seal. St. Thomas ("Suppl." xi. 1, ad 3) says an abbot who knows from the confession of his prior that the office is an occasion of ruin to him may, on some excuse, relieve him of his office, if he will not resign it willingly, provided always there is no danger of the confession being revealed. According to St. Liguori ("Theol. Moral." lib. vi. n. 656), this is the doctrine of St. Bonaventure and Alexander of Hales, but he adds that it can on no account be put in practice, and this seems to be certain from the eleventh of the Propositions condemned in 1682 by Innocent XI.

SECRET. Either secreta, neut pl. "secret things," or secreta oratio, a prayer or prayers said by the celebrant in a low voice, which cannot be heard except by himself, after the Offertory and before the Preface. Hence, in some old Missals it is entitled "Super oblata."

The Reformers objected to the practice of saying the Secrets and nearly all the Canon inaudibly, and great disputes on the matter arose in the French church at the beginning of the eighteenth century. About 1709, when the Missal was revised for the diocese of Meaux at the order of Bishop Bissy (five years later, Cardinal), the new edition appeared with an "Amen," preceded by an R in red at the end of the different prayers in the Canon; and the Rubric requiring the prayers to be said "in a low voice" (submissa voce) was explained by the additional clause—"i.e. without singing" (i.e. sine cantu). The chapter (Jan. 29, 1710) and the bishop (in a mandement two or three days later) repudiated all complicity in the change, and the copies of the Missal were again corrected by episcopal authority. But the innovation of saying the Secrets and Canon aloud, which had been previously condemned by Savary, bishop of Séez, in a mandement of 1698, was eagerly defended and adopted by a number of priests secular and regular, and this number was constantly increasing in Le Brun's time. This great scholar has written an elaborate treatise on the subject, which forms the eighth volume of his "Explication de la Messe." The following are the chief points which he establishes.

(1) The Meaning of the word "Secreta."—Bossuet ("Explic. des Prières de la Messe," n. 2) suggested that the word came from secretio, as missa from missio, &c., either because said over the oblations, which were then separated from the rest of the bread offered, or because said after the separation of the catechumens from the faithful. This derivation, adopted as certain by Vert, is proved false by Le Brun. Neither secretio nor secernere is used for the dismissal of catechumens. Besides, the adjective sense of secreta—i.e. "secret"—is fixed by the ancient Sacramentary of Bobbio and the Ordo Romanus, which have "collectio secreta," "dicta oratione secreta," and by the old liturgical writers—e.g. Amalarius, who says: "Secreta nominatur quia secreto dicitur."

(2) The present Discipline of the Church makes it unlawful for any celebrant (except bishops in the Mass of Ordination) to say the Secrets or Canon audibly. The Council of Trent (sess.

xxii. De Sacr. Miss.) approves the custom of saying some parts of the Mass in a "more elevated," others in a low, voice, and (canon 9) anathematises those who assert that such a custom is "to be condemned." The French innovators explained away these words, as we have already seen. But both Sarpi and Pallavicino understand the Council to mean secret prayer, inaudible to others; so did St. Charles; so do the most celebrated commentators on the Rubrics, Gavantus and Quarti. Lastly, there is an authoritative interpretation of the words submissa voce in the Roman Missal prescribed by Pius V. The priest is to say the secret prayers so low as not to be heard by those around (Rub. Gen. a. 16). This settles the question of practice. Ecclesiastics are free to think as they please on the historical question about the date at which the usage began; but they must keep the law as it stands.

(3) The Antiquity of the Usage.— Cardinal Bona believed that the Secrets and Canon were said audibly till the tenth century. His reason was that the faithful used to answer "Amen" after the words of Consecration, and that Florus, who lived in the ninth century, is the last writer who mentions this response. That the people did answer "Amen" after the Consecration is an unquestionable fact; but there is no reason to believe that they did, and many weighty reasons for thinking that they did not, do so immediately after the words of consecration were uttered. Neither in the old Gallican Missal edited by Thomasius, nor in the first Ordo Romanus, nor in any of the Missals older than the twelfth century examined by Le Brun, is any "Amen" marked till after the "Per omnia sæcula sæculorum" which ends the Canon and precedes the Pater Noster. All the Oriental liturgies distinguish the prayers to be said aloud from those which are uttered in an under-tone. True, the modern Greeks say the words of consecration in a loud voice, but this custom was introduced by a constitution of Justinian (Novella 132, cap. 6, quoted by Le Brun), and even now the Greeks say the rest of the Canon in an under-tone. Add to all this, that the Canon of the Mass was never committed to writing in the first four centuries; that St. Cyril of Alexandria ("In Joann." lib. xii. apud Le Brun) speaks of the doors of the sanctuary which were closed; St. Chrysostom of the curtain drawn during the Consecration, and we shall scarcely doubt that Le Brun is right in claiming immemorial antiquity for our present use. We may quote, in conclusion, two other authorities. Martene, in a letter to Le Brun (March 27, 1726), tells him he has treated the question in a manner which leaves no room for reply, and he says Mabillon, who was his master, always held that the Canon had never been said audibly in the Latin Church. The names of Mabillon, Martene, and Le Brun are probably the very greatest which could be adduced in such a controversy. Nor can any valid objection be made on general grounds to the practice of the Church. It is fitting in every way that the priest, in these solemn moments, should speak in the ears of God alone, and that the faithful should meditate in reverent silence on that great mystery of our redemption which is represented, continued, and applied in the sacrifice of the Mass.

SECULAR CLERGY (sæculum, the world). From St. Cyprian downwards, the terms sæculum, sæcularis, were habitually used by Christian writers to express the world outside the Church, and the spirit of that world. In proportion as the monastic institution grew and spread itself, the contrast between the cloister or the cell and life outside of these was more vividly realised, and when the profession of Christianity had become general, the contrast was no longer between sæculum and ecclesia, but between the secular or worldly and the monastic or regular life. To the clergy of all ranks and orders serving Christ in the world, not bound by vows or by a rule of life, the term "secular" seems to have been first applied in the twelfth century. Honorius II. (1125) permitted the monks of Cluny to give their habit to secular clerks who desired to join them; laicos, seu clericos sæculares . . . ad conversionem suscipere.[1] (Ducange, Sæculum.)

SECULARISATION. The extinction of the title by which property, whether real or personal, is held by the Church, and the placing of that property at the disposal of the secular power. It is obvious that such extinction of title cannot justly take effect except with the consent of the Holy See, as representing the whole Church. Historically, such consent has seldom been asked or obtained; the utmost concession to equity that civil governments are accustomed to make in such a case is to enter into a treaty with the Holy See for regulating the compensation, generally a most inadequate one, awarded to the clergy, secular or regular, whose property has been secularised. This has been done [CONCORDAT] in France, Austria, and Catholic countries generally. In England, Ireland, Sweden, Denmark, and Holland, no compensation for the expropriation of Church property has ever been made.

The principal European secularisations have taken place in the following order: Sweden, 1527; England, 1534–8; Denmark, 1536; North Germany, 1521–1648; France, 1790. In Germany the great secularisation took place in 1803, when the territories of the three ecclesiastical Electors, the Prince-Archbishops of Cologne, Mentz, and Trèves, with those of an immense number of bishops and convents, were apportioned among the German sovereigns as indemnity for the loss which the Empire had sustained at the Peace of Lunéville, through the cession of the left bank of the Rhine to France. Spain, 1835–6; Italy, 1851–1882.

SEMIARIANS. [See ARIANS.]

SEMIDOUBLE. [See FEASTS.]

SEMINARY. A school or college for the training of young persons destined for the priesthood. Under the headings SCHOOLS and UNIVERSITIES will be found some account of the methods employed by the Church to impart this training, and to adapt it to the changing circumstances of European society, in the primitive times and during the middle ages. In the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries the university system was greatly extended; faculties of theology were everywhere erected in them; and the old monastic or cathedral schools, of the success of which Bec, Fleury, York, Rheims, and Cologne, had given brilliant examples, fell into decay. In the sixteenth century many of the existing universities, coming altogether under Protestant influences, were lost to the Church; and even in the remainder a spirit of disaffection or doubt was rife, which made them ill adapted to nourish and protect that pure and peaceful ecclesiastical temper in which it is so desirable that the future servants of the sanctuary should be reared. The Fathers of Trent, comprehending in their full bearing the difficulties and confusions of the time, and providing with equal piety and wisdom the suitable remedies, resolved that, so far as in them lay, no Catholic diocese should in future be without regular and permanent means for supplying itself from generation to generation with pastors carefully trained to meet its spiritual needs. They accordingly ordered that the metropolitan of every province, and the bishop of every diocese, should establish at some suitable place (if there were no institution of the kind already existing) a college or seminary, into which a certain number of boys of not less than twelve years of age, born in wedlock, able to read and write, and giving some promise of perseverance in the service of the Church, should be admitted. The sons of poor parents were to be preferred; but the rich, provided that they paid their own expenses, were not to be excluded. The tonsure was to be given, and the ecclesiastical dress to be worn from the very first. All branches of study—such as the ecclesiastical chant, the ritual, the administration of sacraments, and especially what relates to the tribunal of Penance—which contribute to form a well-instructed priest, were to be taught to the students; besides, of course, Holy Scripture and theology. The rule aut disce aut discede was to be strictly enforced. The management of the seminary was to be in the hands of the bishop and two of the senior canons. On the important question of "ways and means" the Council was full and precise, ordering that the prebends of canons and the revenues of ecclesiastical benefices of every description should be taxed to the extent required for the sustentation of the institution. Two poor dioceses might unite to found one seminary; and a rich diocese might found more than one within its own limits.

The wish of the Council was but partially fulfilled. In France seminaries arose in every direction before the Revolution; the fame of St. Sulpice, founded by M. Olier about 1650, became European; but the Revolution swept away everything. The last sixty years have witnessed the refounding of the seminaries in most of the dioceses of France, in the shape both of grands séminaires, which give the final training, and of petits séminaires, which, besides providing for the earlier stages of the ecclesiastical training, give an excellent general education to all boys admitted into them, whether intending to become priests or not. In Germany various obstacles have all along impeded the execution of the Council's decree. The usual practice has been for clerical students to pass two or three years at a university, and afterwards one year or even less in an episcopal seminary, to acquire special professional knowledge. Of this mode of meeting the exigencies of the problem, so different from that appointed by the Council, Pius VII., in a brief dated August 10, 1819, expressed his disapprobation.[1] Recently, we believe, the German bishops have made great advances towards the introduction of the seminary system. In Ireland, besides the great seminary of Maynooth, there would appear[2] to be eight diocesan seminaries, and at least as many diocesan colleges, the ecclesiastical students from which go up to Maynooth to receive their final preparation for the priesthood. In England and Scotland there appear to be as yet only three diocesan seminaries in the strict sense. In the U. S. many dioceses have their own seminary,[3] though some make use of the seminaries established in richer dioceses, or send their students for the priesthood abroad. But there is a desire in all the dioceses to open their own seminary when able to bear the expense.

SEMIPELAGIANISM. A heresy which arose from reaction against the doctrine of St. Augustine on grace and predestination. The Semipelagians did not go so far as Pelagius, and they held their errors, so far as can be known, without any intention of rejecting Catholic doctrine. They were not considered heretics; on the contrary, St. Augustine and St. Prosper speak of them as "brethren," "holy men," &c., though their doctrine was undoubtedly heretical. Contention arose among the monks of Adrumetum, occasioned by Augustine's letter to Sixtus, priest, afterwards bishop, of Rome in 418. To these monks Augustine in 426 addressed two letters ("Ad Valentin. Abbat. et Monach. Adrumet."), and sent along with them his little work "On Grace and Free-will," and afterwards another "De Correptione et Gratia," which Cardinal Noris calls the key to the whole doctrine of the saint. But in the following year St. Augustine had to write to Vitalis, "a certain learned man in the Carthaginian church," who held that "right belief in God and assent to the Gospel was not the gift of God but of ourselves—that is, from our own will." (August. "Ep. ad Vital." ad init.) Here we have Semipelagianism appearing in a definite form. Further, Augustine learnt from the letters of Prosper and Hilarius that his book "De Correptione et Gratia" had met with great opposition among the monks of Marseilles. These letters are extant, and give a very clear and coherent account of the Semipelagian tenets which are often called the heresy of the Massilienses. The monks objected to the Augustinian doctrine that the number of the elect was absolutely fixed by the decree of God. They made predestination the mere foreknowledge of God that some would, others would not, persevere. They also held that God allowed some infants to die without baptism, some adults without hearing the Gospel, only because He knew they would have made no use of these graces had they been offered. Again, admitting that "all mankind perished in Adam and could not be freed from that state by their own free will," that "no one was able in his own strength to begin, much less to finish any [good] work," they still maintained that the wish to be healed, the beginning of faith "if not entire faith," must proceed from the good use of the natural faculties. Christ was the physician, but the desire to be healed by Him was natural and human. "To that grace through which we are newborn in Christ, man comes by natural power, by seeking, asking, knocking." Lastly, they denied that God gave not only the power to persevere, but also perseverance itself ("ut eis perseverantia ipsa donetur"). These two letters, from which the words in inverted commas are taken, are eminently trustworthy, for they speak of the Massilienses not only with courtesy but even with reverence. St. Augustine replied by sending his two books, "De Predestinatione Sanctorum" and "De Dono Perseverantiæ," written in 428 or 429. It was at this time that Cassian finished the writing of his "XXIV. Conferences" (begun in 423, finished in 428). He had come to Provence about 409, and having been ordained priest, founded two monasteries, one for men, the other for women. He is regarded as the founder of the celebrated abbey of St. Victor at Marseilles, and is said to have had 5,000 monks under him. His "Conferences" have always had a high reputation in the Church. But in them we find Semipelagianism in its most developed and offensive form. "Not only," says Petavius ("De Pelag. et Semipelag. Hær." cap. vii.), "did he attribute the beginning of good-will to the will of man, but even ascribed to it remarkable and heroic virtues." Thus in Collat. xiii. cap. 14, he supposes that God "withdrew his hand" from Job and left him to obtain an actual victory over Satan in his own strength. So he asserts (ib.) that the centurion's faith which Christ praises (Matt. viii.) was due to his natural efforts; else he says Christ would not have praised it, and would have said, not "I have not found such faith in Israel," but "I have not given such faith in Israel." Cassian was attacked by St. Prosper in his "Liber Adversus Collatorem," written about 432 or rather later. It is specially directed against Conference XIII. already referred to.

Before this, in 431, Pope Celestine, appealed to by Prosper and Hilarius, had addressed a letter of capital importance to Venerius, bishop of Marseilles, and the other bishops of Gaul. The Pope, though he speaks of St. Augustine as one whom previous Popes had always reckoned "among the best masters," carefully abstains from insisting on many points in the Augustinian doctrine of grace and predestination which had been regarded, and most naturally, as "hard sayings" by the Semipelagians. But he teaches emphatically (1) that "the will is prepared by God," that "every holy thought, good counsel, movement of the will comes from God," that only through his grace we "begin to will and to do any good," that He acts in us in order "that we may do and will what He wills"; (2) that "no one, except through Christ, can use his free will aright," that none can overcome temptation "save through God's daily help"; (3) that "we must refer final perseverance to the grace of Christ." These statements, he adds, are enough; while he does not despise, he declines to enter on, the "deeper and harder parts of the questions which present themselves" (Celest. "Ad Episc. Gall." ep. 21).

The controversy entered on its last stage about 475. The Predestinationist heresy appeared for the first time in the person of Lucidus, a priest, and a certain Monimus of Africa. We have little accurate information about these heretics. Lucidus seems to have denied free-will, and to have held that men were lost by no will of their own and simply because they were reprobate by the divine decree. He was opposed by Faustus, abbot of Lerins, and afterwards bishop of Riez, and submitted after he had been condemned by two councils at Arles and Lyons (probably in 475; see Hefele, "Concil." vol. ii. p. 597 seq.). But Faustus, in his two books "De Gratia Dei et Humanæ Mentis Libero Arbitrio," showed himself a Semipelagian, and Scythian monks laid the matter before Pope Hormisdas and then before Fulgentius of Ruspe and other African bishops who had taken refuge in Sardinia, and who anathematised Faustus in 523. Fulgentius refuted Faustus in three books, "De Veritate Prædestinationis et Gratiæ Dei." The Catholic doctrine was defended in France by Avitus of Vienne and Cæsarius of Arles (d. 542). In 529, the Synod of Orange (Arausio), in South Gaul, gave the final blow to Semipelagianism. Although only a provincial council, it possesses the highest dogmatic authority, for it was confirmed by Pope Boniface II. It defines that man can neither "believe, will, desire, attempt, labour, watch, strive, seek, ask, knock" "as it behoves him" (can. 6), or even "think any good thing, which pertains to the salvation of eternal life" (can. 7), "by the strength of nature" and "without God's grace." "No one has aught of his own, except lying and sin" (can. 22). On the other hand, the Council teaches that the free will of fallen man is not destroyed, but "perverted and weakened"; "A reward is due to good works, but grace, which is not due, comes first, that the works may be done" (can. 18); "Men do their own will, not God's, when they do that which displeases God" (can. 23); "That some are predestined to evil by divine power we not only disbelieve, but also if there are any who believe so horrible a thing, we say anathema to them with all detestation."

(The great authority on the history of Semipelagianism is Cardinal Noris, "Historia Pelagiana," Florence, 1673; Patav. 1677. See also Petavius, in the work cited in the text. The chief sources are the works of Augustine, Prosper, and Fulgentius mentioned above.)

SEPARATION. [See DIVORCE and MARRIAGE.]

SEQUENCE. A rhythm sometimes sung between the Epistle and Gospel; also called a "prose," because not in any regular metre. At first, the sequence was merely a prolongation of the last note of the Alleluia after the Epistle, till, to avoid the wearisome effect of such a prolongation, words, appropriate to the occasion, were substituted. Notker, a monk of St. Gall, who wrote about 880, is generally said to have been the first writer of sequences; but he himself tells us, in his preface, that he had seen some verses for the notes of the sequence in an Antiphonary which a priest brought him from Jumièges, a Benedictine abbey five leagues from Rouen. Many mediæval Missals have sequences for every feast and Sunday, and they were made in such number and so carelessly that the Carthusians and Cistercians were praised for not admitting any of them. In the revision of the Roman Missal in the sixteenth century, only four sequences were retained: "Victimæ Paschali," at Easter (attributed to Wipso, chaplain to Conrad II., eleventh century); "Veni, Sancte Spiritus," at Pentecost (by Robert, king of France, d. 1031); "Lauda, Sion," at Corpus Christi (by St. Thomas of Aquin); the "Dies Iræ" in Masses of the Dead (by Thomas of Celano, d. circ. 1250). A fifth prose, "Stabat Mater," on the two feasts of the Seven Dolours, must have been added very recently, since neither Le Brun nor Benedict XIV. recognise it. Other sequences are found in the Missals of religious orders—e.g. one for the Feast of the Holy Name in that of the Franciscans. The Lyons Missal, in use till a few years ago, is rich in sequences, some very beautiful.

SERVITES. The order of the "Religious Servants of the Holy Virgin," commonly called the Servites, was founded in 1233 by seven Florentine merchants, whose names were Monaldi, Manetti, Amidei, Lantella, Uguccioni, Sostegni, and Falconieri. The last, Alexis Falconieri, who lived to be 110 years old, was the uncle of St. Juliana Falconieri, whom Hélyot regards as the foundress of the Servite Third Order (1306). The seven founders, who were already members of a confraternity instituted to sing the praises of Our Lady, being assembled in their chapel on the festival of the Assumption, 1233, were conscious of a common internal admonition that they should renounce the world. They began by selling their goods and distributing the price to the poor; then, having found a mean house outside the city, they took up their abode there, living in great austerity and continual prayer, and, with the consent of the bishop, Ardinghi, begging their bread in the streets. Entering the city one day to ask the bishop's blessing and counsel, they are said to have been greeted by infants in their mothers' arms with cries of "See the servants of the Virgin"; and the name thus given has adhered to them ever since. After a while they removed to the Monte Senario, three leagues from Florence, and built a convent on the top of the mountain, which was for centuries the chief seat of their institute. Monaldi was their first superior; St. Philip Beniti, who joined the order in consequence of a vision and became the fifth general (1267), propagated it exceedingly, and saved it from the ruin with which it was threatened in 1276, when Innocent V. wished to suppress it, as coming under the prohibition of the Council of Lyons against the multiplication of religious orders. The habit finally adopted by the Servites was black, with a leather girdle, a scapulary, and a cope. They took the rule of St. Augustine, adding to it many particular constitutions. After a period of uncertainty, the pontificate of Honorius IV. witnessed the first of a series of Papal confirmations and graces conferred on this order, culminating in the celebrated constitution "Mare Magnum" (1487), whereby Innocent VIII., confirming all former grants, bestowed on the Servites equal privileges and prerogatives with those enjoyed by the other four mendicant orders—viz. the Franciscans, the Dominicans, the Augustinian Hermits, and the Carmelites. So rapidly did the order spread, that at the death of the last of the seven founders, Alexis Falconieri, it numbered over 10,000 religious, besides nuns, distributed into more than twenty provinces. Its strength lay chiefly in Italy and Germany; in England it had no houses before the Reformation. Among its distinguished members may be named—besides the seven founders, who have all been beatified, and St. Philip Beniti—the B. Piccolomini of Sienna, the learned Ferrari, Francis Patrizzi, Latiosi, &c. Fra Paolo Sarpi, theologian and counsellor to the Republic of Venice, belonged to this order [see TRENT, COUNCIL OF]. In 1870 this ancient order was introduced into the U. S., and they now have houses in Chicago and Menasha, Wis. In Chicago the Servite friars have a convent in connection with the Church of Our Lady of Sorrows (for Italians), and near this is also a convent of Servite sisters.

SERVUS SERVORUM DEI. The servant of the servants of God. Thomas-sin seems to say[1] that the phrase was first employed by St. Desiderius, bishop of Cahors, and then adopted by the Roman Pontiffs. But a comparison of dates precludes this supposition, for St. Desiderius became bishop only in 630—i.e. twenty-five years after the death of St. Gregory the Great, who had frequently used the phrase at the commencement of his letters.[2] St. Gregory had objected strongly to the title of Universal Bishop, or Œcumenical Patriarch, which John, the patriarch of Constantinople, had assumed; if any new title was needed for the Vicar of Christ, it should be one which likened him still more to the lowliness of Jesus, who "came not to be ministered unto, but to minister."

SEVEN DOLOURS. [See DOLOURS OF B. V. M.]

SEVEN GIFTS OF THE HOLY SPIRIT They are, according to St. Thomas (1 2ndæ, qu. lxviii.), certain gifts bestowed upon the just in order that they may promptly follow the instinct and movement of the Holy Ghost. He appeals to the authority of Scripture—viz. Is. xi. 2, where we are told that seven gifts of the Spirit are to rest upon the Messias. "And the Spirit of the Lord will rest upon him; the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and strength, the spirit of knowledge and piety, and the spirit of the fear of the Lord will fill him." Even, says St. Thomas, when the soul of man is perfected by the moral and the theological virtues, he still needs to be moved and led by the Holy Spirit, and the Seven Gifts enable him to follow this movement promptly. All this, however, is mere speculation, for the Scotists deny that there is any real distinction between the gifts and the corresponding virtues.

Next, although the Fathers generally (so, e.g., Ambrose, "De Sp. S." lib i. 16; August. in Ps. cl. 7; Greg. "Moral." i. 27) enumerate the seven gifts of the Spirit, just as St. Thomas does, this is because they followed the LXX or Vulgate instead of the original.[3] Both the LXX and Vulgate render the same Hebrew words "fear of the Lord" (יִרְאַת יי) in two ways, first by "piety," then by "fear of the Lord." In the Hebrew the words simply are "The Spirit of Jehovah shall rest upon him; the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and strength, the spirit of knowledge and the fear of Jehovah, and his delight[1] shall be in the fear of Jehovah." It was probably from mere wish to avoid repetition that the LXX varied their rendering, and Jerome may have been unwilling to restore a mere literal rendering, since the enumeration of the seven gifts, based on the LXX and Old Latin, was already recognised in the Church. It is possible, however, to find seven gifts (on the analogy of Zach. iii. 9, Apoc. iv. 5, v. 6) even in the original. The Spirit of the Lord seems most naturally to mean the Divine Spirit itself, from which the six following gifts descend. But the "Spirit of the Lord" may be itself a special gift, and this view is represented by the Chaldee Targum, which has "The spirit of prophecy shall rest upon him; the spirit of wisdom and understanding, &c.

SIN. St. Augustine's definition of sin—viz. "any thought, word, or deed against the law of God," has been adopted by St. Thomas and theologians generally. We have spoken of original sin in a special article, and many of the popular classifications of sin, e.g., into carnal and spiritual, of omission and commission, are easily understood, and need not therefore detain us here. But something must be said of the distinction between mortal and venial sin, both because of its dogmatic importance in itself, and because of the objections made to the distinction by Protestants.

The early Protestants regarded every sin as deserving of eternal wrath. They admitted that some sins were more heinous than others, but they looked upon all alike as mortal. Even the daily falls of good men, according to Calvin ("Institut." iii. 4[2]), make them "liable to the penalty

[1] Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Disc. i. 1, 4, 4.

[2] See Beda, Hist. Eccl. i. 23, 24, &c.

[3] It is strange, however, that Jerome, in his Commentary on Isaias, recognises the "seven gifts" as commonly enumerated without raising any difficulty.

[1] Lit. "his smelling"; sc. "a sweet savour;" others, "the breath of his nostrils." Either rendering is possible, but the doubt does not touch the point in the text. In the Targum the London Polyglot has copied the false pointing in Buxtorf's Rabbinical Bible, יְקָרְבִּנְיָה (Peal) for יַקְרִבִנְיָה (Aphel).

[2] "The sins of believers are venial, not because they do not merit death, but because . . . there is no condemnation to those who are in Christ Jesus, their sin not being imputed" of death before the judgment seat of God." On the other hand, no sin is imputed to those who believe; so that we may sum up the Protestant doctrine thus: All sins are mortal in their own nature, but in effect no sin is mortal to those who have faith, all sins are mortal to those who are without saving faith.

Very different is the Catholic doctrine. The Church holds that justification consists in a real renewal of man's nature by the grace of Christ, and cannot therefore admit that one who is in friendship with a holy God is guilty of sins which in their own nature [1] expose him to eternal death. The fact of justification implies a passage from death to life, from sin to holiness. On the other hand, the Church, in accordance with the plainest statements of Scripture and tradition (James iii. 2; 1 John i. 8), has defined (Concil. Trident. sess. vi. can. 23) that no one, not even the most holy, can avoid sin altogether "except by a special privilege of God, as the Church holds concerning the Blessed Virgin." Hence, by inevitable consequences, it follows that some sins are mortal, others venial. There is an analogy between human friendship and that of the soul with God, and just as some offences are sufficient to destroy friendship entirely, while others weaken it, so there are some sins which destroy, others which do but weaken the grace and love of God in the soul. There are some sins of which St. Paul says (Gal. v. 21) that they "who do such things will not inherit the kingdom of God," and these must be distinct from less serious faults which none entirely avoid. This is the basis of the distinction between mortal and venial sins. The former are against the very end of the law, which is the love of God, utterly destroy charity and grace, cause the death of the soul, and deserve eternal punishment. Venial sin, though it disposes to that which is mortal, and is the greatest of all evils except mortal sin, still does not annihilate the friendship of the soul with God. Venial sin is a disease of the soul, not its death, and grace is still left by which the sin may be repaired. Mortal sin is, on the contrary, irreparable, and a man who is guilty of it has lost every principle of vitality, so that he is as unable to recover life as one who has suffered bodily death. Renewal cannot come from within, but only from the Almighty power of God, who can make even the dead hear His voice and live (St. Thomas, 1 2ndæ, qu. lxxviii. a. 1). It is very hard to decide in particular what is or is not mortal sin. We know that we cannot fall away from God without a deliberate act of the will, and those walk securely who avoid, not indeed all transgression, for that cannot be, but all deliberate transgression. The distinction, St. Augustine tells us ("Enchirid." cap. 24), between grave and light sins is to be determined by the judgment of God, not of man; and Scripture does furnish many such divine judgments on the point. The tradition of the Church and natural reason following the analogy of faith must also be taken into account; but when all is done much remains, and must ever remain, uncertain. Some sins, such as those of blasphemy, perjury, impurity, are, if deliberate, always mortal; others—e.g. theft—though mortal in their own nature, are venial, if the amount of the wrong done is very small. Others again are venial in their own nature, and only become mortal under superadded circumstances. Mortal sins differ very much in gravity. The chief subdivision of venial sins is that into deliberate and indeliberate, though, strictly speaking, the latter are done with imperfect deliberation, for, when deliberation is wholly wanting, there is no act of the will and therefore no sin.

It must be remembered that in the Fathers "mortal" and "venial" sin are terms which have quite a different meaning from the modern one explained above. The ancient distinction, often misunderstood by scholastic writers, is clearly put by Petavius in his edition of Epiphanius ("Animadv. in Hær." lix.). The Fathers, he says, mean by mortal sins ("mortalia seu capitalia," also "lethalia") not, as we do, those which deprive us of grace, but sins of an aggravated character, which were specially named in the canons and synodal decrees, and which subjected anyone who was guilty of them to canonical penalties. To these they oppose "lighter and daily sins," including in this class "some which we call mortal and some which we call venial sins." Very often the Fathers simply distinguish between "mortal sins" for which public penance was due and the daily faults of good people. So Tertull. "Pudic." 19; "Adv. Marc." iv. 9; Ambrose, "De Pœnit." ii. 10; Cassian, "Collat." xxii. 13; Augustine, "In Joann."

[1] The doctrine of Baius stands midway between that of the Reformers and the Church. He held that "no sin is venial in its own nature"—i.e. apart from the merciful ordinance of God (Prop. 20; condemned by Pius V., Gregory XIII., and Urban VIII.).

tract. xii. ad fin.; Serm. 352, cap. 2 et 3; "De Symbolo. ad Cat." cap. 7. But the Fathers acknowledge in fact our distinction between mortal and venial sin, though they use other words. Thus St. Augustine ("De Fide et Op." 26) divides sins into three classes—those which involve excommunication, sins without which we cannot live ("sine quibus vita non agitur"), sins to be corrected, not indeed by public penance, but by sharp reproof. We have seen already that he distinguishes between grave and light sins, and means just what we do by mortal and venial sin. Further, in Serm. 393, and "In Joann." tract. xli. 10, he distinguishes between "sins" and "crimes" ("peccatum" and "crimen"). Man, he says, cannot be without sin, but ought to be without crime, "such as murder, adultery, the impurity of fornication, theft, fraud, sacrilege"; those who are exempt from crime have reached "an inchoate liberty" which will be perfected in heaven. And a little earlier in the same treatise he defines crime as "a grave sin, most worthy of accusation and condemnation." This is precisely the doctrine of the modern Church.

SINLESSNESS OF CHRIST. [See CHRIST.]

SION, NOTRE DAME DE. The Congregation of our Lady of Sion took its rise from a remarkable event which occurred in 1842, when M. Alphonse Ratisbonne, a member of an influential and wealthy Jewish family at Strasburg, and himself strongly prejudiced against Christianity, being then in his twenty-seventh year, was suddenly converted to the Catholic faith by the apparition of the Blessed Virgin Mary, with which, as he declared, he was favoured while standing in a side chapel of the Church of S. Andrea delle Fratte, at Rome. M. Ratisbonne at once asked to be taken to a priest, and in a short time was baptised and confirmed. He was engaged to be married to a young Jewess, but an overpowering impulse determined him to embrace the ecclesiastical state, and he broke off the engagement. His elder brother, Theodore, had become a Catholic many years before, and, having taken orders, was at this time living at Paris. Alphonse suggested to him the opening of a house for the reception of Jewish children, to be educated, with their parents' consent, as Christians. There seems to have been a movement in the Jewish mind at the time inclining many to embrace Catholicism, and when the Abbé Theodore resolved to act on his brother's suggestion there was no lack of candidates for admission. They were all young girls, and were placed provisionally in the Convent of the "Providence," under the care of the Sisters of St. Vincent of Paul. In May 1843, Theodore Ratisbonne, with the aid of the Abbé Desgenettes, the venerable founder of the Archconfraternity of the Sacred Heart of Mary for the Conversion of Sinners, obtained the approbation of the Holy See for a new institute, under the title of "Our Lady of Sion," the ladies of which should devote themselves principally to the charge and education of converts from Judaism. The centre of the new foundation was fixed at Paris, and now occupies a magnificent convent, embracing several distinct departments, in the Rue Notre Dame des Champs. The rule of the congregation aims at the union of the active with the contemplative life. "The noviciate lasts two years, after which the religious consecrate themselves to the Lord by the simple vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. These vows are annual for the first five years; at the end of that time they are renewed for five years. Finally, after ten years of perseverance, exclusive of the noviciate, the vows can be taken in perpetuity."[1] Before long the institute planted itself at Jerusalem; a site was obtained bordering on the Via Dolorosa, where tradition places the prætorium of Pilate; and a large convent was opened in 1862. In recognition of the awful memories which make this spot unique on earth, the religious repeat three times a day, "Pater, dimitte illis, non enim sciunt quid faciunt." The congregation has since opened houses in other parts of Syria and at Constantinople; in England it has three convents, two in or near London and the third at Worthing. A "Community of Missionary Priests of Our Lady of Sion," working in concert with the congregation, was organised at Paris with diocesan sanction in 1863; both the brothers Ratisbonne joined it.

SISTERHOODS. A title sometimes given to religious orders and institutes of women. These have been greatly multiplied in quite recent times; and the following enumeration of some of them, chiefly the most recent, must be taken as very imperfect:—

1. Sisters of the Assumption.—Founded by Monsignor Affre, archbishop of Paris, in 1839, chiefly as an educational order. The habit is violet, with a cross on the breast, and a white veil. At the convent in Kensington Square there is the Perpetual Adoration of the Blessed Sacrament. There are three other houses in England.

2. Sisters of St. Brigid, or of the Holy Faith.—This sisterhood was founded by the late Cardinal Cullen, in 1857, to take charge of poor schools for girls and little boys. They have eleven schools, all in the diocese of Dublin. They do an important work in protecting the poor of Dublin, so far as their slender means will allow, from the attempts to destroy their faith which are continually being made by the Irish Church Mission Society (so called), and other heretical bodies, assisted by English money.

3. Sisters of Charity.—Called also "Gray Sisters," "Daughters of Charity," "Sisters of St. Vincent of Paul." This congregation, after many and long-continued tentative operations, was founded at Paris in 1634 by St. Vincent of Paul for the work of nursing the sick in hospitals, and placed under the care of Madame Legras. The constitution of the society has never varied. The sisters take simple vows, which are yearly renewed; they add a fourth vow, by which they bind themselves to serve the sick. Postulants are admitted to the habit at the end of six months; the period of probation lasts for five years. The white hood, with its streaming "cornettes," of these sisters is known all over the world. Their houses were closed in France at the Revolution; but Mère Deleau, who was then superior, yielded not a foot of ground that she could keep; she urged her children to continue to serve the sick, though in a secular dress; and a decree of Napoleon (1801), even before the general restoration of religion, authorised the reorganisation of the society, and assigned to them large premises in the Rue du Bac. About 1860, according to a return furnished to the Abbé Badiche (the continuator of Hélyot) by the secretary of the Lazarists, (under whose direction the sisters have always been), they numbered between 6,000 and 7,000, in upwards of 600 houses scattered over all parts of the civilized world. Besides nursing in hospitals and taking charge of orphanages, the sisters, especially in the U. S., carry on parish schools, as well as boarding-schools. The mother-house of these sisters in the U. S. is at Emmittsburg, Md. [See CHARITY, SISTERS OF.]

4. Sisters of Charity of St. Paul.—This congregation was founded by M. Chauvet, a French curé, assisted by Mdlle. de Tylly, in 1704. Since these teaching sisters were introduced into England in 1847 they have multiplied with surprising rapidity; they have now (1883) forty-eight houses in different English dioceses. They do a great work in the French colonies. In 1873 the total number of their pupils was estimated at 12,000.[1]

5. Sisters of Charity (Irish).—This institute was founded in 1815 by Mary Frances Aikenhead, for the purpose of ministering to the sick and poor in hospitals and at their own homes. The sisters, though not in any way connected with the celebrated foundation of St. Vincent of Paul, have "very nearly, if not exactly, the same objects of Christian charity in view."[2] Archbishop Murray entered warmly into the plans of Mrs. Aikenhead, gave the habit to the first sisters, and established them in North William Street, Dublin. The congregation was approved by the Holy See in 1834. The vows are perpetual; the rule is that of the Society of Jesus so far as it is suitable for women; a probation of two years and a half is undergone before admission to the habit. The community is strongly centralised, the Superioress in Dublin, or wherever she may reside, having jurisdiction over all the convents and members of the order in Ireland. The Sisters opened St. Vincent's Hospital in Stephen's Green, Dublin, in 1834. The order has at present twenty-two convents, all in Ireland; the mother house is at Harold's Cross, near Dublin.

6. Sisters of the Good Shepherd.—This society, the chief object of which is the reformation of fallen women, was founded by the Père Eudes [EUDISTS] and Marguerite L'Ami in 1646. It has now more than a hundred houses. [For account of these sisters in the U. S. see CHARITY, SISTERS OF, OF GOOD SHEPHERD.]

7. Sisters of the Holy Child Jesus.—This recent institute, founded by an American lady, for teaching rich and poor, has seven houses in England and two in the U. S. (in the diocese of Philadelphia).

[2] Sketches of Irish Nunneries, by the Very Rev. Dean Murphy, 1865.

8. Sisters (Little) of the Poor.—This admirable institute was founded in 1840 by the curé of St. Servan, M. le Pailleur, aided by four women of humble birth, whose names were Marie Augustine, Marie Thérèse, Jeanne Jugon, and Fanchon Aubert, for the support, relief, and nursing of aged or infirm poor persons. In 1883 the sisters numbered 3,500, and maintained (their chief resource being begging from door to door) 25,000 old people, in 223 houses, or "Homes." Their first house in the U. S. was opened in 1868 in Brooklyn, and they now have in the U. S. 31 houses, situated in all the leading cities.

9. Sisters of Mercy.—This important and flourishing order, offshoots of which are found in many States of the American Union, and in Australia and New Zealand, was founded in 1827 at Baggot Street, Dublin, by Miss Catherine McAuley, with the approbation of Archbishop Murray, for carrying on all the works of mercy, both spiritual and corporal. The foundress took the title of her order from that of St. Peter Nolasco; its rule, with some slight modifications, from that of the Presentation Nuns. Except in the case of recent filiations, each convent is independent of every other, and is completely under the jurisdiction and control of the bishop of the diocese. Besides the three essential vows the sisters take a fourth—to devote themselves for life to the service and instruction of the poor, sick, and ignorant. Introduced into the U. S. in 1843, at Pittsburgh, these sisters have now about 200 establishments in this country.

10. Sisters (Poor) of Nazareth.

11. Sisters of the Poor Child Jesus.[1]—This institute has two houses in England. It is a cloistered order.

12. Sisters of Providence.—Founded in 1806 in Brittany for the purpose of carrying on schools and caring for orphans, the sick, etc. In 1840 a colony arrived in the U. S. and founded St. Mary's of the Woods, Indiana, the American mother-house of these sisters, who now have many establishments here.

13. Sisters of Notre Dame, Congregation of.—(To be distinguished from the School Sisters of Notre Dame, whose American mother-house is at Milwaukee [SUPPLEMENT B].) Founded at Amiens in 1805, and introduced in 1840 into the diocese of Cincinnati; colonies have also gone to Massachusetts and elsewhere.

SLAVERY. The state of a human being whose present and future lot in life is dependent on the arbitrary will of another person, or of other persons. The young child of free parents, though his present lot in all countries, whether civilised or not, is largely determinable at the will of others, knows that his future will be his own; after reaching a certain age he will be his own master. The slave has no such prospect; even where the law gives him some protection from his master's cruelty or injustice, he has not during the whole course of his life the control of his own acts or movements, and his children are born to the same condition as himself.

The earliest records of man contain no mention of slavery. No slave went into the ark with Noe and the other seven persons who composed his family. It seems to be represented in the book of Genesis as the punishment of the sin of Cham,[1] whose son Chanaan was to be a "servant of servants" (Vulg. servus servorum) to his brethren. The first mention of actual slaves is connected with Egypt; both male and female slaves, with cattle, &c., were given to Abram by the Egyptians[2] on his surrendering his wife to Pharao; and Agar, the domestic slave of Sarai, was an Egyptian woman.[3] Under the law of Moses, the institution was fully sanctioned among the Hebrews, perhaps because of the "hardness of their hearts"; but they were to take slaves from the nations around them, not from their own people; if any Hebrew were compelled to sell himself into bondage, he could go out free in the year of jubilee.[4] At the return from the Captivity, the slaves are said to have stood to the free Hebrews in the proportion of one to six;[5] but the rate was probably much higher than this in times of national prosperity.

Considering the corrupt selfishness of human nature, unaided by grace, there is nothing to wonder at in the institution of slavery. Men, and women too, like to live at ease, and to have the hard work, without which neither food nor luxuries are obtainable, done for them. Especially is this the case in hot countries, in which physical exertion is always more or less distressing. When then neither conscience nor civilisation restrains, any well-armed human tribe has a strong motive for making war upon any neighbouring tribe which it believes to be weaker than itself, in order to obtain the use of the enforced labour of the vanquished. The instructive volumes of Dr. Barth, long a resident in Central Africa, are one long commentary illustrating this statement. Wars for the sole purpose of obtaining slaves were then, and are still, of constant occurrence among the teeming nations of the Soudan. Conversion to Islam, which for many years has been making great progress in Africa, far from checking slavery, tends to spread it; for it gives to the converts a feeling of superiority to the tribes still heathen, which seems of itself to entitle the former to make slaves of the latter. Nothing but the twofold conviction (1) that all men are equal in the sight of God, (2) that a man is bound to do to others as he would they should do to him, can restrain from making slaves of their fellows those who have the power to do so. This conviction, now generally entertained among civilised nations, is the fruit of Christianity; and it has produced a state of things, within the sphere of peoples equally civilised, which removes the power to enslave. Were the belief in Christianity to fail, it does not appear what principle would remain of sufficient power to prevent the civilised from enslaving the uncivilised.

Among the Greeks the notion prevailed that a man could not effectively discharge the duties of a free citizen unless he were exempted from the drudgery of life. This, except in the case of a few rich men, could only be done by means of slavery. Accordingly the institution was an integral part of Hellenic civilisation; and in proportion as a people was more intellectual and refined, it availed itself of slave labour more systematically. The late Dr. Lee, Protestant bishop of Manchester, one of the best of modern schoolmasters, used to say to his boys at Rugby:—"Remember now: thirty thousand Athenians; four thousand Metœcs; four hundred thousand slaves!" The contrast was perhaps accentuated a little too strongly;[1] but its substantial truth and significance are unimpeachable. We are all too apt to forget, in admiring the marvellous fertility of the Attic genius, how ruthlessly these pattern men exploited the labour of a gagged and fettered multitude of miserable beings, created equally with themselves for happiness and immortality.

When the Greek mind began to speculate upon slavery, it rejected the cynical tenet of the old times, that force is its own justification, and that any man who can enslave another may. It suggested that some races of mankind are naturally inferior to other races, and born to be their servants. Aristotle mentions this opinion, without however adopting it as his own.[1] But there were Greeks who expressed nobler views. Not to mention the well-known lines of Homer[2]—

> Jove fixed it certain that the self-same day
> Makes man a slave, takes half his worth away,

Philemon wrote that "no one was ever born a slave by nature; it was ill fortune which enslaved his body."[3]

The able work of M. Wallon describes the extension of slavery among the Romans, even under the Republic, and delineates the fatal moral corruption which it produced. The domestic side of Roman life is unveiled for us in the plays of Plautus and Terence; we thus see how slavery influenced society and vitiated character. The sternly practical turn of the Roman mind, understanding that slavery was at all times dangerous (the war of Spartacus was sufficient to prove that), carried out with horrible consistency the doctrine that the slave, as against his master, has no rights, and that revolt is an unpardonable crime. When Pedanius Secundus, præfect of the city under Nero, had been murdered by one of his slaves, the Senate, on the ground that among the other slaves there must have been some guilty knowledge of the murderer's intention, decreed that the whole household, numbering four hundred —old and young, men, women, and children—should be indiscriminately put to death; and this was done.[4] The gladiators, who were bred to the use of arms that their deadly duels might furnish sport for the Romans, were of course slaves.

Slavery was everywhere one of the conditions of human existence when Christianity appeared in the world. The methods of the Gospel are not revolutionary; they do not deal in those sweeping general assertions which fuller experience always shows to be but half truths; rather they introduce new moral principles into the hearts of men, leaving them there as germs, to bring forth fruit in due season. So it was in the case of slavery. "The Gospel never directly attacks slavery as an institution";[1] nor was the liberation of their slaves prescribed by the Apostles to their converts as an absolute duty. Christianity lifted men to a moral height at which the distinctions between slave and free, Jew and Greek, seemed of trifling importance. "There is neither Greek nor Jew; there is neither bond nor free; there is neither male nor female. For you are all one in Christ Jesus."[2] "Where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty";[3] the liberty of the mind, even though the body be in bondage. "He that is called in the Lord, being a bondman, is the freeman of the Lord";[4] but if a slave could be made free, he was to prefer freedom (v. 21.)[5] A slave was taught to obey his master as though he were Christ himself, not with eye-service, but heartily and strenuously, "as to the Lord and not to men." Similarly, masters were taught to deal humanely with their slaves, as recognising that they had a common master in heaven, with whom there was no respect of persons.[6]

With such principles introduced into human life, slavery, as being in ordinary cases unjust, was at once undermined, and gradually fell. Besides manumissions in life, it became a common practice for Christian owners of slaves to emancipate them by their last will. Long before the end of the fifteenth century slavery had disappeared from Christendom, and even serfdom had been reduced within a narrow compass. The influence of the clergy, pressing with gentle force in the same direction during many centuries, was the chief agent in this beneficent change. After the discovery of the New World, the adventurers and planters whom Spain sent out enslaved the weak Carib population of the West Indies, and forced them to work in the mines. To save the Caribs, the Dominican Las Casas was instrumental in bringing over negroes from Africa, whose hardy frames were capable of bearing great labour under a tropical sun. Other nations, Protestant as well as Catholic, rushed eagerly into the new field of commerce and settlement, and all alike enslaved the negro. The unscrupulous cupidity of the planters of all nations was pretty much on a par; but in countries occupied by Catholics the Church was a real power, and restrained to a great extent the greed and cruelty of the laity. In the Spanish and Portuguese colonies, the slave was not entirely a slave; a code of laws regulated the relations between him and his master; he could buy his freedom for a fixed price; and the slave mother, by paying a small sum, could emancipate her child at the font. These mitigations did not exist in the English and Dutch colonies, where the ministers of the various Protestant sects, divided by deep sectional disagreements, took no common action, but obeyed the public opinion of those among whom they lived. Before the late war in the United States, the Methodist ministers at the North denounced slavery as a sin; the Methodist ministers at the South defended it as an institution sanctioned in Scripture, and eminently pleasing to the Almighty.

Through the movement begun by Quakers, and promoted by Clarkson, Wilberforce, and others, the slave trade was abolished in the British Empire in 1807, and slavery itself suppressed in 1833, compensation being made to the planters of the British West Indies. Previous to this, in 1793, slavery had been abolished in the French West Indies, and many whites had been massacred by the excited negroes. Most of these 40,000 Catholic whites emigrated to the U. S. Spain has moved more slowly, abolishing slavery in Porto Rico, and limiting it in Cuba. Slavery no longer exists in the Spanish-American republics. In 1833 William Lloyd Garrison organized an anti-slavery party in the U. S. Two years later an editor in Alton, Ill., for having denounced slavery, was killed by a mob, whereupon Garrison made a public speech in Boston against this outrage. Garrison was seized by a mob of leading men of Boston, hence known as the "broad-cloth mob," and narrowly escaped with his life. This incensed a young Boston lawyer, Wendell Phillips, who thereafter worked enthusiastically with the "Abolitionist" party. The struggle continued for years. At last the Federal government, as a war measure in 1863, enlarged the scope of President Lincoln's proclamation of the year before and abolished slavery in all the States. Thus Christianity, aided, no doubt, by mere humanitarian views and political considerations, has a second time overmastered those selfish instincts in man which favour the establishment of slavery. In Mahomedan and Pagan countries, no such influence being in operation, slavery, it is to be feared, will for a long time hold its ground.

SOCIETY OF THE FAITHFUL COMPANIONS OF JESUS. This congregation, founded at Amiens by Madame de Bonnault d'Houet in 1820, under the direction of the Père Varin, of the Company of Jesus, to labour for the sanctification of souls and the reform of female education, sent out branches even in the lifetime of the foundress into Italy, Switzerland, England, and Ireland. Madame d'Houet usually began by opening a poor school, in which the education was gratuitous, adding, as circumstances permitted, a middle school in which moderate fees were charged, and a pensionnat for the children of the rich. She died in 1858; her life has been well written by the Abbé F. Martin. The institute is now in a flourishing condition; it possesses fourteen houses in England, the principal one being at Isleworth, near London, and two or three in Ireland, of which the most important is at Laurel Hill, near Limerick.

SOMASCHA, THE REGULAR CLERKS OF. The founder of this order was St. Jerom Emiliani, a noble Venetian, born in 1481. In his youth he adopted the profession of arms, and fought with distinction in the war, disastrous for the republic, which arose out of the League of Cambray (1509). After valiantly defending the town of Castelnuovo, he fell into the hands of the enemy; but being delivered, some say miraculously, from his imprisonment, he resolved to give his future life to God. For some years he devoted himself to the care of some orphan nephews, and to the management of their property. Circumstances gradually led him to the establishment of an orphanage at Venice, about 1528; this was followed up by similar foundations at Brescia and Bergamo. His first associates were laymen, in concert with whom he fixed the centre of their operations at Somascha, a village between Milan and Bergamo. Some fervent priests joined him, and they all lived a life of great regularity and austerity, sanctified by continual prayer, at Somascha. The holy founder died in 1537, before his institute had been approved by the Holy See; he was beatified by Benedict XIV. and canonised by Clement XIII. The Papal confirmation came in 1568; it erected the congregation into a religious order, under the rule of St. Austin, and gave it the name of Regular Clerks of St. Mayeul, or of Somascha. The order was in course of time greatly extended in Italy, and was introduced in France; besides orphanages and Magdalen asylums, it had the direction of several colleges. Its principal house is now at Rome.[1] (Hélyot.)

SORBONNE. This famous college took its name from the founder, Robert de Sorbon, who in 1252 founded within the University of Paris a college for the maintenance of sixteen theological students, four from each of the French, Norman, Picard, and English "nations." Burses were soon afterwards added for Flemish and German students. The discipline was in the hands of a provisor or curator, appointed by a board presided over by the Archdeacon of Paris. The formal approbation of the Holy See was given in 1268. The credit and influence of the college continually increased; the majority of the Paris doctors in theology were there trained; in its halls were ordinarily held the meetings of that faculty; and in process of time "the Sorbonne" and the theological faculty became identified. This was certainly the case as early as the beginning of the sixteenth century. From that time, since the theologians of the university were then and long afterwards its chief celebrities, the history of the Sorbonne can hardly be distinguished, down to the Revolution, from that of the university itself. On the important, and not very consistent part which the Sorbonne played in the great Jansenist controversy, see the article JANSENISM.

In 1629 were opened the existing stately buildings of the Sorbonne in the Quartier Latin, including the church in which lie the ashes of Richelieu, an amphitheatre capable of seating more than 1,500 auditors, and residences for thirty-six "doctors of the Sorbonne." The old University of Paris was destroyed by the Revolution; when it was reorganised by Napoleon in 1808, a faculty of Catholic theology, with seven chairs, was established at the Sorbonne. But the influence of the Government in the appointment of the professors caused the bishops to regard their teaching with some mistrust; the seminarist routine is so firmly established that even those who admit its shortcomings find it scarcely possible to abstain from taking advantage of it; and from these and other causes, the present faculty of Catholic theology is little more than a nominis umbra. The faculties of the Sciences and of Literature in the University of France also hold their high days for the conferring of degrees and prizes in the buildings of the Sorbonne. Lectures are also given within its walls by professors belonging to these faculties.

SOUL. The Scholastics, following Aristotle, mean by soul the primary principle of life, and by living things all such as have the capacity of motion from within. Thus, a stone has no life, and therefore no soul, because it does not move but is moved by forces external to itself; while, on the other hand, vegetables, beasts, and men have all souls. A plant, for example, unlike inorganic substances, has the power, so long as it lives, of absorbing moisture and of assimilating it by the activity of its organs. Brutes have the same power, and add to it that of sense; while the soul of man is at once vegetative, sensitive, and rational. We have to deal here only with the human or rational soul, and the object of this article is to note the principal heads of Catholic doctrine on the subject, not to enter on philosophical discussion foreign to the plan of this work.

1. The Soul is Immaterial.—In respect to his vegetative and animal functions man does not differ essentially from the lower animals, but whereas the soul of brutes is a principle which can only exist in matter and only operates in union with it, the human soul, though it also exists in and operates through matter, "has, nevertheless, an existence apart from matter and an operation in which the body takes no part" (Kleutgen). The Schoolmen find the proof of such immateriality in the power which the mind has of forming abstract and immaterial ideas. And although this immaterial or spiritual character of the soul and the freedom of the will are taught by faith, they may also be certainly proved by reason, and so the Congregation of the Index declared June 11, 1855.

2. The Unity of the Soul.—The three classes into which the functions of the soul naturally fall led some to assert the existence of three distinct souls— vegetative, animal, and rational. In the middle of the ninth century the question assumed theological importance, and Photius excited great opposition by his doctrine that man had two souls—one rational, one irrational—and that the latter only sinned (Hefele, "Concil." iv. p. 334). The immoral consequences which flow from such a denial of the unity of human nature are obvious, and in 869 the Fourth General Council of Constantinople (can. 11), after stating that both Old and New Testaments attributed "one rational and intelligent soul" to man (unam animam rationabilem et intellectualem, μίαν ψυχὴν λογικήν τε καὶ νοεράν), anathematised the doctrine of "two souls" as a heresy. In the middle ages, however, trichotomy, or the doctrine of "three souls," was upheld by Ockham, who alleged that the doctrine of "two souls"—one good, one bad—not that of separate souls, in itself and as a philosophical thesis, had been condemned by the Eighth General Council (Ockham, "Quodlib." II. qu. 10 and 11, quoted by Kleutgen). It deserves notice that although St. Thomas (in 1 Thess. v. 23) speaks of the doctrine of "two souls" as "reprobated in the decisions of the Church," the very learned Estius, in his commentary on the same passage, regards the dispute as merely philosophical, and evidently did not admit that the Church had decided the matter ("an vero ea duo, sc. pars rationalis animæ et pars ejusdem sensitiva, re ipsa an vero, quod magis recepta est, sola ratione distinguantur, philosophi disputant"). In our own time a celebrated German Catholic, Günther (d. 1863), defended the theory that there were in human nature two distinct principles—one the animal soul, the principle of vegetative and animal life; the other a spiritual principle.

3. Union of Soul and Body.—The Schoolmen speak of the one soul as the substantial form of the body. By the substantial form they understand that principle by which a thing is constituted in its proper species, that which makes it what it essentially is. They appeal to the unity of nature testified by consciousness and acknowledged in the common language of mankind. We express our consciousness of our own unity when we say, "I feel," "I reason," "I will." It is not, as Aristotle remarks, so correct to say "My eye sees" as "I see through the eye." Further, we are conscious that we who consider and resolve carry out our resolution through the bodily limbs. Our faculties, indeed, are different, but all proceed from one common principle of life which makes each of us a single being. The denial that the "substance of the rational or intellectual soul is truly and in itself the form of the human body" was condemned at the General Council of Vienne as erroneous and out of harmony with (inimicam) the truth of the Catholic faith. The condemnation was directed against the teaching of John of Oliva (1247–1297), a Provençal Franciscan, who joined the heretical party of the "Spiritual" Friars. The condemnation was repeated by Pius IX. in 1857, in his brief to the Archbishop of Cologne on the errors of Günther. It is, however, well to remember that the doctrine of Scotus is different here from that of the Thomists. He admitted that the single principle of life is the substantial form, but held that the body had a form of its own, this form of corporeity, as he called it, being distinct from that of inorganic bodies.

4. Immortality of the Soul.—Here there is a marked divergence of opinion among Catholic philosophers. St. Thomas and many who follow him believe that it can be proved by reason. Scotus, on the contrary, regards it as a truth cognisable by faith alone. The Roman Congregations have carefully avoided even the appearance of condemning the Scotist position. In the decree of the Congregation of the Index, already cited, it is the spiritual nature, not the immortality of the soul, which is said to be demonstrable by reason.

5. The Origin of the Soul.—Origen held with Plato that souls existed before they were united with the body, and this theory forms the subject of the first of the fifteen anathemas issued by σύνοδος ἐνδημοῦσα of Constantinople in 543 (see Hefele, "Concil." II. p. 790 seq.). Putting this aside, we find that at least three distinct theories on the origin of the soul have been held in the Church.

(α) A few held that the soul of men was produced, like that of the brutes, by natural generation, no special power being attributed to the souls of the parents, except so far as the soul is the animating principle of the body. This theory is stated with characteristic coarseness by Tertullian ("De Anima," 27); was stated as a possible theory by Rufinus (see Hieron. "Adv. Rufin." ii. 8); and perhaps adopted by Macarius (Hom. xxx. 1).[1]

(β) It was a common belief in the early Church (Clem. Al. "Strom." iv. 6, p. 638; ed. Potter, vi. 16, p. 808; Hieron. "In Ecclesiast." tom. iii. ed. Vallarsi, p. 492–3) that the soul was immediately created by God and infused by Him into the embryo when sufficiently organised. Jerome, however (Ep. 126 ad Marcellin et Anapsych.), admits that most Westerns held the soul to be "ex traduce."

(γ) Augustine found it hard to defend himself against the Pelagians on the theory that the soul was immediately created by God. If the soul came straight from God, how could it come stained with original sin? The difficulty led Augustine to investigate the assumption from which it arose. He could find no proof in Scripture that the soul is directly created by God, and, while he repudiated Tertullian's theory, he thought it very possible (Ep. "Ad Optat." 190, al. 157) that an immaterial element ("incorporeum semen") was communicated by the father to the mother. The philosophical reasons seemed to him fairly balanced on either side, though he inclined on theological grounds to the doctrine that the soul came by generation ("De Gen. ad Lit." x. 23). St Augustine's influence led Fulgentius ("De Verit. Prædest." iii. 18), Gregory the Great (Ep. ix. 52, "Ad Secundin."), and Isidore ("De Ordine Creat." cap. 15) to decide, or rather to abstain from deciding, the matter, just as St. Augustine himself had done. On the other hand, St. Bernard (Serm. II. "De Nativ." sub fin.) and the Schoolmen generally (see, e.g., St. Thomas, I. qu. xc.) reverted to the older view—viz. creationism—and abandoned that of Augustine—viz. generationism. Benedict XII. required the Armenian bishops to accept creationism. The controversy was revived in 1854 by Frohschammer, priest and professor of philosophy at Munich. His errors on the relations of faith and reason were proscribed by Pius IX. in a brief to the Archbishop of Munich (1862), but nothing was said of his teaching on the origin of the soul.

SPIRITUALISM, MESMERISM, ANIMAL MAGNETISM, &c. Mesmerism takes its name from Mesmer, a German physician addicted to alchemy and astrology. This impostor came to Paris in 1778, and found many credulous disciples there. He professed to cure disease by contact with magnetic cylinders, and threw many persons into convulsions. His confederate, Puységur, dispensed with the apparatus, and made all depend on passes of the hand and the will of mesmerist and patient. Others, like Faria, pretended to induce magnetic sleep by the mere utterance of a command, while Petet, at Lyons, brought somnambulism and clairvoyance on the stage. In itself and used simply as a natural means of producing natural effects, mesmerism, whatever common sense may have to say on the matter, is not condemned by religion, and so the Congregation of the Holy Office ruled in 1840. Of course, even then persons are bound to beware of the moral dangers to which they may expose themselves in a state of magnetic sleep and in the hands of persons who make a living by this disreputable trade. But the same authority in 1856 strictly forbade attempts of deluded people to find out the secrets of the future and the like from those who professed to reveal them in a state of magnetic sleep. This involves the sin of divination on the part of the dupes, of blasphemy and cheating on the part of the clairvoyante and those who exhibit her.

The still more ludicrous and revolting superstition of Spiritualism began in America. A Dr. Billor, of New York, in 1839, attributed somnambulism to angels and dæmons; in 1847, "spirits," which came at the bidding of mediums, assumed visible shapes, and next year the folly of "table-turning" manifested itself at Hydesville, in the State of New York. The "spirits" wrote and spoke nonsense through their mediums, and, as they condescended to solve theological questions, Spiritualism developed itself into a ghastly caricature of religion, which won adherents among foolish people all over Europe. This consultation of spirits cannot, it is plain, be made seriously without heresy, superstition, and impiety combined. According to Gury, even passive assistance at a séance is sinful, because it is co-operation in a thing intrinsically evil.

STATES OF THE CHURCH. Under the Pagan emperors Christianity was a religio illicita, and the Roman Pontiffs were exposed by their position to the full severity of the laws; a large proportion of them suffered martyrdom. The edicts of Constantine in favour of the religion which he had embraced have been noticed in a previous article [CHURCH PROPERTY, p. 183]. In the middle ages it was long believed that the first Christian emperor had made a solemn "Edict of Donation," conferring on the Pope, Sylvester I., the city of Rome, the imperial palace there, and the "provinces, places, and cities of all Italy, and the western regions."[1] This donation was long ago recognised as a forgery; Muratori assigns its invention to the eighth century.

At the end of the sixth century the Roman See was in possession of large landed estates, chiefly in Italy and Sicily. After the death of Gregory the Great the power of the Eastern Empire in Italy dwindled more and more, and the Lombards, pressing down from the North, threatened to seize upon Rome. Naturally, in the absence of other authority, the Romans and the people of the surrounding districts came to look on the Popes as their protectors and rulers. To drive back the Lombards, Pope Stephen II. appealed for aid to the young Frankish monarchy; Pepin (754) crossed the Alps, defeated Astolfo, the Lombard king, and endowed the Papacy with the Exarchate of Ravenna. This was the real beginning of the Ecclesiastical State. Charlemagne confirmed his father's grant, but with the understanding that the supreme civil authority remained in his hands as "Patrician" of Rome. The next great acquisition of territory came through the bequest of the Countess Matilda (†1115), the friend of Gregory VII.; it consisted of Southern Tuscany and other districts. But just as other portions of the Papal territory had been seized by various counts and princes, so now the rich lands of the Countess were appropriated by the German emperors, and for a hundred years the Popes had little benefit from the gift. At length, under the vigorous rule of Innocent III. (†1216), the right of the Roman See was admitted, and a compact Ecclesiastical State, in which the Popes governed without a superior—except so far as a vague suzerainty was allowed to the emperors—now arose for the first time.

The emperors of the House of Hohenstaufen, ever seeking to extend their power in Italy, left the Popes no rest. After the extinction of that family in the middle of the thirteenth century, a new state of things arose. Rudolf of Hapsburg, the new emperor, guaranteed to the Pope (Gregory X.) in 1274 the tranquil possession of the Pontifical territory. The Popes had for a long time nothing to fear on the side of Germany; on the other hand, the establishment of the House of Anjou at Naples, and the calamitous issue of the struggle between Boniface VIII. and Philip le Bel gave to the French monarchy, in the fourteenth century, an unhappy influence over the temporal policy of the Papacy. The Holy See was removed to Avignon,[1] and fixed there more than seventy years (1305–1378). Meantime its Italian territories were full of confusion; from which, indeed, the genius of Cardinal Albornoz (1353–1368) rescued them for a time; but after the schism had broken out (1378) the peaceful and regular government of the Papal States became for a long time impossible. The vice of nepotism was justly chargeable against several of the Popes in the fifteenth century. This culminated in the exaltation of Cæsar Borgia over all the petty princes of Central and Northern Italy. Pope Julius II. (1503–1513) compelled Cæsar to surrender his acquisitions, and with great ability and vigour took measures against all who had encroached upon the patrimony of the Church. He humbled the Venetians, recovered Bologna and Fermo, and became —after Innocent III. and Albornoz—the third founder and restorer of the Papal States. In 1596 Ferrara, and in 1631 Urbino came by escheat to the Roman See. The States of the Church remained with their frontiers practically unchanged down to the French Revolution, constituting a territory of irregular shape in the centre of Italy, from Ferrara on the north to Terracina on the south, having Ancona for its eastern and Civita Vecchia for its western seaport. By the treaty of Tolentino (1797) Napoleon compelled the Pope to cede the Legations, Bologna, Ferrara, and Romagna, and admit a French garrison into Ancona; Avignon had been already seized and annexed to France. Subsequently the whole of the Papal territory was appropriated by the French, and when the Pope (Pius VII.) launched against Napoleon on this account the sentence of excommunication, he was arrested and kept a close prisoner, first at Savona and afterwards at Fontainebleau. After the fall of Napoleon, the Pope was reinstated in the government of an undiminished territory. Pius IX., being elected Pope in 1846, proclaimed an amnesty to political offenders, and sincerely endeavoured so thoroughly to reform the administration in every department as to leave his subjects without just cause of discontent. The hateful crime of the murder of his minister Pellegrino Rossi (1848) was the answer of the Roman democrats to the fatherly overtures of the Pontiff. The Pope was compelled to take refuge on Neapolitan territory, and a republic was set up at Rome by Mazzini and Garibaldi. Louis Napoleon, having been elected President of the new French Republic, sent troops to Rome, under General Oudinot, who, without much trouble, drove away the revolutionists and brought the Pope back. All this took place in 1849. A French garrison was left at Rome; but the Pope knew that it did not enter into the designs of Louis Napoleon to defend the entire Pontifical territory; in order, therefore, to keep it intact he raised a small army, commanded by the French General Lamoricière, and composed to a large extent of foreign Catholics. After the war between Austria and France, in which the power of the former was beaten down at Solferino (1859), Piedmont, ruled by the astute Cavour and assisted by the revolutionary sects, succeeded in obtaining possession of Tuscany, the Legations, Modena, Parma, and Naples. The small Papal army was overpowered by a Piedmontese force many times more numerous at Castelfidardo (1860). The Pope was now left with only one province, the "Patrimony of St. Peter," extending some fifty miles along the coast to the north of Rome. Of this also, and of his capital, Pius IX. was deprived in 1870 by the Piedmontese king, who took advantage of the reverses suffered by France in the war with Germany to set at naught the treaty of 1864, by which he had agreed that Florence should be the capital of the Italian kingdom. It was now said that Rome was the indispensable capital of that kingdom, but that the Pope's independence should be respected. The

[1] The county of Avignon, or the Venaissin, which once belonged to the Counts of Toulouse, passed to the Roman See in 1274.

Papal palace of the Quirinal and all the public buildings of Rome were appropriated by the invaders; but the Vatican was left unassailed, and a "Law of Guarantees," passed by the Italian Parliament (and capable of being repealed by the same authority), while assigning to the Pope an annual dotation of two million lire, guaranteed to him sovereign rights within the limits of the Vatican. It is scarcely necessary to say that the dotation has not been accepted, while the fragment of sovereignty guaranteed has already been encroached upon in various ways, and is held on a tenure of the most precarious description. For the present, Rome and the Papal States are lost to the Papacy. What the pious and the believing gave, men of a different temper have taken away; and there is no present sign of redress.

The Popes have not ceased to declare, on all fitting occasions, that the preservation of their temporal independence is necessary, as human affairs are constituted, to the free and full exercise of their spiritual authority. It has been argued that the raison d'être of the temporal power has ceased in modern times, because the lay power in states has ceased to be, as it often was in the middle ages, arbitrary, corrupt, violent, and ill-informed, but on the contrary is administered on fixed and equitable principles which ensure equal justice for all. It is further maintained that the danger of undue influence, which might reasonably be dreaded while the European Governments were seriously Christian in one direction or another, and which made intolerable to previous generations the notion of the Pope as a French, or Spanish, or Austrian subject, cannot be pleaded in an age when government has ceased to take theology into account, and is administered on a purely utilitarian basis. What risk of interference with the Papal government of the Church could there be while Cavours and Rattazzis held the reins of power? The Pope, on this view, though a subject of the Italian kingdom, might both be and be known to be absolutely untrammelled in the government of the Church. It is quite true that the objections to the inclusion of the seat of the Papacy in any modern state are no longer precisely what they were. They have changed their character; but they are not less cogent now than in former times. The very fact that European Governments have ceased to be Christian makes it impossible for the Papacy, of which Christ and his gospel are the life, to live at peace with them. Formerly, even if the influence of a Catholic king or emperor at Rome appeared to be excessive, still it professed, like the Papacy itself, to be directed to Christian ends, and it made use of similar methods. The possession of Rome by a Charles V. or a Louis XIV. did not involve the deluging of the city with immoral and infidel publications, or the permission of the public exhibition of every form of heresy and absurdity. It did not mean that "Little Bethels" and sectarian chapels and churches were to spring up unchecked, or that the streets were to be given over to the grotesque proceedings of a "Salvation Army." But all this is implied, and cannot but be implied, in the possession of Rome by such a state as Italy, which has ceased to be Christian. Truth and error, good and evil, the beautiful and the unseemly, are matters of indifference to such a government; it will countenance the preachers of heresy as willingly as the preachers of truth. With such a state the Roman See cannot possibly live on terms of amity. It is not a question about reasonable toleration or respect for the rights of conscience. As the Popes have not in the past, so they would not in the future, interfere with any Protestants residing in Rome who might wish to practise their religious rites in a quiet and unobtrusive manner. The question is whether a Government ought to treat all religions alike—that is, whether it ought to have no religion, and ignore the subject altogether.

Protestants themselves, or the more reasonable and enlightened among them, view with grief and scorn the process by which Rome is being reduced to the level of an English or American town. They would prefer that at least one place should be left on earth where Catholic principles of government and maxims of life might be applied without disturbance. They would wish to see the Sacred Congregations again discharging their critical and judicial functions. It might be said that the discipline so set up must be ineffectual; a Roman could obtain the works of Renan or Paul de Kock at Florence if the sale were forbidden at Rome; he could turn Methodist and rant in public at Naples if this luxury were denied to him at home. But what then? Is it nothing that an example of right practice should be given, towards which European society, dislocated as it now is, might gradually tend? So far from the changed circumstances of Europe making it a matter of little moment that the Pope should be independent, there has never been a time since the conversion of Constantine when his independence has been more vitally necessary, because in no previous age has the civil authority so openly declared itself unchristian. The Pope must oppose, must be out of sympathy with the civil power, when he sees it establishing schools without religion, encouraging the erection of heretical temples, vexing and banishing religious orders, and throwing obstacles in the way of those who desire to embrace the religious life. To make the Pope a subject of any Power that governs in this fashion—and nearly all civilised states do so—can only end in one of two ways: either he will be forced to acquiesce in what he knows to be a false and mischievous system, or he will find himself in a state of continual collision with the civil power. The first alternative is, of course, impossible; the second implies a state of things more or less resembling that which now exists, but still worse in this respect, that even the shadow of independence which the Piedmontese left to the Pope in 1870, through forbearing to seize on the Vatican palace, would be swept away if he were openly declared a subject of the King of Italy. Against such a consummation all Catholics worthy of the name will be ready at any time to protest, and, if necessary, in a manner more effectual than by words. The present position, painful and dishonouring as it is to the Holy Father, disgraceful to the Italians, and afflicting to all faithful Catholics, evidently does not possess the character of durability.

STATIONS. (1) A name given to the fast kept on Wednesdays and Fridays. In the Roman Church the fast was one of devotion, not of precept, and it ended at none—i.e. three o'clock (Tertull. "De Jejun." 2). Tertullian ("De Orat." 19) explains the word from the military usage; the stations were days on which the Christian soldiers stood on guard and "watched in prayer." It was characteristic of the Montanists to prolong the fast of the Stations till the evening ("De Jejun." 10). Prudentius ("Peristeph." vi. 52 seq.) relates of the martyr Fructuosus that he refused the cup offered him because it was a Station and the ninth hour had not come. In the East, on the other hand, the fast of the Stations was obligatory ("Apost. Const." v. 20; "Canon Apost." 69;[1] Epiphan. "Hær." 75 n. 3). In the West, the fast on Wednesday never obligatory, died out altogether, while that of Friday became obligatory about the end of the ninth century. The Greeks, on the other hand, still maintain the fast of Wednesdays and Fridays. (Thomassin, "Traité des Jeûnes," P. ii. ch. 15; see ABSTINENCE and FAST.)

(2) The word, in another sense, still holds its place in the Roman Missal. Many of our readers must have noticed the words "Statio ad S. Petrum, ad S. Mariam majorem," &c., before the Introit of certain Masses. Mabillon ("Museum Italicum," tom. ii. p. xxxi.) explains the term as meaning either a fast or "a concourse of the people to an appointed place—i.e. a church in which the procession of the clergy halts on stated days to say stated prayers. It is an ancient custom in Rome that the Roman clergy should on particular days meet for prayer in some one church where Mass and other divine services are performed. The procession of the Roman clergy to these Stations is either solemn or private; the latter when individuals betake themselves privately to the appointed place, the former when the Pope and the rest solemnly proceed thither singing litanies and other prayers." The gathering of clergy and people before this procession, Mabillon continues, was called collecta, and the name was then given to the prayer said over the people before the procession started from one church to the other in order to make the Station. "It was St. Gregory who regulated the Stations at Rome—i.e. the churches where the office was to be performed daily in Lent, on the Ember days, and on the solemn feasts. For the feasts of the saints were celebrated in the churches which contained their relics. St. Gregory then marked these Stations in his Sacramentary, as they are now in the Roman Missal, and attached them chiefly to the patriarchal and titular churches; but although the Stations were fixed, the Archdeacon did not fail, after the Pope's Communion, to announce the next Station to the people" (Fleury, "H. E." livr.

[1] We follow Thomassin in his interpretation of the fourth canon. The passage in the Constitutions (πᾶσαν τετράδα καὶ πᾶσαν παρασκευὴν προστάσσομεν ὑμῖν νηστεύειν) is, as it seems to us, decisive against the view of Hefele (Concil. vol. i. p. 821) and others. Τέτρας often means "the fourth day."

xxxvi. § 17). In the Easter of 774, Charlemagne assisted at the Station of Easter Sunday at St. Mary Major, of Easter Monday at St. Peter's, Tuesday at St. Paul's—the same Stations still noted in our Missal (Eginhard, apud Fleury, xliv. § 5).

STATIONS OF THE CROSS (Via Crucis, Via Calvarii). A series of images or pictures representing the different events in the Passion of Christ, each Station corresponding to a particular event. Usually, they are ranged round the church, the first station being placed on one side of the high altar, the last on the other. The Stations are among the most popular of Catholic devotions and are to be found in almost every church. Sometimes they are erected in the open air, especially on roads which lead to some church or shrine standing on a hill.

The devotion began in the Franciscan order. The Franciscans are the guardians of the holy places in Jerusalem, and these stations are intended as a help to making in spirit a pilgrimage to the scene of Christ's sufferings and death. Innocent XII., in 1694, authentically interpreting a brief of his predecessor Innocent XI. in 1686, declared that the indulgences granted for devoutly visiting certain holy places in Palestine could be gained by all Franciscans and by all affiliated to the order if they made the way of the cross devoutly—i.e. passed or turned from station to station meditating devoutly on the various stages of the history.

Benedict XIII., in 1726, extended these indulgences to all the faithful; Clement XII., in 1731, permitted persons to gain the indulgences at Stations erected in churches which were not Franciscan, provided they were erected by a Franciscan with the sanction of the ordinary. At present the connection of the Stations with the Franciscan order is almost forgotten, at least in England, except as a matter of history. Our bishops can, by Apostolic faculties, erect the Stations with the indulgences attached to them, and they constantly delegate this faculty to priests. The English bishops received faculties to this effect, provided there were no religious in the neighbourhood to whom the privilege belonged, in 1857. In 1862 these faculties were renewed without this limitation. The faculties are quinquennial. (Conc. Prov. Westmonast. II. Append. I. Concil. IV. Append. II.)

There are fourteen Stations—viz. (1) the sentence passed on our Lord by Pilate; (2) the receiving of the cross; (3) our Lord's first fall; (4) his meeting with his mother; (5) the bearing of the cross by Simon of Cyrene; (6) the wiping of Christ's face by Veronica with a handkerchief; (7) his second fall; (8) his words to the women of Jerusalem, "Weep not for Me," &c.; (9) his third fall; (10) his being stripped of his garments, (11) his crucifixion; (12) his death; (13) the taking down of his body from the cross; (14) his burial. In the diocese of Vienna the number of the Stations at the end of last century was reduced to eleven. On the other hand a fifteenth Station has been sometimes added—viz. the finding of the cross by Helena. These changes are unauthorised.

STIGMATA. The word occurs in Gal. vi. 15, "I bear the marks of Jesus in my body." Such brands or marks (στίγματα) were set on slaves who had run away, on slaves consecrated to the service of a heathen god, rarely on captives, and sometimes soldiers branded the name of their general on some part of their body. Probably St. Paul's metaphor is taken from the second of these customs. (See Lightfoot, ad loc.). He regarded the marks of suffering in Christ's cause as consecrating him the more to his Master's service. The Latin versions retain the word "stigmata," but no Catholic commentator of repute, so far as we know, ever dreamt that St. Paul received miraculous marks of Christ's Passion. Neither St. Thomas nor Estius allude to such an interpretation, and Windischmann only mentions it to dismiss it.

Still, the idea that miraculous wounds on the hands, feet, and side, like those borne by our Lord, were a mark of divine favour, certainly existed in the mediæval Church independently of St. Francis, for in 1222 at a council in Oxford an impostor who claimed to have stigmata of this kind confessed his guilt and was punished accordingly (Fleury, "H. E." lxxviii. § 56). Only two years later—i.e. 1224—St. Francis of Assisi (d. 1226) was on Mount Alvernus to keep his annual fast of forty days in honour of St. Michael. One morning, says St. Buonaventure, about the 14th of September, the feast of the Exaltation of the Cross, Francis saw a seraph flying towards him. There was a figure of a man attached to a cross between the wings. After the vision disappeared, the hands and feet of the saint were found to be marked with nails, and there was a wound in his side. The wounds were seen by some of the friars and by Alexander IV. during the lifetime of the saint, and after his death by fifty friars, St. Clare, and a multitude of seculars. St. Buonaventure assures us that he had the testimony of Alexander IV. from the Pope's own lips. The Church keeps a feast of the Stigmata of St. Francis, instituted by Benedict XII.

The Dominicans claimed a similar distinction for one of their own order, St. Catharine of Siena (1347–1380). They appealed to a letter from the saint to her confessor, Raymond of Capuâ, in which she states that our Lord had impressed the stigmata upon her, but had at her own request made them invisible to others. They also quoted the testimony of St. Antoninus and the hymn which alludes to the stigmata, inserted in the Office of St. Catharine with the approval of Pius II. The Franciscans, who maintained that the privilege was peculiar to their own founder, carried the matter before Sixtus IV. in 1483. The Pope (himself a Franciscan) forbade under severe penalties any one to paint images of St. Catharine with the stigmata. (See Fleury, "H. E." lxxix. § 5, cxv. § 103.)

Still the fact of her stigmatisation is recorded in the Breviary office, and a special feast in commemoration of it was granted to the Dominicans by Benedict XIII. In a work on the subject Dr. Imbert-Gourbeyre enumerates 145 persons, twenty men, the rest women, who are stated to have received the stigmata. Of these, eighty lived before the seventeenth century. Some are canonised, others beatified, others simply persons of reputed holiness. More than one is still living. The work just referred to ("Les Stigmatisées") was published by Palmé in 1873.

STOLE. A narrow vestment made of the same stuff as the chasuble, and worn round the neck. The Pope always wears the stole. Bishops and priests wear it at Mass—the priest crossed over his breast, the bishop, who has already the pectoral cross on his breast, pendant on each side. They also wear it whenever they exercise their orders by administering sacraments or by blessing persons or things. In some places it is, in others it is not, worn in preaching, and the custom of the place is to be followed (S. C. R. 12 Nov. 1837, 23 Maii 1846). Deacons wear it at Mass, or at Benediction, &c., when they have to move the Blessed Sacrament, over the left shoulder and joined on the right side.

Stole—i.e. στολή in classical Greek—in the LXX and New Testament means a robe of any kind, sometimes (e.g. in Mark xii. 38, Luc. xx. 46) a costly or imposing garment. In Latin stola was the upper garment worn by women of position. The conjecture of Meratus (on Gavant. tom. i. P. ii. tit. i.) that our stole is the Roman stola of which only the ornamental stripe has been left, is very unlikely, considering that the stola was, almost exclusively, a piece of female attire. The stole is never mentioned by that name before the ninth century. Theodoret ("H. E." ii. 27) speaks of "a holy stole" (ἱερὰ στολή) given to Macarius by Constantine, but he only means a "sacred vestment" in general, and Germanus of Constantinople at the beginning of the eighth century identifies the στολή with the φελώνιον or chasuble, and distinguishes it from the ὠράριον or stole according to our modern usage (Galland. "Bibliothec." tom. xiii. p. 226).

This word orarium belongs to the later Latin, and means a cloth for the face, a handkerchief. It was also used "in favorem," to applaud at theatres, &c., and sometimes worn as a scarf. The first mention of it as an ecclesiastical vestment occurs about the middle of the fourth century, when the Council of Laodicea (can. 22 and 23) forbade clerics in minor orders to use it. A sermon attributed to Chrysostom, and probably not much later than his time, compares the deacons to angels, and the "stripes of thin linen on their left shoulders" (ταῖς λεπταῖς ὀθόναις ταῖς ἐπὶ τῶν ἀριστερῶν ὤμων) to wings ("Homily on the Prodigal Son," Migne, vol. viii. 520). In the West, for a long time after, orarium was used for a common handkerchief or napkin (Ambros. "De Excess. Sat." lib. i. 43; August. "De Civit. Dei," xxii. 8; Hieron. Ep. lii. 9; Prudent. "Peristeph." i. 86; Greg. Turon, "De Gloria Mart." i. 93; Greg. Magn. Ep. vii. 30. So the Council of Orleans in 511). It is in the Spanish church that we find the earliest traces of the orarium or stole as a sacred vestment among the Latins. The Council of Braga in 563 (can. 9) speaks of the orarium as worn by deacons; a Council of Toledo in 633 recognises it as a vestment of bishops, priests, and deacons (can. 28 and 40). Another synod of Braga in 675 mentions the present custom according to which priests wear the orarium crossed over the breast (can. 4); while the Synod of Mayence in 813 (can. 28) requires priests to wear it not only at Mass but habitually, as the Pope does now, to mark their sacerdotal dignity. Several of the Ordines Romani (the third, fifth, eighth, ninth, and thirteenth), also mention the orarium. Hence, we may conclude that from about the time of Charlemagne the orarium or stole was generally adopted throughout the West as a vestment of bishops, priests, and deacons. The Greeks have always regarded the orarium as a vestment peculiar to deacons. The ἐπιτραχήλιον or περιτραχήλιον of priests differs both in form and in the manner it is worn from the orarium of deacons. The Syrian Christians have adopted the same word orro, ororo, but with them the orro is worn by clerics of all the orders. Readers among the Maronites wear the orro hanging from the right shoulder, subdeacons in all the Syrian rites round the neck, deacons on the left shoulder, priests round the neck and in front of the breast. The Syrians also use the same word for the ὠμοφόριον or pallium of bishops. (See Payne Smith, "Thesaurus Syriacus," col. 101, 102, sub voc. ܐܘܪܪܘ.) Hefele says it appears from ancient pictures that down to the twelfth century the deacon's stole hung over the left shoulder, and was not, as now, fastened together on the right side below the breast. Till a late period the stole was worn outside the dalmatic as now by the Greek deacons over the sticharion. Hefele finds the earliest notice of a deacon's stole worn under the dalmatic in a Salzburg Pontifical of the twelfth century, and in the fourteenth Roman Ordo, compiled about 1300. Bishops, however, wore the stole over the alb and under the tunicella and dalmatic as early at least as Rabanus Maurus ("De Cleric. Instit." i. 19, 20)—i.e. about 816.

The same author (loc. cit.) speaks of the orarium which "some call stole." This is the first certain instance of the use of the latter word, for its place in the Gregorian Sacramentary may be one of the many interpolations to which liturgical books are peculiarly subject. In the eleventh and twelfth centuries stole became the common word (so, e.g., the Synod of Coyaca, in the diocese of Oviedo, anno 1050, can. 3). The oraria on ancient pictures are exactly like our stoles, resembling the pattern known as Gothic. They were often adorned with jewels, bells hung from them, and letters or words were worked in. Hefele acknowledges his failure after much search to find the reason why the word "stole" came to be used for orarium. The vestment has been taken as a symbol of the yoke of Christ (Pseudo-Alcuin), of Christ's obedience (Innocent III.) The prayer in our present Missal evidently refers to the original meaning of the Greek στολή. "Give me back, O Lord, the stole or robe of immortality," &c.

STOLE-FEES. The fees, varying in different countries, which it is customary among the laity to pay to a priest at the time of his discharging any sacred function for their benefit—e.g. in marriages, christenings, and funerals.

SUBDEACONS. Ministers of the Church who rank next to deacons. In the Latin Church they prepare the sacred vessels and the bread and wine for Mass; pour the water into the chalice at the Offertory and sing the Epistle. Among the Greeks they guard the gates of the sanctuary during Mass, and prepare the sacred vessels at the Prothesis. They are therefore allowed to touch the paten and chalice, unless they contain the Holy Eucharist. The 21st Canon of Laodicea forbids them in general terms to touch the holy vessels; but Morinus and Van Espen interpret this canon as referring simply to the "Great Entrance" in the Greek liturgy, when the prepared elements are carried in procession at the beginning of the Missa Fidelium from the Prothesis to the altar.

Among the Greeks and Orientals the subdiaconate is a minor, among the Latins a greater or sacred order. But it was only about 1200 that even the Latins reckoned the subdiaconate among the greater orders. Martene indeed certifies that in Sacramentaries as early as 800 or thereabouts he found the ordination of subdeacons placed along with that of the superior, and separated from that of the inferior ministers. In 1097, the Council of Benevento, over which Urban II. presided, says expressly, "We give the name of sacred orders to the presbyterate and diaconate." Fifty years later Hugo of St. Victor speaks of the subdiaconate as a minor order. But Peter Cantor, who died in 1197, says that in his time "the subdiaconate had been recently made a sacred order." Innocent III. really closed the question by ruling that subdeacons, like deacons and priests, might be chosen bishops.

Usually, subdeacons are ordained by bishops. But the Synod of Meaux in 845 permits (can. 44) chorepiscopi who certainly were not bishops[1] to confer the subdiaconate with the sanction of the ordinary, and the same permission is said to have been given by the Pope to Cistercian abbots. The matter of ordination in the Latin Church has always been the tradition of the instruments. In the very ancient collection known as the Canons of the Fourth Council of Carthage, can. 5 lays down the rule that a subdeacon is to be ordained by receiving the empty chalice and paten from the bishop, while the archdeacon gives him the cruet and towel. This form is preserved with a very slight alteration in the present Roman Pontifical. The Pontifical also prescribes the tradition of the book of the Epistles, but this rite was unknown till the twelfth century at least; neither Hugo of St. Victor nor the Master of the Sentences, nor even St. Thomas, mentions it. The form among the Latins consists in the words which accompany the tradition: "See what kind of ministry is given to you," &c.; "Receive the book of the Epistles," &c. Even the form accompanying the tradition of the paten and the chalice is much more modern than the tradition itself, for the Gregorian Sacramentary has a prayer ("Benedictio subdiaconi") as the form of ordination. Among the Greeks the matter is the laying on of hands, and the form the prayer during this action. Such has been their use from the fifth century at least, as appears from the false Dionysius. They have no tradition of the instruments except after ordination, when the newly ordained are, as it were, put in possession, and this custom is of modern date.

In the time of Cornelius (elected 254) there were seven subdeacons at Rome. Their functions in the ancient Church were very important. They were the secretaries of bishops, and were often sent on distant and important missions. They had a great part in managing the alms and temporal goods of the Church. The letters of St. Gregory the Great show that in his time the Roman subdeacons administered the affairs of St. Peter's patrimony throughout the provinces, made reports to the Pope on the conduct of bishops, and by the Pope's orders admonished prelates, reformed abuses, and assembled councils.

(Chardon, "Hist. des Sacr." tom. v.; Juenin, "Commentarius Historicus et Dogmaticus de Sacramentis," diss ix. qu. vii. For the obligations of the office, see BREVIARY and CELIBACY.)

SUBDELEGATE. One to whom a judge-delegate transfers his jurisdiction in a particular case. [See DELEGATION.] This privilege is restricted to delegates appointed by the supreme authority in a state, except in the case of a delegate ad universitatem causarum—that is, one who is empowered by his principal to try all causes that fall within his jurisdiction, for such a delegate is really a "judex quasi ordinarius." A subdelegate cannot be named (unless by the consent of both parties) to try cases of great importance, for with respect to these, the special qualifications of the delegate must be presumed to have been what moved his principal to appoint him; and the intention might be frustrated if he could commit the most weighty portions of his charge to another. A delegate whose commission only extends to the bare performance of certain acts cannot do them through a subdelegate.

SUFFRAGAN. This name is given to a bishop in an ecclesiastical province, relatively to the metropolitan, primate, or patriarch, in whose province he is. Also, to a titular bishop or bishop in partibus who is exercising the Pontifical functions and ordinations for the ordinary bishop whom he has been invited to assist. Also to a titular bishop who is under a titular patriarch or archbishop; such are suffragans only in name.

Leo XIII. has commanded that the designation "bishop in partibus" should be replaced by that of "titular bishop."

(Morone, Dizion. Eccl.)

SUICIDE. Those who voluntarily, and while in the full possession of their faculties (sui compotes) put an end to themselves, are deprived of ecclesiastical burial. But in such cases the canon law, like the common law of England, inclines to a lenient judgment; and if a person be found, for instance, drowned or poisoned, and it be not proved that he had expressed the deliberate intention of taking his own life, the law prefers to presume some other cause of death, such as the act of a malefactor, or accident, or temporary aberration of mind.

[1] I.e. in the West and at that time; see Hefele on the Antiochene Synod in encæniis, can. 10.

In many countries the civil law now requires that persons who have committed suicide, even though the wilfulness of the act and their sanity at the time be established, shall be buried in the churchyards. In such a case the ministers of the Church take no part in the funeral obsequies. (Ferraris, Homicidium; Wetzer and Welte.)

SUNDAY. The Jewish Sabbath was the weekly day of rest with which the week ended. On that day the Hebrews were forbidden to gather manna (Ex. xv. 23–29). Thus the observance of the Sabbath was made a general law; they were to do no work upon it; the Hebrew family, the stranger in the gates, the slaves, even the cattle, were to rest; and this because God Himself finished the work of creation and rested on that day, blessing it and sanctifying it (Ex. xx. 8–11). In Deut. v. 12–16 it is the kindly and beneficent character of the institution which is emphasised, rather than its sacredness. No reference is made to creation, but the Hebrew is to keep the Sabbath, "that thy man slave and thy woman slave may rest even as thou. And thou shalt remember that thou wast a slave in the land of Egypt, and Jehovah thy God brought thee out thence," &c. The importance attached to the Sabbath in the Deuteronomical and Levitical codes is shown by the very fact that Sabbath keeping is the subject of a precept in the Decalogue. Further, the Sabbath is the basis of a whole series of enactments. The seventh month is the holy month of the year. It is ushered in by the Feast of Trumpets, its tenth day is the Day of Atonement, its fifteenth the Feast of Tabernacles or ingathering, the "joy of the law." The seventh is the sabbatical year; during which the whole land is to rest[1] (Lev. xxv. 1–7); there is to be no sowing, or vintage, or reaping, and thus the Sabbath extends its dominion over nature. After "seven Sabbaths of years" (i.e. 7 + 7 = 49 years) comes the year of Jubilee, when Hebrew slaves are to go free, land to revert to its original owner, &c.

Something must be said on three points connected with the Jewish Sabbath which are of theological importance.

(1) There is no trace of its being observed among the Hebrews before the time of Moses. No doubt, in Genesis ii. 3, we read that "God blessed the seventh day and hallowed it," but it is never said that He told men in the pre-Mosaic period to do so likewise, and evidently the sacred writers knew nothing of a Sabbath kept by the Patriarchs. It is implied that the division of days into weeks, unknown among the Romans till the Empire, was very ancient among some of the Semitic people, for Laban (Gen. xxix. 27) speaks of the "week of this woman"—i.e. the week of marriage festivities. We now know that among the Assyrians the first twenty-eight days of every month were divided into four weeks of seven days each, the seventh, fourteenth, twenty-first, and twenty-eighth days being Sabbaths; and there was a general prohibition of work on these days (G. Smith, "Assyrian Eponym Canon," p. 19, seq.) The date of this usage among the Assyrians is still uncertain (Dillman on Exod. p. 214). But we may conjecture that the division was based, not on the seven planets, but on the phases of the moon, and was familiar within and without Israel before Moses. But from this it does not follow that there was any divine command to keep the Sabbath, or even that the Israelites rested on it. Indeed, the day of rest implies a settled and agricultural life; to a people of shepherds a Sabbath is not necessary or even possible. (So Wellhausen, "Geschichte des Volkes Israel," ch. iii.)

(2) The Jewish was at all times distinct from the Puritan idea of the Sabbath. It is the privilege of rest for the slave and even for the beasts on which the Book of Deuteronomy dwells with characteristic kindliness. In IV. Reg. iv. 22, 23, it is mentioned with the new moons, as a day on which people went to hear the prophets. One of the earliest prophets, Osee (ii. 13) alludes to it (again in conjunction with the new moons) as a day of joy; Amos (viii. 5), as a day on which no business was done. The prophets of the Exile insist on strict rest; Jeremias, e.g., forbids carrying of burdens (xvii. 19 seq.). They enlarge on the sin of breaking the Sabbath and the blessings which attend its observance (Ezech. xx. 16; xxii. 26; and so with reference to the Exile, Book of Isai. lvi. 2; lviii. 13); and the Levitical Code (Ex. xxvi.; xxxv. 3; Num. xv.) enforces the obligation of rest in minute detail, but not a word is said against recreation on the Sabbath.[1] Even the Pharisees, though they multiplied rules against servile work—forbade, e.g., journeys more than 2,000 paces beyond the city; climbing a tree, lest a twig should break; works of mercy, &c., &c.—never prohibited pleasure as such. Even a Chief Pharisee did not scruple to entertain on Sabbath (Luc. xiv. 1). The Rabbinical law on dancing illustrates exactly the difference between the Pharisaical and Puritan view. The Rabbins forbid it, not because it is a worldly pleasure, but because it would lead to tuning the musical instruments, which is reckoned work (Buxtorf, "Lex. Rabbin." שְׁבוּת).

[1] According to the "Book of the Covenant" (Ex. xxi. 2–6), Hebrew slaves are to go free not on the, but on every, seventh year, dating from the beginning of their slavery; and every seventh year the harvest is to be left for the poor (xxiii. 10, 11). The former provision is repeated in Deut. xv. 12–18, and the second has its analogy in the law that on a seventh year proclaimed and fixed, debts are to be remitted (Deut. xv. 1–6). The developed Sabbatical year—i.e. the fixing of one year for the whole country, in which the land is to rest completely from being sown no less than from being reaped—is peculiar to Leviticus. So also is the crown of the whole system—viz. the year of Jubilee.

(3) Our Lord did not during his earthly life abrogate the Sabbath. To do so would have been inconsistent with his position as one "made under the law," and with his own express teaching (see, especially, Matt. xxiii. 1–3). But He did expose the inconsistency and hypocrisy of men who loosed an ox or ass on the Sabbath and were shocked when Christ on the same day "loosed a daughter of Abraham whom Satan had bound" (Luc. xiii. 10–16). He, moreover, enunciated two great principles. The one was then, perhaps, part of the better Rabbinical teaching: "The Sabbath is made for man, not man for the Sabbath." (The words, "The Sabbath is given into your hands, not you into the hands of the Sabbath," are to be found in the "Mechilta," a Midrash or Commentary on parts of Exodus, belonging to the early part of the third century A.D.) Man is made to fulfil the law of love. Not so with regard to the Sabbath, which is simply enforced for man's own good. Next, the "Son of Man is Lord also of the Sabbath." Just as the Sabbath law must give way before the natural needs of man, so, and much more, before the requirement of Him who is the head and representative of mankind (Marc. ii. 23–28). If, again, the ministers of the temple broke the Sabbath law in its service and were blameless, much more might the disciples do so in the service of One greater than the temple (Matt. xii. 5–8).

(4) The precept of observing the Sabbath was completely abrogated in the Christian Church. "Let no man judge you," says St. Paul (Coloss. ii. 16), in eating and drinking or in the matter of a feast or a new moon or of a Sabbath-day (σαββάτων, from the Chaldee שַׁבָּתָא, not "Sabbath days;" cf. "Hodie tricesima Sabbata," Hor. "Sat." i. 9, 69), which things are a shadow of things to come, but the body is Christ's" (cf. Gal. iv.; Rom. xiv. 5, 9). Christians are not to be taken to task on such things; they do not furnish the materials of a judgment, good or bad, since the shadows are characteristic of the Jewish law, the substance of Christ's gospel. Once only does the N. T. refer to a Christian Sabbath. "There is left therefore a Sabbath-keeping (σαββατισμὸς) for the people of God" (Heb. iv. 9). The reference, however, is to no earthly Sabbath, but to that eternal rest of which the Sabbath was a type. The word "Sabbath" is kept in the Greek and the Latin of the Church to denote Saturday—a day which is not sacred among Christians.

(5) In commemoration of Christ's resurrection the Church observes Sunday. The observance does not rest on the natural law, which does indeed require us to give certain time to the worship of God, but not a whole day rather than parts of several days, much less any particular day; nor, again, on any positive divine law, of which there is no trace. Sunday is merely of ecclesiastical institution, dating, however, from the time of the Apostles. Such is the opinion of St. Thomas (2 2ndæ, cxxii. 4 ad 2) and of the greatest Catholic theologians (so Billuart, "De Relig." diss. vi. a. 1; and Turrecrem., Thom., Wald., Cajetan, Sylvius, and others whom Billuart cites). The present rule obliges the faithful to hear Mass on that day and to rest from servile work—i.e. work done with the hands rather than with the head. But custom permits certain servile work even when not required by necessity or mercy—such, e.g., as cooking food—and ecclesiastical authority may dispense from the law. We proceed to trace the history of the observance.

In a single passage of the N. T.—viz. Apoc. i. 10—we find a special name for the first day of the week, "the Lord's day" (ἐν τῇ Κυριακῇ ἡμέρᾳ—very different from ἡ τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμέρα). In Acts xx. 7 [1] Is. lviii. 13 is often quoted in the "Authorised Version," "If thou turn away thy foot . . . from doing thy pleasure on my holy day." But חֶפְצְךָ means "affairs," "business," as elsewhere in later Hebrew.

we are told that St. Paul abode seven days at Troas, and that on the first day of the week the disciples came together "to break bread." The same Apostle writes to the Corinthians (1 Cor. xvi. 1 seq.), "Every first day of the week (κατὰ μίαν σαββάτου) let each of you lay up at home and collect whatever profit he has had," words which do not, indeed, directly imply that there was public service on Sunday, for παρ' ἑαυτῷ (= chez lui) cannot refer to a collection in the Christian assembly. But they do seem to indicate that Sunday was already a sacred day, on which deeds of love were specially suitable. Heb. x. 25 shows this much, that the Christians, when the epistle was written, had regular days of assembly.

(6) The Scriptural references given above show that the observance of Sunday had begun in the Apostolic age; but even were Scripture silent, tradition would put this point beyond all doubt. While, however, Sunday was observed from the first, it is possible to trace several stages in the observance.

(a) The earliest Fathers speak of the assembly for worship, and especially for the celebration of the Eucharist. As this is well known, the following references will suffice: Ep. Barnab. 15; Ignat. ad Magnes. 9; Justin Mart. i. Apol. 59; Dionys. Corinth. (apud Euseb. "H. E." iv. 23); Tertull. Apol. 16; "De Coron." 3. These authors speak of Sunday, which they call the "Lord's Day," the "Day of the Lord's Resurrection," and sometimes, but only in addressing heathen, the "Day of the Sun" (see Probst, "Kirchliche Disciplin in den ersten drei Jahrhund." p. 247), as a day of sacred joy and prayer. But we know of only one passage in any Ante-Nicene Father which alludes to the Sunday rest. Tertullian, after mention of the ritual usage according to which Christians on Sunday prayed standing, not kneeling, adds that on that day business was put aside, that the soul might be left free for God's service ("differentes etiam negotia ne quem diabolo locum demus," "De Orat." 23). Here was the contrast between Sabbath and Sunday. The former was primarily a day of rest from work, and, although the morning and evening sacrifices were doubled on the Sabbath, no law of Sabbatical worship was imposed on the Israelite. Attendance on the prophets, and afterwards on the synagogue, arose naturally out of the enforced cessation of ordinary work. The Sunday, on the other hand, was primarily a day of prayer, and the words in the Apocalypse strike the keynote of Sunday observance: "I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day." The law of rest arose as a protection to the law of worship. It may be objected that, after all, the Church's law only requires a small portion of Sunday to be spent in prayer. But this objection rests on an anachronism, for we shall see presently that the ancient Church required the greater part of the day to be spent in devotion.

(β) When Christianity became, or was on the way to become, the religion of the state, it was necessary to pass some law of rest; otherwise a Christian who kept Sunday might obviously suffer inconvenience from being summoned to court, to military exercise &c., or even from the competition of his heathen rivals in trade. Hence Constantine, as Eusebius reports, required his subjects to rest on the feasts of our Lord (also on Fridays, if Valesius is right in correcting τὰς τοῦ σαββάτου into τὰς πρὸ τοῦ σαββάτου), and on Sundays the Christian soldiers were exempted from work that they might have leisure to pray. (Euseb. "Vit. Constant." iv. 18). A long series of imperial enactments on the matter is to be found in the Roman codes. An edict of Constantine prohibited law business and mechanical arts in towns, though the country people were allowed to till the ground on that day. Later emperors not only closed the law courts, but also the theatre and circus on Sundays.

The decrees of councils also became more and more stringent. The Synod of Laodicea (between 343 and 381) threatens with excommunication those who Judaise by resting on the Sabbath, but exhorts Christians to rest on Sunday "if they can" (c. 29). About the same time Chrysostom speaks (Hom. xliii. in 1 Cor. xvi. 1) of the Lord's Day as bringing "rest and immunity from labours." The Second Council of Mâcon (c. 1) (anno 585) desires the faithful to spend the whole day in prayer. Theodulf, bishop of Orleans, in his Capitulary (cap. 24), will suffer no relaxation of prayer except to take food. The Third Council of Tours in 813 (c. 40) is still more explicit; the prayer and praise is to continue "till the evening," Sunday being reckoned from evening to evening. The Second Council of Aix-la-Chapelle in 836 (cap. 21) tried to restore the old custom of communicating every Sunday.

Nor was this wide notion of Sunday observance peculiar to France and Germany. The Council of Friuli in 791 (can. 13) insists on the same devotion of the whole day to prayer, and the Spanish Council of Coyaca in 1050 (can. 6) prescribes not only attendance at matins, Mass, and the "hours," but also abstinence from travelling except in case of necessity. Theodore of Tarsus (apud Thomassin, "Traité des Festes," p. 527), who became archbishop of Canterbury in 669, assures us that his fellow-Greeks would neither sail nor ride (except to church), or bake, or bathe, or write any unnecessary letters on Sunday. In all these authorities and in the Fathers generally there is no confusion between Sunday and Sabbath. References to the Decalogue as in any sense the warrant for Sunday are extremely rare, though Chrysostom ("In Gen." Hom. x. 7) deduces this much from God's blessing and hallowing the seventh day, viz. that one day in the week should be given to God's service.[1] This principle is accepted by modern theologians, so far at least that they distinguish between the ceremonial part of the third commandment, which enjoins rest on the seventh day, and its moral part, which urges us to consecrate part of our time to heavenly thoughts. But usually the Fathers, and even mediæval writers, appeal simply to the resurrection of our Lord and the descent of the Holy Ghost, which happened on Sunday, to the custom of the Church and to Apostolic tradition.

(γ) Sunday used to be reckoned from evening to evening—i.e. the sanctification of the day began on Saturday and ended on Sunday evening. "It was," says Thomassin, "about the eleventh or twelfth century that after the abolition of public vigils in the Church, people began the celebration of Sundays and feasts on the morning of the same day." He quotes Gratian ("De Consec," d. 3, c. 1), Gregory IX. ("Extra. de Feriis," c. 1, 2), who recognises the old custom; Alexander III. (ib.), who speaks of both customs as existing in his time; and Haytho, bishop of Basle in his Capitulary (cap. 8), who says simply that Sunday lasts "a mane usque ad vesperam."

(δ) Down to the middle of the fourteenth century it was admitted on all hands that the faithful must hear Mass on Sundays and holidays of obligation in their parish church. But about this time the Mendicant Friars pleaded that this law had been changed by Papal privilege in their favour. This led to keen disputes between seculars and regulars under Innocent VI.; and Sixtus IV., more than a century afterwards, in his Constitution "Vices illius," declared that the law obliged parishioners to hear Mass in their own church unless when they absented themselves "for a good reason" ("ex honesta causa"). There has been much controversy on the sense of this last clause. (See Juenin, "Comment. de Sacram." diss. v. § 11.) But in any case the Council of Trent simply recommends (sess. xxii.) attendance at the parish church, and it is certain from a Constitution of Pius V. ("Etsi Mendicantium," anno 1567), that it is enough, so far as strict obligation goes, to hear Mass in any public church.

(ε) Modern discipline has introduced another and a much more important change. Mass used to last for two hours and more; it can now be heard in half an hour. Further, the public recitation of Matins on Sunday before Mass was usual even in secular churches till the end of the middle ages, and it was well understood that the faithful must assist at the Office as well as at Mass. This has been shown above from the decrees of councils. Mr. Maskell ("Monument. Rit." vol. iii. p. xxxii.) proves that the obligation of hearing Matins, Mass, and Evensong on

[1] A sermon once attributed to Augustine (Appendix 280) says that the "glory of Jewish Sabbath-keeping" was transferred to Sunday, but the change is attributed to the "doctors of the Church," and, besides, the Benedictine editors have proved that the sermon is at least later than Alcuin. The universal teaching of the Fathers is that the Sabbath is abrogated in the letter, and that it is kept spiritually by rest from sin, or will be kept by eternal rest with Christ. This is the teaching of Justin (Dial. 12); Iren. (Adv. Hær. iv. 16); Clem. Al. (Strom. iv. 3); Origen (Hom. viii. § 2, In Jos. Contr. Cels. ii. 7); Victorinus (Routh, Reli. Sacr. ii. pp. 4, 5, 8); Augustine (C. Faust. xviii. 5); Jerome (In Isai. liii. ad fin., lvi. 2, lviii. 13); Epiphanius (Hær. viii. 6, xxix. 7, xxx. 32; Exposit. Fid. 32); Gregory the Great (Moral. xviii. 43); Arethes (In Apoc. xi. 2). The Puritan idea of a Christian Sabbath was unknown to the first Reformers. But in Scotland we find the book of discipline drawn up by John Knox and five other ministers enforcing Sabbath observance; and in 1562 the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of Scotland petitioned the Queen to punish Sabbath-breakers. In England the Puritanical or Judaising doctrine was developed and systematised by a learned Puritan clergyman, Dr. Nicolas Bownd, of Norton in Suffolk. The Westminster Confession of 1647 (ch. xxi.) was the first Creed which embodied this view. (For the history of Protestant opinion, see Schaff, Creeds of Christendom, vol. i. p. 775 seq.)

Sundays and holidays was recognised in England till the change of religion. Even in the last century Billuart and many other theologians admit an obligation (though not a grave one) of hearing Vespers as well as Mass on Sundays. At present, a man who simply hears Low Mass satisfies the letter of the Church law. But if he absents himself from sermons, if, above all, he does not use the opportunity the day of rest affords for increased prayer, for reading good books, for instructing his family and the like, he will in many cases sin against his own soul. He can hardly fail to do so, unless he be like the perfect Christian of whom Origen speaks ("C. Cels." viii. 22, 23), with whom every day is a spiritual feast. A man is in a bad way if he makes a practice of hearing a Low Mass, and spending the rest of the Sunday in frivolous recreation.

SUPREMACY, ROYAL. By this is meant the doctrine that the king or chief authority in the state has the power to ordain and judge in the last resort without appeal "in all causes and over all persons, ecclesiastical as well as civil,"[1] within his dominions. Christianity is thus inferentially denied, inasmuch as the charge given by our Lord to St. Peter, not to feed only, but to govern (ποιμαίνειν) his whole flock in the things concerning everlasting life is ignored, and the judgment of the civil ruler substituted for that of the Apostolic See. Nor is this claim to supremacy less obstinately maintained in very many communities which pretend to tolerate all religions, than by old Protestant monarchies. The modern Continental Liberal has no sense for the lofty yet humbling thoughts, the pure penetrating emotions which are present in the souls of believers, and dispose the best of them to the practice of the evangelical counsels—chastity, voluntary poverty, and obedience. He considers that it is the duty of every man or woman to contribute to the advance of civilisation, understood as he understands it; and all mental or bodily exercise which does not so contribute, he looks upon as so much wasted force. This waste, if he has power to prevent it, he will not permit; he will therefore disperse religious communities, forbid the taking of vows, and, generally, assume control in the last resort over religious society. The Radical Government of Switzerland, with nothing but toleration and enlightenment on its lips, is as vigilant in repressing the free development of Catholic life within the republic as the Czars are in Russia or Queen Elizabeth was in England.

The doctrine that the civil power has the right to control the ecclesiastical, even in purely religious matters, is generally attributed to Erastus, a German divine of the sixteenth century;[1] traces of it, however, may be found in the writings of Marsilius of Padua and other mediæval writers. Cranmer, and afterwards Hooker, espoused it; it is indeed the fundamental tenet of the Church of England as such; Grotius and Hobbes argued on the same side.[2] On the other hand, all Catholic theologians maintain the independence and supremacy of the Church within her own sphere. This independence is of course implied in the very fact of canon law; for precepts which may be lawfully set aside at the bidding of some power claiming to be superior to the authority which framed them are not laws at all, but only regulations or monitions. [See CANON LAW; JURISDICTION; FORUM ECCLESIASTICUM.]

The doctrine of the royal supremacy was carried out more consistently in England than in any other Protestant country. It was one of the main causes of the civil war in the sixteenth century; the King, as head of the Church, insisting on ecclesiastical arrangements which the conscience of the more advanced Protestants condemned. The Puritan republic, since it maintained the penal laws against Catholics, practically claimed the right of excluding Catholicism from the country, but it conceded to all Protestant sects the free management of their ecclesiastical concerns without state interference. At the Restoration the old state of things reappeared; but the Revolution of 1688 enforced the toleration of the sects, and withdrew, so far as they were concerned, the ecclesiastical supremacy of the Crown. The liberty thus given has been taken advantage of more and more in the two centuries which have since intervened, and at the present day the supremacy is admitted only by one-half of English Protestantism. In Scotland the Erastian doctrine was rejected from the first. The Presbyterian conception of the Church has no solid basis in Scripture, history, or general reason; but of this Church the Scotch always stoutly upheld the independence as against the state; and the record of their struggles and sacrifices in this cause, from the date of the First General Assembly in 1560 to the disruption of 1843, forms the most attractive feature in the history of Presbyterianism.

In Sweden and Denmark the sovereigns appoint the bishops; Lutheranism is the national religion, and till within the last few years no other has been tolerated. The Calvinism of Holland is more accommodating; the battle of toleration was fought out there in the seventeenth century, and practically won. The established religion is professed only by about one half of the people, and Catholics form nearly 40 per cent. of the whole population. In Russia the Czar appoints the bishops, and is practically supreme in religious matters. The sufferings which the exercise of this supremacy has entailed on the Catholics of Poland, Podolia, and Lithuania, are matter of recent experience. In France the present aspect of things is that of a country whose religious affairs are regulated by a concordat or solemn treaty concluded (1801) between the civil power and the Catholic Church. Many other countries [CONCORDAT] have followed this example. Of course all Powers having concordats with Rome implicitly admit her spiritual independence. The British state does not make concordats with, but laws for, the Church of England, justly regarding it as its own creature and subject.

SUPPRESSION OF MONASTERIES. In every country of Europe there have been hostile suppressions of monastic societies; there have been also, from time to time, friendly, or ecclesiastical, suppressions, carried out with the approbation of the Holy See. The first and most memorable instance of the former class is the closing of the religious houses in England (1535–1540); the particulars are exhibited in the following table:—

Monasteries with yearly revenue under 200*l.*	374
Monasteries with yearly revenue above that sum	186
Small monasteries	52
Friaries—Augustinians	32
„ Carmelites	52
„ Dominicans	58
„ Franciscans[1]	65
Total	819

[1] There were also forty-eight suppressed houses of the Knights Hospitallers.

In Italy a great suppression of religious houses and ecclesiastical foundations, commenced by the Sardinian Government in 1855, and scarcely yet terminated, has seriously changed the moral aspect of the country. Between 1855 and 1873 there were suppressed 3,037 houses for men, and 1,027 for women, and small pensions were granted to a large proportion of their inmates, amounting to nearly 54,000 persons. Up to the end of 1877, Church and monastic lands representing a capital value of nearly $170,000,000 had been confiscated by the state, which, to disarm local opposition, grants to the communes in which any such property was situated a certain proportion of the proceeds of its sale. The establishments spared for the present are compelled to submit to the forced sale of all their immovable property, the purchase money being entered by the Government to their credit in the Italian rentes. ("Enc. Brit." Italy, 1881.)

The Culturkampf in Germany, commenced very soon after the Franco-German war (1870–1), employed the suppression of religious societies as one of its most effectual weapons. The Jesuits, and many other orders and congregations, were at that time expelled from all the territories of Prussia.

In France, a law passed during the Revolution (February 1790) enacted the suppression of all orders and regular congregations in which solemn vows were taken, and prohibited their re-establishment. This law had been long in abeyance, and a system of authorisation had been followed, under which religious societies which laid their rules, statutes, and financial affairs open to the inspection of the Ministry of the Interior, were permitted to exist. Besides these authorised congregations, a large number of non-authorised societies, which for various reasons preferred a hazardous independence to the irksomeness of governmental supervision, had come into being; in 1877 there were five hundred such societies, comprising nearly 22,000 religious of both sexes. But the majority of the congregations of women were authorised. On March 29, 1880, the Government of M. Freycinet, a Protestant, issued two decrees, of which one ordered the absolute and irrevocable suppression of the Society of Jesus in every part of France, the other required that all other non-authorised corporations should within three months apply for authorisation to the Government, supplying at the same time full and minute information as to all their concerns, internal and external. It was well understood that in the case of many societies the authorisation, had it been applied for, would have been refused. In fact, it was in very few instances applied for, and when the prescribed period had passed by, the Government resorted to the various executive means at its disposal for suspending the common life of the non-authorised societies, causing closed doors to be broken open, seizing on property, and forcibly dispersing the religious. Thus not only the Jesuits, but the Dominicans also (except those engaged in teaching), the Capuchins, the Carmelites, and many other orders and congregations, the members of which had supposed the revolutionary furor which dictated the law of 1790 to be extinct, were suppressed in France before the end of 1882.

Ecclesiastical suppressions have been made for various reasons; either for the promotion of learning and education, or in the interest of discipline, or for the removal of presumed abuses and evils. Thus a monastery was suppressed by Bishop Alcock (1497) in order that he might transfer its revenues to his new foundation of Jesus College at Cambridge, and two others were closed at the request of the Countess Margaret, mother of Henry VII., and her executors (1505–1508), to aid in the foundation of Christ's and St. John's Colleges at the same university. Another suppression was allowed in favour of Bishop Smith (1515), when he was founding Brasenose College, Oxford. A measure of the same kind, but on a much larger scale, was permitted by the Holy See to Cardinal Wolsey, who (1524) suppressed twenty-five small priories, and applied their revenues to Christ Church at Oxford and the college at Ipswich which he was then founding. In 1528, experience having shown that when the number of monks in any house was very small, the rule was seldom properly observed, Clement VII. granted a bull to the Cardinals Wolsey and Campeggio, authorising them to suppress houses having less than twelve monks, and transfer their revenues to the larger monasteries.

A suppression far more comprehensive was effected in France a few years before the Revolution through the agency of the "Commission on the Regulars,' a board composed of bishops and high officials, appointed by the Crown in 1766 to inquire into the state of the religious orders. The result of their operations, which do not appear to have had at any time the sanction of the Pope, was, that all houses containing fewer than fifteen religious were closed, that monks were forbidden to take vows before the age of 21, and nuns before that of 18, and that nearly 1,500 monasteries were suppressed. (Tanner, "Notitia Monastica"; Hélyot [ed. Migne], vol. iv.)

SURPLICE. A garment of white linen worn over the cassock in choir and in the administration of the sacraments. It is among the most familiar, and at the same time is one of the most modern of Church vestments.

The word superpellicium means a dress worn over a garment of skins. Such dresses of fur (pelliciæ) came into use among monks early in the ninth century, probably to protect them from the cold and damp during the long offices in church. The great Synod of Aix-la-Chapelle in 817 (can. 22) ordered each monk to have two dresses of fur (pelliciæ). Over these pelliciæ a linen garment, the superpellicium or surplice, was worn in choir. It is uncertain when this last custom began. The surplice is mentioned in 1050 by the Council of Coyaca, and Durandus in 1286 speaks of its use as already ancient, but by no means universal. The Spanish synod just mentioned (can. 3) requires it to be worn under the amice, alb, and the rest of the Mass vestments, and this usage is still recognised in the rubrics of the Roman Missal ("Ritus Servand." i. 2.) In the twelfth century it reached to the ankles, and so the Council of Basle in the fifteenth century requires canons in choir to wear surplices "ultra medias tibias." Cardinal Bona, more than 200 years ago, speaks of surplices being already shorter than the rule of Basle required, but the pictures in Roman Pontificals of the last century show that the present form of the Italian surplice or cotta is very recent. To this day the length varies much in American churches, but it never reaches below the knees, while in the new Italian fashion adopted by many of the English clergy the surplice does not reach nearly so far. It was not till the seventeenth century that surplices were commonly adorned with lace. (Hefele, "Beiträge," vol. ii. p. 174, seq.; see also ROCHET and COTTA.)

SUSPENSION. A censure by which a cleric is forbidden to exercise his orders or his clerical office, or to administer and enjoy the fruits of his benefice. It does not, like deposition, deprive a cleric of his benefice, or make him incapable of lawfully exercising his office without formal rehabilitation; much less does it, like degradation, deprive him of his status as a clergyman. Partial suspension inhibits a man from the use of his orders, of his office—i.e. from exercise of orders and jurisdiction, or, again, from the enjoyment and administration of his benefice. It may prohibit from all exercise of orders or jurisdiction, or only from certain acts of order and jurisdiction—e.g. a bishop may be suspended from ordaining, singing Mass pontifically, &c., and yet be perfectly free to say Mass, govern his diocese, &c. Entire suspension prohibits all use of order, jurisdiction, or benefice. Suspension may be perpetual—i.e. without any fixed limit, or for a definite time. If inflicted for a time, it ceases of itself when the time is over. Perpetual suspension for a fault altogether past is removed by the dispensation of the prelate who inflicted it, his superior, successor, or delegate. If inflicted as a censure[1] it may be removed by absolution given solemnly according to a form prescribed in the Rituale, if the suspension is public; or privately by absolution in a general form, if the suspension is secret. The power of absolution is sometimes held by every priest empowered to hear confessions, sometimes reserved to the bishop, sometimes to the Pope. According to the new reform of the canon law in the Bull "Apostolicæ Sedis," October 12, 1869, the following suspensions only are incurred ipso facto, absolution being reserved to the Pope. They all depend on the giving, receiving, or exercising orders or jurisdiction:—(1) Suspension from the fruits of their benefices is incurred by the chapter of a vacant see if they admit a bishop before he has produced the Apostolic letters for his promotion;[2] (2) bishops are suspended for three years from all right to ordain, if they give orders to one who has neither patrimony nor benefice, on the condition that he renounces all claim to support from the bishop; (3) for one year if they ordain without dimissorials a person who does not belong to the diocese or hold a benefice in it, or a person belonging to but long absent from the diocese, unless he has a certificate of good character from the bishop under whom he has been living; or (4) if, apart from privilege, they confer a holy order on one who has neither patrimony, benefice, or the titulus paupertatis, acquired by solemn vows, already made. (5) Religious expelled from their order are suspended from all exercise of orders. (6) So are persons knowingly ordained by a bishop under excommunication, suspension, or interdict, or notoriously heretical or schismatical (if they were in good faith, they must wait for a dispensation). Then follow some suspensions which affect persons living in Rome, incurred (a) by persons living more than four months in Rome and ordained by a bishop not their own, without leave from the cardinal-vicar, or ordained without being examined before the cardinal-vicar, or ordained by their own bishop after failing in the examination before the cardinal-vicar; (β) by persons in the six suburbicarian dioceses if they are ordained out of their own dioceses, unless with dimissorials directed to the cardinal-vicar himself, or if they receive a holy order without ten days' retreat at the house of the Fathers of the Mission; bishops who ordain in these cases are suspended "ab usu pontificalium" for a year. Further, the following suspensions imposed by the Council of Trent remain in force:—(1) "Ab exercitio ordinum" on bishops who act pontifically without leave in other dioceses, and on persons ordained by them there (Concil. Trid. sess. vi. De Reform. c. 5.) (2) "Ab executione ordinum ad beneplacitum prælati futuri" on all who receive a holy order in virtue of dimissorials from a chapter within a year of the vacancy of the see (sess. vii. De Reform. c. 10). (3) For a year "ab exercitio pontificalium" on titular bishops who ordain without dimissorials, and "ab executione ordinum" on the persons so ordained, as long as their ordinary pleases. (sess. xiv. De Ref. c. 2.) (4) "A collatione ordinum" for a year on bishops who ordain without testimonials of character from the proper ordinary, and "ab executione ordinum" on those so ordained as long as their ordinary sees fit. (sess. xxiii. De Ref. c. 8.) (5) "Ab

[1] I.e. not merely as punishment, but for the amendment of the offender. The common definition, to which we have adhered, treats suspension as a species of censure, but this is not always the case.

[2] In this case the penalties have been extended and increased by the bull Romanus Pontifex, Aug. 28, 1873.

officio et beneficio" for a year on those who furnish dimissorials contrary to the Tridentine decrees. (sess. vii. De Ref. c. 10.; xxiii. De Ref. c. 10.) (6) Absolute suspension at the will of the ordinary of the priest whose rights have been infringed, on parish priests who knowingly marry persons from another parish without leave from their priests (sess. xxiv. De Ref. c. 1); (7) on "episcopi concubinarii, a provinciali synodo admoniti." Of course, provincial and diocesan statutes may inflict suspension to be incurred ipso facto, and prelates are empowered to visit the offences of clerics subject to them with suspension (xxv. De Ref. c. 14).

In the earliest times clerics were often punished, not by simple suspension, but by temporary deprivation of communion. (Canon Apost. 45, Illiber. 21, Epaon. 3). But as early as 314 (Concil. Neocæsaren. c. 1) we have an instance of suspension perpetual and from all functions (ὅλως λειτουργεῖν), and so frequently in the following centuries (Agde, c. 43, in Trullo, c. 26). In the so-called Fourth Council of Carthage (c. 68), where a bishop who breaks the law is forbidden to ordain, we have an instance of partial suspension, and in another early council an instance of suspension from Mass. (3 Aurel. c. 7). Often clerics suspended from order and office retained their stipend (3 Concil. Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 19), while in other cases they were suspended from their stipend (Concil. Narbonn. A.D. 589, c. 11 and 13.)

SYNAXIS. [See LITURGIES.]

SYNCELLUS (a hybrid word, σύν, cella; one occupying the same cell). The thing signified by the term—namely, that a priest or deacon should live continually with a bishop, "propter testimonium ecclesiasticum"—was of very early institution; the "Liber Pontificalis" traces it to Pope Lucius, in the second century. The word (see Ducange) appears not to be traceable beyond the eighth century. Leo III., writing to Cenwulf of Mercia, speaks of Augustine as having been the syncellus of Gregory the Great. Concellus or concellita would have been the natural Latin expression; and the latter term is actually used by Sidonius Apollinaris with reference to a monk of Lerins. The word syncellus must have been coined in the East; whence, probably not before the eighth century, it found its way into the Western Church. In the Eastern Church the syncelli were the chaplains and confidential ministers of Metropolitans and Patriarchs. At Constantinople they formed a corporation; and their chief, the protosyncellus, became in process of time a personage of so much importance as to take rank on public occasions next after the Patriarch. Cedrenus (about 1050) says that before his time the protosyncellus had commonly succeeded to the Patriarchal throne on its becoming vacant. (Morone, "Dizion. Eccl."; Smith and Cheetham, art. by Venables.)

SYNDIC (Gr. σύνδικος). In classical Greek the word was used in three senses: (1) an advocate, especially for the defendant; (2) a public orator; (3) a judge.[1] The term came into regular use in Italy during the middle ages; the municipal magistrates of cities were called syndics (sindaci). Louis of Bavaria was crowned at Rome (1328) by the four syndics of the city; again, in 1347, an official so entitled, chosen by the people for the purpose, knighted and crowned Rienzi the Tribune. At the present day it means an agent of a particular kind—"one chosen to take charge of the affairs of a community, of which he himself is a member." A proctor (procurator) may be agent either for a community or an individual; the term "syndic" is confined to agents representing communities (Morone).

SYNOD. [See COUNCIL.]

SYNOD, HOLY. [See GREEK CHURCH and RUSSIAN CHURCH.]

SYNODAL EXAMINERS. A committee of learned ecclesiastics, appointed in the diocesan synod,[2] numbering not less than six, and (as a rule) not more than twenty members, whose duty it is to ascertain and test the qualifications of candidates for benefices or other Church preferment. They hold office only from one diocesan synod to another. If the committee be reduced below six in the interval between two synods, the bishop makes provisional appointments so as to complete the prescribed number. In countries where diocesan synods cannot be held, as in North Germany, the Holy See authorises the bishops to appoint synodal examiners with the consent of the chapters.

SYNTAGMA CANONUM. Besides the collection called the "Nomocanon" (see that article), Photius, the Patriarch of Constantinople, made, in 833, a second collection of canons, which he designated as above. It contains the canons of the first seven General Councils, and of two councils held at Constantinople by Photius himself; also a series of extracts from the Fathers, and a few civil laws.

SYRIAN CATHOLICS. The name "Syrian Catholic" would naturally apply to all those who use a Syriac liturgy, and to whom Syriac, therefore, is the sacred language. Such are the Chaldeans, or converts from Nestorianism; the Maronites, originally Monothelites; and, finally, the converts from the Jacobite or Monophysite Church in Syria. But in the recognised language of the Church the name of Syrian Catholics is given to the last body and to no other. These Syrian Christians are subject to the Pope, and of course hold the Catholic faith, but they keep the ancient Syriac rites, which are common to the Jacobites and themselves. [See LITURGIES.]

A congregation of Jacobite Christians had been reconciled to the Church in 1546,[1] and in 1781, on the death of George III., the Jacobite Patriarch, Ignatius[2] Michael Giarve, Bishop of the Syrian Catholics at Aleppo, went, with the approval of Propaganda, to Mardin, the seat of the Jacobite Patriarch, and persuaded the Jacobite clergy of inferior rank, many laymen, four bishops, and the Archbishop of Jerusalem, to seek union with the Catholic Church. Ignatius was himself chosen Patriarch by the bishops, and, after being enthroned, he and his electors begged the pallium from the Pope. He nominated the Latin Bishop of Babylon his Procurator at Rome. Meantime, the rest of the Jacobites had chosen another Patriarch. Ignatius, whose election had been confirmed by the Pope in 1783, was driven from Mardin and took refuge at Kesrevân, in the Lebanon, where he founded the monastery of Sajideh el Sharfèh (Sta. Maria Liberatrix), which Pius VI. took under his protection in 1787. He died in 1800, was succeeded by Ignatius Michael Daher (resigned 1810); by Simon (resigned 1818); by Ignatius Peter Giarve, elected 1820, but not confirmed, on account of the strife which had broken out, till 1828. Progress was made owing to the conversion of the Jacobite Archbishop of Jerusalem, Gregory Hyza, and his vicar-general, Ignatius Antony Samhiri, in 1827. In 1830 a firman of the Turkish Government recognised the Catholic Patriarch, Ignatius Peter Giarve, as independent of the Jacobites. In 1854 Pius IX. preconised Ignatius Antony Sanctiri[1] as patriarch of the Syrians, and ruled that he should reside at Mardin. In 1840 the number of Catholics belonging to the Syrian rite was reckoned at 30,000, but it is said to have increased considerably since then, many conversions having been made by the Capuchin Castells (1860, Apostolic delegate in Mesopotamia, Lesser Armenia, and Persia; 1866, Archbishop of Marcianopolis; d. 1873). The Syrian Patriarch Ignatius Philip Harcus (d. 1874) was present at the Vatican Council. The Patriarch is chosen by the bishops. He is enthroned during Mass, receives the pastoral staff, takes the oath of obedience to Pope, and makes the profession of faith prescribed for the Orientals by Urban VIII. in 1642. He sends these formulæ, subscribed and sealed, to Rome, and deputes a priest or monk to beg the pallium. He has jurisdiction over all Catholics of his rite in Syria, Mesopotamia, and Egypt. He is himself immediately subject to Propaganda, and to the Vicar-Apostolic of Aleppo, as Apostolic Delegate. He is entitled Patriarch of Antioch.

The diocese of Aleppo is governed immediately by the Patriarch, who is also administrator of the diocese of Jerusalem. There are, besides, the dioceses of Beyrout, Damascus, Diarbekir, Emesa or Horus, Mardin, Mosul, Keriatin, Tripolis.[2] The Syrians have two monasteries on the Lebanon, that of El-Sharfèh, already mentioned, that of St. Ephrem, and a third, that of Mar-Behnâm, north-east of Nimrud. They are not, however, monasteries in the strict sense, but only houses for communities of unmarried secular priests. The first two serve as clerical seminaries.

TE DEUM. A hymn in the form of a psalm, recited at the end of Matins on all feasts except Innocents' Day, and on all Sundays except during penitential seasons.

1. Its Author and Date.—According to the legend, given in the so-called Chronicle of Dacius, it was sung in alternate verses by Ambrose and Augustine after the baptism of the latter. Dacius, bishop of Milan, died about 555, but the Chronicle which bears his name is now known to be a late and worthless forgery, which, in important particulars, contradicts the confessions of St. Augustine himself. As late as 1695 the story was defended by an Augustinian hermit, Eustachius a S. Ubaldo, but everyone, say the Benedictine editors of St. Ambrose (vol. ii. p. 1410, in Migne's reprint), "not utterly ignorant" (non plane rudis), treats it as a fable.

The rule of St. Benedict (cap. 14) orders it to be sung after the fourth responsory; this and the rule of Tiridius, a disciple of Cæsarius of Arles, being, according to Menard ("Annot. in S. Gregor. Sacram." p. 586), the earliest documents which mention it. Gavantus "Thesaur." tom. ii. § v. xix.) found it attributed, in an ancient MS. Breviary, to St. Abundius; Usher (see Bingham, "Antiq." xiv. ii. § 9), to Nicetius, bishop of Trèves (d. circ. 535). Abbo, an author of the sixth century, attributed it to St. Hilary of Poitiers. The fact is, the author is absolutely unknown, but the form "suscepturus hominem," or, rather, "suscepisti hominem," as the older texts have it, points to an early date, for this expression fell out of use after the rise of Nestorianism. Daniel, in his dissertation on the "Te Deum" (in vol. ii. of his "Thesaur. Hymnolog.") seems to have established the fact that the psalm is based on a Greek hymn, the text of which he gives from an Alexandrian MS. The Latin is an expansion of the Greek, and the very different forms in which the "Te Deum" occurs shows that the hymn gradually assumed its present fixed form.

2. Use as a Hymn of Thanksgiving.—The "Gloria in Excelsis" used to be sung, just as the "Te Deum" is now (Chrysost. "In Cap. i. Coloss." Hom. iii.; Greg. Turon. "De Gloria Mart." i. 63; Anastas. "In Vita Leon. III." vol. ii. p. 1215, in Migne's reprint). It was the "Te Deum," however, which was sung at the coronation of Charles the Bald, and even earlier, under Pepin, at the translation of the body of St. Germanus, bishop of Paris, if we may believe the author of the narrative in Surius (see Menard, loc. cit. p. 585).

3. Use in the Office.—This, in the Roman Church, came later than its use on festal occasions. When Amalarius went to Rome in 831 he found it was not sung there except "in natalicis Pontificum" (Amalar. "De Ord. Antiphon." ad init. p. 1246, in Migne). On the other hand, the Benedictines, in the eleventh century, were reproached with singing it even in Lent and Advent.

TEMPLARS. This military order was founded early in the twelfth century, soon after the establishment of the Christian kingdom of Jerusalem, by nine French knights, among whom the leading spirit seems to have been Hugo de Payens. High self-denying fervour and undoubting faith dictated the enterprise, of which the object was to levy a permanent militia, sworn to do battle for the defence and extension of that small area of Christian light and truth, pent in on all sides by dark deserts of Mahommedan misbelief. On the whole, the Temple—at any rate till within a short time before its dissolution—remained true to the purpose of its institution. Aspirants for knighthood joined it in great numbers; solemn forms of initiation were devised; like a religious order it was organised into provinces, each containing so many preceptories and commanderies. The knights took the three vows of religion; wealth poured in upon them, was even thrust upon them, but it aggrandised the order, not the individual. In little more than a century the nine knights had grown into a trained army of fifteen thousand warriors. That fervour declined, that contact with Oriental manners sometimes corrupted, that the respect in which they were held engendered pride, and overflowing wealth sometimes brought luxury along with it—all this is true; but to admit it is but to say that the Templars, like other men, felt the pressure of circumstances and were subject to human frailty; it is no proof that their institute was either a mistake or a mischief. While the Christian kingdom endured, the Templars fought strenuously for its preservation; but the unfortunate rivalry between them and the Knights of St. John [HOSPITALLERS] robbed the military efforts of both orders of much of their efficacy. After the loss of Jerusalem (1187) the vassal Christian principalities carried on the struggle, with ever dwindling fortune, for a century longer; and in this struggle the swords of the Templars, though with far too little amenability to any higher control or general plan of operations, were ever wielded with distinguished bravery. At the closing scene of Christian power in Palestine—the fall of Acre in 1291—the forces of the besieged were commanded by the Master of the Temple, who was killed while fighting valiantly. The order then established itself in Cyprus, where the descendants of Guy de Lusignan still reigned, in the hope that time would bring some opening whereby they might regain their footing in the Holy Land. But years wore on and nothing was done. The Hospitallers, who had been driven out of Palestine at the same time as the Templars, still had work cut out for them; wherever they were they could tend the sick; and their well-considered project of attacking Rhodes (in which the Templars refused to share) proved to Christendom that the Knights of St. John had no intention of abandoning the conflict with Islam which they had been waging for two hundred years. The Templars, on the other hand, took up no definite enterprise; they were so rich that they could afford to wait, and so powerful that they dreaded no attack. At once the question arose, What was the use of the Templars? Why should not the order dissolve itself, now that the cause of which they were champions had failed, and that which they had undertaken to defend was lost beyond recovery? In Spain and Portugal only did the order continue to be popular, because the knights flung themselves earnestly into the national contest against the Moors. Philip the Fair, irritated at the state and splendour which the Templars observed, and coveting their wealth, laid a deep plot for their destruction. An apostate Italian Templar and a French heretic, his accomplice, informed the king that they could make fearful revelations. Charges were formulated (1307), at the head of which was that of formally denying Christ and spitting on the cross at the time of initiation into the order. They were also accused of sorcery, of idolatry, of foul and unnatural lusts, of causing parts of the Canon of the Mass to be omitted in their churches, of betraying the Christian cause in the East, &c. The King caused all the Templars throughout France to be suddenly arrested on the same day and thrown into prison. Upon their answers to the charges made against them—their denials, admissions, re-denials, and prevarications—volumes have been written, but no solid result has been obtained. Nor can it ever be, since whatever confessions individual Templars made were extorted by torture, which was applied all through this trial with horrible frequency and severity, and were invariably retracted when the victims found themselves out of the King's power. The Pope, Clement V., interfered so far as he dared, but too weakly and irresolutely to save them. Great numbers of the French knights died under the torture or from the effects of long imprisonment; about a hundred were burnt at the stake, on the ground that having retracted their confessions they should be dealt with as relapsed heretics. The Grand Master, Du Molay, after being long kept in prison and driven by torture to admit the truth of some of the charges, finally (in March 1313) retracted those admissions and was burnt at the stake. The order was dissolved in France, and all its wealth seized by the King. In England (1310) Edward II., at the request of the Pope, had caused all the Templars in the kingdom to be imprisoned, but their trial was conducted with less inhumanity, and though condemned, it was upon evidence so flimsy that in the present day a man could not be convicted on it of the most trifling offence. In Spain and Portugal the knights were put on their trial on the same charges, but honourably and enthusiastically acquitted. In Germany also they were acquitted. The Council of Vienne (1311) decreed the entire dissolution of the order.

TERTIARIES. The status of a tertiary, that is "a member of the third order," was originated by St. Francis of Assisi, who, after he had founded his own order, and after the order of Minorite nuns [POOR CLARES], living under a rule prescribed by him, had been founded by St. Clare, instituted (1221) a third order, as a sort of middle term between the world and the cloister, the members of which, men and women, should be bound by rule to dress more soberly, fast more strictly, pray more regularly, hear Mass more frequently, and practise works of mercy more systematically than ordinary persons living in the world. He called them Brothers and Sisters of Penance. They had to undergo a year's novitiate, and to take a simple vow to observe the rule. They were also to abstain from dances and theatrical entertainments, to eschew all quarrelling and contention, not to take up arms except in defence of the Church or their native land, and to take no unnecessary oaths. An immense number of persons, anxious to sanctify their life in the world, joined the order; among these in the thirteenth century were St. Louis of France and St. Elizabeth of Hungary. Many tertiaries in course of time, as circumstances permitted, desired to take solemn vows and live in community, while still conforming to the rule of the Third Order. Thus arose various congregations of tertiary monks and nuns —in Lombardy, Sicily, Dalmatia, France, Spain, and Portugal. One of these congregations alone, the Sisters of St. Elizabeth, reckoned in the middle of the sixteenth century 135 convents and nearly 4,000 members. The regular tertiaries were in some cases invested by the Holy See with independent jurisdiction; more commonly they were under the government of the Observant or Conventual Franciscans. The double aspect of the Third Order was noticed by Benedict XIII. in the bull "Paterna sedis," where he speaks of it as "a true and proper order, uniting in one seculars scattered all over the world and regulars living in community;" adding that it is to be distinguished from all confraternities as having its own rule, approved by the Holy See, novitiate, profession, and a habit of determinate form and material. St. Elzear and his wife, St. Delphina, St. Roch, St. Elizabeth of Hungary, St. Bridgit of Sweden, St. Rose of Viterbo, and Anne of Austria, were all members of the Third Order of St. Francis. In a rescript of recent date (1883) Pope Leo XIII. very warmly recommended this order to the careful attention of the faithful in every part of Christendom, as one most suitable to be embraced by seculars who sincerely desire to live nearer to God.

The Dominicans also had their Third Order, founded by St. Dominic himself, in what year is uncertain. These Penitents bound themselves to labour for the recovery and preservation of Church property. The glorious St. Catherine of Sienna was for the greater part of her life a member of the Third Order of St. Dominic; St. Rose of Lima also belonged to it. The Augustinian Hermits established a Third Order at the beginning of the fifteenth century. The example was followed by the Minims (1501), the Servites, the Carmelites, and the Trappists.

There are in England at the present time nine convents of Dominican, and four of Franciscan, Sisters of the Third Order.

THEATINES. This congregation of "Regular Clerks," the first that had been so designated, derived its name from Theate, or Chieti, of which John Peter Caraffa, one of its founders, was bishop. The idea of its institution arose in the mind of St. Cajetan, a native of Vicenza, who having made his legal studies with great distinction at Padua, was appointed protonotary apostolic in the Roman Curia. He became a fervent member of the confraternity of the Divine Love; and thirsting more and more for the salvation of souls, he resigned his office, and took holy orders. Family affairs caused him to return to Vicenza, whence he proceeded to Venice, and laboured there for a considerable time. On the advice of his confessor he again fixed his abode at Rome. The reform of the lives of Christians, and especially of the irregularities too common at that time among the clergy, presented itself to him as the object to which God willed him to devote his life. Meeting with Bishop Caraffa, who at the time was thinking of renouncing his preferments and joining the order of Camaldoli, St. Cajetan persuaded him to take part in the holy enterprise which he had matured. Two other men of piety and experience, Paul Consiglieri and Boniface de Colle, joined them; and these four, renouncing whatever benefices they had, founded the Theatine congregation in 1524. It was approved by Clement VII. the same year, in a brief which permitted them to take the three ordinary vows, elect a superior, receive new members, and frame statutes, imparting to them at the same time the privileges of the canons of St. John Lateran. They embraced a more than Franciscan poverty, for they bound themselves not only to have no property or rents, but to abstain from asking for alms, being persuaded that the providence of God and the unsolicited charity of the faithful would sufficiently supply their wants. Caraffa was elected the first superior; at the end of three years he was succeeded by St. Cajetan. By degrees the value of their services was recognised and their numbers increased. St. Cajetan died in 1547; Caraffa, having been elevated to the cardinalate in 1536, was elected Pope in 1555, and took the title of Paul IV. The congregation received many favours and made signal progress during his pontificate. Besides numerous houses in Italy, they established themselves in Spain, Poland, and Bavaria; with the aid of Cardinal Mazarin they opened a house at Paris. The learned Cardinal Thomassi and Father Ventura belonged to this congregation, which at the present day appears not to be found out of Italy. The Theatine nuns were founded by the B. Ursula Benincasa, who, having been suspected of being a visionary and a deluded extatica, was declared by St. Philip Neri to be a soul truly enlightened by God; she died in 1618. (Hélyot.)

THEOPASCHITE. [See TRISAGION and MONOPHYSITE.]

THOMAS, ST., CHRISTIANS OF. A name given to Christians on the Malabar Coast who were once all Nestorians, then all, nominally at least, Catholics, at present partly Catholic, partly Jacobite or Monophysite. The name is supposed to come from St. Thomas the Apostle, who, according to their legendary account, led them to Christian belief; others explain it as referring to a Thomas of Cananes,[1] who is said to have come to the Malabar Coast with authority from Eustathius of Antioch. Assemani, however ("Bibliothec. Orient." tom. iii. p. 2, p. 443), puts this latter Thomas four and a half centuries after Eustathius. Be their origin as it may, the Christians of Malabar (Μαλὲ, ἔνθα τὸ πέπερι γίνεται) are mentioned by Cosmas Indico-pleustes ("Topograph. Christ." iii. p. 169; xi. p. 445, ed. Migne), and at that time—viz. A.D. 522—they were in communion with the Nestorian patriarch, for Cosmas says they had a bishop ordained in Persia. King Alfred is believed to have sent the Bishop Swithelm of Sherborne on an embassy to the shrine of St. Thomas in India (Turner's "Anglo-Saxons," vol. ii. p. 145 seq.). Marco Polo in the thirteenth century speaks of them, and Vasco di Gama in 1498, or at all events on his second arrival in 1502, found them numbering 200,000 souls (Howard). They were Nestorians, using the Syriac language and the three Nestorian liturgies, with a fourth, that of Diodorus (Howard). The Portuguese endeavoured by very cruel means to unite them to the Church, and did produce an external submission. In 1599 Menezes, archbishop of Goa, summoned them to a synod at Diamper, a few miles S.E. of Cochin. They were allowed to retain their chief Syriac liturgy, that of SS. Adeus and Maris, but striking alterations were made after the Roman pattern—e.g. the elevation of the host was introduced, and the invocation common to all Eastern liturgies was placed before the words of institution. At this council Papal supremacy was solemnly accepted, all allegiance to the Nestorian patriarch renounced, and Nestorius anathematised.

The episcopal see was moved from Angalamalé to Cranganore on the coast, so as to make it more accessible to the Portuguese. Menezes ordered their books to be burnt or in certain cases expurgated, and he did his work so thoroughly that no one has succeeded in finding a copy of their liturgy as it was before the Roman alterations. Four Portuguese or Spanish bishops in succession were set over them, the first of them being Francis Roz, a Jesuit.

These poor people cared very little about Nestorius, whom they had not seen, but they hated the Portuguese, whom they had. No sooner did the Portuguese settlements pass into the hands of the Dutch, who expelled the Jesuits, than about half the Malabar churches ceased to be Catholic. At this time, in 1655, after fruitless endeavours to get a bishop from Cairo, they succeeded in obtaining a visit from the Jacobite[1] Gregory of Jerusalem, who consecrated a native metropolitan. They adopted the Syriac liturgy of St. James from the Monophysites. To judge from a very interesting tract by Philipos, a schismatic chorepiscopus of Malabar, translated and published in 1869 by his friend the Rev. G. B. Howard, they have adopted the Monophysite tenets, the opposite extreme from their old error, in good earnest. In many ways, however, the tract of this chorepiscopus witnesses to Catholic doctrine. Its statements on the sacrifice of the Mass, the real presence, obligatory confession, extreme unction, prayer to the saints and for the dead, are entirely Catholic. The Schismatics refused in 1806 to enter into communion with the Church of England on account of the uncertainty of Anglican ordinations (Howard, p. 157). The Metropolitan has civil as well as ecclesiastical authority. He elects and consecrates his coadjutor and successor. The clergy are married; they say Matins and Vespers daily in the church, but are free to follow secular trades. Silbernagl gives (A.D. 1865) their number as 70,000.

[1] Mr. Howard is at a loss to know the authority for the statement that a Jacobite bishop went to India in 696. The authority is Renaudot, Hist. Patriarch Alex. The whole matter is discussed by Assemani, Bibliothec. iv. P. 2, p. 451 seq., who argues that Ethiopia, not India in our sense, is meant.

The united Christians of St. Thomas numbering about 90,000, are subject to the Vicar-Apostolic of Verapoli. They have 339 priests, 182 inferior clerics, 114 parishes with 167 churches, and a clerical seminary. They use the Syriac liturgy, which they inherited from the Nestorians, and hence are reckoned as belonging to the Chaldean rite. (Assemani, "Bibliothec. Orient." iv. P. 2; Silbernagl, "Kirchen des Orients"; the Rev. G. B. Howard (an Anglican clergyman), "The Christians of St. Thomas and their Liturgies," 1864; "The Syrian Christians of Malabar," by Edavalikel Philipos, chorepiscopus, &c., at Travancore, edited by G. B. Howard, 1869.)

THOMISM. [See DOGMATIC THEOLOGY; also SCOTISTS.]

THREE CHAPTERS. The condemnation of the three chapters[1] means the condemnation of (1) Theodore of Mopsuestia, his person, and his writings, (2) of Theodoret's writings against Cyril and the Ephesine Council, (3) of a letter from Ibas to Maris the Persian, also against Cyril and the Council. Theodore anticipated the heresy of Nestorius. Ibas and Theodoret were indeed restored at Chalcedon, but only after they had given orthodox explanations and shown that they were free from Nestorianism. Hence, it was quite possible to condemn the Nestorian or semi-Nestorian error of the "three chapters" without falling into the opposite error of Eutychianism and rejecting the definitions of Chalcedon. The Emperor Justinian was led chiefly by Theodore Ascidas, archbishop of Cæsarea, and by Theodora his empress, to believe that the condemnation of the three chapters would serve to reconcile the Monophysites in Egypt, and strengthen the unity of the Eastern Empire. In fact, the Severian Monophysites had raised objections to the Council of Chalcedon on the ground that there Ibas and Theodoret had been declared orthodox. (Mansi, viii. 829.) Accordingly, in 544 an edict of Justinian condemned the three chapters, and at the same time maintained with Pope Leo the orthodox doctrine that there are two natures in Christ. This edict was accepted by the four Eastern Patriarchs, but opposed in Africa, where Facundus of Hermiane led the opposition, in Illyria, [1] Properly speaking, the κεφάλαια are the propositions containing the condemnation, not the condemned matter. But in later imperial edicts, the Acts of the Fifth Council, and Papal letters, the term always has the meaning given in the text. Hefele, Concil. ii. p. 800.

Dalmatia, and by Pope Vigilius, who was summoned that same year to Constantinople.

There the Pope changed his mind, and in his "Judicatum" of 548 anathematised the three chapters (Mansi, ix. 181.)[1] This "Judicatum" excited great opposition in the West, particularly in Africa, where Pope Vigilius was excommunicated in a Council of Carthage, A.D. 550 (Hefele, ii. p. 831). Besides Facundus, the Africans Fulgentius, Ferrandus, and the deacon Liberatus ("Breviar. causæ Nestor. et Eutych.") wrote in defence of the three chapters. That same year Vigilius withdrew his "Judicatum" (Mansi, ix. 153), and agreed to let the matter rest till a council could meet. But, probably in 551, Justinian, without waiting for the council, published another edict against the chapters (ὁμολογία κατὰ τῶν τριῶν κεφαλαίων, Mansi, ix. 537–582), and the Pope, who would not approve it, was subjected to cruel outrage, and at last fled to the Church of St. Euphemia at Chalcedon. In the negotiations between Pope and Emperor, the former gave and then withdrew his consent to the meeting of a council from which the Africans were to be excluded. The council (see CONSTANTINOPLE) met in 553, and to it, on May 14, 553, Vigilius sent his "Constitutum," in which he censured sixty propositions of Theodore, but strictly forbade any personal condemnation of him, or any censure of the writings of Ibas and Theodoret (Mansi, ix. 61–106). The council did precisely what the Pope had forbidden, and on December 8, 553, the latter declared in a letter to Eutychius of Constantinople that "Christ had removed the darkness from his mind," that "it was no shame to admit and retract error" after the example of St. Augustine, and accordingly he condemned the three chapters, just as the council had done (Mansi, ix. 413–20). He repeated the same decision in his second "Constitutum" of February 23, 554, which ends with an anathema of the three chapters and those who defend them (Mansi, 457–488). Vigilius died on his way home at Syracuse in 554 or January 555. His successor, Pelagius I., also approved the acts of the Fifth Council, which, however, was bitterly opposed in Asia, North Italy, Gaul, Spain, and Britain. The Africans, except a few who were exiled or imprisoned, gave way in 559. Milan was in formal schism till the publication of the "Henoticon" by Justin II. in 571. It was in Istria that the schism was most obstinate. In 607 the Bishop of Aquileia-Grado and those of his suffragans who were in the imperial territory were reunited to the Church. On the other hand, those suffragan bishops who were subject to the Lombard king or to the Duke of Friuli set up a schismatical patriarchate at Old Aquileia. Soon after the Popes granted the title of Patriarch to the Bishop of Aquileia-Grado. The schism continued till the Council of Aquileia in 700. After the union the two Bishops of Old Aquileia and Aquileia-Grado were both allowed to retain the title of Patriarch. The Patriarchate of Grado was transferred to Venice in 1451, and still continues. The Patriarchs of Old Aquileia, after its destruction, transferred their see to Udine, and the title was abolished by Benedict XIV. in 1751 at the request of Austria (Hefele, ii. p. 923).

(Chiefly from Hefele, "Concil." vol. ii. Ballerini, "De Primat." cap. xv. § x. 38, argues that Vigilius did not issue contradictory definitions on the faith, but simply changed his mind on a matter of expediency, and this of course is the only theory consistent with the definitions of the Vatican Council. Bossuet ["Déf. Cler. Gall." P. iii. lib. vii. cap. xx.], though he urges the history of Vigilius as an argument against Papal infallibility, still allows that the Pope and his opponents "de summa fidei facile consentiebant;" adding, however, "omnino ad fidei causam quæstio pertinebat." The attempt of Vincenzi ["Vigil. Orig. Justin. Triumph. in Syn. V. Romæ," 1865] to deny the most patent facts and treat some of the chief documents as forgeries, is unworthy of serious notice.)

THURIBLES (θυμιατήριον, thimiamaterium, thuribulum), must be as old as the use of incense in the Church [see that article], and Anastasius in his Life of Sylvester (n. 36), says Constantine presented two thuribles of pure gold, weighing thirty pounds, to the Lateran Church, besides one of gold set with gems for the baptistery. Evagrius ("H. E." vi. 21) mentions a thurible sent by Chosroes to the shrine of St. Sergius. But thuribles in their present form—i.e. with chains attached—do not occur, according to Martigny ("Dict. des Antiq. Chrét." art. Encensoir), before the twelfth century.

which the incense is carried answers to the Low Latin navicula, which had the same meaning (Ducange, sub voc.), and to the French navette; Ital. navicella.

TIARA. A cylindrical head-dress pointed at the top and surrounded with three crowns, which the Pope wears as a symbol of sovereignty. The word (τιάρα) occurs in the classics to denote the Persian head-dress, particularly that of the "great king." In the Vulgate it is a synonym of cidaris and mitra, and is used for the turban of the high priest (מִצְנֶפֶת, Exod. xxviii. 4), or of the common priest (מִגְבָּעָה, ib. 40.) Till late in the middle ages tiara was a synonym of mitra, a bishop's mitre. regnum being the word for crown (Ducange, sub voc.).

The whole history of the Papal Tiara is uncertain. Nicolas I. (858–867) is said to have been the first to unite the princely crown with the mitre, though the Bollandists think this was done before his time (Bollandists, "Thesaur." vol. ii. p. 323, quoted by Hefele). The common statement that Boniface VIII. (about 1300) added the second crown is false, for Hefele shows that Innocent III. is represented wearing the second crown in a painting older than the time of Boniface. Urban V. (1362-70) is supposed to have added the third crown. The tiara is placed on the Pope's head at his coronation by the second cardinal deacon in the loggia of St. Peter's with the words, "Receive the tiara adorned with three crowns, and know that thou art Father of princes and kings, Ruler of the world, Vicar of our Saviour Jesus Christ." At ceremonies of a purely spiritual character the Pope wears the mitre, not the tiara. (Hefele, "Beiträge," vol. ii. p. 236 seq.)

TITHES. Tithes are commonly defined as "the tenth part of all fruits and profits justly acquired, owed to God in recognition of his supreme dominion over man, and to be paid to the ministers of the Church." They were paid by Abram (Gen. xiv.), vowed by Jacob (Gen. xxviii.), and regulated by the Mosaic law (Exod. xxii.; Lev. xxvii.; Numb. xviii.). In the early Christian ages the free-will offerings of the faithful supplied what was necessary both for the Divine worship and the support of the clergy; but as the conversion of the Western nations proceeded, a more permanent provision was seen to be necessary. In a canon of the Second Council of Mâcon (585) occurs the first express mention of the Christian obligation of paying tithes.[1] They began to be generally rendered in the eighth century, not earlier. In 855, Ethelwulf, king of Wessex, father of Alfred, "assigned the tenth part of his land all over his kingdom for the love of God and his own everlasting weal."[2] The tithe of the produce, not the tenth part of the land itself, is certainly here intended. Many authors, both Catholic and Protestant, have imagined that the proportion itself of 1 in 10 was fixed by a Divine precept for ever as that part of our substance which God requires to be devoted to Him; and mystical reasons have been invented to account for this. This belief is now less commonly held. Cardinal Soglia speaks of the tithe as "a certain part, not the tenth part; for it is sometimes greater, sometimes smaller, according to the custom of different places."[3]

Tithes are of two kinds, prædial and personal. Prædial are those receivable in respect of the annual crops, corn, wine, oil, fruit, &c., and of the increase of cattle, including milk and cheese. These last are called by some "mixed" tithes, but the distinction appears to be unnecessary. Great tithes are of corn, wine, and oil; small tithes, of vegetables and fruits. Personal tithes are receivable in respect of the profits of trade and industry. Property acquired on the title of gift, bequest, or inheritance is not itself tithe-able; but its annual increase, so far as it is produced by nature or human industry, is so.

Tithes were originally paid to the bishops, but with the erection of separate benefices the right to them passed to the parish priests, in whom it is now vested by the common law of the Church. Prædial tithes are due to the parish in which the farm lies, or in which the animals are ordinarily fed; personal, to that in which the tithe-payer is bound to receive sacraments.

Exemption from tithe may be obtained by Papal privilege, by prescription, by custom, or by convention. The Popes in former times often granted the tithes of certain places or districts to princes or nobles who had rendered eminent services to the Church, and allowed them to transmit the same to their successors. Bishops used to grant tithes to laymen for similar reasons; but this was restrained by the Third Council of Lateran (1179), which [1] Fleury, Hist. Eccl. xxxiv.

[2] Sax. Chron.
[3] Inst. Can., vol. ii. 8.

ordered that no alienation of tithe be made by a bishop without the consent of the Pope. Prescription can only confer exemption, as against a parish church, if it be proved to have existed forty years, and to rest on some title, or if—without a title—it can be shown to be immemorial. Against other churches (monasteries, chapters, &c.), a shorter prescription is sufficient. [PRESCRIPTION.] Custom differs from prescription in that it affects places or countries, while prescription affects individuals. By custom, "personal and mixed tithes have almost everywhere become obsolete, and prædial also, in many places, especially where competent revenues of a different kind have been assigned to the parish churches." On the other hand, "the law of tithes can never be abrogated by prescription or custom, if the minister of the church have no suitable and sufficient provision from other sources; because then the natural and Divine law,[1] which can neither be abrogated nor antiquated, commands that the tithe be paid."[2] (Spelman, "Of Tythes," Eng. Works, 1723; Ferraris, Decimæ; Soglia, "Inst. Can.")

TITLE TO ORDERS. According to the ancient law, no secular cleric could be admitted to holy orders except titulo beneficii; that is, he was required to show that he had been nominated to a benefice (of which he would have undisputed possession) sufficient for his decent maintenance (Conc. Tr. xxi. De Ref. c. 2). The same decree of the Council of Trent which lays down this general principle names two other titles to ordination as exceptionally admissible—that which consists in the possession of sufficient private property (titulus patrimonii), and that which depends on a guarantee to the ordinand by some solvent person or persons of an annual sum sufficient to maintain him, in the event of the failure or withdrawal of ecclesiastical resources (titulus pensionis). A fourth title to orders (titulus paupertatis) was, and is, the poverty professed by those who have taken solemn vows in any religious order; since this poverty (as was shown in the article RELIGIOUS PROFESSION), while it debars the professed from possessing any private income, guarantees to him a maintenance for life on the part of the religious house or order of which he is a member. Benefices having now ceased to exist over a large part of Europe, one of the other titles noticed by the Council is now, under the name of "titulus mensæ," generally required in German countries. The titulus mensæ is "the legal undertaking of a third person to provide for the sufficient maintenance of a clerk in major orders, in case of, and during, his incapacity to discharge his functions." (Wetzer and Welte.)

Again, the pupils of certain seminaries —as of the College of Propaganda at Rome—and candidates for orders where the Catholic Church is circumstanced as in Great Britain, Ireland, and the U. S., may be ordained titulo seminarii, or missionis. The acceptance of this last-named title imposes on the bishop the responsibility of providing for the support of the ordinand if he shall become incapable of discharging his functions, whether it be without fault (emeritus), or through his own fault (demeritus). (Ferraris, Titulus, § 31; Wetzer and Welte.)

TITULAR BISHOP. [See BISHOP IN PARTIBUS INFIDELIUM.] The political condition of the eastern and southern shores of the Mediterranean has for some time been such as to allow of the existence of flourishing Christian communities in many places where formerly Mussulman bigotry would have rendered it impossible. These countries are no longer "partes infidelium," in the full sense of the words. His Holiness Leo XIII. has therefore, by a recent decision, substituted the phrase "Titular Bishop" for "Bishop in Partibus Infidelium."

TITULAR OF CHURCH. [See PATRON SAINT.]

TITULI. A name given to the parish churches of Rome, as distinct on the one hand from the patriarchal churches such as St. John Lateran, St. Peter's, St. Mary Major, St. Laurence in Agro Verano, St. Paul's, which belonged especially to the Pope, and on the other from the Diaconia and Oratories. Each titular church was under a cardinal presbyter, had a district attached to it, and a font for baptism in case of necessity. A Roman synod under Pope Symmachus, in 499, enumerates thirty tituli served by sixty-six priests. (Mabillon, "Comm. in Ord. Rom." c. 3.)

Baronius (An. 112, n. 5) supposes the name to be derived from the sign of the cross, which "title" marked them as belonging to Christ. Bingham ("Antiq." vii. 1, 10), with far greater probability, explains the name from the fact that these churches gave a "title of cure or denomination" to the presbyters who were set over them.

TONSURE. The shaving of the crown in a circle, which is a distinguishing mark of clerics. Among some of the monastic orders and friars the tonsure leaves only a circle of hair round the head; the tonsure of secular clerks, on the other hand, is small. The first tonsure is made by the bishop, in a form prescribed by the Pontifical, and the person receiving it is thereby admitted to the state and privileges of a cleric. (See CLERICAL STATE.) The bishop may confer it at any place or time. Mitred abbots may give it to their own subjects; cardinal priests to the clergy of their titles, and it may also be conferred by other priests with special privileges.

The clerical tonsure, it is scarcely necessary to say, was unknown in the first ages of the Church. Christians were simply expected to avoid vanity in dressing their hair (Tertull. "De Cult. Fem." ii. 1), or at most to keep it short ("Const. Apost." i. 3). Ascetics and clergymen were thus naturally led to make a point of cutting their hair close. Jerome ("In Ezech." xliv.) deprecates eccentricity in this respect, and expresses his dislike both of long hair and shaven heads. The so-called Fourth Council of Carthage (c. 44) simply forbids clerics to wear long hair: "nec comam nutriat, nec barbam."

We have, however, clear proof that the clerical tonsure was familiar at least in Gaul during the latter part of the fifth and in the sixth century. For Sidonius Apollinaris (lib. iv. Ep. 13) says the bishop Germanicus had his hair cut "in the shape of a wheel" ("in rotæ speciem"), and St. Gregory of Tours ("Vit. Patr." 17) relates that Nicetius was miraculously designated from birth for the clerical state, being born with a fringe of hair like a "corona clerici."

The Fourth Council of Toledo (A.D. 633, c. 41) requires all clerics to shave their heads, leaving only a rim of hair behind, and reprobates the fashion of making only a small tonsure, prevalent among heretics.

Writers of the seventh and eighth centuries distinguish three kinds of tonsure. (1) The Roman tonsure, known as St. Peter's, which consisted in shaving the whole head, leaving only a circle of hair. It prevailed in France and Spain (vide supra) and in Rome (Joann. Diac. "Vit. Greg. Magn." iv. 83). It was only late in the middle ages that this tonsure was lessened, and the present distinction between the tonsure of clerics and of monks or friars arose. Chardon shows that the large clerical tonsure continued, at least in some places, down even to the fifteenth century. But as early as 1240 a synod of Worcester (Wilkins, "Concil." tom. i. p. 670) refers to a difference of size in tonsures, the tonsure being increased in size with each step in the sacred ministry. (2) The tonsure of St. Paul, usual among the Easterns, was entire. When the Greek Theodore came to the see of Canterbury in 668, he had to wait four months and let his hair grow that he might receive the Roman tonsure. (3) The Celtic tonsure, called St. John's, and by its Anglo-Saxon enemies that of Simon Magus, consisted in shaving the head in front of a line drawn from ear to ear. It was adopted by the British and Irish Churches and the disciples of St. Columbanus on the Continent. No question on the comparative merits of the Roman and Celtic tonsures was raised by St. Augustine either at the Oak or at Bangor; but the matter became the subject of violent controversy in the seventh and eighth centuries—e.g. at the Council of Whitby, A.D. 663. (Bede, "H. Angl." iii. 25, 26.)

Even after the tonsure was introduced it was never given separately, but always with the order of reader. Nobody could belong to the clerical state without at least a minor order, and children dedicated to God were not simply tonsured, but made readers, since nothing short of ordination to some grade of the ecclesiastical ministry placed a person in the clerical state. (Isidore, "Ecclesiast. Off." ii. 1.) Then from the seventh century, according to Chardon, children were tonsured without ordination; and in an ancient Ordo Romanus there is an office "ad puerum tonsurandum;" and lastly, very much later, adults anxious to be free from the secular courts, &c., were tonsured without any ordination. This last custom was of course an abuse.

It was only gradually that the right to tonsure was limited to bishops, abbots, &c. Till the tenth century it was given by simple priests, or even by laymen to each other. (Mabillon, "Annal. Benedict." Præf. ad. Sacc. iii., quoted by Chardon.) (Chiefly from Chardon, "Hist. des Sacr." tom. v. p. 45 seq.)

TRACT. Verses of Scripture said after the Gradual (not "a form which the Gradual assumes," as Hammond supposes, "Ancient Liturgies," p. 385), instead of the Alleluia in all Masses from Septuagesima till Holy Saturday. Le Brun ("Explic. de la Messe," tom. i. p. 205) says the name meant something sung "tractim"—i.e. without break or interruption of other voices, as in responsories and antiphons—by the cantor alone, and that the theory of Durandus—viz. that the tract is something sung tractim, i.e. in a slow or sad voice—arose by mistake in the tenth century.

TRADITION (παράδοσις) means properly the act of handing down, and thus the doctrine so handed down. In its widest sense it includes all truths or supposed truths handed down from one generation to another; and in all societies which have no literature tradition is, with all its manifold imperfections, the great bond between the present and the past, and one of the great distinguishing marks between man and the brutes, which latter have no tradition, and therefore no history. Among the Hebrews, as among all other nations, tradition was the only history till an historical literature arose, but among the later Jews the word assumed another and a much more restricted sense. The early Hebrew tradition arose naturally before there was any written law or history; the latter Jewish tradition interpreted the written law and added to it.[1] To a certain extent such a tradition arose of necessity, for the Pentateuch is a "Corpus Juris," and no system of law can remain absolutely unchanged. Additions and alterations are inevitable, as the conditions of society change in the course of ages, and the Rabbinical traditions were as defensible as the "fictions" of the Roman lawyers. The danger, however, lay in this, that the law of Moses determined the relation of man to God, the relation of love and kindness between man and man, and in such a sphere the legal spirit is sure to be dangerous and even pernicious. Hence the charge which Christ makes against the Pharisees, "Ye have made void the law of God by your tradition." They used the same "fictions" which lawyers employ to preserve the letter of a law which can no longer be really observed, in treating of God's eternal law. Again, just as a human legislator rightly and necessarily contents himself with regulating the external actions of man, so the Jewish Scribes were apt to make much of outward things, little comparatively of justice and mercy and truth. But we do not mean to discuss the merits and demerits or the unhistorical[1] character of Jewish tradition here. We will only add that Josephus uses the same word, παράδοσις, which was adopted in the N. T. and in ecclesiastical writers. The Pharisees, he says ("Antiq." xiii. 10, 6), imposed many "enactments" (νόμιμα) on the people, not to be found in the written law; the Sadducees, on the other hand, rejected the "tradition of the Fathers" (τὰ ἐκ παραδόσεως πατέρων). Jewish tradition in the strict sense never invaded the Church. In the Judaising homilies which go under the name of Clement a false tradition is exalted at the expense of the Scriptural text, which is said to have been corrupted by irreligious interpretations. (Clem. Hom. ii. 38–39.) But this, of course, is quite opposed to the Rabbinical idea of tradition. In the Clementine Recognitions, on the other hand, tradition is only put forward as determining the sense of Scripture ("Recog.," 1, 21, cf. ii. 45), a notion which is neither Rabbinical nor heretical, but Catholic.

This brings us naturally to speak of tradition in the Church. So far from setting tradition, as such, aside, Christ left his Church with no written books, and with nothing but tradition to guide it. St. Paul insists on the necessity of holding to the Christian tradition. (1 Cor. xi. 2; 2 Thess. ii. 15.) Even when the Scriptures of the N. T. were written tradition did not fall out of sight, for the early Christians were well aware that it was tradition which settled the canon of Scripture, and they were not unreasonable enough to reject tradition for Scripture, since the authority of Scripture itself was based on tradition. They knew very well that many barbarous nations furnished converts to the faith although they had no translations of the Bible as yet in their own languages, and could not therefore learn the truth from it. They were convinced, moreover, that though human tradition is in its own nature shifting and uncertain, the Holy Spirit preserved the tradition of truth in the Church. Add to all this the obscurity of Scripture, the fact that it is a collection of books which never professes to contain the sum of Christian truth, and the appeal of the Fathers to tradition becomes quite intelligible. Hence Heresippus (apud Euseb. "H. E.," iii. 32), appeals to the "wholesome canon of saving preaching;" Irenæus and Clement of Alexandria to the "canon of the truth" ("Adv. Hær." i. 9, 4, ii. 27, 1; Clem. Al. "Strom." iv. 1, p. 564, ed. Potter), and the "Canon of the Church" (ib. i. 19, p. 375[1]). The latter will have doubtful questions decided by an appeal to the Apostolic churches, and considers that tradition would have been a sufficient guide, even if the Church had been left without any Scriptures at all (iii. 4, 1). Just in the same way Tertullian invokes the decision of the Apostolic churches ("Præscr." 17 et passim), and ("De Corona," 3) asserts the decisive authority of unwritten tradition, in favour, it is true, of matters of custom and ritual, but of custom and ritual which involved questions of doctrine, such, e.g., as "oblations for the dead." Tertullian speaks for Africa and Rome, Irenæus for Asia Minor and Gaul. Origen, the great representative of the early Alexandrian church, holds the same language. Since, he says ("De Princip." § 2), there are differences among Christians, "let the ecclesiastical teaching handed down by order of succession from the Apostles, and abiding till now in the churches, be observed; that only is to be believed the truth which no way differs from ecclesiastical and Apostolic tradition."

[1] The Halakah is legal (from הלך, to go); the Haggadah (from הגיד, to relate) legendary; the Kabbala (from קבל, to receive) mystical; the Massora (from מסר, to deliver), is textual tradition. The last of these has a very real value.

[1] The common account is given in Pirke Avoth, ad init. "Moses received the law (i.e. the secret and oral law, the תורה שבעל פה. See Buxtorf, Lex. sub voc. מסר), from Sinai, and delivered it to Joshua, and Joshua to the elders, and the elders to the prophets, and the prophets to the men of the great synagogue."

The following are some of the testimonies of later Fathers: "It is enough," says Gregory Nyssen ("Contr. Eunom.," iv.; "Opp." vol. ii. col. 653 in Migne's reprint), "for the demonstration of our position to have the tradition which comes to us from the Fathers transmitted as an inheritance by succession from the Apostles through the saints that followed them." St. Basil ("De Spir. S." § 66): "Of the doctrines and decrees (κηρυγμάτων = canons and decrees on discipline, &c.), we have some from written teaching; others we have received, apportioned to us from the tradition of the Apostles in a mysterious manner, both of which (i.e. Scripture and tradition) have the same force." St. Chrysostom ("In 2 Thess." hom. iv. § 14), after saying that the Apostles did not hand down all by epistles, but much also without writing (πολλὰ καὶ ἀγράφως), adds: "The one and the other are worthy of belief, so that we consider the tradition of the Church also worthy of belief. It is a tradition: ask no more." St. Epiphanius ("Hær." lxi. 6): "We must also use tradition, since all cannot be got from the divine Scripture, wherefore the divine Apostles handed down some things in writings, others in tradition." So, much later, St. John of Damascus ("De Fid. Orthodox." iv. 16) supports the received doctrine on images by a reference to "unwritten tradition." We have passed over one Greek Father, St. Gregory Nazianzen, because he attributes an exaggerated importance to tradition, and speaks as if the tradition of the Church had added new truths, not clearly taught even by the Apostles. The N. T., he thinks (Orat. xxxi. § 26), only hinted at (ὑπέδειξε) the divinity of the Holy Ghost: "Now the Holy Ghost dwells with us (ἐμπολιτεύεται), making the manifestation of himself more plain." If we turn to the later Fathers of the Latin Church, we meet with the same appreciation of tradition. St. Augustine, treating of the dispute about the validity of heretical baptism ("Contr. Bapt. Donat." ii. 7), writes: "I believe it (i.e. the Roman rule of accepting such baptism as valid) comes from tradition of the Apostles, like many things which are not found in their letters, nor in earlier councils, and yet because observed by the whole Church are believed to have been handed down and commended by no others than by them" (the Apostles; see also ib. iv. 24, v. 23). Vincent, in his first "Commonitorium" (cap. 2), the classical work on the subject, argues for the necessity of tradition from the fact that the Bible may be understood in many different ways, although the canon of Scripture is perfect, and "in itself sufficient, and more than sufficient, for all." Here the reader may observe a difference. Other Fathers, and especially Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, Epiphanius, Chrysostom, look on Scripture and tradition as two co-ordinate authorities, each divine. To Vincent the authority is single, tradition not completing but merely determining the sense of Scripture. Cardinal Newman ("Via Media," i. p. 327), points out that even modern "Catholic controversialists, while insisting that they need not prove their doctrine from Scripture, always do so prove it." In other words, they would have no objection to admit that all Catholic doctrine is in some implicit way contained in Scripture, and to grant with Vincent the sufficiency of Scripture illustrated by tradition. There is, on the contrary, a radical difference between the Catholic belief on the necessity of tradition and the opinion of Protestants pure and simple that no doctrine can be an article of faith unless it can be clearly deduced without the aid of tradition from the sacred text. Of such a theory there is no trace in antiquity, except perhaps that Stephen Gobaras the Tritheist ("Phot. Bibliothec." Cod. 132), laboured to set Father against Father, apparently with the view of sapping the authority of tradition. Therefore the Council of Trent (sess. iv. De Canon Script.), when it teaches that the truth of Christ is contained partly in the Bible, partly in unwritten tradition received by the Apostles from Christ or from the Holy Ghost and entrusted by them to the Church, that Scripture and tradition (the latter of course only when proved Apostolic) are to be reverenced alike, follows the express teaching of many of the earliest and greatest Fathers, the spirit of all. The advocate of private judgment, on the other hand, is committed to the conclusion that the Church was left for a generation without any true and complete rule of faith, that when this rule was given nobody, not even the holiest and wisest, understood its purpose or use, and that when after fifteen centuries this use was understood, the rule intended to secure unity in faith became the most fertile source of strife and division.

[1] Clement has also the idea of a secret and esoteric tradition which is a very different thing, and has its true analogon in Judaism. Strom. vi. 7, p. 771. See also Euseb. H. E. ii. 1.

In conclusion, the difficulties which arise from the statements of some Fathers who seem to make Scripture the sole guide are only apparent. St. Augustine ("De Doctr. Christ." ii. 9) no doubt allows that the things "openly stated in Scripture" contain the whole sum of faith and morals. We have seen already what St. Augustine thought of tradition, and in this place he adds, "namely, faith and hope," meaning that a Christian may find in the Bible all that he needs to know explicitly in order to be saved, a fact which is undeniable. Optatus ("Schism. Donat." v. 3) is contrasting Scripture, not with Apostolic, but with human tradition. St. Cyril of Alexandria (Cat. IV. 17) tells his catechumens that he will have them believe nothing he tells them except he can prove it out of Scripture. But (1) he refers to the articles of the Apostles' Creed, which can certainly be proved from the Bible; (2) he is contrasting Scripture, not with tradition, but with "probabilities," "ingenious arguments" (λόγων κατασκεύαις), "inventions" of his own (εὑρεσιλογίαις).

TRADITIONALISM. A system of philosophy in which intellectual cognition, so far as the human mind is concerned, is reduced to belief in truth communicated by revelation from God, and received by traditional instruction through the medium of language, which was originally itself a supernatural gift. This system is also called Fideism, and is a reaction from the extreme of rationalism into an opposite extreme of antirationalism. De Bonald († 1840) is regarded as its author. In its strictest form this system reduces the intellect to a merely receptive faculty, capable of acquiring knowledge by instruction, which comes originally from God by a primitive revelation given to the first progenitors of the human race. In its modified and milder form it restricts the absolute necessity of a traditional instruction derived from revelation to metaphysical, religious, and moral truth, admitting the capacity of the human mind to discover other intellectual truths by its innate power. M. Bonnetty was the most conspicuous advocate of this modified traditionalism, which for a time obtained numerous adherents among Catholics, especially in France and Belgium. It has been partially adopted by some advocates of ontologism and combined with that philosophical theory. There are, besides, other thinkers and writers whose tendency is to minimise the rational, and elevate towards the maximum the traditional element in the highest departments of human knowledge, but who cannot be classed as advocates of traditionalism properly so called. The best Catholic theologians and philosophers have always recognised the moral and practical need of revelation and traditional instruction, for the easy acquisition of complete and certain knowledge of the highest truths within the scope of the natural intelligence and rational faculty of man, by men in general. The reason of this need is accidental, extrinsic, and to be ascribed to the actual condition and environment of mankind in its present state. The specific difference which places the system of traditionalism in opposition to this common doctrine consists in this: to wit, that it makes this need to be a physical necessity arising from the intrinsic essence and nature of the human intellect. The former doctrine has been explicitly formulated and promulgated by the Council of the Vatican in the Constitution "Dei Filius," with an exclusion of the latter opinion. This is a condemnation of traditionalism proper. It had been already condemned by a decree of the Congregation of the Index bearing the date of June 11, 1855, and approved by his Holiness Pius IX., which set forth four theses to be subscribed by M. Bonnetty. These theses are the contradictories of several propositions extracted from his writings. It may suffice to cite the second and third:

II. Ratiocination can prove with certitude the existence of God, the spirituality of the soul, the liberty of man. Faith is posterior to Revelation, and cannot therefore suitably be alleged for proving the existence of God against an atheist, or for proving the spirituality and liberty of the rational soul against a follower of naturalism and fatalism.

III. The use of reason precedes Faith and conducts man to it, by the aid of Revelation and of Grace.

The judgments of the supreme authority in the Church have been submitted to with docility by those Catholics who had adopted the theory of traditionalism, and the controversy respecting this matter has come to an end. For a very full historical and doctrinal exposition of the main points in this controversy see the works of Cardinal Dechamps, vol. vii. "Opuscules."

TRADITION OF INSTRUMENTS. [See ORDER.]

TRADITORES. A name given to Christians who in the persecution of Diocletian gave up to the officers of the law "the Holy Scriptures or the vessels of the Lord, or the names of their brethren" (Concil. 1 Arel. A.D. 314, c. 13). The first edict of Diocletian, A.D. 303, ordered the churches and the sacred books of the Christians to be burnt. Hence the surrender of sacred books (to be burnt), and of vessels (ad fiscum). The edict also deprived Christians of honours and civil rights, and made them, if slaves, incapable of freedom. Hence perhaps bishops, &c., were asked for the list of their flocks, though others think that the traditio nominum was a consequence of Diocletian's second edict, condemning all ecclesiastics to prison, and requiring them to sacrifice. The canon already quoted orders the deposition of all clerical traditores, but allowed persons ordained by traditores to remain in office. [See DONATISTS.]

TRADUCIANISM. [See SOUL.]

TRANSFIGURATION, FEAST OF (ἡ ἁγία μεταμόρφωσις τοῦ Κ. Ι. Χ.). With the Greeks, who, like the Latins, keep it on August 6, it is one of the twelve greater feasts which come next after Easter in dignity (Daniel, "Cod. Lit." iv. p. 239). It is mentioned in the Constitution of Manuel Comnenus, and, of course, in the Menologies (Thomassin, "Traité des Festes," p. 406).

In the West its institution is commonly attributed to Calixtus III. (1455–58). But Thomassin (loc. cit.) shows that the feast is mentioned in the Martyrology of Vandelbert (said to have lived about 850); by Ildefonsus in 845, who says it was kept the sixth day before the Calends of August, and was among the chief solemnities; and by Peter the Venerable in the Statutes of Clugny. Gregory IX. (see Bened. XIV. "De Fest.") speaks of it as celebrated on the present day—viz. August 6. Calixtus, however, promoted the observance, in order to obtain the help of God against the Turks, by granting indulgences. He also instituted an Office for the day, which was afterwards altered, in the hymns and lessons of the two first nocturns, by Pius V. (Gavant. "De Fest. Aug." § 7, 10, 6.)

TRANSLATION OF FEASTS. Some account of the rules on this matter will be found in the article on FEASTS. But while this work has been in progress, an important change has been made by the present Pope in the Apostolic Letters, "Nullo unquam tempore," July 28, 1882. By the new rule, mere doubles ("festa duplicia minora"), unless feasts of the doctors of the Church, and semi-doubles, if the celebration on the proper days is impeded by the concurrence of a greater feast, or of a Sunday, are not transferred. Instead, they are commemorated on the day itself at Lauds and Vespers, and the ninth lesson at Matins is composed of the two or three lessons which give the history of the saint. If the solemnity of the day does not admit such a mode of commemorating the excluded feast, then all notice of the latter is omitted during that year, according to the rule already provided for simple feasts "In Rubric. lit. ix. n. x., lit. x. n. viii."

TRANSUBSTANTIATION. [See EUCHARIST.]

TRAPPISTS. A branch of the Cistercian order; see that article. The founder, Armand Jean le Bouthillier de Rancé, born in 1626, was of a noble family. According to an abuse common in that age, the child, being destined to be a priest, was loaded by his father with preferment from his early years. Though only ten or eleven, he was commendatory abbot of La Trappe and two other abbeys, prior of two priories, and canon of Notre Dame at Paris; his ecclesiastical income was from 15,000 to 20,000 livres. He was ordained priest in 1651 by his uncle, the Archbishop of Tours, whose coadjutor he hoped one day to become. His youthful worldliness was gradually shaken by a series of striking incidents; the death of a cousin, a remarkable escape from death, a disappointment to his ambition in the assembly of the clergy, were among the occasions of his entering into himself, and recognising the nothingness of all for which he had hitherto lived. In 1660 he resigned all his benefices except the abbacy of La Trappe; disposed of his patrimony for 300,000 livres; and gave the greater part of the money to the Hôtel Dieu, or great hospital at Paris. He then repaired to La Trappe, and told the monks that they would thenceforth have to live by the rule of what was called the "Strict Observance" of the Cistercian order. La Trappe was an ancient monastery lying in the heart of La Perche, not far from Séez, founded as a Cistercian house in 1140 by Rotrou, count of Perche. It suffered much during the long wars with England, but its discipline was still more fatally injured in later times by the system of commendation, which gave the name and emoluments of abbot to some non-resident layman or ecclesiastic. When de Rancé came there in 1662, the state of things was deplorable; the monks had ceased to live in community, and if they met at all it was for pleasure parties; the buildings were going to ruin, and persons from without were suffered to live in them. With much difficulty de Rancé succeeded in bringing from a neighbouring monastery some monks of the Strict Observance, and in restoring regularity at La Trappe. Still he was not satisfied; an ideal had been for some time floating before his eyes in which were blended the union with God through contemplation and prayer, bodily mortification, and severance from causes of distraction. The final result was the discipline of La Trappe, of which we take an abridged account from Hélyot. "In summer the religious go to rest at eight, in winter at seven. They get up at two o'clock in the night to go to Matins, which usually last till half-past four, because they add the Office of the Blessed Virgin to the regular Office, and between the two make half an hour's meditation. . . . After Matins, in summer time, they may go and rest in their cells till Prime; in winter they go into a common room near the stove, where each reads to himself. . . . At half-past five they say Prime, and then go to chapter," which usually takes up half an hour. "At seven they go to work; the cowl is put off, and the under garment tucked up; some dig, others riddle, others carry stones,—each according to the task assigned to him, for they are not free to choose the kind of work which they like best. The abbot himself works, and often takes up the most abject sort of employment." Their indoor employments, when the weather does not allow of outdoor labour, include carpentry, joinery, copying, binding, sweeping, and many other useful toils. "When they have worked an hour and a half they go to office; Tierce is said, followed by Mass; then Sext; after which an interval of reading in their own cells is allowed." None is said at half-past eleven; on fast days a little later. Then they go to the refectory, a very large room with a long row of tables on each side. The abbot's table is laid for six; guests are entertained at it if they offer themselves, but this does not often happen. There are no table-cloths, but the tables are kept very clean. Each monk has his napkin, his mug, his knife, his wooden fork and spoon, which remain always in the same place. The repast consists of coarse brown bread, some vegetable soup made without butter or oil, a mess of carrots or lentils, two apples or pears, and a little cider. "At or about one o'clock they return to work. . . . This second period of work lasts from an hour and a half to two hours. The recall being sounded, every monk takes off his 'sabots,' puts away his tools, puts on his cowl, and goes into his cell, where he reads and meditates till Vespers, at four o'clock." At five a collation, consisting of dry bread and some fruit, with a little cider, is taken in the refectory. After collation there is a short interval in the cells; then the monks go to chapter and listen to spiritual reading till six, when Compline is said. At seven a bell rings and they go to their dormitories; they sleep on straw paillasses, and in their ordinary dress. Probably the most trying part of all the discipline is the silence, no monk being allowed to speak to his brother on any occasion. The abbot and the guest-master are the only persons in the convent who are permitted to speak to strangers.

The monks of La Trappe for the most part resisted the sophistries of Jansenism. After the suppression in 1790 an energetic monk named Dom Augustin succeeded in finding a retreat for himself and a score of his brethren in the canton Fribourg, where they occupied the monastery of Val Sainte. From this centre Trappist filiations spread into Spain, Belgium, Piedmont, England, and Ireland. Mount St. Bernard in Leicestershire and the Trappistine[1] convent of Stapehill in Dorset are their houses in England; in Ireland they have monasteries at Mount Melleray and Roscrea. (Hélyot.) In 1805 some monks from Clairvaux came to the U. S., but did not remain, going hence to Tracadie, Nova Scotia. In 1848 a colony came from Mt. Melleray Abbey in Ireland, and founded the Abbey of La Trappe at Gethsemani, Kentucky, and still later New Melleray Abbey, 12 miles from Dubuque, Iowa, was established.

TRENT, COUNCIL OF. The general councils of the fifteenth century succeeded on the whole in one of the principal objects for which they were convened, that of restoring or maintaining the unity of Christendom. At Constance the great schism was closed; at Basle the difficulty with the Hussites was arranged; at Ferrara-Florence East and West were momentarily reunited. [See CONSTANCE, BASLE, COUNCILS OF.] Hence it was natural, that when religious dissension and disturbance broke out in the sixteenth century, a general council should be confidently looked to as the remedy. And yet, as Pallavicini remarks,[1] the remembrance that the Nicene Council did not put down Arianism, nor that of Chalcedon Eutychianism, with other like instances, might have served to moderate expectation and check disappointment, if it should prove that the great Œcumenical Council of the sixteenth century, though inferior in no respect to any, even the very greatest of its predecessors, nevertheless, far from suppressing Protestantism, ushered in a long period of strife between Catholics and the various heterodox bodies in every land—a strife of which the end appears to be still distant.

When Leo X. by the bull "Exsurge Domine" (1520) condemned the doctrine of Luther, the latter appealed from the judgment of the Pope to that of a general council. The Diet of Spires (1529) insisted on the convocation of a council, and the Recess of Augsburg (1530), while forbidding religious innovation, promised that the case of the reforming party should be laid before the council, which the Emperor would induce the Pope to convene. With most of the Protestant leaders this appeal was merely a device of controversy. Luther wrote to Melanchthon: "We must admit the council in this sense, that our doctrine is true apart from the council, that the angels in heaven can change no part of it, and that the angel who should attempt to do so ought to be put under anathema and excommunicated; much more then is it inadmissible that theEmperor, the bishops, or the Pope should judge of it."[2]

During the troubled pontificate of Clement VII. (1523–1534) it was impossible to hold the council; but Paul III. (Farnese) from the time that he was elected Pope bent all his energies to this end. He issued letters to the bishops and the sovereigns in 1537, proposing Mantua as the place of meeting. Various difficulties arose, especially on the part of the Protestants; and after long negotiation it was agreed between Charles V. and the Pope that the place of meeting should be Trent, the ancient Tridentum, an imperial and episcopal city on the Adige, where Italy borders upon Germany, so that the Protestants could not say that the council, being held in an Italian city, would of necessity be unduly influenced by the Pope. The Papal legates were at Trent in 1542, but the war which had just broken out between France and the Empire rendered any large gathering of bishops impossible. The Treaty of Crespy (1544) restored peace to Europe, and the Pope immediately announced his intention of holding the Council. The Emperor gave his consent, and his brother Ferdinand, meeting the German Protestant Princes at the Diet of Worms (May 1545), endeavoured to induce them to accede to the general desire of Christendom. But they pleaded that the Pope, by whom the Council was convened, and who would preside in it through his legates, had already pronounced against them, so that they would only go to Trent to hear their own condemnation pronounced. Yet how could they expect that the Pope and the Catholics would leave the authority of the see of Peter an open question? To do so would have been tantamount to admitting that the Protestants had been justified in separating themselves from the unity of the Church. It was therefore clear from the first that no considerable body of Protestants would submit to the council; still the Pope hoped, and with good reason, that the firmer definition of Catholic doctrine, and the reform of discipline, which might be expected from the deliberations of the synod, would strengthen the position of all the Catholic rulers of states, and help them to arrest or undo innovation, whereever the mischief had not grown to an incurable height.

The first session was held on December 13, 1545. The Pope was represented by three legates, the Cardinals Del Monte (afterwards Julius III.), Cervino, and Reginald Pole. There were present four archbishops, twenty-two bishops, five generals of orders, and envoys from the Emperor and the King of the Romans. The Prince-Bishop of Trent named Count Sigismund von Arco guardian of the council; its secretary was the able Angelo Massarelli. Cardinal del Monte, addressing the assembly, said: "Is it your will, for the praise and glory of the undivided Trinity, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, for the increase and exaltation of the faith and religion of Christ, for the extirpation of heresies, the peace and union of the Church, the reformation of the Christian clergy and people, and the putting down and extinction of the enemies of the Christian name, to decree and declare, that the sacred General Council of Trent begins and has begun?" The Fathers answered, "Placet." The next session was fixed for January 7, 1546.

Three points of great importance were settled soon after the opening of the Council. First, that the bishops should vote, as in the ancient synods, individually, and not, as had been done at Constance, by nations. Secondly, that the work of the definition of doctrine, and that of the reformation of discipline, should be carried on simultaneously. Thirdly, that the style of the conciliar decrees should bear the impress of the Papal authority and presidency from the outset. Several bishops desired that, as at Constance, the Council should describe itself as "representing the universal Church." To this the legates would not consent, and it was determined that the style should run thus. "The sacrosanct Synod of Trent, legitimately gathered together in the Holy Ghost, the three legates of the Apostolic See therein presiding . . . decrees," &c.

In the second session the Council regulated various matters of procedure. In the third (Feb. 4, 1546), the Fathers present expressed their adhesion to the Creed of Nicæa and Constantinople, and caused it to be recited before them. New arrivals gradually added to their numbers, and at the fourth session (April 8, 1546), the important decree on Scripture and tradition, rendered signally opportune by the irrational or fanatical opinions on the subject which the Protestant press had been pouring forth for many years, was brought forward and adopted. It declared that the truth and teaching of Christ were contained "in the written word and in unwritten traditions" (in libris scriptis et sine scripto traditionibus), defined the canon of Scripture as embracing all those books, and those only, which we find in the Latin Vulgate and the Douay Bible, and ordained that the Vulgate translation should be accepted everywhere as "authentic." In the fifth session (June 17, 1546), at which nine archbishops and fifty bishops were present, the doctrine of Original Sin was defined, an important part having been taken in the previous discussions by the Jesuits Laynez and Salmeron, who had come to the Council as papal theologians. The usual method of procedure was this: the projects of decrees on doctrine or discipline, proposed by the legates, were discussed point by point in private conferences of theologians and canonists, and moulded into shape; they were then laid before general congregations, in which each bishop had the right of speaking to them in his turn, and their form was finally settled; lastly, they were adopted and promulgated in public session. After a long interval, in the course of which the disturbed state of Germany nearly led to a prorogation of the Council, the celebrated decree on Justification, prepared in numberless conferences and a long series of general congregations, was adopted at the sixth session (Jan. 13, 1547). By this decree the Lutheran errors, that man is justified by faith only, and that his justice consists in the imputation to him of the merits of Christ, were solidly confuted and demolished. It is generally agreed that the records of no former general council contain a theological statement which for completeness, depth, and solidity of view, for careful and precise expression, and for general impressiveness and cogency, surpasses this Tridentine decree. Thirty-three canons, sanctioned by anathemas, were appended to it, in the twenty-third of which the Council condemns the tenet that man can avoid all, even venial, sins throughout his life, "unless by special Divine privilege, as the Church holds concerning the Blessed Virgin," thus paving the way for the definition of the absolute sinlessness of our Lady promulgated at Rome three hundred years afterwards. The decree on reform passed at this session renewed the ancient canons requiring the residence of bishops, and enacted new rules to the same end.[1]

The doctrine of Justification having been unanimously defined, the means by which the soul receives grace, or recovers it when forfeited, presented themselves for consideration. Accordingly, in the seventh session (March 3, 1547), the prevailing errors on the doctrine of the Sacraments in general were condemned in thirteen canons; fourteen others guarded and elucidated the doctrine of Holy Baptism, three that of Confirmation. The necessity of intention on the part of the priest, at least to do what the Church does in a sacrament, was asserted in the eleventh canon, "De Sacramentis in Genere." [See SACRAMENTS.] A decree of reform in fifteen chapters was also adopted.

An epidemic now broke out at Trent: a bishop and the general of the Franciscans died of it; and the alarm was so great that ten or twelve bishops abandoned the Council and went home. The legates deemed it expedient to transfer the assembly to Bologna, and this view was adopted by the majority of the bishops; a minority, being chiefly those who were devoted to the Emperor, voted for remaining at Trent. Charles V. was strongly opposed to the removal of the Council, and regarded the alleged epidemic as a mere pretext; from that time there was no more cordiality between him and the Pope. There was much danger of a schism, for the imperial bishops would not leave Trent; but the danger was averted by the prudence of the Pope, who, though the labours in conference and congregation went steadily forward at Bologna, would allow nothing to be published while the circumstances were so critical. Sessions viii. ix. x. relate merely to this business of the translation. On September 14, 1547, in a general congregation held at Bologna, the next session, which was to have been on the following day, was postponed sine die. In the following May the Emperor published the Interim (a system of doctrine substantially Catholic, but containing several important concessions to the Protestants), which was to be observed in all the German States until the General Council had completed its work.

Paul III. died in Nov. 1549. His successor, Julius III., lost no time in recalling the bishops to Trent, and the second period of the Council commenced with the eleventh session, held on May 1, 1551, under the presidency of the legate, Card. Crescenzio. The Council was formally resumed, and the next session fixed for September 1, on which day the business was further postponed to October 11, with an intimation that the Sacrament of the Eucharist would then be treated of. In session xiii. (Oct. 11, 1551), a decree on the Blessed Sacrament of the altar in eight chapters, with eleven canons appended to it, was adopted. The orthodox and primitive belief as to the nature of the gift of his body and blood left by Jesus Christ to his Church was re-stated, and the Council (chap. iv.) adopted the term "transubstantiation," as fitly expressing the change which takes place in the elements upon consecration.

[1] Before this session it was long debated whether the residence of bishops was obligatory jure divino or jure ecclesiastico. As the obligation was the same in either case, the Pope was of opinion that the question need not be decided.

The Protestants, though their various sects, propounded doctrines of every shade on the Eucharistic gift, naturally all fell short in their definitions of the stupendous reality; and this decree has consequently furnished ever since a ready touchstone to distinguish truth and error. In England, down to the date of Catholic emancipation, no one could sit in Parliament without first signing a declaration against transubstantiation.

The Council also resolved in the thirteenth session to postpone the discussion on four points of Eucharistic doctrine,[1] on which it was understood the German Protestants desired to be heard, to January 25, 1552, and meantime to publish a safe-conduct, pledging the public faith that all persons of the German nation, of what status or rank soever, should be free to come to the Council, confer with the Fathers there, and leave it again, without molestation or interference of any kind.

In the fourteenth session (Nov. 25, 1551), the doctrine of the Sacrament of Penance and that of Extreme Unction were defined. A decree of reform was also passed in thirteen chapters.

By the middle of January, 1552, a considerable number of deputies from Protestant states and cities had come to Trent, and they were received by the Council in a general congregation on the 24th inst. Their demands, presented in writing, were found to be of an impracticable character. One was that their theologians should have an equal consultative and deliberative voice in the Council with the bishops; but to grant this would have been to revolutionise what had been the unbroken ecclesiastical practice from the time of the Apostles. A new safe-conduct, expressed in more ample terms, was read at the fifteenth session. But there was no other fruit of all these negotiations with the Protestants, except to prove the earnest desire of the Pope and the bishops to leave the breakers of Church unity without excuse.

At the fifteenth session (January 25, 1552) the business which had been announced was postponed to March 19. But before that day Maurice of Saxony had commenced his march from Thuringia, Germany was full of confusion and alarm, and at the sixteenth session (April 28, 1552) the Fathers present adopted a decree suspending the Council for two years. In May the Emperor was nearly surprised by Maurice at Innspruck; not long afterwards, disheartened and weary of life, he abdicated the throne, and retired to the monastery of San Yuste. Thus ended the second period of the Council.

Paul IV. (Caraffa), who sat in the chair of Peter between 1555 and 1559, took no step to reassemble the Council; but on the accession of Pius IV. (Medici), it was evident that the Church had received a ruler whose energy in her cause no difficulties could tire, no resistance overcome. He published a bull on November 29, 1560, convening "a sacred general and œcumenical council" to meet at Trent on Easter Day, 1561. It was not expressly said in the bull that this was a continuation of the former Council. That it should ultimately so be deemed was the firm resolution of the Pope, and in this he was altogether supported by Spanish opinion. But the King of France and the Emperor Ferdinand, fearing to exasperate their Protestant subjects, whose opinions had been condemned in the former sessions, were unwilling to consent to the present Council's being regarded as a continuation of the last; they wished it to appear that all debated questions were still open, and might be discussed de novo. Pius made two distinct efforts to interest Queen Elizabeth in the Council. Of the first we have spoken in a former article [ENGLISH CATHOLICS]; the second was made in 1561, when the Abbot Martinenghi was sent to Belgium, and application made on his behalf for leave to cross to England and lay before the Queen the Pope's entreaty that she would join the Council. The reply[1] to the application was an absolute refusal, based upon grounds some of which were flimsy enough, but such on the whole as the logic of the Anglican position required. The real drift of the document was, that England had done with the Pope, and therefore it was useless, and might be mischievous, for her rulers to confer with his emissaries on any subject whatever. Mr. Froude thinks this attitude very grand; Catholics may allow that—assuming for a moment the Protestant contention as to the Papacy to have been true—it was consistent and sagacious. But what if England, in rejecting the Papacy, was rejecting an integral part of Christianity? In that case these proceedings were no matter of gratulation, and eventually could not but lead to evil results.

But in spite of the hostility of the English Government, England was not entirely unrepresented at the Council. At some of the earlier sessions Cardinal Pole, late Bishop of Worcester, had been present; now, in 1562, Thomas Goldwell, bishop of St. Asaph, proceeding to Trent after his deprivation by Elizabeth, defined with the assembled Fathers that ancient Catholic faith which his countrymen had received more than eight hundred years before. Ireland was represented by three bishops, Thomas O'Herlaghy of Ross, Eugene O'Hart of Achonry, and Donald McCongail of Raphoe. Mary of Scotland wrote a Latin letter [1] in 1563, to the "Sacrosanct Synod of Trent," in which she referred the Fathers to her uncle, the Cardinal of Lorraine, for an explanation of her position. The Cardinal spoke on the matter at considerable length,[2] unfolding the ruinous state of religion in Scotland, and showing that the few Catholic bishops could not be spared from their task of watching over the feeble relics of Catholicity. The Council replied [3] in terms of feeling and lofty courtesy. They accepted the Queen's excuses, condoled with her on the state of her kingdom, admitted the Cardinal of Lorraine as her envoy and representative, and declared that among the princes and rulers who in those evil times had been bold in the cause of the Church of God, "assuredly the illustrious name of Mary, Queen of Scotland, would be commended to the undying remembrance of mankind."

The Council was re-opened in the seventeenth session (January 18, 1562) by the Papal legates, Cardinal Gonzaga of Mantua and four others, and immediately adjourned to February 26. On that day a decree was adopted relating to the censorship of books; a committee was appointed; ultimately the matter was referred to the Pope; and the result was seen at last in the erection of the Sacred Congregation of the Index [INDEX, &c.]. A fresh safe-conduct, addressed not to the German nation only, but to all those, whether nations or individuals, "who have not communion with us in the things which are of faith," guaranteeing their safety, and entreating them to come to Trent, was soon afterwards published.

Sessions nineteen and twenty were formal only. In the twenty-first (July 16, 1562), the four questions on Eucharistic doctrine, postponed at the thirteenth session, were dealt with. In the twenty-second (September 17, 1562), the doctrine of the sacrifice of the Mass was defined in nine chapters; things to be observed or avoided in the celebration of the same were noted; and the demand for the concession of the chalice to the laity (on which Ferdinand, pressed by his Bohemian and Hungarian subjects, and also the Duke of Bavaria, had much insisted), was referred to the judgment of the Pope.

Disciplinary questions of great difficulty and complexity, the satisfactory settlement of which required an active and patient interchange of views among the bishops and theologians of various countries, caused the next session to be deferred till July, 1563.[1] In the previous March the Cardinal of Mantua died, and was succeeded as legate by the able Cardinal Morone, under whose prudent management the remaining deliberations of the Council were swiftly and successfully carried through.

In January 1563, the Anglican bishops had met in convocation at London, and adopted a code of Thirty-nine Articles to regulate the religious belief and practice of the English people. It can hardly be doubted that these articles came to the knowledge of the Fathers of Trent, and that several statements contained in them were included among the "errores nostri temporis," against which [1] About the time of the arrival of the Cardinal of Lorraine and the French prelates (Nov. 1562), stormy discussions took place on the jurisdiction of bishops; did it come immediately from God, or from God through the Pope? The Spanish bishops generally held the former opinion. Mendoza's speech is interesting (Döllinger, ii. 98). That episcopal order was jure divino, all, he said, were agreed; on the second point, relating to jurisdiction, "my view is that we receive it from the Supreme Pontiff." Next day the Spanish Bishop of Guadix spoke vehemently on the other side; Cardinal Simoneta said he wondered at the speaker's language; there was great excitement. The Archbishop of Granada took part with the Bishop of Guadix, and protested against his being interrupted. But many bishops, with whom was the Cardinal of Lorraine, thought that at a time when the Protestants were denying the authority of bishops altogether, the point in dispute might stand over; and this view at last prevailed.

[3] Le Plat, loc. cit.

the dogmatic decree of the twenty-third session (the first held after the publication of the London symbol) was especially directed. Thus the twenty-fifth article denies "Orders" to be a "sacrament of the Gospel," and classes it among "those five commonly called sacraments," which "have grown partly of the corrupt following of the Apostles, partly are states of life allowed in the Scriptures." On the other hand, the Council defines: "If any one shall say that Orders or sacred ordination is not truly and properly a sacrament instituted by Christ the Lord . . . . let him be anathema." A similar opposition of view will come under our notice in other instances.

The decree of Reformation in eighteen chapters, adopted at the twenty-third session, contained a number of important provisions on the residence of bishops and priests, on ordinations, on the qualifications for the priesthood, and on the erection of seminaries for the training of clergy.

At the twenty-fourth session (November 11, 1563), the doctrine of Christian marriage was defined, and anathema pronounced on whoever should deny it to be truly and properly a sacrament. Here again the conciliar decree is in precise contradiction to the teaching of the Anglican bishops in their twenty-fifth article. A decree in ten chapters on the reformation of marriage was added.

In the twenty-fifth and last session (December 3 and 4, 1563), the Council adopted decrees on Purgatory, on the Invocation, Veneration, and Relics of Saints and Holy Images, and on Indulgences. The Anglican twenty-second article, by a singular choice of words, describes the doctrine of the Holy See on these various, and, in part, dissimilar subjects as "a fond thing vainly invented." The Council states what is necessary to be believed upon them all, neither confining the liberty of theologians by an over-preciseness of definition nor leaving any essential point obscure. In the section on Holy Images, reference is naturally made to the decrees of the Second Council of Nicæa against the Iconoclasts. A number of important regulations affecting the religious orders were embodied in the decree "De Regularibus et Monialibus" (on the regular clergy and nuns).

Since the commencement of the third period of the Council, the opposition of the Emperor and the King of France to the view that it was a continuation of the former Council had gradually become weaker, and now the fact of continuity was assumed without disguise, and agreed to by all. The Fathers, arrived at the termination of their labours, agreed to request the confirmation of the Council in all its three phases from the Supreme Pontiff. This confirmation was given on January 26, 1564. It was also determined that all the decrees of the Council which affected ecclesiastical discipline and modified positive law should be considered as coming into force on May 1, 1564.

Besides the ambassadors, the names of nine cardinals, three patriarchs, thirty-three archbishops, two hundred and thirty-seven bishops, eight abbots, eight generals of orders, and a hundred and fifty theologians and canonists, were inscribed on the attendance-roll of the Council, as having been present at one or more of the sessions. As regards nationality, the Italian prelates, numbering 187, constituted more than half the Council.

Among the prelates at Trent distinguished for their virtue and learning were the Cardinals del Monte, Cervini, and Seripandi, Bartholomew de Martyribus, archbishop of Braga, Paulus Jovius, bishop of Nocera, Diego Covarruvias, bishop of Segovia, Vida, bishop of Alba, and Lipomani, bishop of Modon. Among the more eminent theologians were Peter de Soto and Melchior Cano, Dominicans, Salmeron, Laynez, Le Jay, and Turriani, Jesuits, Michael Baius, Jansenius, Ramirez, Fernandez, &c., &c. The counsel of his holy nephew, St. Charles Borromeo, was a source of strength and enlightenment to Pius IV. during the whole third period of the Council.

(The voluminous literature of the Council is well given in Cardinal Hergenröther's "Handbuch der allgem. Kirchengeschichte," iii. 460. Among the most important sources are, Sforza Pallavicini,[1] "History, &c." in Italian, 1656, in Latin, Antwerp, 1673; Le Plat, "Monumenta, &c.," Louvain, 1786; Theiner, "Diary of Angelo Massarelli," 1874; Mendham, "Acta Concilii Trid." 1842; Döllinger, "Sammlung von Urkunden, &c." 1876. The histories of Raynaldus, Gieseler, Menzel, Alzog, and Rohrbacher, and the critical work of Brischar, may also be consulted. Paul Sarpi's[1] "History of the Council of Trent," first published in Italian at London in 1619, under the feigned name of Pietro Soave Polano [an anagram of "Paolo Sarpi Veneto"], translated into French by Courayer, 1736, is quite unworthy of trust.)

The martyr Edmund Campion (†1580) wrote in the following terms of the Council of Trent: "The Synod of Trent, the older it waxeth, the more it will flourish. Good God! what variety of nations! what choice of bishops of the whole world, what splendour of kings and commonwealths, what marrow of theologues, what sanctity, what weepings, what fasts, what academical flowers, what languages, what subtilties, what labour, what infinite reading, what riches of virtues and studies, did fill up that majestical sacred place!" (Quoted in Brent's English version of Sarpi's history, Lond. 1640.)

TRINITARIANS. This order was founded at Rome in 1198 by St. John of Matha, a native of Provence, and an aged French hermit, Felix of Valois, in order to redeem Christian captives out of the hands of the infidels. Affairs in the East had taken an unfortunate turn; Jerusalem had fallen into Saladin's hands, and great numbers of Christian soldiers were in captivity, which, with Mahommedans, was equivalent to slavery. The dangers of every kind which beset these unfortunates were what moved the holy founder to make a great organised effort for their relief. The order was sanctioned by Innocent III.; the rule was that of St. Austin with particular statutes; the diet was of great austerity; the habit, at least in France, was a soutane and scapular of white serge, with a red and blue cross on the right breast. The first monastery was at Cerfroy, in France; this continued to be the mother house till the French Revolution. The work was begun with great energy; John the Englishman and William the Scot, two of the earliest followers of St. John, were sent to Morocco, where they negotiated (1200) the ransom of 186 captives, and restored them to their friends. It was a fundamental rule of the order that at least one-third of its revenues should be set apart for the work of redemption. At Tunis, a short time after the success in Morocco, the saint, having redeemed 120 captives, embarked with them in a ship bound for Ostia. Some Mahommedans boarded the vessel, took away the rudder, and tore the sails to ribands; but St. John is said to have hung his cloak and those of his companions from the yard, and to have obtained by prayer such effectual aid from heaven, that the vessel was wafted after a few days into the harbour of Ostia.

The Trinitarians had at one time as many as two hundred and fifty houses. It was estimated in the seventeenth century that since its foundation the order had rescued 30,720 Christian captives.

St. John of Matha died in 1213. Five years later, the military order of Our Lady of Mercy for the redemption of captives, commonly called the Order of Mercy, was founded at Barcelona by James I., king of Arragon, and St. Peter Nolasco, with the same general object as that pursued by the Trinitarians. This order, after a time, while adhering to the rule of St. Austin which it had originally embraced, elected a priest for its superior and put off its military character. The religious belonging to it threw themselves with great ardour into the mission work in America. One of them, F. Solorzano, was confessor to Columbus and almoner of the fleet in the memorable voyage of 1492; Henryon calls him "the first apostle of the New World."[1]

At the dissolution there were eleven Trinitarian houses in England, five in Scotland,[2] and one (Adare, co. Limerick) in Ireland. Though in fact regular ca-

Pallavicini gives a list of 361 falsifications or misrepresentations of fact in his history, of which Bossuet wrote that it was the work not so much of the historian as of the open enemy of the Council.

nons, these religious were often called in England Red, or Maturin friars, from the colour of the cross on the habit, and because they had a famous house at Paris built near the chapel of St. Maturin.

A reformation made by Father Juan Baptista was approved by the Holy See in 1599, and resulted in the erection of the congregation of "Discalced Trinitarians" in Spain. Their houses, as well as those of the unreformed portion of the order, were suppressed in Spain in the reign of the late Queen, Isabella II.

TRINITY, FEAST OF. A decretal attributed to Alexander III. in the "Corpus Juris," but really of Alexander II., informs us that some churches kept this feast on the Sunday after Pentecost, others on the Sunday before Advent, while the Roman Church did not keep it at all, since every day the Trinity was praised and worshipped. Very early in the tenth century the feast was kept at Liége, in the twelfth the Abbot Rupert speaks of it as generally observed, and in 1334 John XXII. ordered its observance by the whole Church on the Sunday next after Pentecost. (Benedict XIV. "De Fest.")

TRINITY, HOLY. The mystery of the Trinity consists in this, that God being numerically and individually one, exists in three Persons, or, in other words, that the Divine essence, which is one and the same in the strictest and most absolute sense, exists in three Persons really distinct from each other, and yet each really identical with the same Divine essence. The Father is unbegotten, the Son begotten, the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father and Son. Each Person is really distinct from the other, each is the true, eternal God, and yet there is only one God. We can understand how three individual men are distinct from each other and yet possess humanity in common. The unity of the three Divine Persons is altogether different. When we speak of them as one God, we mean not only that each is God, but that each is one and the same God, and herein is the mystery, incomprehensible to any created intelligence. The word Trinity (τριὰς) first occurs in Theophilus of Antioch ("Ad. Autol." ii. 15), who wrote about 180, but the doctrine which the word expresses appears in the New, and has its roots in the Old Testament.

(A) The Doctrine in the Old Testament.—(a) Catholics, from the Fathers downwards, full of faith in the Holy Trinity, and knowing that the author of the New Testament is also the author of the Old, have naturally been prepared to find traces of the doctrine in the ancient Scriptures and have often satisfied themselves that such traces exist in cases where scholarship proves the possibility or even the correctness of another interpretation. In what follows, we have kept constantly in view the least an adversary must admit, the least which grammatical and historical considerations require us to see in any particular text.

Passages there are, quoted by the Fathers, in which God speaks of Himself in the plural. Such are Gen. i. 26, iii. 22, xi. 7; Is. vi. 8. In the first two the Fathers generally see an allusion to the Trinity, most of them do so in the third, a few only in the fourth, which is generally understood as addressed to the seraphim who are mentioned in the context (references in Petavius, "De Trin." ii. 7). Let us take the first passage from Genesis, the strongest, as Petavius thinks, among them all. "And God said, Let us make man in our image." The New Testament gives no exposition of the words. The oldest explanation is found in Philo, and adopted in the Targum of Pseudo-Jonathan, which paraphrases the words thus: "Jehovah said to the angels, ministering before Him, who were created on the second day of the creation of the world, Let us make man in our image." This view has met with the approval of some modern scholars, but there is no mention of angels in the context, and the notion of angelic agency in creation is Babylonian and Persian, but not Biblical. Another very popular view in modern times is that God uses the plural, just as kings do, as a mark of dignity (the so-called plural of majesty), but it is only late in Jewish history that such a form of speech occurs, and then it is used by Persian and Greek rulers (Esdr. iv. 18; 1 Macc. x. 19). Nor can the plural be regarded as merely indicating the way in which God summons Himself to energy, for the use of the language is against this (Gen. ii. 18; Is. xxxiii. 10). The most recent explanation is that of Dillmann (ad loc.), who thinks that God, in the solemn moment of man's creation, addresses Himself as the complex of Divine energies and powers. Akin to the arguments drawn from the above texts is that from the fact that the Hebrew word for God is plural, while it is usually construed with a singular verb. The real origin of this plural form is obscure, but anyhow Petavius most rightly refuses to see in it any allusion to a plurality of Divine Persons. The word for a human master is also often plural, and the same plural form of the word God with a singular verb is used of Dagon (Jud. xvi. 23). Lastly, under this head we may mention the "Holy, holy, holy" of Is. vi., the triple blessing in Num. vi. 24, and the apparent distinction between God and God in Gen. xix. 24: "And Jehova rained on Sodom and Gomorrhah sulphur and fire from Jehova from the heavens." The first two places may only show that three, like seven and ten, was a favourite (cf. Jer. viii. 4) and perhaps a sacred number among the Hebrews; in Gen. xix. 24, the repetition of the words "from Jehova" is perhaps merely an old and emphatic equivalent for from "Himself." Its meaning is much the same as that of the words which follow it—viz. from "the heavens," just as ἐκ Διὸς = ἐξ οὐρανοῦ.

(β) The so-called Theophanies.—God, whom no man can see and live, is represented as appearing to the Patriarchs without indication of time or mode, Gen. xii. 7, xxvi. 2, xxxv. 9, by night, xxvi. 24: "the word of Jehova" is said to have come in a vision, xv. 1. God spake to Adam (Gen. iii. 8, but it is not said that He appeared), and an angel (מַלְאָךְ "legatus," but properly "legatio"), who appears in God's name is alternately distinguished from and identified with God Himself (see, e.g., Gen. xvi. 7 seq., xviii., xxxi. 11 seq.; Jud. vi. 11 seq.; Zach. i. 19). The LXX (see Keil on Genesis, p. 128), regarded these cases as apparitions of a created angel, and it appears to us that the view is confirmed by various passages in the New Testament (e.g. Acts vii. 30; cf. Heb. ii. 2, 3; Gal. iii. 19; Acts vii. 53). In the early church Scripture was interpreted in another way, and the Fathers, down to St. Augustine's time (references in Petav. "De Trin." viii. 2), believed that "the angel of the Lord" was the Word of God, taking the form of an angel, and alleged such apparitions as a powerful argument against Jews and heretics for a distinction of Persons in God. The interpretation, however, was used by Arians to prove a difference of nature between Father and Son, the former being invisible, the latter visible. St. Augustine's view is expressed in his treatise on the Trinity, and finally prevailed. He argues that God in any Person cannot be seen corporeally, and that a creature, such as the angel who appeared to Abraham, &c., might represent any one of the three Persons. (Augustine, "De Trin." ii. 18; cf. Hieron. "In Gal. iii. 19," who regards the appearances as of created angels representing the Mediator.) This, as it seems to us, is the reasonable view, or rather, we should prefer to say that the angel represents God, quite independently of his existence in one or more Persons. At the same time, we may fairly look on such apparitions as preparing the way for a belief in the Incarnation, especially when we remember that the "angel of Jehova" is a title given to the Messias (Mal. iii. 2). Again, the angel who led the Israelites is called the angel of God's "face or presence" (Is. lxiii. 9), which has a resemblance, though a very imperfect one, to the New Testament doctrine that God is manifested in Christ. So understood, the Theophanies would have an indirect connection with the doctrine of the Trinity.

(γ) Word, Wisdom, Spirit.—The personification of God's word and wisdom in the Old Testament brings us far closer to the doctrine of the Trinity. Even in Gen. i. God is represented as creating by his spoken command, and in Ps. xxxiii. 6 the creative energy of God is summed up in a single term—viz. his word: "By the word of Jehova were the heavens made" (cf. Ps. cvii. 20, cxlvii. 15). Elsewhere we meet with another form of the same idea—viz. the wisdom of God, which is personified[1] in Job xxviii. 12 seq.; Prov. viii. ix.; Ecclus. i. 1–10, xxiv. 8; Baruch iii. 27–iv. 4. In the Alexandrian Book of Wisdom we get beyond mere personification, and a real personal existence is attributed to Wisdom (vii. 7–xi.). This Wisdom is "the effulgence of eternal light," "the image of God's goodness," the spirit in her is "intelligent, holy, only-begotten" (vii. 22). On the other hand, though the book speaks of God's "Almighty word" (xvii. 5) "leaping down from his royal throne" to take vengeance on the Egyptians, this seems to be no more than a figure of speech, and the conception of the Word of God falls into the background behind that of Wisdom. It is often difficult to decide whether the attributes ascribed to Wisdom answer most closely to those of the Λόγος in the New Testament, or to those of the Holy Ghost. On the one hand, it is through her that all things are made; on the other, she dwells in the hearts of the just. It can hardly be said that the Old Testament certainly expresses the hypostatical existence of the Holy Spirit, natural as it is for a believer in the Catholic doctrine to interpret various passages of the Old Testament in this way. The Spirit of God works in nature; it endows men with skill of various kinds (Exod. xxxi. 3–6), and particularly with moral virtues, whence it is called the Holy Spirit (Ps. li. 13); it is to rest specially on the Messias and the people of the Messianic period (Is. xi. 2 seq., xxxii. 15, xliv. 3; Ezech. xxxix. 29; Joel iii. 1, 2). There is indeed one passage in the Vulgate which expressly attributes hypostatic existence to the Spirit of God—viz. Is. xlviii. 16: "The Lord God and his Spirit have sent me" (Is. xlviii. 16: "Dominus Deus misit me et Spiritus ejus"). But in the Hebrew "Spirit" may be, and probably is, the accusative. "The Lord God hath sent me and his Spirit"—i.e. His Spirit to dwell in and guide me.

[1] It is, of course, hard to draw a clear line between poetical personification and doctrinal statement of hypostatical existence. The beautiful passage in Job, and the reflection of it in Baruch, are clear instances of the former.

(δ) In a few passages the Old Testament ascribes Divine attributes to the Messias, and this, as the Messias is sent by and is distinct from God (the Father), implies a duality of Persons in God. Some places often adduced, although their true sense and reference to our Lord are certain to us from the light of the New Testament, are scarcely conclusive in and by themselves. Thus in Ps. ii. 7, "Thou art my son, this day have I begotten thee," the sonship does not of itself imply divinity. Israel collectively was God's first-born (Exod. iv. 23), and Solomon as king of Israel was the Son of God (2 Sam. vii. 14: "I shall be to him for a Father and he shall be to me for a son,") and the "day" might well be the day of coronation, for the Hebrew Bible never speaks of a mere private individual as a child of God. Sonship belongs to the people collectively or to their representative. In Ps. cx. i., "Jehovah said to my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand," the word translated Lord (אֲדֹנָי, not אָדוֹן) is simply the common term for any lord or master (1 Sam. xxii. 12); and in 1 Chron. xxix. 23, we read, "Solomon sat on the throne of Jehovah, as king." In Ps. xlv. 7, 8, "Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever," the interpretation of the Hebrew words, on mere philological grounds, and apart from New Testament authority, is very doubtful. "Thy divine throne" is a rendering to which there is no grammatical objection, and certainly the Psalm in its natural and literal meaning seems to celebrate a royal marriage of the ordinary kind. "This is the name which they shall call him, Jehova-[is]-our-justice," says Jeremias (xxiii. 6), speaking of the Messias. Such a name does not necessarily imply divinity, and we must remember that the prophet says the city of Jerusalem will be called by the very same name. "And this is the name which they shall call her [לָהּ fem. not masc. as in Vulg.], Jehovah-[is]-our-justice." In Mic. v. 1, where the origin of Messias from Bethlehem is predicted, the Vulgate has "his going forth is from the beginning, from the days of eternity." It would be at least equally fair to translate, "from of old, from ancient days," for the word which answers to "initium" in the Vulgate is used by Micheas (vii. 20) of the oath made to the Patriarchs, in Isaias (xxiii. 7) of the Tyrian commerce, and the word translated "eternity" is used of the ruined walls of Jerusalem at the time of the exile (Is. lviii. 12). There is nothing which compels us to see more in the words than a statement that the Messiah would spring from the ancient house of David. Much more weight must be given to Is. ix. 5, 6: "A child is born to us, a son is given to us, and the princedom is on his shoulder, and they have called his name—Wonderful-Counsellor, God-the-Mighty, Father-for-ever, Prince-of-Peace." "God the mighty one," though not an absolutely certain, is still the most probable rendering (x. 21, to which Gesenius, ad loc., appeals for his rendering "Strong hero," tells quite the other way; cf., however, Ezech. xxxii. 21). The force of the phrase is quite lost in the Septuagint (where, however, it was interpolated—θεὸς ἰσχυρὸς; see Field, "Orig. Hexapl." vol. ii. p. 448), as well as in the other Greek versions (Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, Field, loc. cit.), and this may account for its not being quoted in the

New Testament. It is true that such an expression does not mean as much in the Old Testament, where the name of God is used far more freely (see, e.g., Zach. xii. 8, "the house of David will be as God," and Chron. loc. cit.), as it would in the New, though it is of course very startling and remarkable. In the Book of Daniel the language falls far short of the strength and sublimity which characterise Isaias. But the doctrine on the personality of the Messias is, as we should expect, more definite and full. The seer beholds one "like the Son of man" brought before the ancient of days, who gives him eternal dominion over the earth (Dan. vii. 13 seq.). Here, the pre-existence and superhuman personality of the Messias are clearly taught.

To sum up. Here and there the Old Testament clearly and by itself indicates portions of the doctrine, in more the New Testament helps us to discover certain or probable traces of it in the Old, while it is generally held by Catholic divines that some favoured saints of the old law had a knowledge more or less complete of the mystery.

(B) Ancient Jewish Tradition.—We have seen how the conception of the Divine Wisdom stands out in the Old Testament, while the "Word of God" is scarcely more than a metaphor, and the idea remains undeveloped. But in the Targums or Chaldee translations and paraphrases of the Old Testament the "word of Jehovah" is very prominent, and fills a definite position. The oldest of the Targums—that of Onkelos, on the Pentateuch—cannot be earlier than the latter half of the first century after Christ, and that of Jonathan, on the Prophets, belongs to about the same time. But it is admitted by all, even by scholars who put these Targums much later, that they preserve a very old exegetical and theological tradition; and this is the case to a certain extent even with those which, like that of the Pseudo-Jonathan on the Pentateuch, were compiled in the seventh century of our era or even later. In the Targums the Word of Jehovah or of God[1] appears in the main for two reasons. First, anthropomorphical expressions used in the Hebrew of God are applied in the Targums to his word. Thus for "they heard the voice of Jehova walking in the garden" (Gen. iii. 8), the Targum of Onkelos has "the voice of the word of God;" for "Jehova smelt a sweet savour, and said," &c. (Gen. viii. 21), "Jehova received his offering with favour, and said by his word;" for "God came to Balaam by night, and said," &c., "the word from before Jehova came to Balaam," &c.; and where God is said to have "repented," the Targums qualify the expression, "God repented in his word (Onk. Gen. vi. 6; Jon. 1 Sam. xv. 11). Next, the "Word" represents God, and is the instrument through which He acts in relation to the world. "I by my word made the earth" (Jon. Is. xlv. 12); "Israel is redeemed by the word of Jehova" (Jon. Is. xlvi. 17, for "Israel is saved in Jehova);" "I will place my word for thee there" (Onk. Exod. xxv. 22, instead of "I will make myself known to thee there"). We see no proof that personal existence was attributed to this "Word,"[1] and it was certainly not identified either with the "angel of the face" or with the Messias (Jon. Is. ix. 5, 6; Is. lxiii. 8, 9; Onk. Gen. xvi. 7). In later Jewish theology the "Word" falls into the background, and is replaced by the "Shechinah" (שְׁכִינָה), which denotes the presence of God among his people. It manifested itself specially in the Temple, but if ten persons pray together, if even a man and his wife live piously, the Shechinah is in their midst (Talmudical references in Levy, sub voc.). Prominent, too, is the "Mitatron" (מִיטַטְרוֹן, perhaps from μετὰ τύραννον or μετὰ θρόνον), the "angel of the presence," whose name is like that of God. (With reference to Exod. xxiii. 21: the numeral value of the letters is equal, omitting the י, to those in the name of God.)

The theology of the Word is much more complete in Philo, who was born about 20 B.C. His position differed widely from that of the Targumists. Though he knew some Hebrew, he used the LXX, not the original text, and he was deeply imbued with Greek philosophy. The notions of Heraclitus, Plato, and the Stoics, as well as of Jewish tradition, contribute to his conception of the Word. This Word, or Λόγος, is the

[1] מֵימְרָא דיי generally, דִבּוּרָא in the Jerusalem Targum (Jer. ii.) The Peshito has adopted a third Semitic word to express the Λόγος of St. John—viz. ܡܶܠܬܳܐ. It is worth noticing that this Syriac term can only mean "word," so that the authors of this early version show what sense they attached to Λόγος.

[1] Weber's references to the Targum on the Prophets in proof that the "Word" was the object of prayer are false.

"idea of ideas" ("De Migrat. Abr." tom. i. p. 452, ed. Mangey); through him the world was made ("De Monarch." lib. ii. tom. ii. p. 225); he is the image of God and the brightness which reflects his essence ("De Somn." lib. i. tom. 1, p. 656); he is God, yet distinct from the Supreme God (Θεὸς, but not ὁ Θεὸς, "De Somn." lib. i. tom. i. 655); he is also the "oldest" or "supreme angel" (πρεσβύτατον ἄγγελον, "De Confus. Ling." tom. i. p. 427); "the first-begotten Son" ("De Agricult." tom. i. p. 308); "high-priest" (ὁ ἀρχιερεὺς λόγος, "De Gigant." tom. i. p. 653). "The Λόγος of Philo," says Siegfried ("Philo von Alexandria," p. 223), "is a thesaurus of all that had been thought out in the O. T. and in Palestinian Judaism on the 'face of God,' the 'angel of Jehovah,' 'Wisdom,' the 'Word,' the 'Name,' on σοφία among the Alexandrian Jews, on the Λόγος among the Greeks." It has been asked whether the "Word" of Philo was personal, and the question has received opposite answers. The truth seems to be that Philo often and distinctly affirms the personality of the Word, but that his language on the point is not consistent with itself. His theory requires him to believe in a personal Word, for he postulates the existence of the Logos on this ground—that the Supreme God could not come into immediate contact with matter, and here, plainly, the conception of the Word as a mere attribute would not have availed. This account of the matter seems to be now generally accepted by scholars (see Soulier, "Doctrine du Logos chez Philon," where there is a complete résumé of opinions). Most certainly, near as Philo comes to the language of the fourth Gospel, he would have utterly rejected the idea of an incarnate Word. Nothing could be more opposed to his whole view of matter, and he does not even "place the Logos in connection with the Messiah" (Westcott, on St. John, p. xvii.)

(C) The Trinity in the New Testament.—The absolute unity of God was and is the great article of Israel's faith, and it is asserted with equal emphasis throughout the New Testament (Rom. xvi. 27; 1 Tim. vi. 15 seq.; John xvii. 3). If, then, the New Testament teaches the real, distinct, and divine personality of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, this comes to teaching the Catholic doctrine of the Trinity.

1. The Son or Word of God.—The first three Gospels and the Acts describe Jesus as the "Son of God," a title which primarily implies his Messianic office. Because He is the Christ, death cannot bind Him (Acts ii. 24); He is "the prince of life" (iii. 15). After his resurrection, He "receives all power in heaven and earth" (Matt. xxviii. 18). Nowhere, however, is his pre-existence, much less his eternal generation, asserted in terms, but Christ in the Synoptic Gospels certainly claims attributes which can hardly be less than divine (see, particularly, Matt. xi. 27). In the earlier Epistles of St. Paul, his pre-existence is clearly affirmed. Through Him "are all things" (1 Cor. viii. 6); He is "the image of God" (2 Cor. iv. 4); He is "the Lord" (1 Cor. xii. 3; Rom. x. 9); He is absolutely sinless (2 Cor. v. 21); He is "the Spirit" (2 Cor. iii. 17)—i.e. the Holy Spirit is his Spirit, the living principle of his working and indwelling. In Rom. ix. 5, as commonly translated, we have the strongest statement of Christ's divinity in St. Paul, and, indeed, in the N. T.: "Whose are the Fathers, and from whom is the Christ according to the flesh, who is the God over all blessed for ever. Amen." We cannot enter on a discussion of the rendering here. In any case, the text cannot be conclusively urged against an opponent. There is no reason in grammar or in the context which forbids us to translate, "God, who is over all, be blessed for ever. Amen"—a doxology suddenly introduced, but quite in St. Paul's manner (Gal. i. 5; cf. Rom. i. 25; 2 Cor. xi. 31).

In the Apocalypse we find the term "Logos" peculiar in the N. T. to the Joannic writings (xix. 13, "Word of God;" not, however, ὁ λόγος, as in the Gospel). He is the "beginning of the creation of God" (iii. 14), though this phrase seems to imply priority in dignity rather than in existence.[1] He is "Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end" (xxi. 6), the same phrase which is used (i. 11) of the "Almighty." In the Epistle to the Hebrews the "Logos" is not used as a personal name, but the ideas prominent in the Book of Wisdom recur here, are applied to Christ, and united to the doctrine of his generation as the Son of God before the world was made. Thus, Wisdom (vii. 26) is the "effulgence (ἀπαύγασμα) of eternal light," "the unstained mirror of the working of God," and "the image of his goodness;" and so (Heb. i.) the Son is the "effulgence" (ἀπαύγασμα) of God's glory, the "stamp" or expressed image of "his substance." As Wisdom is the "artificer of all things" (Sap. vii. 21), so through the Son all things were made, and He upholds all things by the "word of his power" (ῥήματι, not λόγῳ). Not only is the Son, because Son, raised above the angels, but He is addressed as God (v. 8), and the description of God's majesty (Ps. cii. 26–28) is applied to Him. Somewhat similar is the aspect which the doctrine assumes in the later Pauline Epistles, particularly in that to the Colossians, in which Christ is "the centre of the universe, of the spiritual and corporeal world" (the words are Hilgenfeld's). The Pastoral Epistles occupy themselves chiefly with discipline and morals, and supply little matter for our purpose. In Titus ii. 13—"the manifestation of the glory of the great God and [of] our Saviour, Christ Jesus"—a Unitarian could not be expected to admit that Jesus Christ is called "the great God," for the words will certainly bear the interpretation, "the manifestation of the glory of the great God and the manifestation of the glory of our Saviour," &c.—viz. at the second coming. In 1 Tim. iii. 16, ὅς, not Θεὸς, is the true reading. (So Lachmann, Tischendorf, Tregelles, Westcott and Hort. Even Scrivener—"Introduction to the Criticism of the N. T." p. 556—considers it "highly probable" that "Θεὸς of the more recent many must yield place to ὅς of the ancient few.")

The divinity and distinct existence of the Word are most clearly taught in St. John's Gospel. The Word (absolutely only in i. 1 and i. 14) existed before all time; "in the beginning," before things were made, He was. This existence was a personal one, for the Word is no mere attribute, like the reason or wisdom of God, but was πρὸς τὸν Θεὸν—i.e. in active communication with God. (For the force of πρὸς compare Marc. vi. 3, ix. 19; Matt. xiii. 56, xxvi. 55; 1 Cor. xvi. 6; Gal. i. 18, iv. 18.) As the spoken word is distinct from him who utters it, so was the Word distinct from God the Father (ὁ Θεός). Yet in nature or essence He is one with the Father—"the Word was God" (Θεός); "all things came into being through Him," and this without any exception. And the continuance of things, no less than their origin, depends on Him—"That which was made was life in Him." As He is the Word or perfect expression of God the Father's being before creation, so, after it, He is the source of all spiritual illumination (i. 9); and lastly, He "became flesh and tabernacled among us," replacing the partial revelations of the past by one which was full and perfect. He is Son as well as Word, but his sonship is different from that which is common to believers. He is Son in the strict sense, with the same nature as his Father; whence He is "the only-begotten from the Father," "the only-begotten Son" (or, perhaps, "the only-begotten God;" so Westcott and Hort, i. 14, iii. 16, 18; see also 1 John iv. 9). He and the Father "are one" (x. 30); to have seen Him is to have seen the Father (xiv. 9). All that had been previously revealed in the Bible, all the results of extra-biblical speculation in the Jewish Church, are here combined—the "Word" of the Hebrew Bible and of the Targums; the λόγος or "reason" of Philo, the creative Wisdom of Proverbs, and the Deutero-Canonical books. And the Bible, in one of its latest books, is the exposition of an idea which can be traced back to the words with which the Bible, as we have it, begins: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth, and God said, Let there be light, and there was light."

2. The Spirit of God.—On the whole, the New Testament, like the Old, speaks of the Spirit as a divine energy or power particularly in the heart of man. The Spirit rests on Christ, and is a power within Him distinct from Himself (Matt. iii. 16, xii. 28; Luc. iv. 1–14; John i. 32), having first caused his miraculous conception (Luc. i. &c.) The Spirit is imparted to Christ's disciples, the citizens of the Messianic kingdom, and is their guide. (1 Pet. i. 12; Acts ii. 4 seq., xv. 28; cf. v. 2.) This divine Spirit is clearly distinguished from the Spirit or conscience of man (Rom. viii. 16), and the authority of the Spirit is identified with that of God Himself (Matt. xii. 31; Acts v. 3, 9; 1 Cor. iii. 16; but cf. Exod. xvi. 8; 1 Thess. iv. 8.) But is a personal existence clearly attributed to the Spirit? No doubt, all through the N. T. his action is described as personal. He speaks (Marc. xiii. 11; Acts viii. 29), bears witness (Rom. viii. 16; 1 John v. 6), searches (1 Cor. ii. 10), decides (Acts xv. 28), helps and intercedes (Rom. viii. 26), apportions the gifts of grace (1 Cor. xii. 11.) Most of these places furnish no cogent proof of personality. The Spirit of God and Christ

(Gal. iv. 6) may be said to do what He operates through man; and again, we must not forget that the N. T. personifies mere attributes such as love (1 Cor. xiii. 4), and sin (Rom. vii. 11), nay, even abstract and lifeless things, such as the law (Rom. iii. 19), the water and the blood (1 John v. 8.) However, if we look well to the last passage quoted from St. Paul (1 Cor. xii. 11), we find that the Spirit is distinguished from the gifts of the Spirit, and that personal action is predicated of Him. "All these things one and the same Spirit worketh, dividing to each separately, as He [the Spirit] wills." Poetical personification would be quite out of place here, and Meyer rightly treats the words as decisive. In the fourth Gospel, however, this personal existence is stated more fully and plainly (ch. xiv.) Even the author of the article on the Trinity in Schenkel's "Dictionary of the Bible" ("Bibel-Lexicon," art. Dreieinigkeit), though he writes to show that the doctrine of the Trinity is not Biblical, admits that the hypostatical existence of the Holy Spirit is taught here. "I will ask the Father and He will give you another advocate, that He may be with you for ever, the Spirit of truth . . . . I will not leave you orphans, I will come to you" (v. 16–18). "Advocate" is the same name given in 1 John to Christ Himself, our advocate with the Father, and in each case the name is a personal one. In essence He is one with Christ, so that when He comes, Christ comes too. But He is not, as the writer just quoted thinks, represented as one in person with the glorified Christ; on the contrary, He is "another advocate."

3. Trinitarian formulæ occur throughout the N. T. books. Baptism is to be given "into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit" (Matt. xxviii. 19; cf. 1 Cor. i. 13–15, x. 2), which indicates the prevalent idea of baptism, as bringing the baptised into relation with living persons. The persons of the Trinity are further mentioned together by St. Paul (2 Cor. xiii. 13) and by St. Peter (1 Ep. i. 1–2). Considering the strict Monotheism of the N. T., such language implies the divinity, as well as the personality, of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and they are sufficient warrant for refusing to believe that N. T. writers did not know the doctrine, because they did not, like St. John, state it explicitly.

(D) The Development of the Doctrine in the Church.—1. The Scriptural doctrine of the Trinity, as a whole, is neither expanded nor reduced to system in the Apostolic Fathers. Clement of Rome follows closely the language of the Epistle to the Hebrews. Christ is the "sceptre of God's majesty" (1 Ep. 46), "the effulgence of his majesty" (36). The Logos is not used as a personal name (see 27, and cf. Heb. i. 3). The spurious but early epistle of Barnabas speaks of Christ as the Son, not of man, but of God (12). Ignatius, on the other hand, is familiar with the technical sense of Logos. Christ is God's "word proceeding from silence"[1] (Magnes. 8). He is God (Ephes. 1 and 7); He is, "God having become in flesh" "from Mary and from God, first impassible, then passible,' &c., so that his divine and human natures are distinguished. Among the earliest writers generally, "Spirit" is the term for Christ's pre-existent nature (Hermas, "Sim." ix. 1; "2 Ep. Clem." 9), and this use, which may be traced back even to the O. T. (Is. xxxi. 3: "The Egyptians are man and not God, and their horses flesh and not Spirit"), survived in writers much later than the Apostolic Fathers (Theoph. "Ad Autol." ii. 10; Tertull. "Adv. Marc." iii. 16).

Passing to the middle of the second century after Christ we find much fuller statements, and an approach to a definite theology on the three divine persons. All the Fathers between the Sub-Apostolic and Nicene age are permeated by the teaching of the fourth Gospel. Justin Martyr is the single exception, and even he is familiar with the doctrine of the Logos. All these writers recognise the divinity of the Word, and in many we meet with statements that the Son is one in substance with the Father, that He is in the Father and the Father in Him, that there are three divine Persons, each answering to the idea of God. Thus, Christ is said to be God by Justin ("Trypho." 126), by Tatian ("Orat. ad Græc." 21, p. 90), by Theophilus ("Ad Autol." ii. 22, p. 120). Justin speaks of Christ as Son, and good in the strict sense (1 Apol. 23, p. 60) as begotten like fire from fire ("Trypho." 128, p. 432), and Tatian expresses himself in like manner ("Orat. ad Græc." 5, p. 20); Tertullian ("Adv. Marc." iv. 25) asserts Christ's equality with the Father, and his unity with Him in substance ("Adv. Prax." 2).

[1] This is the correct reading, as has been shown by Bishop Lightfoot, Contemporary Review, Feb. 1875, p. 357 seq.

Athenagoras confesses the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, to be each God (Leg. 10, p. 44 seq.), their distinct personal existence and their union in power ("Leg." 24, p. 124). These early Fathers reconcile the unity of God with the Trinity of persons by their doctrine of the monarchia or priority in nature of God the Father. Just as in later theology the Father is acknowledged to be the "fountain of Godhead" (πηγη θεότητος), because the one divine essence is communicated from Him to the Son and the Spirit, so the Ante-Nicene Fathers call the Father "the God" (ὁ Θεός) or God absolutely (ὄντως Θεός), the Son only "God" (Θεὸς without the article.) This distinction is made explicitly by Clement of Alexandria ("Strom." iii. 12, p. 548; "Quis Dives," 6, p. 939), and usually observed by Justin, though in three places ("Trypho." 56, p. 184; 86, p. 300; 113, p. 180), as the text now stands, he calls Christ ὁ Θεός. Tertullian, writing in a language which has no article, makes an equivalent distinction. To him the Father is "ipse Deus," the Son "hactenus Deus, quatenus ex ipsius Dei substantia" ("Adv. Prax." 26).

2. But in two ways the teaching of many Ante-Nicene Fathers was imperfect and inconsistent with itself. First, their belief on the principatus and on the Theophanies, the mediatorial work of Christ, &c., led them to speak as if the nature of the Son were inferior to that of the Father. Justin, e.g., describes the Word as a "God under the maker of the universe," as "a God different in number from the God who made all" ("Trypho." 56, p. 184). Clement of Alexandria attributes to the Son a "nature most near to the sole Almighty" Father ("Strom." vii. 2, p. 831). The word φύσις cannot be pressed, still it is noteworthy that in the passage quoted he is exalting the Son's sanctity, which, of course, belongs to his nature in the proper sense. Tertullian ("Adv. Prax." 9) declares that the whole substance of the divinity is in the Father, a "portion" of it only in the Son; Origen, that the Son is worthy of a "secondary honour" (τιμῆς δευτερευούσης) after the God of all (c. Cels. vii. 57), that He is "different in essence" from the Father (ἕτερος κατ' οὐσίαν, "De Orat." 15), and in a passage, which can scarcely refer to Christ as man, that the Son perhaps foreknows the actions of all creatures.

Next, though in a sense the Ante-Nicene Fathers generally hold the eternity of the Logos, many of them affirm that his generation as Son happened in time. Logos may mean either reason or the Word. Now God, of course, was never without Logos or intellect, and Theophilus ("Ad Autol." ii. 10, p. 80 seq., ii. 22, p. 118) distinguishes between the Λόγος ἐνδιάθετος, the immanent reason of God, and the Λόγος προφορικός, which came forth from God, as a spoken word at the creation. This temporal generation of the Son is also held by Justin ("2 Apol." 6), Tatian ("Orat. ad Græc." 5, p. 20 seq.), Hippolyt. ("Contr. Noet." 10), the author of the "Philosophumena," (x. 32–33), Tertullian ("Adv. Prax." 5, "Adv. Hermog." 3), Novatian ("De Trin." 30), Lactant. ("Instit." ii. 9, iv. 6). On the other hand, the eternal generation of the Son was maintained by Irenæus ("Adv. Hær." iv. 20, 3), and, as Cardinal Newman thinks, by the Alexandrian school. Certainly, this is true of Clem. Al. ("Strom." vii. 1, p. 829), of Origen ("De Princip." iv. 28, i. 2, p. 2; cf. Athanas. "De Decret. Syn. Nicæn." 25), if the Latin translation of Rufinus and the quotation of Athanasius are to be trusted. Moreover, we have a clear statement of the eternity of the Son by Dionysius, bishop of Rome, in the middle of the third century (Routh, "Rell. Sacr." tom. iii. p. 375). Enough has been said in previous articles on the Arian and Sabellian heresies. Here, however, we may remark that the Catholic doctrine unites the positive elements in two opposite systems, each of which errs, not by assertion, but by denial. Catholics agree with Sabellians in holding that the Son is consubstantial with the Father, and with Arians in maintaining that He is a distinct person.

3. The full and perfect divinity of the Son and his eternal existence were defined once and for all in the Nicene Creed. True, the eternity of his Sonship was not defined, and for many years after the Council a few even of the orthodox continued to deny it. Cardinal Newman ("Tracts Theological and Historical," p. 242 seq.) shows that this was the case with St. Zeno of Verona (consecrated 362), with his contemporary Victorinus and, for a time, with St. Hilary. But shortly after the Arian Councils of Seleucia and Ariminum this inconsistent opinion died out, and it is mentioned indeed by St. Augustine, but only mentioned as a heresy. (See Newman, loc. cit.)

4. The Nicene Creed in its original form ends with the words, "and [I believe] in the Holy Spirit," and the very fact that belief in the Holy Ghost is placed on the same level with belief in the Father and the Son implies the divinity of all three. Indeed, so much is involved in the very confession of a Trinity, as St. Athanasius points out ("Ep. ad Serap." n. 2[1]). This inference, however, was not pressed home by the Council. Some even of those who were orthodox on the divinity of the Son feared to call the Holy Ghost God, partly because they doubted whether Scripture justified such use of language, partly because they feared seeming to confess three Gods (Greg. Nazianz. Orat. xxxi. n. 1, n. 13.) St. Gregory Nazianzen believed that the divinity of the Holy Ghost was to be taught gradually, with great caution, and not to all (Orat. xli. n. 6), and he defended St. Basil the Great for his prudent reserve on this point. Basil believed that the Holy Ghost was God, but did not at the time say so openly in set terms (Greg. Naz. Ep. lviii.) But it became plain that the matter could not rest here. The Semi-Arians, who thought it enough to admit the Son's likeness to the Father, but would not allow the second Person to be equal to or consubstantial with the first, were driven by the force of logic to make the Holy Ghost a creature. To them, difference in order implied difference in nature, and hence, if the second Person, because second, was only like the Father, the third, because third, could not be even like, with the same exclusive likeness which belonged to the Son. And so Macedonius admitted that "the Son was God, both in all things and in essence like the Father, but he declared that the Holy Ghost had no part in the same prerogatives, calling Him servant and minister" (Sozomen, "H. E." iv. 27). The true divinity of the third Person was asserted at a Council of Alexandria in 362, by two synods at Rome under Pope Damasus, and finally by the Council of Constantinople of 381, in a decree accepted by the whole Church.

5. One great question still remained—viz. the nature of the unity in essence between the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. The heresy of Tritheism was formally maintained by John Philoponus, a commentator on Aristotle and a Eutychian, about the year 360. As he identified hypostasis or person with individual nature, he argued that, as in Christ there is but one Person, therefore also one nature only, and that as in the Trinity there are three Persons, therefore also three individual natures. On this view the unity of essence is specific, not numerical, and the three Persons are God, only so far as three individual human beings are each man. Such a theory overthrows the unity of God, which is a primary truth of religion, and it contradicts the περιχώρησις or inhesion of one Divine Person in another, which our Lord teaches when He says that the Father is in Him, and He in the Father. Petavius discusses the history of opinion on the point with that fulness of learning, acuteness, and impartiality which are his characteristic gifts, and we can only give his conclusions here. Many Fathers in their contest with Arians, who held a specific difference, wrote as if they believed merely in a specific unity of the Divine Persons. Of this Tritheistic theory, "certain seeds," says Petavius, "may seem to have been cast in the old Fathers, not only in such as lived before Arius, but also in those who lived in the very midst of the Arian controversy" (Petav. "De Trin." lib. iv. cap. 13; see also cap. 9, and 14–16). The same Tritheistic error was revived in the West by the Abbot Joachim and condemned by the Fourth Lateran Council (cap. 2, Def. contr. Abb. Joachim) in 1215. The Council defines the distinction of the Persons from each other and the absolute identity of each with the one "individual essence" of God. Another theological principle is involved in the Lateran definition. The Council speaks of the Incarnation as effected "by the whole Trinity in common." Of course, the second Person only was incarnate, but all works exterior to the Trinity itself are effected by the three Persons. They are distinct only in virtue of their relations to each other. The Father alone generates, the Father and Son alone breathe the Holy Ghost. But all three have one single nature, and therefore one indivisible operation with respect to the outer world. We do indeed appropriate certain external actions to one of the Persons. We speak, e.g., of the Holy Ghost as the sanctifier because that work of love is attributed with special fitness to him who proceeds from the mutual love of the Father and Son. In reality the renewal of man's heart is he work of all three Persons equally. It cannot, however, be said that all three Persons are sent, because mission consists in the procession of one Person from another with the production of a temporal effect, visible or invisible ("processio cum habitudine seu connatione temporalis effectus," Suarez, "De Trin." lib. xii. De Missione). All three Persons enter a soul which loves God, but the second and third Persons alone are sent, because they come by an impulse which is one with the nature which they receive, the Son from the Father, the Holy Ghost from the Father and Son. Suarez (loc. cit.) limits mission to cases where a supernatural effect is produced, because in these only God is present in a new way, so present that He would be there even if not already there by his omnipresence.

(E) The Trinity and Natural Reason.—All Catholic theologians are agreed that the existence of the Trinity cannot be proved by reason, and although they add that the doctrine is above, but not contrary to reason, still Billuart at least ("De Trin." Procem. a. 4) admits that we cannot prove "positively and evidently" that the doctrine does not involve a contradiction. The obvious objection presents itself that we cannot believe what is absolutely unintelligible, and again it may be said that a revelation which tells us nothing of God's character brings us no closer to Him, in no way affects our own life, is not a revelation at all.

We reply, that each single proposition held by Catholics concerning the Trinity is quite intelligible, and may, therefore, be the object of real assent, little as we can understand the consistency of these propositions with each other. Further, it is easy to see that the long contest on the Godhead of the Son and the Spirit had a most important meaning. Given, that the Son was the object of worship, then unless his unity of essence with the Father had been established, Christianity, instead of perfecting the Jewish revelation, would have been a relapse into polytheism. As it was, the Trinitarian doctrine was a safeguard to the belief in the one God; it revealed an inner and eternal life of God which made all Pantheistic confusion between the life of God and the life of the world, all representations of God, as the soul of the world, a sheer impossibility. Moreover, every other article of the Christian belief is affected by the faith in the Trinity. it is one thing to regard our Lord as the most perfect of human teachers or even of creatures, quite another to adore Him as the God-man. The daily life of Christians assumed a new sanctity when they came to believe that every good impulse within them came from God the Holy Ghost, that their very bodies are his temple. Nor is it without a special significance that God proclaims Himself as the Father of individual souls, that He teaches us to address Him as our Father in heaven, just when He reveals Himself as the Father from all eternity of our Lord Jesus Christ.

TRISAGION. ("O holy God, holy and strong, holy and immortal, have mercy on us;" ἅγιος ὁ θεὸς, ἅγιος ἰσχυρὸς, ἅγιος ἀθάνατος, ἐλέησον ἡμᾶς), a brief hymn so named from the triple ascription of holiness to God. It is sung in the liturgy of Constantinople in the Mass at the little entrance—i.e. when the book of the Gospels is solemnly carried from the prothesis to the altar. It occurs more than once in the Syriac liturgy, and probably is identical with the "ajus" mentioned in the "Expositio Brevis" attributed to St. Germanus. This "ajus" was sung in the Gallican rite before the Old Testament lesson and before and after the Gospel. In our liturgy the Trisagion is said by the celebrant at the "adoration" of the Cross by the people on Good Friday. (Hammond, "Ancient Lit" p. 381.) It is also said in the ferial prayers at Prime for penitential days.

The legendary account of its origin is given by St. John of Damascus ("De Fid. Orthodox," iii. 10). He says Proclus, bishop of Constantinople in the middle of the fifth century, was leading the prayers during a tempest, when a boy was caught up into the air (συνέβη ἁρπαγῆναι) and taught the Trisagion by the angels. Towards the end of the fifth century Peter the Fuller inserted the clause, "who wast crucified for us" (Hefele, "Concil." ii. p. 568), in the interest of the Monophysite heresy, though the addition was capable of a good sense and was defended by some Catholics (Petav. "De Incarnat." v. 4). Calendius, who replaced Peter the Fuller at Antioch, added the other words "O King Christ," so as to remove the heretical taint. But the addition was generally rejected in the West, and in the East except among the Monophysites, who made it a watchword and were thence called Theopaschites. It was bitterly opposed by the monks called Acœmetæ [see the article], who, however, fell into the heresy at the opposite pole—i.e. Nestorianism. The addition was also rejected by Acacius in a σύνοδος ἐνδημοῦσα at Constantinople, A.D. 478 (Hefele, ii. p. 603), and by the Synod in Trullo (c. 81). Gregory VII. ordered the Armenians who were reunited to the Church to abandon it as an occasion of scandal, and the prohibition was repeated by Propaganda in 1635 (Benedict XIV. "De Fest." cccxxx).

TROPE, TROPASION, &c. In the Latin Church tropes were verses sung at High Mass, before or after and sometimes in the middle of the Introit. They were introduced as early at least as 1000 by the monks, but entirely removed at the revision of the Missal under Pius V. The Troperion, Troparion, Troper, &c., i.e. the book containing the tropes, is often mentioned in Church inventories, though the word seems to have been also used for Sequentialis or Book of Sequences. The Bodleian contains a fine MS. Troperium. After Kyries and hymns written on the first few pages comes the title "Incipiunt Tropi de adventu Domini Nostri Jesu Christi." Then follow the other parts of the liturgy which were sung. (Maskell, "Mon. Rit." I. p. xliii. seq.)

In the Greek Church τροπάριον is the generic name for the short hymns with which the Offices of that Church abound. (Neale, "Introduction to History of Holy Eastern Church," p. 832, note b.)

TRULLO, COUNCIL IN. The word "trullus" (τροῦλλος, τροῦλλα) is base Greek for θόλος, or dome, and the Council in Trullo takes its name from the domical hall in the imperial palace at Constantinople which was the place of meeting. It is also known as πενθέκτη, or "quinisexta," because it was regarded as a supplement to the fifth and sixth councils, which passed no disciplinary decrees. It was convoked by Justinian II. in 692, and its decrees were subscribed by the Eastern Patriarchs, and by other bishops and episcopal proxies (211 in all, but all Easterns). In some of the 102 canons on discipline which the Council passed, the enmity against Rome and the West which at last led to the schism clearly betrays itself. Thus (c. 2), 85 apostolic canons are admitted as authentic, though corrupted by heretics, whereas Rome only accepted 50; and in a long list of canonical authorities there is no reference to Papal decrees or to any Western council except Sardica, and a synod of Cyprian, the latter being evidently mentioned only out of opposition to Rome. In canon 13, priests and deacons are allowed to continue in the married state, and the rule of Rome is contrasted with that of the Apostolic canons. Canon 55 strictly forbids the Roman custom of fasting on the Saturdays of Lent; can. 36 renews in defiance of Rome the 28th canon of Chalcedon on the patriarchal rank of Constantinople;[1] canon 67 condemns the eating of blood, permitted long before in the West, as unscriptural. Pope Sergius I. naturally refused to accept these decrees, and an insurrection prevented Justinian from forcing him to subscribe them. John VIII. accepted the Trullan canons, so far as they are consistent with sound morals and "earlier canons and decrees" of the Popes. Hadrian I. looked on the Council in Trullo as a continuation of the Sixth General Council, and accepted the canons "which were promulgated lawfully and by Divine help" in the first six councils, including that in Trullo (Mansi, xii. 982). Hefele ("Concil." iii. p. 348) takes the clause as qualifying the Papal acceptance. To the schismatic Greeks the Council in Trullo is a continuation of the sixth and therefore œcumenical.

TUNIC (tunica or tunicella). A vestment proper to sub-deacons, who are clothed in it by the bishop at ordination, and exactly like the dalmatic, except that, according to Gavantus ("Thesaur." P. 1, tit. xix.), it is rather smaller. Even this distinction is not, so far as we know, generally observed. It is also worn by bishops under the dalmatic when they pontificate. Gregory the Great (Ep. ix. 12) says one of his predecessors had given the sub-deacons linen tunics, and that some other churches had adopted this usage, but he himself had restored the old fashion, and left his sub-deacons without any special vestment. There is no notice of the tunicella in the Gregorian Sacramentary. But the first (§ 6) and the fifth (§ 1) of the Roman Ordines distinguish between a greater and less dalmatic, and the latter probably is our tunicle. Amalarius expressly marks ("Eccles Offic." ii. 21, 22) the difference between dalmatic and tunicle, and tells us that some bishops wore one, some the other, some, as now, both. He says the tunic was also called "subucula," and was, when worn as an episcopal vestment, purple (hyacinthina). Honorius of Autun calls the tunicle ("Gemma," i. 229) "subtile," and "tunica stricta" (i.e. narrow); Innocent III. ("De Altar. Myster." i. 39 and 55), "tunica poderes."

[1] It is to "enjoy the same privileges" as old Rome.

UBIQUITARIANS. Ubiquity, or omnipresence, is a natural property of God, and the Apollinarists and Eutychians, who confused the two natures in Christ, taught that Christ, as man, was omnipresent. Some taught that this confusion, by which divine attributes became proper to Christ as man, took place at the incarnation, others only after his death and resurrection. This theory is, of course, directly contrary to the definition of Chalcedon (Petav. "De Incarn." x. 7).

The Eutychian doctrine on the omnipresence of Christ's body was revived by Luther in his controversy with the Zwinglians. The latter denied that God Himself could cause a body to exist in more than one place at the same time; Luther, in a sermon of 1527 ("Quod Verba Stent"), and in the "Confessio Major" of 1528, replied that Christ's body was not only in heaven and in the Eucharist, but everywhere, and this of necessity. The humanity, he argued, is united to the divinity; the latter is omnipresent, therefore the former also. Again, Christ as man is at the right hand of God; God's right hand is everywhere, therefore also Christ as man (Bossuet, "Hist. des Variations," liv. ii. n. xliii.). Not only Calvinists and Zwinglians, but Melanchthon opposed this doctrine. He pointed out that it led to a confusion of the two natures, and also to a denial of that very mystery of the Real Presence which it was intended to support. Christ would not be more truly present in the Eucharist than in any piece of wood or stone (Bossuet, loc. cit. viii. n. xxxvii.). The belief in the ubiquity, however, became a mark of the Lutheran orthodoxy, and was inserted in the famous "Formula of Concord," A.D. 1577,[1] although the doctrine had been silently omitted in the Augsburg Confession, A.D. 1530 (Bossuet, ib. n. xlvi.).

UNITED GREEKS. The name includes all who follow the Greek rite and, at the same time, acknowledge the authority of the Pope—i.e. the United Melchites in the East; the Ruthenian Catholics, who use the Greek liturgy in a Slavonic version; the Greek Catholics of Italy; and the Catholics of the Greco-Roumaic rite in Hungary and Sibenbürgen. Of the Melchites and Ruthenians an account has been given already.

(1) The Greeks in Italy. — Many Greeks came thither from Albania about 1468, and the Greek settlements became more and more numerous after Soliman (1538-40) drove the Venetians from the Archipelago; after the conquest of Cyprus by Selim II. in 1571; and after 1718, when Venice lost the last remnant of her possessions in the Morea. In the eighteenth century there were about 100,000 Greeks in Italy, especially in Calabria and Sicily, and they obtained various privileges from Leo X., Paul III., and Julius III. Pius IV. withdrew these concessions in 1564, and placed them under Latin bishops, allowing them, however, to retain their rites. Their position was finally determined by the bull of Benedict XIV., "Etsi Pastoralis" (May 26, 1742). According to the rules there laid down, they have their own clergy, who may marry when in minor orders and continue in the married state after they are priests. They are forbidden, however, under pain of deposition, to contract a second marriage. They have three seminaries—viz. the Greek College of St. Athanasius at Rome, erected in 1577 by Gregory XIII.; the College at Palermo, erected in 1715; the College of S. Benedetto di Ullano, in the Calabrian diocese of Bisignano, erected by Clement XII. in 1732, and transferred to the Basilian monastery of St. Adrian in 1820. Each college has a bishop of the Greek rite residing in it, for the ordination of candidates; and those at Palermo and in the seminary of S. Benedetto have to visit the Greek churches and see that the rite is duly observed. Otherwise, the Greeks in Italy are entirely subject to the bishop of the diocese in which they live. This bishop, however, must appoint a Greek as well as a Latin vicar-general; and the Metropolitan must appoint a Greek judge, if Greek cases come to the Metropolitan court of appeal. Silbernagl estimates the number of Greeks in Italy at 30,000, of whom 25,000 are in Calabria. They have 66 churches, 144 priests. There are colonies at Ancona, Leghorn, Pianino in the diocese of Aquapendente, Naples, Villabadessa in the diocese of Atrie Penne, Barletta in the diocese of Trani, Lecce, Cargese in the Corsican diocese of Ajaccio. Further, in Calabria the diocese of Cassano has eight colonies, Rossano five, Bisignona two, Anglona four. Sicily has Greek colonies at Palermo, where there is also a Basilian monastery founded in 1609, at Monreale, Girgenti, Contessa, and Messina.

(2) Greco-Roumaic Church.—In the thirteenth century many Roumanians belonging to the Greek schismatic church found a refuge in Siebenbürgen and Hungary. In 1690 a few conversions were made, with the help of the Jesuits, by the imperial commissary Tullus Miglio, when two priors of Greek monasteries and six parish priests abjured the schism in the Jesuit church at Fünfkirchen. Nine years later, the efforts of Cardinal Kolonitsch and of the Jesuits Hevenes and Bárány were rewarded with much greater success. The Greek bishop of Siebenbürgen, Theophilus II., became Catholic; and on February 16, 1699, the diploma of union from the Emperor Leopold I. was solemnly read at the Landtag. The united Greeks of Hungary and Siebenbürgen number about 900,000, and form an ecclesiastical province. The Archbishop of Fogaras (see erected, 1721; made head of a province, 1850) is Metropolitan; his suffragans are the Bishops of Groszwardein (erected, 1776), Lugos (erected in 1850), and Szamos-Ujvar (erected about 1865). The secular priests are married. There is a clerical seminary and a small Basilian monastery at Balasfalva. [Silbernagl, "Kirchen des Orients."]

UNIVERSITY. The Museum of the Ptolemies (on which see Cardinal Newman's sketch in the "Office and Work of Universities"), the philosophic schools of Athens, the institute of Gondisapor under the Abasside Caliphs, and perhaps Cordova under the Moors, were all eminent examples of schools for the higher education, existing apart from Christianity. With regard to the matter of instruction, the universities of modern times, in which "arts" hold the chief place, stand in a direct line with the Roman imperial schools. On the other hand, their historical institution, machinery, and terminology are Christian, and are traceable to the activity of the Catholic clergy in the middle ages.

A great medical school arose at Salerno in the eleventh century, but Döllinger seems to be hardly justified in describing it as a university.[1] The first institution in Europe to deserve that name was undoubtedly the School of Paris, which passed through the stages of "High School" and "Studium Generale," and, favoured by its situation at the capital and the patronage of the bishops of the see, became, towards the end of the eleventh century, the University of Paris. That it was ecclesiastical in its origin is manifest. It grew up out of a concourse of able men, attracted to Paris partly by the encouragement and protection which they received from the authorities, partly by the intellectual sympathy which they were sure to find among an increasing body of students of mixed nationalities.[2] These men could not lecture until licensed by the Chancellor of the diocese, who thus gradually came to be considered the Chancellor of the university also. By the end of the twelfth century, instead of the Chancellor licensing any one whom he chose at his own discretion, we find the teachers in the schools recommending to him those of their pupils whom they judge fit to receive the license. By the end of the thirteenth century, the prestige and privileges of the university continually increasing, the Chancellor's right to license has disappeared; that right is now in the hands of the Faculties, and is given upon examination.

[1] P. 1; see end of art.

[2] Ordericus Vitalis speaks of Normans being sent for instruction to the "schools of France" (Paris is probably meant), though he does not distinctly name the University.—Eccl. Hist. viii. 17.

Regarded from the intellectual side, the university, when its organisation was complete, consisted of four groups of teachers and students—viz. the Faculties[1] of Arts, Theology, Jurisprudence, and Medicine. Arts had the pre-eminence; the university was always said to "have its foundation in arts;" for these were the branches of learning and science which were the development and continuation of the old Trivium and Quadrivium. The Masters of Arts, strictly speaking, were the "Universitas;" the teachers in the other faculties were long regarded as more or less outsiders. At the same time, the theological school, especially after it took into itself the study of canon law, rapidly attained to a world-wide celebrity. The professorial campaigns of the great lecturers of the twelfth century—Abelard, St. Bernard, William of Champeaux, Saint Amour, Roscelin, &c.—are the very romance of education. The Church encouraged the free play of mind, which, as such, can never be otherwise than favourable to her; at the same time, she watched carefully that no heretical teaching should mar the soundness of that foundation of Catholic faith without which neither university nor any other teaching is of much value. The Popes were lavish of privileges to the rising institute; Gregory IX. gave to the teachers (magistri, doctores) the right of scholastic legislation—i.e. of settling all that concerned the manner and time of lecturing; another Pope authorised Paris masters to open a school anywhere. So great was the fame of the theological school that, according to Thomassin,[2] several universities were erected under Papal sanction without a theological faculty, on the understanding that students who wished to proceed in that branch should go to Paris. As the Church of Rheims was esteemed a model of discipline for other Churches, so the University of Paris was regarded as the model and rule for other universities in learning. For two centuries, says Döllinger, Germany sought learning at Paris or Bologna. The efforts of a rival school set up in the abbey of Ste. Geneviève, which was outside of the jurisdiction of the see of Paris and appointed its own chancellor to license teachers, served eventually to enhance the glory of the one great university, in which the singular phenomenon of two chancellors, preserved to the end of its existence, survived as the only monument of a once formidable opposition. The degree of Bachelor (the origin of the word is doubtful) grew out of the scholastic disputations. That of Master originally depended on the license to teach given by the Chancellor. When this came to be given by the teachers themselves, it became an honour—a dignity—a degree; and many competed for it who had no intention of opening a school. A pileus or hat was conferred, as the symbol of admission inter magistros. From the circumstance that a body of masters was thus gradually formed who did not teach arose the distinction between Regentes and non-Regentes.

Thus far we have considered the University of Paris from the intellectual side. But the aggregation of large numbers of students presented an important disciplinary problem also, and to this we must devote a few words. "Outside the lecture-room the scholars fell into clans, based on community of language and manners, and technically called 'nations.'"[1] These assumed spontaneously an independent organisation. Each of the four nations at Paris—the French, the Picards, the Normans, and the English—elected a Proctor as its ruler and representative; collectively they chose a Rector, who was head of the whole "Corpus Scholarium," and in time appears as the ruler of the teaching body as well as of the "nations." The student's life outside the lecture-room was the affair partly of the Rector and Proctors, partly of the authorities of the various colleges—if he happened to belong to one of them—of the Sorbonne [SORBONNE], of Navarre, Des Dix-Huit, of St. Thomas of the Louvre, Des Bernardins, of Cluny, of Prémontré, of Bayeux, &c., &c.—which, in course of time, were founded within the university. But the Popes, "even in the fullest power of the universities,"[2] claimed to and did interfere if the interests of morality and order demanded it.

The Universities of Oxford and Cambridge were founded in imitation of that of Paris, and arose not long afterwards. The schools of Oxford began to be largely frequented in the reign of Stephen. About 1134, Robert Pullus or Pulleyn, educated at Paris, is said to have lectured on Scripture. In the conflict of jurisdiction between Henry of Blois, bishop of Winchester, the Papal Legate, and Archbishop Theodore, difficult questions of law were involved, and a general wish arose that the learning of the great Italian jurists should be made available in England. The Lombard Vacarius was summoned over, and "taught law at Oxford,"[1] about 1149. The place was central, relatively to the then distribution of the population; it was also neutral ground —a long way both from Canterbury and Winchester. The students were divided into two "nations," the Northern and the Southern English, each with its proctor; hence the discipline of Oxford is to this day in the hands of two proctors. The supreme authority in the university was the Chancellor, originally appointed by the Bishop of Lincoln, in whose diocese Oxford was situated; afterwards elected by the Masters and confirmed by the Bishop. In the thirteenth century both Oxford and Cambridge were in high repute; Paris and Bologna also were at the height of their prosperity. At Bologna, in 1262, there were 20,000 students;[2] at Oxford, in 1231, there are said (à Wood) to have been 30,000. Halls (hospitia, aulæ) presided over by masters of arts, provided the necessary accommodation. The first collegiate foundation within Oxford ("University") dates from 1249; the oldest collegiate buildings ("Merton") from about 1270. Gradually the great majority of the students were drawn within the colleges, in which discipline was more easily maintained.

Germany came into the field in the fourteenth century. Charles IV., taking Paris for his model, founded the University of Prague in 1348; that of Vienna dates from 1365. Salamanca in Spain and Coimbra in Portugal were founded in the thirteenth century. Nine universities were founded in Germany in the course of the fifteenth century, besides five already existing. In this central land, owing to the plurality of independent states, the solicitudes which beset a unified ambitious nationality, such as France or England, were absent; and it fell to Teutonic thinkers, pondering deeply on the philosophy of the matter, to develop the modern notion of a university, as a place where all sciences and all liberal arts are prosecuted and taught, with the aid of the best appliances, by the most competent persons anywhere to be found;[1] the learners being all those students, and no others, who willingly come to the professors to be taught. If to this notion the conception of the pastoral oversight of the Catholic Church be added as a postulate, nothing will be wanting to our ideal of a perfect Academe.

The Revolution destroyed the University of Paris; in its place, the first Napoleon erected the huge examining machine which he called the "University of France."

URSULINES. This teaching order was founded by St. Angela Merici, of Brescia, in 1537. Angela was born at Desenzano, on the lake of Garda, in 1470. Her life was one long endeavour after perfection: she joined the third order of St. Francis, practised the greatest austerities, made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem and Rome, and on her return settled at Brescia, where she obtained a great influence among the piously disposed of her own sex, and gradually matured the plan of a new institute. She seems to have desired a freedom of action and of movement for herself and her associates, which would not have been compatible with enclosure and solemn vows. A fervent company of seventy-three women met together in the kitchen of Angela's house, at Brescia, in 1537; the objects of their institution—nursing the sick, teaching young girls, and sanctifying their own lives—were known to them all; the rules by which Angela endeavoured to conciliate a certain community of work and worship with the routine of domestic life in the world were considered and approved; and she was elected superior—foundress she would not be called—of the "Company of St. Ursula." A young girl might join the company from twelve years and upwards; at entrance each was to express the firm resolution of living chastely in the society, without taking the vow of chastity; they were to hear Mass daily; on the first Friday in each month they were to meet in some church in the city previously fixed upon, and all receive communion; on the last Sunday of the month they were to assemble in the oratory belonging to the company to hear the rule read; their dress was to be always plain in texture, and sober in hue and make, but a costume was not at first adopted. St. Angela died in 1540. A bull of Paul III. (1544) confirmed her foundation under the title which she had given to it. The work of teaching was from the first the distinctive employment of the society; and as their success and popularity increased, the need of greater stability than was furnished by the original rule would naturally be felt. A uniform costume, with a leathern girdle, was introduced soon after the appearance of the Papal bull. St. Charles Borromeo brought the Ursulines to Milan in 1568, and favoured them in every way, advising all his suffragan bishops to introduce them in all the large towns in the North of Italy. In the Milanese alone there were eighteen Ursuline houses at the death of St. Charles. The excellent César de Bus assisted a lady of Avignon, Françoise de Bermont, to establish there a colony of Ursulines, on the original plan, in 1594. Françoise was a person of great energy; she travelled from city to city in the South of France, and planted Ursulines at Aix, Marseilles, and Lyons. She adhered to the design of St. Angela, except that, in obedience to a suggestion of César de Bus, she substituted the common life for dispersion in various homes. The conversion of the society into a religious order was chiefly the work of a French lady, Mme. de Ste.-Beuve, who built and endowed a monastery for Ursulines in the Rue St. Jacques at Paris in 1610, and obtained from Paul V., two years later, a bull, by which her foundation was subjected to the rule of St. Austin, under the invocation of St. Ursula; the nuns were to be strictly enclosed; they were to take solemn vows; and were to add a fourth, that of instructing the young. This was the commencement of the Ursuline congregation of Paris, which soon numbered forty-five houses. The followers of St. Angela who preferred still to abide by her original plan, were called "congregated" Ursulines—Ursulines congrégées; but the "religious" Ursulines, who observed enclosure and took solemn vows, appear to have better suited the prevalent mode of thought in the seventeenth century, and they were multiplied in every direction.

Several distinct congregations, each numbering many convents, were formed. Of the congregation of Paris we have spoken; that of Bordeaux was founded in 1606 by the Cardinal-Archbishop de Sourdis, with the aid of Mother Madeleine de la Croix, and approved by the Holy See in 1618; before long it had eighty-nine affiliated houses. The congregation of Dijon (1619) owed its existence to the zeal of Françoise de Xaintonge; the vows in it were simple not solemn, and a fourth vow, of perseverance in the society, was taken. The congregation of Lyons, of which the commencement was the house founded by Françoise de Bermont in 1610 for Ursulines congrégées, adopted enclosure and solemn vows in 1620. Mention is also made of a congregation of Tulle, and another of Arles, founded about the same time. The order was introduced into Canada, through the zealous exertions of Mme. de la Peltrie, in 1639. The site at Quebec which they still occupy was soon obtained for them, and till 1850 might be seen within the convent precinct a venerable ash tree, sole relic of the ancient forest, under which the first Ursulines used to teach the catechism to little Indian children. Having belonged to different congregations in Europe, the Ursulines of Quebec had for some years no determinate constitution, but in 1682 they affiliated themselves to the congregation of Paris. The services rendered by this community, during the two centuries and a half of its existence, in preserving a religious spirit among the French population and humanizing and instructing the Indians and half castes, are beyond all estimation. In the chapel of their convent may be seen the tomb of the brave Marquis de Montcalm, slain in the unequal combat on the heights of Abraham (1759), which decided the fate of Canada.

The Irish Ursulines owe their establishment at Cork in 1771 to Miss Nano Nagle, the foundress of the Presentation Order (see that article). They regard themselves as a filiation of the convent St. Jacques at Paris, because all but one of those who founded the house at Cork were trained there; that one was Mrs. Kelly, a professed nun of the Ursuline convent of Dieppe, who, accompanying her countrywomen to Cork, governed the new monastery for four years. (Hélyot.)

The earliest Ursuline settlement in North America was that of Quebec in 1639. In 1818 two American ladies from the convent at Three Rivers established Mt. St. Benedict's Convent at Boston, which, to the disgrace of that city, was burnt down by an anti-Catholic mob in 1834. The oldest Ursuline community in the U. S. is that of New Orleans, dating from 1727. In 1844 a colony from France settled at St. Martin's, Ohio, and later others at St. Louis, and Cleveland, Ohio. Numerous filiations from all these have been made.

USURY. Usury, in its wider signification, means all gain made by lending. This is a sense which usury often has in the classics, and so understood usury occurs whenever a man lends capital at interest. Now, however, usury signifies unjust gain on a loan, unjust because not justified by the loss, risk, &c., of the lender or the advantage to the borrower,[1] or because the amount of gain is exorbitant. In this latter case usury is forbidden both by the natural law and by the Bible. It is always unjust, and its wickedness is aggravated when advantage is taken of the needs of the poor to secure usurious interest. But we shall see presently that both in the Old Testament and for a long time in Christian legislation little distinction was made between the two kinds of interest. The laws of the Old Testament on the subject had a most important influence on Christian feeling, so that something must be said about the former here.

(1) Usury in the Bible.—Public loans and the humane spirit of the law in Christian nations have taught us to draw a clear line between lawful and usurious interest; but in the ancient world, as it is in the East at this day, interest was always usurious. The Egyptian contented itself with prohibiting interest which was more than cent. per cent. (Diodor. Sic. i. 79); the laws of Menu permitted an interest of 18 or even 24 per cent. (see the reference in Smith's Bible Dictionary, article Usury), and 12 per cent. is, or was till quite lately, a minimum rate in the East. Partly, no doubt, for this reason, partly because in an agricultural nation like Israel loans were only asked by those whose need put them at the creditor's mercy, partly to encourage kindness towards the poor, the Mosaic law prohibits lending at interest. The most ancient code (Exod. xxi.–xxxiii.) prohibits lending at interest (נֶשֶׁךְ) to poor Hebrews. Deut. xxiii. 20 forbids interest to be taken from Hebrews generally; Levit. xxv. 35–37 repeats the precept of Exodus, forbidding also interest in kind (תַּרְבִּית, also מַרְבִּית). Lending at interest generally is reprobated in the strongest terms in Ps. xv. 5, Prov. xxviii. 8. Nehemias, after the exile, restored the observance of the law against taking interest from Hebrews, and made the usurers restore the "hundredth part" of the money (i.e. "centesimæ usuræ," 1 per cent. a month = 12 per cent. a year; 2 Esdr. v. 11). The New Testament gives no definite rule on the subject, though of course the spirit of Christ's words, "Give to him that asketh thee" (Matt. v. 42) excludes lending at interest.

(2) Usury in the Church.—The moneylender's trade presented much the same aspect in the Roman State as in the old Eastern world. Loans were still usually made to the needy who could not protect themselves. The "usura centesima" (12 per cent.) was under the later Republic and the Empire the legal rate of interest, which was due every month (i.e. 1 per cent. a month), so that Ovid very naturally calls the Calends "swift," and Horace "sad." This accounts for the feeling of the Church on the matter down to modern times.

(a) The Fathers are unanimous in regarding all interest as usury, and, therefore, as a species of robbery. Their general opinion was that the prohibitions in the Old Testament bound Christians, and that in a more stringent form, since the taking of interest from strangers had only been tolerated among the Jews for the hardness of their hearts. Tertullian ("Adv. Marc." iv. 24, 25), Cyprian ("Testimon." iii. 48), Ambrose ("De Tobia" throughout, see especially 14 and 15), Basil (in Ps. xiv), Jerome (in cap. xviii. Ezech.), Chrysostom (in Matt. Hom. lvi. al. lvii), Augustine ("De Bapt. contr. Donat." iv. 9, in Ps. xxxvi), Theodoret (in Ps. xiv. 5), in their condemnation of interest appeal, or at least add a reference to the Old Testament.[1] Other Fathers, probably from mere accident and for the sake of brevity, omit any such appeal—e.g. Apollonius (apud Euseb. "H. E." v. 18), Commodian ("Adv. Gent. Deos," 65), Lactantius ("Inst." vi. 18), Epiphanius (in the "Exposit. Fid." at the end of the "Hær." n. 24), Augustine (Ep. 153). These passages are all explicit. Tertullian, e.g. ("fœneris sc. redundantiam quod est usura"), Ambrose ("quodcunque sorti accidit"), Jerome ("usuram appellari et superabundantiam quicquid illud est, si ab eo quod dederit, plus acceperint"), define usury as taking interest; the word Epiphanius employs is τοκολῃψία, "taking interest;" "it is unjust," says Lactantius, "to take more than one gave."

[1] I.e. the ordinary worth which money has to the borrower; for it is, of course, unjust to take advantage of the borrower's necessity in order to exact exceptional interest.

(β) Conciliar and Papal Laws.—From early times the clergy were forbidden, under penalty, to take interest. So Canon. Apost. 44, Council of Arles A.D. 314 (c. 12), of Nicæa (c. 17), Laodicea (c. 4), Leo I. (Ep. 5, "Ad Episc. Campan."), Council in Trullo (c. 10). Not that taking interest was considered by these authorities permissible in laymen; such a thing, says Leo, is lamentable in the case of any Christian, and so of course specially reprehensible in clergymen. The mediæval canon law extended the penalties to laymen. Thus the Second Lateran Council, A.D. 1139 (c. 13, lib. v. Decret. tit. 19, c. 3, cf. c. 7), condemns usurers to excommunication and deprives them of Christian burial. Clement V. in the Council of Vienna (Clem. lib. v. tit. 5, De Usuris, c. Ex gravi) declares it heresy to maintain pertinaciously that usury is no sin. It is plain from St. Thomas (2 2ndæ qu. lxxviii.) that all taking of interest was still regarded as usury. Further, Alexander III. (lib. v. Decret. tit. 19, c. 6) decides a case proposed by the Bishop of Genoa. The merchants of that city used to sell spice above the market value, agreeing to wait a stated time for payment. The Pope replies that such a contract, unless there was some doubt whether the market price might not rise or fall in the meantime, though not strictly speaking usurious,[2] was sinful

(γ) The Modern View.—It became more and more evident that commerce could not exist without a rate of interest, and reflection showed many just grounds on which a moderate rate could be exacted. Such are the risk to the lender, the loss to which he is put by the want of capital with which he might trade, the fruit which the money yields, &c. The law can remove many of the dangers of usury by fixing a legal rate, and the poor are now just the persons who would suffer most, were all interest prohibited. It was long, however, before opinion adapted itself to new circumstances. Luther consistently, and Melanchthon with some hesitation, stood where the Fathers and canonists had stood before them. (See the quotations in Herzog, art. Wucher.) Bossuet represents Calvin as the first theologian who propounded the modern distinction between interest and usury, and this seems to be true, so far at least as writing goes, though, according to Funk ("Zins und Wucher," p. 104), Eck and Hoogsträten had defended the same distinction at Bologna. Bossuet himself maintains the old doctrine as of faith ("Traité de l'Usure" in vol. xxxi. of the last edition of his works), and this though he was fully aware of the arguments on the other side. He rejects as sinful the charge of interest on the general ground that the lender could have used the capital he lends in trade, though, very inconsistently, he allows interest to be charged if the lender has foregone a particular and definite gain,[1] which he had in prospect. Benedict XIV. in his encyclical to the Italian bishops, "Vix Pervenit," A.D. 1745, condemned the doctrine that interest might be taken, merely on the ground of loan, however low the rate of interest, and although the borrower might be ever so rich and have profited by using the money in trade, though he leaves the questions about the accidental or extrinsic reasons for taking interest, the risk, loss of profit, &c., quite unsettled. Further, this Pope, according to Ballerini (loc. cit. p. 615), allowed books defending the modern view to be dedicated to him. Keen controversy on the point among Catholics had arisen during that century, and the work of the famous Scipio Maffei (1675–1755) on the laxer

[1] Clem. Al. (ii. 18 p. 473) explains the word "brother," from whom interest may not be taken, as meaning not only one of the same kin, but any one who "shares in the same doctrine."

[2] Because there was no formal loan.

[1] The older theologians—e.g. St. Thomas (at least, in his work, "De Malo") and Scotus—would not admit even this excuse for interest, if the loan was voluntary and repaid at the time agreed upon. (See Ballerini's Gury, 2nd ed. vol. i. p. 598.)

side ("dell' impiego dell danaro") had attracted great attention. In 1830 the Congregation of the Holy Office, with the approval of Pius VIII., decided that those who regarded the fact that the law fixed a certain rate of interest as in itself a sufficient reason for taking it, were "not to be disturbed." This principle is now accepted throughout the Church, though the Holy See has given no positive decision on the matter. Even the laws restraining the clergy from taking interest are entirely obsolete. Gury accepts the position tolerated in the decree of the Sacred Congregation, and argues that the State has power in certain cases to transfer the property of one subject to another. No doubt. But where is there the faintest proof that the State means to exercise this power in the case, and to transfer the interest from the pocket of the borrower to that of the lender? We may add that the Fathers, in the places quoted above, expressly deny that the State-law makes usury lawful. Ballerini, rejecting Gury's explanation, argues that the words "loan" (mutuum), &c., imply spontaneous liberality, but that interest may be taken if there has been a previous contract to that effect. It is scarcely necessary to answer that the Fathers and Schoolmen meant much more than a truism like this—viz. that a man must not require interest if he professes to lend without it. Later on, Gury (ii. p. 611) seems to give the true reason. The ancient world believed that money was barren, and the Schoolmen inherited this principle from Aristotle. Experiences proves that money, far from being barren, "produces fruit and multiplies of itself" ("fructum producit et multiplicatur per se," Gury, loc. cit.), and a man may justly take 5 per cent. for money which is well worth that to the merchant, bank, railway company, &c., who receive the loan.

(Herzog, "Encycl. für Prot. Theol." art. Wucher, gives useful citations from the Reformers. Smith and Cheetham, Funk's work "Zins und Wucher," Hefele, "Beiträge" and "Concil." vol. i., have also been used. But for exhaustive learning and clear statements of the points at issue we have seen nothing comparable to Bossuet's "Traité de l'Usure.")

V

VALDENSES, or VAUDOIS. It does not fall within the plan of the present work to give even an outline of the long and varied history of this sect; but since it exists now, and has been undoubtedly in being since the twelfth century—since, moreover, it now professes Protestant doctrine, and is regarded with the strongest favour and interest by English Protestants, who commonly believe that it can trace its origin to primitive if not even to Apostolic times—it is necessary to examine with some minuteness the nature of the evidence bearing on two questions, (1) when did it arise? (2) what kind of tenets did it originally profess?

(a) At the Council of Verona, held in 1184, Lucius III. condemned those who falsely called themselves the "humbled" or the "poor men of Lyons," with several other heretical sects. The first on the list of errors attributed to the condemned, or some of them, was that they presumed to preach in public without mission or authority from Pope or Bishop.

Writing to the Archbishop of Aix and his suffragans in 1198 (Migne, "Patrol." vol. 214), Innocent III. requests him and them to assist Rainier, the commissioner whom he is sending to Provence, in his efforts to put down the heretics in those parts, "qui Valdenses Catari et Paterini dicuntur," and by other names. This seems to be the earliest occurrence of the name in ecclesiastical history. The common characteristic of all these sects is stated to be, that they "reject the authority of the Roman Church."

Bernard, abbot of Font-Cauld, wrote a special treatise, apparently about 1200, "against the sect of the Valdenses." He says nothing as to their founder, but playing upon their name derives it "a valle densa," from the thicket of errors in which they were entangled. Disobedience to ecclesiastical authority is the first and principal fault imputed to them, but they are also charged with allowing women to preach, with a systematic desertion of the churches, and with rejecting prayers and other ministrations for the dead. (See this tract in Migne, vol. 210.)

Alanus de Insulis, a celebrated theologian, in a work which must have been written before 1202,[1] attacks heretics generally, the Valdenses, the Jews, and the "Pagans or Mahometans." In the book devoted to the Valdenses he says that they are so called "from their heresiarch, who was named Waldus, who, led by his own spirit, not sent by God, invented a new sect, so that he presumed to preach without the authority of any prelate, without divine inspiration, without science, and without learning." "They assert," he says, "that no one is bound to obey any one but God."

Conrad, elected abbot of Ursperg in 1215, when about to describe in his Chronicle the rise of the Franciscans and Dominicans, contrasts with these orders the "Poor Men of Lyons" and the "Humiliati." Both these sects, he says, arose in Italy. He thinks ("ut puto") that the founder of the Poor Men was one Bernhard, whom, attended by his followers, he had himself seen soliciting approbation for his institute at the Papal court. Bernhard alleged that they imitated the life of the Apostles, having no property or fixed abodes, and that all their peculiar practices, among others that of men and women travelling about in company, had "descended from the Apostles." But the Pope, apprehending that some of their customs were superstitious, and others inexpedient, refused to confirm them. Such is Conrad's account. It seems likely that his memory misled him, and that he confounded Bernard, the archbishop of Narbonne, an active opponent of the Vaudois in the last years of the twelfth century, with the real founder of the sect.[2]

It cannot be doubted that the "Pauperes de Lugduno" of Conrad of Ursperg and the Council of Verona are identical with the "Valdenses" of Innocent III., Alanus, and Bernard. This identity is expressly stated by Rainier Sacho, a somewhat later authority, and it became the general belief. Thus in a tract by an unknown Carthusian monk (printed by Martene),[3] written about 1440, with the title "De Religionum Origine," this sect is called "Valdensium hæresis seu pauperum de Lugduno." The early evidence all points to the rise of the sect as having taken place about thirty years before the end of the twelfth century. Their claim to great antiquity is indeed noticed by Conrad, but it seems easy of explanation. If the living authority of the Church was to be resisted, it could only be done by inducing the belief that their tenets were apostolic, "ab apostolis descendisse." The passages Acts ii. 44 and 1 Cor. iv. 11 and ix. 5 probably led to conscious imitation on the part of the Valdenses, and from such imitation to the assertion that their customs had come down from the Apostles the step was not great.

Rainier Sacho, a Dominican, who died in 1260, and in his capacity of inquisitor must have had great opportunities for obtaining exact information, gives the following account of the origin of the Vaudois.[1] Peter Valdo, a rich merchant of Lyons, about 1160, shocked and stunned by the sudden death of a friend, resolved to strip himself of his wealth, and both practise and preach an Apostolical poverty. Followers soon gathered round him, and they were variously named "Valdenses," "Pauperes de Lugduno," "Leonists" (from the city), and "Insabatati" (from the sabots or wooden sandals which they wore). Valdo caused portions of the Bible to be translated into the vulgar tongue; these he used himself in preaching, and caused others to use; and when the clergy remonstrated he paid no heed to their admonitions. A rapid development of sectarian tenets was the natural consequence of this first resistance. Rainier divides the errors of the Valdenses into three classes—against the Church and the clergy, against the sacraments, against sacramentals. Under the first head they taught that the Church of Rome was not the Church of Christ, but, rather, the harlot mentioned in the Apocalypse; that it had become corrupt in the time of Pope Sylvester, when the poison of temporalities first infected it;[2] that scarce any but themselves held the true Gospel doctrine; that the Pope is the author of all errors; that tithes ought not to be paid, and the Church should not possess property; and that all members of the Church are equal. Under the second head, they found fault with all the sacraments of the Church; as to Baptism, they said that the washing of infants was of no avail to them, and they rejected many of the ceremonies proper to the rite. Confirmation they set aside; as to the Eucharist, they held that priests in mortal sin could not consecrate, and fell into a variety of other errors which we have not space to enumerate. As to Penance, they said that a bad priest could not absolve, but that a good layman could. With regard to Marriage, they set at nought the impediments established by the Church, and acknowledged no spiritual affinity as resulting from the sacrament. They disapproved of the sacrament of Extreme Unction, because it was only given to the rich. What respect they would have for the sacrament of Holy Orders is apparent from what has been already said. All laymen, they held, were entitled to preach, and women also.[1] Whatever was not in the Scriptures they held to be fabulous. They believed in no saints but the Apostles. With regard to the third head, that of Sacramentals, they made a clean sweep of all the beautiful and touching ceremonies —all the salutary institutes—with which the Church had surrounded the life of Christians here below. No festivals, no fast-days, no holy-water, no lights, no ornaments, no incense, no images, no chanting; to hear a Valdensian ranter at uncertain times seems to have appeared to these poor sectaries the sum of all the support and delectation that the soul could possibly require. They held that it was unlawful to swear. "They condemn all princes and judges, being persuaded that it is not lawful to punish malefactors. Lastly, they condemn the ecclesiastical judgments."

Severe measures of repression were used against the Vaudois from time to time, but failed to extirpate them. A letter from a Franciscan inquisitor to the Council of Basle,[2] dated in 1432, states that although the writer had "made great executions on many heretics" within the past two years, the sect still flourished on both sides of the Alps, that he had several relapsed heretics in prison, both at Yverdun and at Briançon, and that these had revealed to him the existence of more than five hundred others. At the Reformation some of the Protestant leaders, who perceived the use that might be made in controversy of the alleged existence of a sect which had maintained a "pure" religion and resisted the authority of Rome for many centuries, made overtures to the Vaudois, and in 1530 their deputies, Masson and Morel, met Œcolampadius and Bucer at Basle. According to Dupin, these last engaged the deputies to renounce some of the more extravagant of their tenets—e.g. that a Christian might not lawfully swear, that ministers might not hold property, and that the ministrations of wicked pastors were invalid; and, on the other hand, to hold with the Protestants, that the Body of Christ was not in the Eucharist, and that confession of sins was unnecessary. But the complete adoption by the Vaudois of Protestant doctrine is said not to have taken place till about 1630.

Such is the view which authentic history presents of the rise of the Vaudois and of their original doctrines. The modern popular view, which represents them as a race of primitive manners and simple piety, dwelling in remote Alpine valleys, and clinging to a Scriptural and Protestant religion, handed down from the first ages, in the teeth of continual persecution, appears to be founded in great part on a falsification. Soon after the Reformation broke out, "their whole history, and a part of their written documents, were subjected to a process of re-casting—just as already some older writings had been re-fashioned in a Hussite sense, owing to contact with the circle of Hussite sects."[1] For particulars of this falsification ("Fälschung"), we must refer the reader to the Protestant writer just quoted, who states that no existing Vaudois MS. is of date earlier than the fifteenth century, although many were made to appear to have been written in the twelfth.

In 1655 the Duke of Savoy sent troops against the Vaudois of Angrogna and the neighbouring valleys, who were said to have spread themselves outside the limits to which they were confined by treaty. Great excesses were reported, and were denounced by the indignant Muse of Milton in the well-known sonnet beginning, "Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughtered saints." Cromwell interposed vigorously, and the Duke was obliged to grant the Vaudois favourable terms. At the present day

[1] From this account it would appear that Milman's statement, that "they rejected the seven sacraments, except Baptism and the Eucharist," which, if true, would assimilate them closely to the Anglicans, is not very accurate (Latin Christianity, v. 395).

VANNE, ST., CONGREGATION OF. [See BENEDICTINES; MAURISTS.] This congregation, of which the famous commentator Calmet was the chief literary ornament, was in a flourishing state at the outbreak of the French Revolution. Its houses were then suppressed, and it has not since been revived.

VATICAN COUNCIL. This Council met on December 8, 1869, and is not yet concluded. No general council had been held for three hundred years, and the author of the article on Trent in Herzog's "Encyclopædia," writing only about seven years before the bishops met in the Aula of the Vatican, speaks of another general council as a moral impossibility. Yet, it is easy enough to see that the events of half a century had been preparing the way for the General Council of 1869. The interference of statesmen with the freedom of the Church had turned the law (Concil. Trid. sess. xxiv. "De Reform." c. 2) which requires provincial synods to be held every three years into a dead letter. The same cause would also have proved an obstacle, and probably an insuperable one, to great assemblies of the bishops at Rome. But the revolution which stripped the Church of her wealth certainly left her freer in action. The first Provincial Synod which had been known for long, assembled at Tuam in 1817, and its decrees were confirmed at Rome. It was followed by the National Synod of Hungary, held at Pressburg in 1822. But it was from the United States that the revival of Provincial Councils really came. There were Provincial Synods of Baltimore in 1829, 1833, 1837, 1840, 1843, 1846, and 1849. Pius IX. early in his Pontificate urged the observance of the Church's law upon the bishops. Soon, no fewer than twenty provincial councils had assembled in France; Austria and Hungary followed the example in 1858 (Synods of Vienna and Grau), Holland in 1865 (Synod of Utrecht), and numerous synods were held in Germany, in England, just after the hierarchy had been restored, in Ireland, in Australia, and in South America (Quito and New Granada). Even the Catholics of the Oriental rites were affected by the movement. Syrians, Maronites, Armenians, met in council, and the last Council of the Armenians at Constantinople in 1869 deserves special notice. In Italy, on the other hand, political troubles made the number of provincial councils very small. Nor was this revival of synodical action the only preparation for a general council. Pius IX. had three times seen a vast number of bishops gathered round him—viz. at the definition of the Immaculate Conception, at the canonisation of the Japanese martyrs, on the eighteenth centenary of the martyrdom of St. Peter and St. Paul. Since the Second Lateran Council of 1139, Rome had never witnessed such an assembly of bishops as this last one. Nor was it simply the fact of these unions which led the way to the General Council in the Vatican. It is evident now that the chief definition of this Council—viz. that of the Papal Infallibility, came as the result of forces which had been long at work. The French universities had disappeared in the storms of the Revolution, and Gallican principles were dying out in France itself. In Italy, Spain, and Portugal, where, owing to the influence of the Governments, Gallicanism had found, even late in the last century, such representatives as Tamburini, Bishop Solari, Fontani, Palmieri, Degola, Bishop Clement of Barcelona, &c., it was now wholly extinct. Many of the provincial councils and the bishops in their assemblies at Rome had held language which showed that a proposal to define the Pope's infallibility would meet with no opposition among the majority. With the German Catholics it was otherwise. There many of the clergy were still educated at "mixed" universities—many of the Catholic professors had already manifested their distrust of the "Roman" theology, and some of them had come into collision with the Roman Congregations. They clung, in the supposed interests of science, to methods different from those which prevailed at Rome. And even in France there was a party, small in numbers, but strong in talent and character, which was attached to liberal principles in politics and distrustful of Roman interference in such matters. They had fought the Church's battle for freedom of instruction, and they were unwilling to admit that the appeal they had made to the principles of freedom and toleration was after all only an argumentum ad hominem. Ultramontanism then prevailed throughout the Church, but it was opposed by a small band of Catholic "liberals" in France, and by a number of learned men in Germany. The former advocated the interests of freedom, as they understood it; the latter, those of philosophy, history, and theology, as they understood them. There were, besides, Catholic statesmen in both countries who saw danger to the State in a definition of Papal infallibility.

Pius IX. first imparted his idea of convoking a General Council to the cardinals of the Congregation of Rites in December 1864; and shortly afterwards he consulted all the cardinals who resided in Rome on the matter. They were requested to submit to the Pope their opinions, in writing, on the opportuneness of such a convocation, and the subjects which, supposing the Council opportune, ought to be discussed. Nineteen advised the convocation, two were against it, one was doubtful. In March 1865, five cardinals (Patrizi, Reisach, Panebianco, Bizarri, Caterini) were appointed to consider the votes sent in, and these, with the addition of some other cardinals and of consultors, were formed into a Congregation of Direction (Cecconi, "Storia del Concil. Vatic." lib. i. cap. 1). In April and May a circular was addressed to thirty-six bishops, begging their opinion on the subjects to be treated (ib. Doc. iii.), and letters were also addressed to the Nuncios at the various Courts, asking them to find theologians fit to act as consultors in the preliminary congregations (ib. Doc. iv.). Next year, in February and March, certain Oriental bishops and bishops of the Greek rite in the Austrian Empire, were also consulted (ib. Doc. vi. and vii.). All these consultations were made in the strictest confidence. On June 4, 1867,[1] Cardinal Caterini wrote to all the bishops present for the centenary of the martyrdom of St. Peter and St. Paul. He added a list of seventeen questions on points of discipline, and invited suggestions on other matters (ib. Doc. ix.).

[1] So Schneemann, Kanonen und Beschlüsse des Vatikan. Concils, Einleit. p. xv. The date in Cecconi—viz. June 6, 1866—must be a slip.

At last, in the same month, the Pope announced in a public Consistory of some 500 bishops his intention of convoking the Council (ib. Doc. x.), and by a bull of June 29, 1869 (ib. Doc. xxxvi.), the Council was summoned to meet at Rome on December 8, 1869. Meantime, in September of the previous year, "all bishops of the churches of Oriental rite not in communion with the Apostolic See" (ib. Doc. xxxvii.), and all "Protestants and non-Catholics" (ib. Doc. xxxviii.), were invited to attend. There was some thought of addressing a similar invitation to the Jansenist bishops in Holland, but it was resolved not to do so (ib. vol. i. p. 119 seq.). It was intended that these Oriental bishops should be allowed no part in the Council till they professed the Catholic Roman faith whole and entire; and it was explained in a letter to Archbishop, now Cardinal, Manning that the Protestants were only invited to attend that they might be referred to "experienced men," and have their difficulties solved. No effect followed from these letters to Orientals and Protestants, except a few protests (Friedrich, "Geschichte des Vatikan Concils," i. p. 723 seq.). Besides the Commission of General Direction, mentioned already, the Pope nominated six special commissions—for Ceremonial, the Relations of Church and State, the Churches and Missions of the East, the Religious Orders, Dogmatic Theology and Discipline. Each consisted of a cardinal president, and of consultors from all parts of the world. Vercellone, Theiner, Tarquini, Franzelin, Schrader, Perrone, Gibert, Freppel, Hefele, Haneberg, Hergenröther, Alzog, Molitor, Moufang, Hetlinger, Feijje, were among the consultors. Dr. (now Cardinal) Newman was asked to be a consultor, but declined on account of bad health. It was the duty of these special congregations to prepare "schemata"—i.e. draughts of canons and decrees for the consideration of the Fathers. Their members were bound to absolute secrecy.

Till the Council met nothing was said by any one in authority of any intention to define Papal infallibility. But attention was roused by statements in the French correspondence of the "Civiltà," February 6, 1869 (reprinted in Cecconi, Doc. cxl.). In this Jesuit organ, published at Rome, and believed by many to possess very high authority in the Roman Court, it was stated that the Council would probably set its seal to the condemnations of the Syllabus; that the bishops would define the Pope's infallibility by acclamation, and that the corporal assumption of the Blessed Virgin into heaven would be made an article of faith. This was the occasion soon after of the famous articles in the Augsburg "Allgemeine Zeitung," which afterwards appeared in the form of a book entitled "Janus." It professed to be written from a Catholic point of view, but was in reality a bitter attack on the Papacy. In April 1869 Prince Hohenlohe, Foreign Minister in Bavaria, sent a circular to the European Governments warning them of the political dangers which the Council might cause (Friedrich, ib. i. p. 774), and in September a large majority of the German bishops assembled at Fulda laid before Pius IX. their fears as to the consequences in Germany should Papal infallibility be defined. This document was undoubtedly despatched to the Pope, but Cecconi, after laborious search, could not find it in the Roman archives (Cecconi, part i. vol. ii. sect. i. p. 479).

The time of convocation was drawing near, and Pius IX. in a brief "Multiplices inter," November 27, 1869 (ib. Doc. lii), arranged the order of business at the Council. The preparatory commissions had done their work, and were to be replaced by new ones. The Pope appointed five cardinal-presidents; viz. Reisach (who died shortly afterwards and was replaced by De Angelis), De Luca, Bizzari, Bilio, Capalti, a secretary—viz. Bishop Fessler of St. Pölten, and a deputation of members of the Council, who were to examine proposals made by the bishops. Four other deputations for Dogma, Discipline, Religious Orders and Oriental Rites, were to be chosen by the Fathers of the Council, but each was to be placed under a cardinal-president nominated by the Pope himself. The schemata drawn up by the preparatory commissions were to be printed and distributed to the Fathers. The bishops might send proposals to be examined by the directive deputation. These new schemata or proposals, if approved by it, were also to be printed and circulated among the bishops some days before the discussion on them began. Bishops who wished to speak on any subject must notify their intention at least a day before. They were to do so in order of rank, and, after they had ended, others might obtain leave to speak from the presidents. If there was no prospect of agreement, schemata, according to their subject-matter, were to be referred to the special commissions for revisal, and then voted upon in general congregation. Finally, the canon or decree was to be read in the Pope's name in solemn session, the Fathers were to answer "Placet" or "Non placet;" the Pope was to announce the result, and, in case of acceptance by the Council, to confirm its decision by Apostolic authority. The Council opened on December 8, 1869. There were 719 members present, and by March of the following year as many as 764. Of these 120 were archbishops or bishops in partibus infidelium, now called titular prelates, and 52 were abbots, generals of orders, &c. (From the lists in Schneemann.)

Much time was spent in discussions on discipline, the preparation of a Short Catechism, &c., which have issued as yet in no definite result. The work actually finished consists of two Constitutions—one, "De Fide Catholica," made up of chapters and canons on the primary truths of natural religion, on revelation, on faith, and the connection between faith and reason; the other "De Ecclesia Christi," treating chiefly of the primacy of the Roman See, and defining the Pope's immediate authority over all Christians. The former constitution passed with comparatively little difficulty. It was unanimously accepted by the 667 Fathers present, and confirmed by the Pope in the third public session, April 24, 1870.

Very different was the fate of the second constitution. We have seen that nothing had been said, at least publicly and by authority, before the Council met, of any intention to define the Pope's infallibility, and Cecconi (lib. i. cap. i.) assures us that of the cardinals first consulted by the Pope—i.e. in 1864—two only even mentioned the subject. Scarcely, however, had the Council met when a "postulatum" representing the views of the great majority of the Fathers begged that the question should be proposed for decision. On the other hand, in January 1870, forty-five German and Austrian bishops, thirty-two French, joined by three Portuguese and four Orientals, twenty-seven from nations of English speech, seventeen Orientals, seven Italians, begged the Pope to prevent the discussion. (Original texts in Friedrich, "Documenta ad Illustrandum Concil. Vatic." Abth. i. pp. 450, 251, 254, 256.) At the same time, outside the Council, a protest was made by Dr. Döllinger as well as by the French Minister Daru and the Austrian von Beust, supported by the Bavarian, Portuguese, Prussian and English Cabinets. Archbishops Dechamps of Malines, Manning of Westminster, Spalding of Baltimore, and Bishop Martin of Paderborn, were prominent on the side of the majority; while the learned Hefele, who was promoted to the bishopric of Rottenburg in November 1869, Strossmayer, bishop of Diakovar in Slavonia, Cardinal Rauscher, archbishop of Vienna, Darboy, archbishop of Paris, Dupanloup, bishop of Orleans, Maret, bishop in partibus, Kenrick, archbishop of St. Louis in the United States, Clifford, bishop of Clifton, were strenuous supporters of the opposition.

New complications arose from a document issued by the cardinal-presidents at the wish of the Pope on February 20, 1870. Complaints were made of the way in which the discussions were protracted, and accordingly new arrangements were devised. In the discussion on any amended schema no one was to take part without giving notice beforehand of that particular portion of the said schema on which he meant to address the Council. Further, at the request of any ten Fathers, the presidents might ask the Council if they desired the discussion to proceed, and if a majority said no, they might close it there and then. This led more than a hundred prelates to protest, in a document addressed to the presidents, that by these regulations "the freedom of the Council might seem in several respects to be impaired, nay, destroyed" ("minui imo tolli posse videatur"). They implored that nothing should be defined except with the moral unanimity of the Fathers, and appealed to the example of Pius IV. at the Council of Trent. Otherwise they feared that "the character of the Œcumenical Council might be exposed to doubt ("œcumenici concilii character in dubium vocari possit." Text in Friedrich, Abth. i. p. 258 seq.) It must be remembered, however, that the whole discussion was extended over seven weeks. The points at issue must have been perfectly familiar to those with whom the decision lay, and the majority could not be expected to tolerate a protracted discussion which had no real influence on opinion, and only served to impede definition.

Early in May the schema "De Ecclesia," with the added clauses on Papal infallibility, was laid before the Council, and the conciliar discussion upon it began. On July 13, it was voted upon in general congregation; of the Fathers present 451 said "Placet," sixty-two "Placet juxta modum"—i.e. they were ready to accept the Constitution with modifications, but not as it stood; eighty-eight said "Non placet," seventy did not vote at all. In the last general congregation the Fathers protested against the calumnies of the press, especially against the report that the Council was not free. In a letter to the Pope fifty-five bishops declared that their mind was unaltered, but that they meant to absent themselves from the public session. This was held on July 18. The bull "Pastor Æternus," containing the Constitution "De Ecclesia" and the definition of Papal infallibility, was read. Thereupon 535 answered "Placet," the two others—viz. Bishop Riccio of Ajaccio and Bishop Fitzgerald of Little Rock—"Non placet." The Pope then confirmed the decree by Apostolic authority. On that same day Napoleon III. declared war against Prussia. On September 20 the Italians possessed themselves of Rome, and by a brief of October 20 the Pope prorogued the Council. It has never been reassembled.

In the articles on FAITH and on the POPE, we have said something on the meaning of the Vatican decrees, and in that on OLD CATHOLICS we have spoken of the opposition made to them. No single bishop refused assent, and for that and other reasons a schism of any considerable magnitude was impossible.

(The histories of the Council by Cecconi and Friedrich resemble in more points than one those of the Tridentine Council by Pallavicino and Sarpi, with this notable difference that Sarpi wrote before Pallavicino, while Friedrich takes care to write after Cecconi, and to use his materials. Neither historian has reached the actual assembly of the Council. Cecconi has access to the Vatican archives, so that his work [first part published 1873] will always be indispensable. But it has already exceeded 3,000 pages large octavo; it is filled with much irrelevant matter, is badly written and badly arranged. Friedrich's first volume [1877] is well arranged and interesting, and does not, so far as we can test it, alter the facts; but it is disfigured by a vehement invective against the Roman Court and Ultramontanism in general. For the actual history of the Council Friedrich's collection of documents [1871] was useful but incomplete, and has been replaced by the fuller collections of Bishop Martin [1873] and the Protestant Friedberg [1871]. The Jesuit Father Schneeman [1871] has prefixed a short history of the Council to his edition of its decrees, and there is another brief history by the learned Protestant Frommann [1872].)

VEIL (velum, a covering). Pagan customs in regard to the use of the veil cannot here be considered, but we shall endeavour to give some account of the various kinds of veil recognised in the Catholic ritual for covering either things or persons. Three Eucharistic veils were in use in the ancient Eastern Church, the paten veil for covering the bread before consecration, the chalice veil, and a very thin transparent veil for covering both paten and chalice. The offertory veil (offertorium) was used, according to the ritual of the Church of Sarum,[1] in various parts of the ceremonial of High Mass. It seems to be the same as the superhumeral veil with which the sub-deacon now covers the chalice at High Mass, and which is also used at Benediction [BENEDICTION OF THE BLESSED SACRAMENT]. Magri (quoted in Morone), says that in Spanish churches from the first day of Lent a veil is drawn before the high altar while the hours are recited, and during Mass on feriæ; it is withdrawn at the Gospel and the elevation of the host. On Wednesday in Holy Week, when in the "Passion" the words occur "et velum templi scissum est," the veil is withdrawn and no more used.

The nuptial veil or flammeum, as is well known, was in use among the Romans. St. Ambrose speaks of a veil (pallium) stretched over the heads of the bride and bridegroom during the celebration of marriage, with a mystical significance.[2] The priest officiates with veiled head in several Oriental rites—Coptic, of St. Anthony, Abyssinian, Maronite.

In Maskell's "Monumenta Ritualia" is printed a form[3] for the "Order of Consecration of Nuns" according to the use of Sarum, from which we shall extract what relates to the ritual of the veil. On the day of profession, the novices, clad in white, each bearing on the right arm the "habite that the relygyon and profesyon requireth, wyth the veyle, ryng, and scroll of hir profesyon attached upon the sayd habite, and in hir left hande beryng a taper wythoute lyght," go in procession from the place where they were arrayed towards the western door of the choir, with looks bent on the ground, singing the respond "Audivi vocem, &c." Passing through the choir and going up to the altar, they lay their veils, rings, and scrolls on the right end of it. They then make the vow of chastity, and after receiving the habit from the bishop return whence they came. After the Credo the virgins return to the western door of the choir, bearing lighted tapers in their right hands. The rite proceeds; after the Litanies each makes her profession before the bishop and abbess, and signs her scroll of profession with a cross. After the psalm "Domine, quis habitabit," during which the virgins prostrate themselves, they rise and go with the bishop to the right end of the altar, and taking their veils therefrom, hold them in their hands, with their faces turned towards the bishop. He, standing in his place, blesses the veils in the virgins' hands, "with orysons." The first of these prayers is, "We suppliantly beseech Thee, O Lord, that in Thy clemency a blessing may come down upon these veils which are about to be placed on the heads of Thy handmaidens, so that they may be blessed, and consecrated, and spotless, and holy for these Thy handmaidens. Through." The second, "O God, Creator of things visible and invisible, be mercifully present with us, and vouchsafe to bless and sanctify with the streams of Thy grace these veils which are the type of holiness and the sign of humility; may Thy servants deserve through Thy gift to take and hallow them in heart and body. Through." Every virgin, before the bishop puts the veil upon her head, kisses his hand. Being veiled, she sings, "The Lord hath clothed me with a garment[1] woven of gold, and with immense jewels hath he adorned me." The ritual of the ring succeeds, followed by the "long benediction," during which the virgins lie prostrate. Before their "houselling" the bishop draws down their veils over their eyes. After their communion each gives up her taper to the bishop, after kissing his hand, and he gives to them all his benediction. Then the abbess pulls their veils down beneath their chins, and so they remain for three days. On the third day, after they have communicated, the abbess lifts up their veils, and from that time "they shall were and goo and cumme as other of the convent doth." (Morone, "Dizion. VESTMENTS. (1) Their Distinctive Character.—It was the common belief in the middle ages that the vestments used by the Church at Mass and other services were derived from the Jewish temple, though Walafrid Strabo had a better notion of the historical aspect of the question, and affirmed ("De Reb. Eccles." c. 24) that Christian priests in the early ages officiated in the common dress of daily life. Strabo's view (with a modification to be mentioned presently) is confirmed, to use the words of Dr. Rock, "by the concurrent testimony of writers who have bestowed much laborious research upon the investigation of this subject" ("Hierurgia," p. 414). No quotation can be adduced from any author of the first five centuries which so much as alludes to any difference in form between the dress of priests at the altar and of laymen in common life. True, St. John (Polycrat. apud Euseb. "H. E." iii. 31, v. 24; Hieron. "Vir. Illustr." 45) and St. James (Epiphan. "Hær." lxxviii. 14) are said to have worn the "shining plate" (πέταλον, lamina = ציץ) of the Jewish high priest; but even were we prepared to accept these testimonies as literal statements of fact, they would not affect the question, for no such ornament has ever found a place in the Church, and the mitre, which comes nearest to this "plate," was unknown, as has been already proved, for centuries after the Apostolic age. But the strongest proof will be found in the articles on the particular vestments. There it has been shown that the ecclesical vestments had their origin in the ordinary dress of the Roman empire.[1] It was after the fall of the empire that the fashion in ordinary attire underwent a revolution, and the garb once common to all became peculiar to the servants of the altars, till at last the very memory of its original use was obscured. This obscuration was, as we should expect, gradual. Walafrid Strabo, as we have said, in the ninth century understood the true state of the case, and another writer of the same age —viz. Anastasius ("In Vit. S. Stephani," cf. Baron. "Annal." ad ann. 260, n. 6)— was not wholly ignorant of it, for he says of Pope Stephen: "He ordained that priests and Levites should not use the consecrated vestments in common life, but only in the Church."

Long, however, before the ecclesiastical vestments were distinguished by their form from those in common use certain garments were reserved for the officiating clergy, and, though these were identical in form with the ordinary garb, they were often no doubt of costlier material. The Apostolic Constitutions (viii. 12) describe the bishop as clothed in a "shining vestment" (λαμπρὰν ἐσθῆτα μετενδὺς), and we may perhaps take this as evidence for the practice at the end of the fourth or beginning of the fifth century. A little earlier Jerome ("In Ezech." xliv. 17), speaking of the vestments of the Jewish priests, adds: "Thence we learn that we should not enter the holy of holies with common attire or in any sort of dirty dress, such as will do for daily life, but that we should with clean conscience and in clean attire handle the mysteries of the Lord." It is not easy to decide how far this passage is to be taken literally.[1] Anyhow, we learn from Theodoret ("H. E." ii. 23) that Constantine gave Macarius, bishop of Jerusalem, "a sacred dress" (ἱερὰν στολὴν) "of gold thread"—i.e. a dress of the common form but of very costly material and intended exclusively for use in church. It is very uncertain when the blessing of ecclesiastical vestments was introduced, but we find a form for that purpose, very like the one now used, in the Gregorian Sacramentary. (See the reprint in Migne, "Patrol." lxxviii. p.

[1] The alb and girdle, which are really most like Jewish vestments, had a purely secular origin; and the alb is first marked as a Church dress by enactments which forbid clerics to use the same alb in common life and in church. Jerome (Ep. 64) gives Fabiola an elaborate account of the Jewish vestments, but never alludes to the use of analogous vestments in church.

[1] It is clear, however, from the passage quoted further on in this article, that Jerome was familiar with the use of special vestments by the clergy in church.

157.) The Council of Poitiers, A.D. 1100, can. 4 (Mansi, xx. 1123) forbids any one not a bishop to give this blessing, and Innocent III. ("Altar Myst." i. 9) lays down the same rule. It is still in force, though bishops constantly delegate the power to simple priests.

At first the vestments were of one colour—viz. white. Thus, when Pelagius alleged that all splendour in dress was irreligious, Jerome ("Adv. Pelag." i. n. 29) charges him with exaggeration, and asks what harm there was in wearing "a tunic particularly clean" (tunicam mundiorem), what objection could be made, "if bishop, priest, and deacon, and the rest of the clergy appeared at the administration of the sacrifice in white array" (candida veste processerit.) So Gregory of Tours ("De Gloria Conf." c. 20) describes the band of "priests and Levites in white vestments." Black was sometimes used in sign of mourning (Theodore Lector. lib. 1, excerpt quoted by Hefele). Even Pseudo-Alcuin, in the tenth or eleventh century, knows only of white vestments, except that he speaks of the scarlet stripes on the deacon's dalmatic ("Divin. Offic." c. 40), and of the use of black vestments during the litany and procession on the Feast of the Purification (c. 7). Innocent III. is the first to mention four colours—viz. white, which the Roman Church employs on feasts of confessors, virgins, and on joyful solemnities generally; red, used on the feasts of martyrs, of the cross (though then perhaps white is to be preferred), and on Whitsunday, by some also on All Saints, but not by the Curia Romana, in which white is the colour; black, used in penitential seasons and Masses for the dead; green, used on common days, because "midway between black and white." He regards violet, which is now the penitential colour, as a mere variety of black, and says the former was used on Holy Innocents and Laetare Sunday. So scarlet and saffron-yellow (coccineus et croceus) are varieties of red and green. Rose-coloured vestments, he says, were sometimes used on feasts of martyrs, and yellow ones on feasts of confessors ("Altar. Myst." i. 65). At present yellow counts as white, and rose-coloured vestments are only used at solemn Mass on the third Sunday in Advent and fourth in Lent.

Bishops, when they celebrate pontifically, take their vestments from the altar, simple priests put them on in the sacristy. But this distinction is probably not very ancient, for even in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries it was the common custom for priests, at least in England, to vest in the sanctuary. (Maskell, "Ancient Liturgy of the Church of England," p. 219). The present law on the use of vestments at Mass is very strict, and many theologians (see Benedict XIV. "De Miss." iii. 7, 1) believe that no cause whatever will excuse a priest from observing it. (The chief recent authorities are Bock, "Gesch. der Liturg. Gewänder"; Hefele, in his "Beiträge," ii. p. 150 seq.; Wharton Marriott, "Vestiarium Christianum.")

VESTMENTS, GREEK AND ORIENTAL. Something has been said on this subject already in the account given of the various vestments used in the Latin Church, but it may be convenient to give a separate article on the vestments of the Greeks and Orientals.

1. Vestments worn by the Deacon.—In preparing to officiate at Mass, the first vestment which he puts on is the στοιχάριον or στιχάριον. It answers to our alb, except that it is not bound by a girdle. It used to be of linen and always white, but now it is often made of silk. It takes its name from the stripes (στίχοι) with which it is adorned. In Lent, except on the Annunciation and Holy Saturday, it is of purple colour. It is used by all the Orientals. The Syrians call it Kûtino (ܟܘܬܝܢܐ = χιτῶν, and that again is really a Semitic word, cf. כְּתֹנֶת), and the Copts, according to Daniel, labat or touniak. It is also worn by readers and sub-deacons. In form it has come to resemble our dalmatic, though worn, like the alb, immediately over the cassock. Next comes the ὡράριον or stole (see under that word), the distinctive badge of deacons, and lastly the ἐπιμανίκια, a barbarous compound of ἐπὶ and manus. They stretch from the wrist to the elbow, leaving the hand free. They are first mentioned by Balsamon in the twelfth century, and have apparently been adopted by the Syrians.

The priest puts on the στοιχάριον, then the ἐπιτραχήλιον, which is a stole broader than the deacon's and joined in front, next the ζώνη or girdle, the ἐπιμανίκια, the ὑπογονάτιον or ἐπιγονάτιον, a square piece of cloth which hangs from the girdle and is really proper to bishops, archimandrites and other dignitaries, such as protosyncelli, protopopes, &c., but is in matter of fact worn by very many priests.

Over all he puts the chasuble (φελώνιον, φελώνης, φαινόλιον) in shape much like one of our Gothic chasubles.[1]

Bishops also use the above vestments. But their στοιχάριον is marked with white and red stripes, and they have a picture of Christ on their ἐπιγονάτιον and ἐπιμανίκια. Their chasuble is marked with many crosses and called πολυσταύριον. The σάκκος, which has sleeves, and, to judge from the woodcut in Daniel, resembles a dalmatic in shape, was at first worn by metropolitans only instead of the chasuble, and by them never except on the three great festivals. From the time of Alexius Commenus it became the habitual substitute for the chasuble with metropolitans, and now it is worn in Russia by all bishops. Lastly, the bishop takes the ὠμοφόριον, a sort of pallium made of wool, which is hung on the shoulders and falls over the back. At some of the functions, but not at Mass, bishops wear a monastic cloak called μανδύας. The word which is said by Hesychius and Eustathius to be of Persian origin occurs in the LXX (e.g. Judges iii. 16), and a MS. Greek lexicon quoted by Schlausner explains it as a "sort of upper garment and the cloak of monks" (εἶδος ἱματίου καὶ τὸ τῶν μοναχῶν πάλλιον). The mitre (κίδαρις) is never worn in the sanctuary except by the Patriarch of Alexandria. Greek bishops have no ring, but they wear a pectoral cross (τὸ πανάγιον) and use a pastoral staff (πατερήσσαν), which, however, is much shorter than those customary in the West and much less ornate.

(Chiefly from Daniel, "Cod. Liturg." tom. iv. p. 375 seq.)

VIATICUM. Holy Communion given to those in danger of death. Such persons are allowed to receive the Communion, even if they are not fasting, and they may do so again and again in the same illness, if circumstances render it expedient. Viaticum is given by the parish priest, or by another priest deputed by him. The priest, wearing surplice and stole, carries the Blessed Sacrament in procession; lights are borne in front, and a bell is rung to excite the devotion of the faithful. In the U. S. it is, of course, impossible to carry out all this ceremonial. A special form is used in administering the Sacrament—viz. "Receive, brother [or sister], the viaticum of the body of our Lord Jesus Christ. May He guard from the malignant foe, and lead thee to eternal life!" Afterwards, the priest cleanses his fingers in a little water, which the sick man drinks.

(1) The Origin of the Name.—The word "viaticum" came into Church use as a translation of the Greek ἐφόδιον. This latter word means provision for a journey; then, metaphorically, provision for the journey of life (Clem. Rom. Ep. i. 2; Dionys. Corinth. apud Euseb. "H. E." iv. 23). Next the metaphor was extended to the provision for the last journey—viz. from this world to the next—and so it occurs as an epithet of the Holy Communion given to the dying in the Council of Nicæa (can. 13). There the Eucharist is said to be the "last and most necessary viaticum" (τοῦ τελευταίου καὶ ἀναγκαιοτάτου ἐφοδίου). Innocent I. ("Ad Exsuper."; Mansi, "Concil." iii. 1039) employs the Latin word "viaticum" in the same sense, and so does the First Council of Orange, A.D. 441 (can. 3; Mansi, vi. 437), with an evident allusion to the canon of Nicæa. Thus it became a technical term for Communion given to the dying. (So Council of Agde, A.D. 506, can. 15; Mansi, viii. 327; Bede, "H. E." iv. 14; Amalar. "Eccl. Offic." iii. 35.) But even late in the middle ages the word had not acquired its present fixed and exclusive sense. The Council of Vaison, A.D. 442 (can. 2; Mansi, vi. 453), speaks of the viaticum, meaning, probably, the absolution and communion of the dying; and in the Council of Gerunda, A.D. 517 (can. 9; Mansi, vii. 550), it certainly includes absolution. Aubespine, indeed, in his note (ad loc. 554), takes it to mean simply reconciliation and absolution granted to dying penitents—the "benedictio beatifica," as the Council of Barcelona, A.D. 541 (can. 9; Mansi, ix. 110), calls it. Hence the so-called Fourth Council of Carthage (can. 78; Mansi, iii. 957) has the expression "Viaticum Eucharistiæ," to distinguish it from "viaticum" in the other sense. The term was also applied to the Eucharist generally, as our support in our earthly pilgrimage; and we find it so employed not only in the liturgy of St. Mark (ἐφόδιον, Hammond, p. 191), but even in a synod of Durham early in the thirteenth century (Wilkins, "Concil." i. p. 578).

(2) Viaticum in One or Two Kinds.—In the third and fourth centuries we have clear instances of viaticum given under the form of bread only (Dionys. Alex. apud Euseb. "H. E." vi. 44; the contemporary Life of St. Ambrose, by Paulinus, n. 47). There can be no reasonable doubt about these cases, and Bossuet ("Communion sous les deux espèces," P. 1, n. 2) seems to be quite right in taking can. 76 of the Fourth Council of Carthage as evidence that Communion was given to dying persons who were unable to swallow the Host in the form of wine ("infundatur ori ejus Eucharistia," Mansi, iii. 957). Still, Chardon ("H. des Sacr." tom. ii. Euchar. ch. v. a. 2) considers, and with reason, that the rule was to give viaticum under both kinds, so long as those in health received Communion in this way. Chrysostom's letter to Innocent (Mansi, iii. 1089) shows that the Eucharist under the form of wine was reserved for the sick. He complains that the soldiers spilt the precious blood on Holy Saturday, and this cannot have been in the chalice at Mass; for women, he says, were waiting for baptism, which preceded the Mass of Holy Saturday. The Eleventh Council of Toledo, A.D. 675 (capit. 11), the direction in the Gregorian Sacramentary ("oratio ad visitandum infirmum"), and three forms for administering viaticum given from ancient MSS. by Menard in his notes on this Sacramentary, all assume that the dying man will receive both kinds. The same thing follows from Bede's "Life of St. Cuthbert" (cap. 39).

[1] The Greeks have no change of colours for the feasts. The φελώνιον of the priest and the στοιχάριον of the deacon are black at Masses of the Dead, and purple, as we have seen, is used in Lent. Great feasts are marked by the splendour of the vestments.

(3) The Minister of Viaticum.—In the early days of persecution it was sometimes carried to the sick by laymen (Euseb. "H. E." vi. 44). The practice apparently continued long after, when it had become a mere abuse. For Leo IV. (847–55) strictly forbids priests to send it by laymen or women (Mansi, xiv. 891). About the same time, we find Hincmar of Rheims requiring his deans to ask whether the priests gave Communion to the sick with their own hands, and not through anyone they could get to do it for them ("per se, non per quemlibet," Hincmar, Opp. ed. Sirmond, p. 716; in Migne's reprint, p. 779). The Council of Ansa, near Lyons, A.D. 990 (Mansi, xix. 101) permits no one except priests to give viaticum. Deacons, however—at least, in some places—continued to do so. This is proved, according to Chardon, by the old statutes of the Carthusians; and a Council of Westminster, A.D. 1138 (can. 2; Wilkins, i. p. 415), puts priests and deacons precisely on the same level in this respect ("per sacerdotem aut diaconum aut necessitate instante per quemlibet").

(4) Rites and Ceremonies, &c.—No special legislation, so far as we know, exempted the dying from the rule of fasting before Communion. But history witnesses to the anxiety of the Church in all ages that the dying should communicate, and we may fairly assume that the present rule was in force from the beginning. The ceremonies, much as we have them now—e.g. the wearing of the stole, the cross and lights in the procession, the carrying of the pyx, the bell—are prescribed in the Constitutions of St. Edmund of Canterbury, A.D. 1236; in the Council of Durham, to which we have already referred; and in a provincial council of Scotland in the time of the Scotch King Alexander II. (Wilkins, "Concil." i. pp. 579, 615, 637). On the other hand, we doubt if the special form in which viaticum is now given was usual in the middle ages—"Accipe, frater, Viaticum," &c. The Gregorian Sacramentary simply says: "Then let him [the priest] give Communion with the body and blood of the Lord;" and the Salisbury Manual—i.e. Ritual—of 1543 (reprinted in Maskell, "Monument. Rit." vol. i.) has merely a Rubric to the same effect. The three forms given by Menard from old MSS., and also a fourth from a Soissons Manual printed only eighty years before his time, would be suitable for ordinary Communion. However, a Bangor Pontifical of the thirteenth century contains the form as we now use it—"Accipe, frater, Viaticum corporis Domini nostri Jesu Christi," &c. (Maskell, loc. cit. p. 81). Viaticum, in the modern Church, is given before Extreme Unction. In the middle ages the reverse order obtained, as Menard (loc. cit. p. 536) proves by a multitude of authorities, and such was the order followed in the English use till Queen Mary's time. The importance of receiving the Communion while the mind is still clear and calm is the reason given by theologians (Juenin, "De Sacram." p. 588) for the order now laid down in the Roman Ritual.

VICAR-APOSTOLIC. By this was formerly meant either a bishop or archbishop, generally of some remote see, to whom the Roman Pontiff delegated a portion of his jurisdiction; or an ecclesiastic, not necessarily a bishop, who, acting under a Papal brief, or in virtue of instructions received from the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars, was commissioned to exercise the episcopal jurisdiction (except in certain special cases) in a diocese where the ordinary, from whatever cause, was incapacitated from its full and efficient discharge. At the present day, vicars-apostolic are nearly always titular bishops [see that article], and are stationed either in countries where episcopal sees have not yet been established, or in those where the succession has been interrupted. On the vicars-apostolic sent to England by the Holy See for this latter cause, see ENGLISH CATHOLICS. The Gerarchia Cattolica for 1883 specifies one hundred and twelve apostolic vicariates now in being. Of these, nine are in Europe; sixty-four (out of which twenty-four are in China alone) in Asia; fourteen in Africa; sixteen in America; and nine in Oceania.

VICAR FORANE (foraneus = qui foris est; one exercising authority at a distance from the place where the bishop resides). A vicar forane is either a dignitary or, at least, if possible, a parish priest, who is appointed by the bishop to exercise a limited jurisdiction in a particular town or district of his diocese. An appeal lies from his decision to the bishop, who can also remove him at pleasure. "The chief part of the office of a vicar forane is to report to the bishop on the lives of the clergy within his district, and to inquire into any charges brought against them; to promote the observance of the synodal constitutions and the decrees of the bishop; to preside at local conferences, in which moral or liturgical questions are treated of; and to give notice to the bishop of anything contrary to faith and good morals, or tending to impair the Divine worship, the reverence due to churches, the observance of holidays, and the maintenance of ecclesiastical discipline, which may occur within his district; finally, to decide civil causes of slight importance" (Soglia, 'Instit. Canon.' ii. § 71). The fourteenth decree of the first Council of Westminster, on Vicars Forane, is in general agreement with the above, but adds that it is their duty to "take care of sick priests, to watch over the administration of Church property, and to see that sacred buildings be kept in repair." The council treats the title "Vicar Forane" as equivalent to "Rural Dean." There are vicars forane in many Irish dioceses, but almost their sole function is to grant episcopal dispensations for the non-publication of banns. (Ferraris, Vicarius Foraneus.)

VICAR-GENERAL. This official has succeeded to much of the power formerly exercised in a diocese by the archdeacon [ARCHDEACON]. In the canon law he is styled indifferently "officialis" and "vicarius generalis" and the common use of the term in Italy is conformable to this state of the law. In Transalpine countries the name of "official" is commonly given to the ecclesiastic administering the contentious jurisdiction of the bishop, and that of "vicar-general" to him who exercises his voluntary jurisdiction [JURISDICTION].

The origin of the office is supposed to be traceable in a Papal Constitution, promulgated in the Fourth Lateran Council, by which Innocent III. authorised the appointment by any bishop who was overburdened by the weight of his episcopal duties of an ecclesiastic to assist him in performing them. Yet since no allusion to such an office occurs in the Decretals, compiled some years later under Gregory IX., it would seem that the permission granted at the Lateran Council was not for some time much acted upon. However, before the end of the thirteenth century vicars-general had become common, and the "Sext" of Boniface VIII. minutely regulates their functions.

A bishop is not obliged to appoint a vicar-general if the circumstances of the diocese are such that he is able to discharge all his episcopal duties without assistance; and this is in fact the case in several English and Scottish dioceses at the present time. On the other hand, the bishop may, if he pleases, appoint two or more vicars-general, either assigning to each jurisdiction over a certain district, or giving to one the contentious, to another the voluntary jurisdiction, or, thirdly, making over to them joint and full jurisdiction over the whole diocese in solidum. The person appointed must be a clerk, not a layman, but the law does not require that he should be in holy orders; the modern practice of the Curia, however, obliges him to have a doctor's or some other degree in canon law. No one having cure of souls, nor any regular belonging to a mendicant order, can be appointed to the office. A regular canon or a monk may be a vicar-general, if certain conditions be fulfilled. It is held to be desirable that, as far as possible, the office should be committed to an ecclesiastic belonging to another diocese.

In matters of jurisdiction the vicar is regarded as the ordinary, and his tribunal is identical with that of the bishop, so that there is no appeal from the one to the other. But he is bound to keep carefully within the limits of his commission; thus he may not do any of those things which come under the definition of "Pontificalia," and belong to the episcopal order, such as making the holy oils, consecrating churches, altars, chalices, &c. Nor may he decide anything without a special mandate, which it may be reasonably presumed the bishop could not have intended to entrust to him by his general commission. For instance, although his commission warrants him to do all formal acts required in the institution of ecclesiastics to benefices, offices, or dignities, it does not authorise him to confer any of these; to do so lawfully he must have a special mandate. He cannot summon a synod, nor convoke the chapter, nor visit the diocese; "and generally, in business of an arduous and weighty nature, he cannot act without consulting the bishop."[1] The powers of a vicar-general cease and determine—(1) when his commission is cancelled by the bishop; (2) upon his death or resignation; (3) when, from whatever cause, the bishop's own jurisdiction in the diocese ceases. (Soglia, "Instit. Canon." ii. §§ 69, 70.)

VICE-CHANCELLOR. [See CURIA ROMANA.]

VIENNE. The Fifteenth General Council was opened by Clement V. at Vienne, in the Dauphiné, on October 16, 1311. Great uncertainty prevails as to the number of members present, and the number of bishops and mitred abbots present is variously estimated at 114 and 300. The Pope in his address at the opening gives three reasons for the assembling of the Council—viz. the affair of the Templars, the rescue of the Holy Land, the reform of abuses in the Church.

The investigation of the charges against the Templars took a long time, and nearly six months passed between the first and second sessions. The order, as has been already said in a previous article, was suppressed by a Papal bull, but no definite judgment was passed on the crimes laid to the charge of its members. The French king, Philip the Fair, did not succeed in obtaining the condemnation of Pope Boniface VIII., but a decree of Clement in 1307 had annulled the excommunications, interdicts, &c., issued by Boniface against Philip and his supporters, and secured them from any prejudice in the future.

The rest of the decrees of the Council were partly dogmatic, partly disciplinary. John Peter de Oliva, a Franciscan (born in Provence 1247, died 1297), belonged to the "Spiritual" party in his order, was an admirer of the abbot Joachim, the author of the "Eternal Gospel," and himself wrote a fantastical commentary on the Apocalypse. It was with reference to him that the Pope in Council condemned the opinions that the soul is not "in itself and essentially the form of the human body," and that Christ was still living when his body was pierced with the lance, and declared it the more probable view that sanctifying grace and the virtues are infused into the souls of children at baptism. The immoral Quietism of the Beguards and Beguines was also reprobated, particularly their doctrine that man may become absolutely perfect, and attain perfect beatitude in this life; that a perfect man is free from subjection to the ecclesiastical or civil law, and may commit the grossest offences against the moral law without sin.

The following were the chief disciplinary decrees.[1] The "black" monks and the nuns were forbidden to indulge in luxurious and worldly habits (e.g. hunting, attending the courts of princes, wearing silk or jewellery, being present at balls, &c.) An attempt, not altogether successful, was made to heal the schism in the Franciscan order caused by the "Spirituals." The clerics, who were rectors of hospitals, were reproved for neglecting the poor and enriching themselves from the funds entrusted to them. For the future such institutions were to be placed under good and prudent men, who were to submit their accounts to the ordinary. This, says Fleury, was the origin of the lay administrators of hospitals, established "to the shame of the clergy." Many secular prelates were anxious that the exemptions granted to religious orders should be withdrawn. This was not done, but religious were forbidden under pain of excommunication to give Extreme Unction, Holy Communion, or the nuptial benediction without express leave from the parish priest. They were also forbidden to beguile lay people from attending the services in the parish church. Regulations were made on clerical decorum, and on the age for orders. A sub-deacon must be at least in his eighteenth, a deacon in his twentieth, a priest in his twenty-fifth year. The bull of Urban IV. instituting the feast of Corpus Christi was repeated and confirmed. Steps were taken to promote the study of the Oriental languages, a measure which Raymond Lully had desired long before. Chairs of Hebrew, Chaldee, and Arabic were to be established in the Roman Court and in the Universities of Paris, Oxford, Bologna, and Salamanca. Lastly, a crusade was proclaimed for the recovery of the Holy Land; the Kings of England, France, and Navarre promised to take part in it, and a tithe was to be levied for six years to defray the expense. The third and last session ended on May 6, 1312. (Fleury, "H. E." liv. xci.; Hefele, "Concil." vol. vi.)

[1] Soglia.

[1] A memoir, drawn up at the Pope's request by William Durand, bishop of Mende, gives an appalling picture of the state of the Church. He mentions particularly the want of all observance in monastic orders, the immorality of the monks and clergy, the venality of the Roman Court, the way in which benefices were kept vacant, &c. He pleads for reform in the Curia and among the clergy, and proposes that priests should be allowed to marry.

VIGILS. Originally the watch kept on the night before a feast, and then, from the eleventh or twelfth century (Probst, "Brevier. und Brevier-Gebet," p. 176), the day and the night preceding a feast.

(1) The practice of spending the night in public prayer is probably older than Christianity, for Eusebius ("H. E." ii. 17) attributes it to the Therapeutæ or Alexandrian Essenes. In Acts xx. 7 we have an instance of devotional exercises continued at least till midnight. Vigils are mentioned by Tertullian ("Ad Uxor." lib. ii. 5),[1] and the vigil maintained till "cock-crow" on Holy Saturday is prescribed in the Apostolic Constitutions (v. 19). Chrysostom speaks of the observance of vigils as a proof of piety (Hom. iv. in illud "Vidi Dominum," tom. vi. p. 120 in Migne: ἴδε πέντας ἐκ μεσονυκτίων μεχρὶ τῆς ἡμέρας παραμένοντας, βλέπε παννυχίδας); and Socrates ("H. E." vi. 8) refers to the nocturnal hymns and vigils of Catholics and Arians at Constantinople in the saint's time. We learn from Basil (in Ps. cxiv.) that vigils were held before the feasts of martyrs, and it appears from Theodoret ("H. E." ii. 10) and Socrates that such vigils were the usual preludes to Mass on Saturday and on Sunday, or other feasts. Jerome (Ep. cix. and "Adv. Vigilant." n. 9; cf. Ep. cxlvii.) defends the custom against Vigilantius, admitting, however, the grave immorality by which they were sometimes accompanied. It was probably these and other abuses which led to the discontinuance of the devotion. Gautier, bishop of Poitiers, prohibited vigils within his diocese in 1280, and it seems from the language of the Papal legates at the Council of Valladolid in 1322 that the old use was dying out. St. Charles forbade the keeping of any vigil except that before Christmas, and at present the Matins and Lauds and the midnight Mass before that feast are the only relics of the old custom. (See Thomassin.)

(2) The Fast on the Vigils.—The statement in Smith and Cheetham that "the observance of a vigil by fasting came to be usual not later than the ninth century" is inaccurate, or at least misleading. Holy Saturday was kept as a fast from very early times (see "Const. Apost." v. 18; also HOLY WEEK and LENT); and Augustine (Ep. lxv.) considered it a crime to break the fast on the vigil of Christmas in those churches where it was observed. But it was in the middle ages that the obligation of fasting was extended to vigils generally. Peter Damian (Opusc. lv. "De Vigil," al. Ep. lib. vi. 35) insists that the vigils of the birth of St. John the Baptist, St. Philip and St. James, St. James the Greater, St. Bartholomew, of Christmas, Easter, Pentecost, and the Assumption, are fasting days. Nay, he even contends that the law of fasting binds on the vigil of the Epiphany, because there is a Mass for the vigil in the Gregorian Sacramentary. Lanfranc, on the other hand, excepts this last vigil ("Decret. pro Ord. S. Benedict"; Migne, "Patrol." cl. p. 451), and this is the rule which has actually prevailed. Innocent III., writing to the Archbishop of Braga, says the Roman Church fasted on the vigils of all the Apostles, except on that of St. John the Evangelist (excepted because of Christmas), and St. Philip and St. James, excepted because of Easter. This letter has been incorporated in the canon law ("Decret." lib. v. tit. xlvi. cap. 2, "Consilium Nostrum"). Such is the present law of the Church, apart from indult or dispensation, with regard to the vigils of the Apostles. On March 9, 1777, Pius VI. exempted English Catholics from the obligation of fasting on all vigils except those of the Assumption, SS. Peter and Paul and All Saints, substituting the fast on the Wednesdays and Fridays of Advent. (See the new edition of the Provincial Councils of Westminster, p. 199.) Fasting is also obligatory by the Church law on the vigils of Christmas and the Assumption, and by custom which has the force of law on the vigils of Pentecost, the Nativity of St. John the Baptist, St. Lawrence, and All Saints. (Meratus, s. 3, c. 7, n. 1.)

(3) The Mass and Office of Vigils; their Translation, &c.—The Office used to be identical with that of the Feria till Pius V. introduced the Gospel from the Mass of the Vigil with a homily appended. (Gavant. s. 3, c. 7, n. 5.) Probably Corpus Christi has no vigil, because introduced after vigils in the original sense had fallen into disuse. Greater vigils—i.e. those of Christmas, Epiphany, and Pentecost—are celebrated with semi-double; that of Christmas from Lauds onwards with double rite. If a feast with a vigil falls on Monday, the vigil and fast are kept on Saturday.[1] This rule is laid down by Innocent III. (loc. cit.), but was evidently not yet established shortly before under Alexander III. ("Decret." lib. v. tit. xl. cap. 14, "Quæsivit a nobis.") (From various sources, chiefly Thomassin, "Traité des Jeûnes," P. I. ch. xviii.; P. II. ch. xiv.)

VINCENT OF PAUL, ST., SOCIETY OF. This society, which exists for the purpose of helping the poor, was founded at Paris just fifty years ago. At that time a number of Catholic students, attending lectures in Paris, were brought into contact with students of various ways of thinking—Materialists, Deists, St.-Simonians, Fourierists, &c.—with whom they discussed subjects of common interest in a "Conférence d'Histoire," or historical club. One of these Catholic students was the well-known writer Frederic Ozanam. The free-thinkers were wont to allow that Christianity had certainly accomplished great things, but they maintained that its ancient spirit had fled, and that great practical enterprises could no longer owe to it either their inspiration or their vitality. "What do you do?" they asked of the Catholics; "you are full of talk and theory, but there it ends." The taunt sank into the mind of Ozanam and others; they meditated, prayed, exchanged ideas; at last, at a meeting attended by five or six friends, after much had been said as to the benefit which works of charity would confer both on themselves and on the poor, some one (it was never ascertained who) cried out, "Let us found a Conference of Charity." This was in the spring of 1833. But the particular mode of commencing their operations was a matter of difficulty. It was decided to go to Sister Rosalie, who at that time was superior of the Sisters of St. Vincent of Paul, and obtain from her the addresses of some poor families, whom the members of the new conference could visit. This was done, and M. Bailly, an excellent layman, who was in intimate relations with many of the Paris clergy, was asked to be their president. He accepted the post, and provided the conference with rooms to meet in. Eight young students—Ozanam, Letaillandier, Devaux, Lamache, Lallier, Clavé, and two others—held the first conference in May 1833. The orders for relief to be given to the poor who were visited were in the first place purchased by the members from Sister Rosalie. The conference chose St. Vincent of Paul for its patron. Bailly was a parishioner of the curé of St. Etienne du Mont, M. Faudet, who sanctioned and favoured the new work among the poor of the parish. After a time rules for the conduct of meetings and the administration of relief, with appropriate "considerations" attached to them, were drawn up by M. Bailly and adopted. The objects of the new institute were stated to be—(1) "to encourage its members, by example and counsel, in the practice of a Christian life; (2) to visit the poor and assist them when in distress, as far as our means will permit, affording them also religious consolations . . . ; (3) to apply ourselves, according to our abilities and the time which we can spare, to the elementary and Christian instruction of poor children, whether free or imprisoned . . . ; (4) to distribute moral and religious books; (5) to be willing to undertake any other sort of charitable work to which our resources may be adequate, and which will not oppose the chief end of the society."

In 1835, the conference having been joined by many new members, the question of dividing it into sections, which should serve as new centres whence the work of charity among the swarming poor of Paris might be carried on more effectually than before, came on for discussion. The division was warmly opposed by many; at last, however, it was resolved upon, and thus a step was taken which facilitated and foreshowed the ultimate extension of the labours of the society to other cities and other lands. The new sections themselves were after a time called "Conferences," and the aggregate of the conferences formed the "Society of St. Vincent of Paul."

[1] This does not apply to the Mass and Office for the vigils of Christmas and Epiphany.

The movement originated among laymen, and the administration of the society has always been in lay hands, but in union with and subordination to the clergy. Its lay character is said to have much favoured its extension at the particular time when it arose, when it was enough for a society or enterprise of any kind to have an ecclesiastic at his head, to be denounced in the press and the salons as an "œuvre jésuitique."

The members devote themselves to visiting and relieving the poor, and in order to do this effectually, many special works of charity have been organised by it. Among these are libraries, clothing depôts, crêches, boarding out with farmers, visits to prisons and hospitals, and finding work for labourers and women out of employ. On urgent occasions the society will grant extraordinary help; thus it sent money for the relief of the terrible Irish distress in 1847 and 1848.

Soon after the division of the first conference, the presidents of the different conferences began the practice of meeting in council from time to time: thus was formed the "council-general." Other councils—c. centraux, c. supérieurs—arose as they were required. In 1853 the members of the Paris conferences were 2,000 in number, having 5,000 families inscribed on their visiting lists. The society had even at that time spread to England, Ireland, Spain, Belgium, America, and Palestine. Indulgences were granted to it in very ample terms by Popes Gregory XVI. and Pius IX. The last named Pope, in 1853, gave to the society Card. Fornari as its Cardinal Protector.

Under the Second Empire, the Count de Persigny, in a circular letter to the prefects, brought charges against the administration of the society, the drift of which was that under the pretence of charity, its organisation was being used to promote political objects. The Government required that, the society should accept Cardinal Morlot as the official head of the General Council; otherwise it was to be suppressed. The society declined to accede to this proposal, and the General Council was consequently suspended; the local conferences carried on their operations as usual.

In 1876 the number of conferences, established in all parts of the world, was nearly 6,000. In 1877 more than seven millions of francs were expended by it in the relief of distress. ("Vie de Frédéric Ozanam," 1879; "Manual of the Society of St. Vincent of Paul," 1867.)

VIRTUE. [See FAITH; HOPE; CHARITY.]

VISIT TO THE BLESSED SACRAMENT. The daily visit to a church in order to engage in silent prayer before the Blessed Sacrament, is a practice common in all religious houses, and ascetical writers recommend the custom to persons living in the world. This devotion, natural as it is on Catholic principles, does not seem to have been familiar to Christians in the early or even the middle ages. Fr. Bridgett, in his learned work on the "History of the Blessed Sacrament in Great Britain" (vol. ii. p. 239), does produce instances—e.g. from the earlier part of the middle ages—of prayer made before the altar at a time when, evidently, no service was going on; but there is no express reference to the Holy Eucharist.

VISITATIO LIMINUM APOSTOLORUM. That it was a duty incumbent on a Catholic bishop to visit from time to time the tombs of the Apostles Peter and Paul at Rome, in order to honour the institution of Christ in the person of his Vicar, to strengthen his own communion and that of his flock with the living centre of Christianity, and to report the state of his diocese to the Supreme Pastor and Ruler, was a conviction which had been growing in force for centuries, and had found continuous practical expression in those innumerable visits of bishops to Rome which the annals of the Church record. Leo III. (Ep. i.) ordained that bishops should visit the limina Apostolorum, but without prescribing anything as to the time. In the sixteenth century the practice assumed the form of a positive law. Sixtus V. by the Constitution "Romanus Pontifex" (1585), ordained that the bishops of Italy, the islands in the Adriatic, and the neighbouring parts of Greece, should be bound to visit the limina Apostolorum once in three years; the bishops of France, Spain, England, Germany, and other countries within the North and Baltic Seas, as also of the islands in the Mediterranean, once in four years; all other bishops in Europe and those of Africa, once in five years; and all Asiatic and American bishops, once in ten years. The visit was to be made either in person, or, if a legitimate hindrance intervened, by a suitable proctor or representative.

What was a visit of duty for a bishop was a pious pilgrimage for a clerk or layman, and so good a work, that by the sound Catholic feeling of ancient times it was almost raised to the level of a duty. Benedict Biscop, the founder of the monasteries of Wearmouth and Jarrow in the seventh century, visited Rome six different times. Ordericus Vitalis († about 1142), after describing the martyrdoms of SS. Peter and Paul under Nero, says: "Rome, the capital of the world, glories in having for her patrons such exalted saints, to whose temples the faithful resort from all parts of the world, in order that by the assistance of these powerful advocates they may be protected from all their adversaries and all hostile influences."[1] (Ferraris, "Lim. Ap."; Soglia, ii. § 63.)

VISITATION, EPISCOPAL. To visit his diocese, and ascertain the state and progress of religion in every part of it, is of course one of the main portions of that "oversight" which belongs to the bishop's office. The Council of Trent[2] prescribed that all bishops, either in person or by their vicar-generals or visitors, should, if the size of the diocese rendered the annual visitation of the whole of it impossible, at least visit every part at intervals not exceeding two years. The aim of such visitations is described as comprehending the maintenance of sound doctrine, the expulsion of heresy, the reformation of morals, the right arrangement of whatever relates both to persons and things ecclesiastical, and the encouragement of the faithful, by preaching and other means, to lead religious and peaceful lives. The visitor, whether the bishop or his deputy, is counselled to eschew vain pomp and show, and to accept no fees or gratifications for any service connected with the visitation except such as are expressly authorised by law. All that the visitor can claim is board and lodging, or (if such be the local custom) the equivalent thereof in money. But if it be the custom of the place or province to give nothing at all, not even board, to visitors, that custom must be respected.

Bishops may in their own right, and also as delegates of the Apostolic See, visit the chapters of cathedral and collegiate churches within their dioceses, and correct what may be found amiss in them.[1] In the decree on seminaries (sess. xxiii. c. 18, De Ref.), it is assumed that these institutions will be frequently visited by the bishops. Benefices with cure of souls, which are annexed to churches, monasteries, &c., as part of their endowment, should be annually visited by the bishop, who should take care that the vicars administering them be reasonably remunerated out of the revenues.[2] When the members of a regular community (except the monastery of Cluny and the houses in which the heads of orders have their ordinary principal residence) have the care of the souls of secular persons, other than their own servants and dependents, they are subject to the visitation and control of the bishop of the diocese.[3] As delegates of the Apostolic See, bishops are empowered to visit—(1) monasteries and benefices held in commendam, (2) hospitals, colleges, confraternities, schools, monts-de-piété, and "pia loca" in general, (3) churches in nullius diocesi, or "peculiar," provided that the cathedral of the bishop so visiting be the nearest to the place; if that is a doubtful point, the right of visit belongs to the bishop who has been elected to it by the prelate of the peculiar in a provincial council. The results of an episcopal visitation are to be reported to the Sacred Congregation of the Council. (Soglia, lib. ii. § 63; Ferraris, Visitatio.)

VISITATION, ORDER OF THE. This order was founded at Annecy in 1610 by the holy widow Jane Frances, Mme. de Chantal (who was canonised in 1767), under the direction of St. Francis de Sales, then bishop of Geneva. It was designed by the bishop to be open to widows and ladies of weak health as well as to the young and robust; hence but few corporal austerities were required by the rule, and at first there was no enclosure, so that the religious could freely visit the sick and needy in their own homes. On the other hand, the employment of time and the regulation of the thoughts were provided for in the rule with great minuteness. St. Francis did not wish the religious to be exempt from the jurisdiction of the bishops, and therefore he would not consent to the appointment of a superior for the whole order. The rule of enclosure was adopted in 1618. A few of their convents—e.g. Blois and Troyes—resisted the bull "Unigenitus" [JANSENISM], but the great majority showed an excellent spirit. About 1863 the order "still numbered a hundred houses, divided between Italy, France, Switzerland, Austria, Poland, Syria, and North America, with about 3,000 members."[1] The Ven. Marie Marguerite d'Alacoque, so well known in connection with the devotion to the Sacred Heart, belonged to this order. In 1814 a voluntary society, popularly known as "the Pious Ladies," existing in Georgetown, D. C., since 1799, assumed the vows of Visitation nuns and thus formed the first community in the U. S., where there are now twenty convents.

VOCATION. In its more restricted and special sense vocation is taken for that "disposition of Divine Providence" whereby persons are invited to serve God in some special state—e.g. as ecclesiastics or religious. The ecclesiastical vocation is manifested by the pious desires of the heart, by innocence of life, by the sincere love of Christ, by pure zeal for God's glory and the salvation of souls. That to the religious state, or the perfect practice of the evangelical counsels, comes to souls with a certain pressing invitation, with a strong desire of self-sacrifice and a clear perception of worldly vanity, with a certain attractiveness for intimacy with Christ and for the exaltation of his holy Name. But it is given differently to different persons, and prepares them "powerfully" though "sweetly" for the practice of solid virtue. "If thou wouldst be perfect," said our Lord, "go sell what thou hast and give to the poor, ... and come, follow Me."

VOTIVE MASS. [See MASS.]

VOWS. A vow is a deliberate promise made to God in regard to something possessing superior goodness. To be valid it must proceed from the free, deliberate will of one who by age and social position is capable of contracting a solemn obligation. It is to God alone that a vow is taken, and because, in a special manner, it belongs immediately to God's service, it is an act of religion, or of divine worship. To vow to a saint means, in the mind of Catholics, to vow to God in honour of a saint; just as to dedicate a church to a saint simply implies to dedicate it to God in the saint's honour. What is illicit or altogether indifferent, or imperfect, or impossible cannot be the subject-matter of a vow; in the circumstances in which it is taken it must always turn on "the greater good"—"de bono meliori." The vow gives to the actions which it covers a special merit—a merit which St. Thomas derives from a threefold source. First, since a vow appertains to religion, or the order of divine worship, it communicates its character to acts of other virtues practised under its control, or elevates them to the rank, as it were, of sacrifice. To obey duly is a virtuous act, but to obey in virtue of a vow is to perform an act which is invested with the character of worship. Secondly, because the offering made to God by the performance of virtuous actions under the obligation of a vow is a much greater offering than the performance of the same without that obligation. In the latter case the bare action is offered; in the former not only the action but the faculty from which it proceeds; or, to use the comparison given by St. Anselm, in one instance you offer the fruit, in the other not only the fruit but the tree also. Thirdly, because by a vow the will is bound to a virtuous line of action, receiving stability therein not only for the present but for the future. Thus, by being immovably allied to the good by the force of a vow, the will is strengthened to tend to the perfection of virtue. One can, however, through perversity, break through the obligation of his vow; but by the requirements of the same he may not do so—that is, he has the physical but not the moral power of violating the law which he has imposed on himself. But it must never be forgotten that an action done without the obligation may be and constantly is more holy and pleasing to God than a corresponding action done under vow, because the former may proceed from a more intense love of God. It is on this that the intrinsic perfection of our deeds depends. And an action which is vowed is more perfect than one not so vowed, only if other things are equal.

It is true that by vows the will is limited in its sphere of action; by its promise to God its scope is bounded by a certain special law. Still, for all that, it is none the less free, since true freedom exists only within the range of the virtuous. "The Blessed" are free, though irrevocably confirmed in glory; God, who by his nature is infinitely just, is free; and man under vows is free "by the freedom with which Christ has made us free." Vows certainly do not exempt those who take them from sinning against them; but to say that on that account they ought not to take them is equivalent to saying that, as a rule, one ought not to undertake what is good in itself, lest through his own fault he should violate his purpose; or, for instance, that he ought not to go to Mass on Sunday, lest some accident might befall him by the way.

From the earliest times vows have been taken. Under the old law they are spoken of, among other passages, in Genesis xxviii., Leviticus xxvii., and Deuteronomy xxiii. Christ could not have bound Himself by vow, according to St. Thomas, because He was God, and because his human will was confirmed in goodness. The Apostles are supposed by many to have vowed whatever belongs to the state of perfection when, after having left all, they followed Christ. It is also said of St. Paul in the Acts of the Apostles that he had a vow; and, again, that the four men whom he took into the temple to be purified "had a vow on them." As to the special vows of religious life, or "the evangelical counsels," as they are called, their substance or subject-matter was marked out by our Lord Himself. These have been observed, at least partially, by individuals or communities since the Apostolic age, and form the basis and substance of the religious state. Vows are of divine institution, but the forms under which they are to be taken in different religious bodies are determined by the legislation of the Church. She admits vows, temporal or perpetual, conditional or absolute, simple or solemn. Vows are solemn because they have been instituted as such and have been accepted as such by the Church.[1] Their obligations are more stringent and their privileges greater than those of simple vows and form one of the special characteristics of a religious order. According to the law enacted by Pope Pius IX. in 1857, only simple vows are to be taken after the noviceship in all religious orders, and that for the term of at least three years; after which time, if superiors should sanction it, their subjects are entitled to take solemn vows. In the Society of Jesus, according to its constitutions, the noviceship being ended, simple vows, with the approbation of superiors, are taken by its members, and after trials of many years, either three public but simple vows or four solemn vows are to be taken by the same members as their superiors shall decide. In a few convents of the Visitation order in the United States, nuns, after having lived duly under simple vows during five years, are admitted to the profession of solemn vows. The members of all other religious communities in the United States take only simple vows. When the subject-matter of vows, or the reason for which they were taken, or the possibility of fulfilling them ceases to exist, they cease to be binding. Their obligation also is cancelled by a dispensation of the Church. To her has been granted by Christ the power of binding and loosing by the words, "Whatsoever you shall bind upon earth shall be bound also in heaven, and whatever you shall loose upon earth shall be loosed also in heaven." To the Pope, therefore, as vicar of Christ, belongs the supreme authority through the whole Church of dispensing from vows for legitimate reasons; and under him bishops and religious superiors having quasi-episcopal jurisdiction have the power of dispensing, on just grounds, from the vows of those who are under their spiritual care. What has been said of the dispensation of vows may, according to due measure, be said also of the commutation of them. For dispensations from solemn vows recourse is to be had to the Pope; for dispensations from simple vows, in religious congregations whose rule has received Papal sanction—from vows of chastity, vows of entering religion, and vows of pilgrimage to the Holy Sepulchre, the limina Apostolorum, or St. James of Compostella—application is likewise to be made to the Holy See or to a superior specially delegated by it for that purpose. Vows taken in religious associations which have received only episcopal approbation may be dispensed from by episcopal authority.

[1] Theologians are much divided on the essential nature of the distinction between solemn and simple vows. It has, of course, nothing to do with the public or private manner in which the vow is made, or the ceremonies which accompany the making of it. A solemn vow implies an absolute and irrevocable surrender, and the acceptance of it by lawful authority. Whereas a simple vow makes marriage unlawful and deprives the person who has made it of the right to use his property, a solemn vow makes marriage invalid and takes away all dominion over property. The vows which Jesuits make at the end of the novitiate annul marriage, but are not irrevocably accepted by the superiors, and therefore are not solemn.

VULGATE. The name is now commonly given to the Latin version of the Bible, authorised by the Catholic Church. In this version all the books found in the Hebrew Bible were translated by Jerome from the Hebrew and Chaldee originals, except the Psalter, which belongs to an Old Latin version revised by Jerome. Judith and Tobias were freely translated by Jerome from the Chaldee (this Chaldee, however, being merely the version of Hebrew originals now lost; see Neubauer, "Book of Tobias," p. xvi.). In the rest of the Old Testament books, and in the deutero-canonical portions of Esther and Daniel, we have the Old Latin translation unaltered; the New Testament consists of the old Latin text revised by Jerome from the Greek. It was only very slowly that this composite work supplanted the Old Latin which had preceded it, and became known as the Vulgate or common edition. It was the Old Latin which, till the seventh century, was recognised as the Vulgate; and not till the thirteenth, according to Kaulen ("Geschichte der Vulgata," p. 22), was the present use of the word firmly fixed.[1] Jerome himself employs the term (1) of the LXX in contrast with the Hebrew (Hieron. "In Is." xv. 20, xxx. 22; Osee vii. 13); (2) of the LXX in the κοινὴ ἔκδοσις—i.e. the corrupt and current text, as opposed to the critical text in Origen's "Hexapla" (Hieron. Ep. cvi. § 2); sometimes (3) of the Old Latin version as made directly from the LXX (Hieron. "In Is." xiv. 29); (4) of the New Testament in the Old Latin (Hieron. "In Matt." xiii. 35).

(A) The Old Latin Version, or Versions, the Itala, &c.—This part of the subject is involved in no little obscurity, and the very fact that the most eminent scholars differ on essential points proves that as yet no certainty has been reached. The critics of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries believed that several translations of the LXX and New Testament into Latin were made in very early times, and that one of these was known as the "Vulgata" or "Communis," because generally received, and again as the Italian version or Itala, from the place of its origin. (So Simon, "Hist. Crit. V. T." liv. ii. ch. 11, A.D. 1680; Hody, "De Bibliorum textibus originalibus, versionibus Græcis et Latina Vulgata." p. 342, A.D. 1705; Mill, "Prolegom. in N.T." p. xli. A.D. 1707.) An epoch was made in the criticism of the history by Wiseman. (Two letters on some parts of the controversy concerning 1 John v. 7.)[1] He maintained that the Latin Church before Jerome had only one translation of the Bible; that this version arose not in Rome or Italy, but in North Africa; that it underwent many recensions or revisions, of which the best and most famous was called by St. Augustine from the place where it was made, "Itala;" that the saint became acquainted with it at Milan and used it in his works. Every part of this theory was received with extraordinary favour. It was adopted by Lachmann, Tischendorf, Tregelles, and many others. Westcott (article Vulgate in Smith's "Dictionary of the Bible") considered its truth demonstrated, and Reinkens ("Hilarius von Poitiers," A.D. 1864) thought some courage was necessary to oppose such a strong consent of scholars. We shall see, however, that the number of dissentient voices has increased of late, and some of those who are best qualified to judge reject the whole of Wiseman's arguments and conclusions. We will take the points one by one.

(a) Were there several Old Latin Versions of the whole Bible current in the early Church? We say of the whole Bible, for it is, we believe, admitted that there was more than one version of Tobias, Maccabees 1 and 2, and of Baruch. The most recent authority—viz. Fritzsche (Plitt und Herzog, "Encycl. für Prot. Theol." art. Latein. Bibelübersetz.)—follows Wiseman and Westcott,[2] and answers in the negative. Reinkens (op. cit. p. 343) believes in several independent versions; so does a very eminent authority—viz. Ziegler ("Lateinische Bibelübersetzungen von Hieron." A.D. 1879, pp. 4–18); so do

[1] Kaulen is no doubt right. Roger Bacon (d. 1284) uses "Vulgata" for the Old Latin. (See the long extract from a MS. of Roger Bacon in Hody, De Bibl. Text. lib. iii. P. ii. ch. 11.)

[1] The edition before us is that of Rome, 1835. But the letters had appeared previously in the Catholic Magazine. They are reprinted in the Cardinal's Essays.

[2] Add Vercellone (Dissertazioni Accademiche, p. 19, Roma, 1864), who at least believes in one version, "ricevuta e sanzionata per l' uso pubblico della Chiesa" "nei primi tempi della Chiesa."

Rönsch ("Itala und Vulgata" ad init. A.D. 1875), and Kaulen ("Einleit. in die H. Schrift," A.D. 1876), while the tone in Westcott and Hort's New Testament ("Introd." p. 79, A.D. 1881) is much less confident than that of Dr. Westcott in Smith's Dictionary.

This divergence of opinion among scholars is quite intelligible considering the uncertainty of the tradition. Tertullian ("Monog." 5) mentions and censures a rendering of 1 Cor. vii. 39, "si dormierit vir ejus," as current in his time ("in usum exiit"), and again he rejects ("Adv. Prax." 5) the customary translation ("in usu est nostrorum") of the Greek λόγος by "Sermo," for which he substitutes "ratio." This seems to show that the African Church about 200 A.D. had one received text, though the possible existence of several translations is not excluded. He speaks ("Adv. Marc." ii. 9) of a translation of the word πνοὴν (Gen. ii.) as given by some ("quidam enimde Græco interpretantes": cf. v. 4, "duæ ostensiones, sicut invenimus interpretatum"); but this need not carry us further than the fact that one Latin version was in various places emended from the Greek, which is admitted on all hands. Jerome clearly believed in many types of text, many revisions of the same version ("tot exemplaria quot codices." Præf. in Jos. and so Præf. in iv. Evang. ad Damas.), but not in many independent versions. His commentary on Jonas ii. 5 is decisive on this point ("Hoc quod in Græco dicitur ἄρα et habet vulgata editio putas, interpretari potest igitur"), considering that nothing can be produced from him on the other side.[1] Cassiodorus ("De Inst. Div. Lit." 14) is explicit. "This text [of the New Testament], varied by the translation of many . . . . was left emended and arranged by the diligent care of the Father Jerome." This can only mean that there was one text which appeared in many recensions, because so many tried their hand at retranslating particular passages from the Greek, while they left the version, as a whole, in its original state. On the other hand, there seems to be no reasonable doubt that St. Augustine attributed the variety of texts to the effect of independent translations. Thus, he says ("Doctr. Christ." ii. 11): "Those who turned the Bible from Hebrew into Greek can be counted, but the Latin translators are innumerable, for in the earliest days of the faith every one who got a Greek MS. into his hands, and thought he had some little acquaintance with each tongue, ventured to translate." The force of this testimony is broken if we accept Wiseman's explanation of "interpretari," "interpres," as meaning "revise," "reviser," of the same version. But the contrast between the Greek translators and the Latin "interpretes" is fatal to Wiseman's view. Besides, Augustine ("Doct. Christ." ii. 14, 15) expressly distinguishes between translation and mere emendation. "The skill of those who desire to know the divine Scriptures must be on the watch, that MSS. not emended may give place to such as are emended, provided they come from one class of translation" ("emendatis non emendati cedant, ex uno duntaxat interpretationis genere venientes;" so "Retract." i. 7, 2 and 3: "ejusdem interpretationis alii codices," "codices ejusdem interpretationis.") For a more complete discussion we must refer to Ziegler (p. 6.)

In ancient then, as in modern times, we find authority ranged against authority, and the proper appeal is to the MSS. of the Old Latin. Here it is only specialists versed in the examination of MSS. and their texts who can claim to be heard. But probably Fritzsche, with whom Westcott and Hort are in accord, is right in the account he gives. In spite, he says, of differences which can only be explained by independent translation of single verses, nay, of "smaller and greater sections," still the fact that the most discordant MSS. fall back again into unity justifies the belief in one single "Vetus Latina," which is the common basis of all the recensions. The differences he noticed may well have led Augustine, who was no critic, to think there had been many independent versions; and, in fact, the instances of difference which he gives are mere variants quite consistent with fundamental unity. (See August. "Doctr. Christ." ii. 12; "Quæst. in Heptateuch," iii. 25.)

(β) Where did the Old Latin Version (supposing that there was one only or one commonly received) arise? Here, too, no certain answer can be given. Wiseman tried to establish a theory suggested by Eichhorn ("Einleit. N. T." vol. iv. p. 355 seq.)—viz. that the "Vetus Latina" arose in North Africa. Westcott and Hort (ii. p. 78), Rönsch ("Itala u.

[1] We say this advisedly, after careful consideration of Ziegler's references and arguments to establish Jerome's belief in a multiplicity of versions.

Vulgat." ad init.), Fritzsche still maintain this position, but it has been abandoned by Gams ("Kirchengeschichte von Spanien," i. p. 86 seq.), Reinkens, ("Hilarius von Poitiers," 335), Kaulen, ("Geschichte der Vulgat." 109 seq.). Greek no doubt was the official language of the early Roman Church. Clement, Caius (circ. 210), Hippolytus, wrote in that tongue; and Pope Victor and the Senator Apollonius are the only Latin authors, prior to Tertullian whom Jerome ("Vir. Illustr." 53) names. This supplies a probable argument for African origin, since in Africa Greek certainly had not the same currency as in Rome. But it is quite another question whether Greek, even at Rome, was the popular language, and whether the poor to whom the Gospel was preached would not require a Latin version as much as the Christians at Carthage. The inscriptions even at Pompeii and Herculaneum are almost without exception in Latin, and De Rossi's collection of Christian inscriptions in the Lateran Museum leads to the same conclusion (Ziegler, p. 23). Wiseman tried to show that the Old Latin and the vulgate of the New Testament—i.e. the Old Latin or an Old Latin version revised by Jerome—is full of "Africanisms," and this, if true, would settle the question. But Gams (p. 86–100) has simply annihilated this argument. He has shown that every supposed Africanism can be met with parallels from Christian and heathen writers who had nothing to do with Africa. To accept Wiseman's instances, we must suppose that the Latin version of Irenæus, the Muratorian fragment, the Latin version of Hermas, were made in Africa; and even this gratuitous assumption would not suffice. The linguistic peculiarities of the Old Latin and Vulgate belong partly to the decadence of Latin, partly to the "lingua rustica," or vulgar language. Even Rönsch, who still appeals to this theory of Africanisms, admits that these "Africanisms" were common to the language of South Italy, and this amounts to a surrender of the argument.

(γ) As to the date and authorship of the earliest Latin version, we can only say that most of the New Testament books must have existed at the close of the second century, and that the version came from many authors. The latter point was established long ago by Mill ("Proleg." 2 seq.)

(δ) What is meant by the Itala? The word as a technical term occurs once only in Patristic literature—viz. in August. "Doctr. Christ." ii. 14, 15. "Among translations let the Italian be preferred to the rest, for it sticks closer to the words and gives a clear sense." St. Augustine must mean some version of Italian origin, for we cannot think Ott's suggestion that "Itala" means simply the Latin version in the use of the African Church or that of Rönsch: it was written in "the popular provincial dialect of Italy; therefore the name 'Itala,'" even plausible. "Itala" then must mean either a translation or the revision of a translation made in North Italy, and most likely St. Augustine made acquaintance with it at Milan, brought it to Africa, and used it in his works. Scholars believe it a translation or a recension, according to the views they take on the previous questions. Fritzsche and (with some hesitation) Westcott and Hort hold it to have been a recension of the original African work. The two last, indeed, regard it as a revision of a revision, for they distinguish between the Old Latin of African origin, a revision of this current in Europe, and a revision of this European text made from Greek MSS. and also with a desire to improve the style. This last, current from about 350, they call the Itala. They think it survives in f (Cod. Brixian., vi. Sæc., Gospels) and g (Cod. Monacens., Sæc. vi., Fragments of Gospels), and in St. Augustine's quotations. Ziegler, on the other hand, distinguishes between the version of Tertullian (for the divergence of this author from all known authorities see Hilgenfeld, "Einleit. Nov. Test." p. 798), that of most African writers—viz. Cyprian, Lactantius (educated in Africa), Commodian, Firmicus, Maternus, Primasius, that represented by Augustine, the Italian Fathers and the Friesingen Fragments of the Pauline Epistles.

(B) The Vulgate in the Modern Sense.—1. Jerome's Labours: (a) In Revising the Old Latin.—Pope Damasus requested Jerome to revise the Latin version of the New Testament, then in terrible confusion, and in A.D. 383 the Gospels, so revised, made their appearance. He tells us ("Præf. ad Dam.") that he corrected the errors of scribes, false emendations and false translations; that he used for this purpose Old Greek MSS., but left the faults of the old version untouched if they did not affect the sense. To the rest of his revision of the New Testament he has left no preface, probably because so much revision was not needed (see Westcott in Smith). In the same year he made a cursory revision of the Psalter from the LXX. This revision is known as the Roman Psalter, because used in the Roman Church till the time of St. Pius V. It is still retained at St. Peter's, and in the Ambrosian rite, in the invitatory Psalm at matins in our own Breviary, and in some portions of the Missal (e.g. in the Tract for first Sunday in Lent; Kaulen, "Vulg." p. 160).[1] Soon after, retiring to Bethlehem in 387, Jerome made a more careful revision of the Psalter from the Hexaplar text (the Roman had been made from the κοινή. See Jerome's "Præf. in Psalm." with Vallarsi's note). This revision is the one in present use. It is known as the Gallican Psalter, because, as it is said, introduced into Gaul by Gregory of Tours (Walafr. Strabo, "De Reb. Eccles." i. 25). He then proceeded to revise all the books of the Old Testament which he recognised as canonical (i.e. all except the deuterocanonical ones. See "Præf. ad Salom. Libr."). It is certain that this revision was completed (Hieron. in Tit. ii. Ep. lxxi. 5, cli. 19, "Adv. Ruf." ii. 25), but great part of it seems to have been lost in Jerome's own time (Ep. cxxxiv. 2), and besides the two revisions of the Psalter the book of Job alone is extant. But we have also the prefaces to Job, Prov., Cant., Paralip., Eccles. (Kaulen, p. 163), and much may be restored from Jerome's commentaries on the Prophets, particularly on the Minor Prophets and on Ecclesiastes (Hody, p. 354 seq.).

(β) Translation from the Hebrew.—Jerome began to learn Hebrew when forty-five, under a converted Jew, as a remedy against sensual temptation (Ep. cxxv. 12). He speaks ("Præf. ad Job," and "In Habac." ii. 15) of a Jew of Lydda whom he hired at great cost, and (Ep. lxxxiv. 3) of a certain Baraninas who came to him by night for fear of his brother Jews. It is this Baraninas who in the silly joke of Rufinus ("Apol." ii. 12) appears as Barabbas. Thus prepared, Jerome began to translate from the Hebrew. The four books of Kings were published first. Then followed the book of Job, the Prophets, and the version of the Psalter from the "Hebrew truth." This last, of which the best edition is the recent one by Lagarde, has never been admitted to public use. Illness interrupted Jerome's labour, but in 393 he resumed it again, and translated the three books of Solomon, Esdras, Paralipom. and Genesis appeared between 394 and 396; early in 404 the rest of the Pentateuch had been published; in 404 and 405 Josue, Judges, Ruth, Esther, with the deuterocanonical portions of Daniel and Esther, and the books of Tobias and Judith.[1] No attempt was made to translate or even to revise Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus or Maccabees (Kaulen, p. 168 seq.; but see also Westcott in the "Bible Dictionary").

2. Reception of the Vulgate in the Church.—Jerome at first met with little gratitude. He had his own reward, for he had lived "to pluck sweet fruit from the bitter root" of Hebrew study, which he again and again had given up in despair and begun afresh "in eagerness to learn" (Ep. cxxv. 12). But that for a time was all. He was attacked by those who mistake ignorance for piety—nay, a letter was forged in his name to the effect that he had been induced to pervert the Scriptures by the Jews ("Adv. Rufin." ii. 25). Even Augustine objected to Jerome's translating from the Hebrew, because it was impossible to improve on the LXX (August. Ep. xxviii. 2), and because of the discord a new translation would cause (Ep. lxxi.). He admits that the Jews (who were the only persons capable of judging) testified to Jerome's accuracy, but adds that he himself keeps to the prevailing belief in the inspiration of the LXX ("De Civ. Dei." xviii. 43). But gradually scholarship prevailed against prejudice. Cassian ("Collat." xxiii. 9) quotes the Vulgate of Job as the "emendatior translatio," and in the fifth century it was adopted by Eucherius of Lyons, Vincent of Lerins, Sedulius, Claudianus Mamertus, and Faustus Rhegensis (Hody, p. 397 seq.), though the Old Latin held its ground in Africa and Britain (Hody, ib.). In the sixth century the Vulgate was coming into general use. Cassiodorus ("Inst. Div. Lit." 12) strongly prefers it to the old version, though at a later date St. Gregory the Great ("Præf. ad Job," 5) speaks of "the Apostolic see" as using both. In the seventh century St. Isidore of Seville ("Eccles. Offic." i. 12) says "all the churches" used the Vulgate, which must have been true at least of Spain. Early in the ninth century Rabanus

[1] It was used till 1808 at Venice in the chapel of the Doge (Kaulen, Vulg. loc. cit.).

[1] We take these conjectural dates from Westcott, with whom, however, neither Kaulen nor Fritzsche entirely agrees.

Maurus ("Cler. Inst." ii. 54) says the same thing, almost in the words of Isidore; and Walafrid Strabo, the disciple of Rabanus, writes ("Præf. in Gloss. ordinar."), "the whole Roman Church now everywhere uses this translation" (i.e. Jerome's). The Council of Trent in a decree which we shall have to examine further on, declared the Vulgate to be the authentic version of the Church, and in doing so appealed with good right to the long use of ages.

3. History of the Text.—The text of this composite work which we call the Vulgate was exposed to special danger of corruption. Side by side with it stood the Old Latin used for a long time after Jerome's death in many churches, familiar to the scribes, and standing in the most curious relations to our Vulgate—in some books identical with it; in others differing to a slight extent; in others offering an independent translation. Hence "mixed texts" arose in which the Vulgate and Old Latin were confused, when they should have been kept distinct. In 802 Alcuin revised the text with marked success from ancient Vulgate MSS., but without consulting the Greek (Porson to Travis, p. 145). Subsequent revisions were made by Theodulf of Orleans (787–821); Lanfranc, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1089); the Cistercian abbot Stephen II. (1109), and Cardinal Nicolaus (1150). After that, different corporations issued "Correctoria," in which various readings were mentioned and discussed. Such were the "Correctorium Parisiense" (also called "Senonense," because approved by the Archbishop of Sens), the Correctorium of the Dominicans drawn up by Hugo a S. Caro about 1240, and shortly after replaced by another, and that of the Franciscans.

The first printed book was a copy of the Vulgate (Mayence, about 1450), and after 1470 a number of editions appeared, professing to be emended from the original texts (Kaulen, p. 311). In 1516 Erasmus revised the Vulgate New Testament, which he altered partly to bring the text into harmony with his own Greek text, which was of little value, and partly from a desire to improve the style. The really critical work of giving a purer Vulgate text from old MSS. was undertaken by Gumelli (Paris 1504), the Dominican Castellaer (Venice, 1511), Laridius (Cologne, 1530). None of these editions are of much account, but valuable contributions to the restoration of a critical text were made by Cardinal Ximenes in the Complutensian Polyglott (1502–1517), and by R. Stephens (1528, many subsequent editions). The Theological Faculty of Louvain entrusted the task of a new critical revision to Henten, of Malines, and his first edition, based on that of Stephens in 1540 and a collation of Latin MSS., was published in 1547. After Henten's death, in 1566, the Louvain theologians resolved to issue a correct edition of the Vulgate, answering to the requirements of the Council of Trent ("Vulgata editio quam emendatissima imprimatur"). With the help of the Antwerp printer Plantinus, and under the guidance of one of their own members, Lucas Brugensis (i.e. of Bruges), a great quantity of MSS. were collated; but their text of 1574 is identical with that of Henten (1547), except that they had added to the number of marginal readings. We must also mention a Lyons Vulgate of 1545, which gives valuable and ancient readings, though without naming the sources.

Meantime, commissions had set to work in Rome at the preparation of an official text, and in 1590 Sixtus V. issued an edition, prefixing to it the constitution "Æternus ille," in which he ordered it to be used in all discussions public and private, and to be received as "true, lawful, authentic and unquestioned." Unfortunately, the Pope revised the work of the commission with his own hand, and on principles different from theirs; he called needless attention to typographical errors, by pasting them over with pieces of paper; and nobody was satisfied with the result.[1] In 1592 the definitive edition known as the Clementine saw the light. The printer's work in the first edition of the Clementine was worse done than in the Sixtine Bible, but it had this merit, that it returned to the text fixed by the Roman commissions (Kaulen, "Einleit." p. 126). It was not a perfect text of the Vulgate. The preface disclaims any such exaggerated praise—nay, admits that imperfections had been left "of set purpose," lest offence should be given to the people, as well as for other reasons. But the Clementine editors rightly claim to have supplied a purer text than any hitherto known, and Vercellone ("Dissertaz." iv.)

has shown that it is the fruit of long and well-directed toil and of great opportunities. The work of correction was continued for about forty years with few interruptions. The most eminent men from all countries were summoned to take part in the revision: among them Sirlet, Caraffa, Bellarmin, Morinus (a critic who has had few equals), Allen, Turrianus, Toletus, Sà (the famous Portuguese commentator), Agellius, whose commentary on the Psalms is still esteemed, especially for its critical remarks on the Alexandrine and Vulgate texts. They used the Codex Amiatinus (A) written about 541; the codex Paullinus (C), a ninth-century copy of Alcuin's recension; the Vallicellianus (D), a MS. of the same type but rather older; the Ottobonianus (E, Sæc. viii., imperfect at the beginning, and ending with Judges xiii. 20); besides a number of Vatican MSS. Further, they had collations of the Toletanus (B, Sæc. viii. according to Westcott, later according to Vercellone) and of another Spanish MS. from Leon. They had the benefit of French readings in the Stephanic edition of 1540 and collations of sixty Belgian MSS. made by Plantinus; and they understood the weight due to ancient authorities. Vercellone tells us they "preferred to every codex" that known as the "Amiatinus," the Queen of Vulgate MSS.[1] Still there were precious MSS., like the Fuldensis of the New Testament (A.D. 546), unknown to them; and textual criticism has advanced a long way since their time. Valuable contributions to the formation of a better text have been made by Vercellone ("Variæ Lectiones"), and a distinguished scholar, the Rev. John Wordsworth, has put forth the prospectus of a new critical edition of the Vulgate New Testament.

4. The Critical Value of the Vulgate and its Merits as a Translation.—The latter point is of course quite distinct from the former. The LXX is a very imperfect translation, but its critical value is very great. We have no Hebrew MSS. older than the ninth century, and those we have represent one single type of text, fixed by the Masorets or "holders of tradition," who did not finish their work till eight centuries after Christ, and preserved with superstitious care ever since. Again, the earlier Hebrew writing simply gave the consonants of each word, and the vowel points are an invention not completed till the seventh century of our era. We have, indeed, a collection of various readings in our Hebrew Bibles, but as a rule they are of little interest, and the diligent labours of Kennicott and De Rossi at the end of the last and the beginning of this century prove how scanty is the harvest which can be reaped from the most exhaustive collation of existing Hebrew MSS. Most welcome, then, is the light which comes to us from times far before the fixing of the Masoretic text. We find important variations in that Hebrew Pentateuch which the Samaritans received from the Jews about 430, while the Book of Jubilees, a Hebrew work written shortly before the final destruction of Jerusalem, agrees in some of the numbers assigned to the age of the Patriarchs, and in other readings with the Samaritan edition of the Pentateuch. But the LXX offers the fullest and most valuable evidence now accessible on the early state of the Hebrew text. The Pentateuch was translated about 280, and the rest of the version some time before 133 B.C., and we find ourselves carried back at once to a text differing in important respects from that of our Hebrew Bibles. It is not only that we meet with various readings, often strongly commended by internal evidence, but we find certain sections present in the Greek and wanting in the Hebrew, or vice versa. These differences are most striking in the books of Samuel and Kings, in Proverbs and in Jeremias, in the last of which no less than 2,700 words of the Hebrew have nothing answering to them in the Greek. The Vulgate of the Old Testament, so far as it is Jerome's work, possesses no such interest as this. His text is far nearer that of the Masoretic, and many scholars have denied it any independent value. It is as close to the Masoretic text, says Eichhorn, as any Spanish MS. from a modern synagogue; and Wellhausen, in his edition of Bleek's Introduction, says much the same thing, in a more guarded way. The true state of the case seems to be put by Nowack ("Bedeutung des Hieron. für die A. T. Critik," 1875), and the following is a summary of his judgment. Jerome had before him a text with the words divided much as in our modern Hebrew Bibles; it was, however, destitute of vowel points or diacritic marks. His vocalisation, compared with that of other versions, was the nearest of all to the Masoretic, and his consonant text very near to it on the whole; for it presents no great omissions or additions like those of the LXX. Still, many of his readings are "indispensable for a correct understanding of the text," especially those which are peculiar to him, or only common to the Chaldee and Syriac versions. The case stands very differently with the Vulgate text of the New Testament. Here we have to deal with two distinct elements: the Old Latin, which forms the substratum, and the corrections due to Jerome. The latter carry us back to the fourth century, when Jerome lived, and beyond that, since he consulted MSS. which were old even then.[1] Hence, as we have no MS. of the New Testament prior to the fourth century, and only two at most which belong to it, the value of the Vulgate for critical purposes may be easily seen. "It represents," says Dr. Westcott, "the received Greek text of the fourth century, and so far claims a respect (speaking roughly) due to a first-class Greek MS." Jerome supplements "the original testimony of Greek MSS. by an independent witness." When identical with the Old Latin, the Vulgate, says the same scholar, has "a more venerable authority," for this translation was "fixed and current more than a century before the transcription of the oldest Greek MS. Thus it is a witness to a text more ancient and cæteris paribus more valuable than is represented by any other authority, unless the Peshito in its present form be excepted." This value is much increased by the fact that the extremely literal character of the Old Latin enables us as a rule to restore with confidence the Greek text which the translators read, and though the Old Latin was marred by interpolations, the corruptions proceeded according to a different law from those of Greek MSS., so that "the two authorities mutually correct each other."

[1] Mr. Law draws attention to the verdict of Ranke (Codex Fuldens. p. 562), one of the highest authorities on the Latin Bible, and himself a Protestant. Ranke rejects as undoubtedly erroneous the opinion of those who think the authorised revision of the Vulgate uncritical.

We turn next to the merits of the Vulgate as a translation. It is admitted on all hands that Jerome's version from the Hebrew is a masterly work, and that there is nothing like it or near it in antiquity. A perfect work it could not be, and this for the very reasons which may well increase admiration of the measure of success which Jerome actually reached. Few advantages were open to him which are denied to modern scholars. Hebrew had ceased for centuries to be a living tongue, and Jerome, moreover, had to learn it orally: there was no such thing as a Hebrew grammar, or a dictionary, or a concordance. The comparative philology of the Semitic languages, often the only key to the meaning of Hebrew words, is the creation of modern times; and Jerome knew no other Semitic language except Chaldee, and that very imperfectly ("Praef. ad Job"). He made many mistakes now impossible to a tyro of average intelligence who has learnt the elements in a good grammar. For instance, he believed Hebrew to be the mother of all languages (Hieron. Ep. xviii.), whereas it is generally agreed that Arabic on the whole comes nearer the primitive form even of the Semitic tongues; that the guttural ע was a vowel (in Osee ii. 16, 17); that the noun צֶדֶק was an adjective meaning "just" (in Is. i. 21); he confuses עָפָר, "dust," with אֵפֶר, "ashes" ("Quæst. in Gen." ii. 14); חֶרֶב, a "sword," with עֹרֵב a "raven" (in Zeph. ii. 15). His version tells the same tale as his commentaries. He had no idea of the elementary rules on the construct state (Jer. xxxiii. 4; Ez. xl. 14; Osee x. 4, xiv. 3; Ezech. xxi. 77); he makes a plur. masc. agree with a sing. fem. (Jer. xi. 15), breaks other simple laws of concord and construction (Ez. xlviii. 10; Is. xli. 7; Zach. iv. 12; Zeph. i. 2); misunderstands the force of tenses (Jer. xliv. 25; Ez. xi. 16; Joel iv. 4); shows his ignorance of syntax (Jud. viii. 5; Eccles. ii. 3). As a natural consequence of all this, he very often misses the sense in difficult places. We have no room for instances, which would need explanation to those who have no acquaintance with Hebrew; while those who are Hebrew scholars will find them easily enough if they turn, e.g., to Job or the harder parts of the Prophets. We can only explain the excellence of the Vulgate from the fidelity of Jewish exegetical tradition, and the honest industry with which Jerome used it. No admiration can be too great for Jerome's courage and independence, his thirst for learning, his outspoken candour, his contempt for the ignorant bigotry which he fought and conquered; but they know little of his spirit who, blind to the progress of Hebrew learning, use the very arguments against modern philology which were employed against Jerome by the advocates of the LXX. Little need be said on the translation of the New Testament. It is close and literal, and executed when Greek was a living tongue; and even its faults arise "most commonly from a servile adherence to the exact words of the original" (Westcott).

5. The Authority of the Vulgate in the Church.—The Council of Trent, "considering that no small profit would accrue to the Church of God if it be made known which of all the Latin editions of the sacred books in actual circulation is to be esteemed authentic, ordains and declares that the same (hæc ipsa) old and Vulgate edition which has been approved by the long use of so many ages in the Church itself, is to be held for authentic in public readings, discourses and disputes, and that nobody may dare or presume to reject it on any pretence." A little earlier it had anathematised those who knowingly refuse to accept the canonical books "with all their parts, as they have been accustomed to be read in the Catholic Church, and are contained in the old Latin Vulgate" (Concil. Trid. Sess. iv., Decret. de Canon. Script., Decret. de Edit. et Us. Sacr. Libr.). We shall begin by explaining what the council does not mean, and we shall distinguish points in our interpretation now at least universally admitted from those on which there is still difference of opinion.

First, then, no particular edition of the Vulgate is declared to be authentic; and as a matter of fact neither the Sixtine nor Clementine, nor any other authoritative edition, existed at the time of the decree. The Sixtine edition by implication, and the Clementine expressly, admit that they are not perfect; and if, says Cardinal Franzelin ("De Traditione et Scriptura," p. 470), we can show that a text of whatever kind, though found in the Clementine edition, is no part of the old Vulgate, that text is not declared authentic by the council. Hence a Catholic is perfectly free to reject the text of the "three witnesses" (John v. 7) on this among other grounds, that it formed no part of the primitive Vulgate. "In fact," says Kaulen, an author of unquestioned orthodoxy, "the passage occurs neither in the oldest MSS. of the original, nor in the old versions, nor in the Fathers before the end of the fifth century, and is only to be regarded as commentary on v. 8, venerable on account of its diffusion in the Church" ("Einleit." p. 36). Vercellone, as we shall see presently, goes much further than Kaulen. Franzelin ("De Deo Trino," Thes. iv) and Scheeben ("Dogmatik," p. 757) insist on the necessity of accepting the text, because in any case it is part of the Vulgate as received for many centuries in the Church. We reply that the council does not require us to acknowledge as authentic any text simply because received for many centuries. The Fathers of Trent only bid us receive the Vulgate version which in matter of fact, and with substantial identity of form, has been approved by the long use of the Church.[1] Besides, Pallavicino ("Istoria del Concil. di Trento." vi. 17, n. 5) takes the "long use of ages" to mean from St. Gregory's time; and we have good ground for thinking that the text in question was no part of the Vulgate even then, for it is wanting in the two oldest MSS. (Amiatinus and Fuldensis), written about 545, and in Alcuin's reputed copies at Rome (prima manu), and at London (Scrivener, p. 562).

Next, no comparison is made between the Vulgate and versions in other languages—e.g. the Peshito—much less between the Vulgate and the originals. The council compares the Vulgate with other Latin versions, and pronounces the former authentic.

Thirdly, the Vulgate even in its purest form is not declared to be perfect. Such perfection was, indeed, attributed to it by some Post-Tridentine theologians, but was utterly denied by many Catholic scholars at the time (Hody, p. 509 seq.), and now probably would be affirmed by nobody. Franzelin sets this exaggerated view aside as little better than fanatical.[2]

Fourthly, Franzelin admits the lawfulness of holding that texts directly intended to teach dogmatic truth may have been omitted in the Vulgate; and again that even when such texts are given, considerable alterations may have been made in their form. For example, he grants

[1] The council regarded the version as the species of which particular copies were the individuals, and approved the former only (Letter of the Cardinal di S. Croce, apud Vercellone, p. 85); and desired that the Vulgate should be corrected from the most ancient texts (ib. p. 80). This settles the question of John v. 7.

[2] He shows (De Tradit. et Script. p. 501) that a decree of the Congregation of the Council (Jan. 17, 1576), which misled many theologians, is of no authority.

that we are at liberty in Gen. iii. 15 to reject the Vulgate (or supposed Vulgate) reading, "she shall crush thy head," as an error, for "he shall crush thy head"; and similarly, that we may deny the correctness of the rendering "ante luciferum" (Ps. cix. 3), "fundetur" (Luc. xxii. 20), "in quo omnes peccaverunt" (Rom. v. 12), "omnes quidem resurgemus" (1 Cor. xv. 21).

Here, however, Franzelin (as also Scheeben and others) makes two reservations. He argues that the decree of Trent requires us to believe that the Vulgate is accurate substantially (quoad substantiam) in texts "which are in themselves (i.e. directly and in their primary intention) testimonies concerning matters of faith and morals." We confess that we are quite unable to see any sufficient ground for this part of his thesis. No such distinction is made by the council. It is not even hinted at in the important correspondence on the sense of the decree between the Papal legates and the Congregation at Rome, printed by Vercellone ("Dissertaz." p. 79 seq.). We can find no trace of it in the elaborate collection of Catholic theological opinions in Hody;[1] while Vercellone's opinion is supported by Vega and Didacus, both of whom were at the council, as well as by Ruggerius and Natalis Alexander (Hody, pp. 511, 520, 522, 545). The distinction which allows us to reject such a reading as, e.g., "She shall bruise thy head," and binds us to accept such a verse as, e.g., "This kind goeth not forth save by prayer and fasting" (Marc. ix. 218), is surely a very subtle one. To determine what texts are directly and primarily dogmatic, and then what changes will affect only the mode in which the doctrine is presented, leaves immense scope for private judgment. Had the council meant to limit criticism, it would surely have expressed itself more clearly. Be this at it may, it is certain that the question is an open one. Vercellone, who was probably the greatest of all authorities on the Vulgate, published his treatise "On the Authenticity of the Single Parts of the Vulgate Bible" ("Sulla Autenticità delle Singole Parti della Bibbia Volgata") at Rome in 1866. This dissertation appeared with the imprimatur of the Master of the Sacred Palace, and in no way lessened the high reputation of its author. He holds that there may be an error of translation even in passages which the Fathers and the Church herself have regarded as dogmatic, and he rejects by anticipation the whole of Franzelin's distinction. Besides the reasons given he urges that it would need a series of miracles to preserve a text pure in the hands of copyists from all error in dogmatic texts, and the very same reasons which plead for an immaculate translation also plead for a perfect preservation of the text; he points out that we have no right to expect such a miracle, since the versions received for centuries in the East and West contain many variations in passages considered to be dogmatic, with some faults of omission and addition; while all theologians admit that councils may err in the texts they allege in proof of their definitions, although the definitions themselves are exempt from error.

Franzelin's second reservation concerns sections like Mark xvi. 9–20; John vii. 53—viii. 11; John v. 4. Many Protestant critics have rejected them as interpolations, but Franzelin is of opinion that they must be accepted by Catholics on the authority of the council which sets its seal to the books of the Bible, as contained in the Vulgate, "with all their parts." The judgment of Vercellone is diametrically opposite. He believes that the words "cum omnibus suis partibus" refer simply "to those deuterocanonical portions which were disputed by the heretics of that age, such as the additions to Daniel and Esther." If criticism showed these sections to be apocryphal he "would have no difficulty in accepting its conclusions," and "would not believe them contrary to the decree of Trent" (p. 46).

What, then, is the meaning of the council? It teaches that the Vulgate contains nothing contrary to true faith and sound morals. This was the great point present to the mind of the Fathers. They were unwilling, the legates write, to abstain from a formal approval of the Vulgate, "which was never suspected of heresy, that being the chief thing in the sacred books" (Vercellone, loc. cit. p. 16). But this is not all. The Vulgate is "authentic": in other words, the council assures us that the books in that version "are in substance entire and incorrupt, [1] I.e. none of the theologians make Franzelin's distinction between the substance of a dogmatic text and the mode of its presentation. Hody divides Catholic theologians into two classes: (1) those who "contend for the translation against the original"; (2) those who hold that the Vulgate was declared authentic "quia nullum continet in fide et moribus perniciosum errorem" (pp. 510, 511).

and therefore to be received by us as divine" (ib. p. 37). We may admit in the Vulgate all defects which may exist "in any book whatever without destroying its substantial integrity" (p. 36). To be more precise: the Church has never in any age or in any place mistaken a counterfeit for the written Word of God. "Therefore, all those innumerable variations which occur between the modern Latin Vulgate and the old Latin version lawfully employed for so many centuries in the Western Church do not destroy the substantial integrity of the Bible. Nor is this integrity destroyed by all those variations which are found if we confront our copies of the modern Vulgate with the ancient copies of the Greek Church, or with those of the Syrians, Armenians, Copts, or other Catholics in any part of the Church. . . . From a theological point of view (dogmaticamente), all the versions employed by lawful authority in the Church are equal" (p. 33). If we take the decree in this, as we believe, its true sense, no defence of it is so much as needed. A Catholic is not at liberty to say with Calvin (Hody, p. 551) that there are scarcely three verses in the Vulgate without some striking blunder, but a statement of this kind is contrary to sober criticism as well as to the Tridentine decree. "An authorised edition," says Westcott (p. 1705), "became a necessity for the Roman Church, and however gravely later theologians may have erred in explaining the policy or intentions of the Tridentine Fathers on this point, there can be no doubt that . . . the principle of their decision—the preference, that is, of the oldest Latin text to any later Latin version—was substantially right." (See also Scrivener, p. 311.)

Little need be said on the public use of the Vulgate, which is of course a mere matter of discipline. Catholic scholars may, and often do, translate from the original, and Vercellone has made valuable collections of various readings in the Vulgate text. But it is not lawful to use any except the Clementine edition in church, or to print any other text of the Vulgate, or even to insert various readings in the margin (Preface to the Clementine edition, ad fin.); though there is no objection to placing them at the foot of the page.

(The chief authorities have been named in the course of the article, except Van Ess, "Pragmatisch-kritische Geschichte der Vulgata," Tübingen, 1824; Brunati, "De Nomine, Auctore, Emendatoribus et Authentia Vulgatæ," Vienna, 1837. General readers will find the best account of the Vulgate in Mr. Law's treatise quoted above.)

W

WAR. The resort to force on the part of two or more nations which cannot settle their differences by peaceful methods. The word "nation" implies that war must be carried on by the people of a country regarded as a whole, and represented by its Government, not by any section of the population acting for itself. That concentrated and organised force of political society which is behind the tribunal of the magistrate, and executes the sentence of the judge, in war is turned outward, and applied to the overcoming of the corresponding force exerted by the hostile nation.

There have been sects, notably the Quakers, which have denied altogether the lawfulness of war, partly because they believed it to be prohibited by Christ (Matt. v. 39, &c.), partly on humanitarian grounds. On the Scriptural ground they are easily refuted; the case of the soldiers instructed in their duties by St. John the Baptist, and that of the military men whom Christ and his Apostles loved and familiarly conversed with, without a word to imply that their calling was unlawful, sufficiently prove the point. They are on stronger ground when they point to the frightful evils of every kind which war unchains upon a community, and the more so in proportion to its civilisation; and when they urge that war should be put an end to by a general agreement among nations to resort to arbitration, it is impossible not to go a long way with them. There have been, however, and there probably will be again, many disputes between nations which they would under no circumstances submit to arbitration; and in these cases, if negotiation has failed, and there be, on one side or on both, great exasperation, war must inevitably ensue. But the voice of morality, enlightened by religion, is not thereby silenced; it claims to define, both what wars may be justly undertaken, and how they should be conducted. On these subjects there is a tolerably general consensus of opinion as to a number of important points among theologians, canonists, and publicists.

a. The question what wars are just resolves itself into two inquiries—what is just for the State, and what is just for the individual. A State may justly declare war in order to recover territory of which it has been unjustly deprived, or to reassert its authority over subjects who have declared themselves independent, or to punish gross and wanton insults to its citizens while invested with a public capacity, and for several other causes. The canonists hold that a State may lawfully make war upon a heretic people, which is actively spreading heresy, and stirring up dissension and rebellion within its own subject provinces; or upon a pagan people, which prevents the preaching of the Gospel, and refuses free passage to missioners who desire to carry the light of faith to countries beyond. When the justice of a war is doubtful, Grotius ("De Jure Belli et Pacis," c. 23, cited in Ferraris) urges that, considering the evils which war entails, particularly upon innocent persons, Governments ought to prefer to remain at peace; and this is probably now the general opinion. It is no just cause of war that a State desires to rule over its neighbour, or to enlarge its dominions, or add to its wealth or power, or to preserve a certain balance of force and prevent another nation from becoming dangerously powerful, unless the aggrandisement feared tend manifestly and indisputably to the subjugation of other nations.

The subjects and citizens of a Government declaring war are safe in obeying it, and taking up arms in its behalf, unless they are certain that its cause is unjust. "In doubtful matters we ought always to obey, . . . because, though the ruler may sin in commanding, the subject does not sin in obeying" (Glossa on St. Augustine, quoted by Ferraris). But a foreign auxiliary, enlisting himself voluntarily in the service of a nation at war, is bound to satisfy himself beforehand that its cause is just. If a soldier is certain that the cause in which his Government is fighting is unjust, he ought to obtain his discharge as soon as he can, and in the meantime to abstain, so far as possible, from acts of hostility.

β. As to the manner of conducting war, opinion formerly tended to harsher conclusions than those now commonly received. All movable property used to be looked upon as the lawful spoil of the soldiers of an invading force. "Quæ ab hostibus capimus, jure gentium statim nostra fiunt"—"The things which we take from our enemies, by the law of nations immediately become our own" (Ferraris, art. iii. § 34). Animals used for ploughing, and seed corn, were excepted from this right of spoil enjoyed by conquerors. At the present day, among civilised nations, private property on land is held to be exempt from spoliation in time of war. The invading general requisitions the authorities of the towns and villages which he occupies for such supplies as he may require, with or without payment; and, if these requisitions be complied with, it is held to be his duty to restrain his soldiers from every species of plunder. Private property at sea is still subject to be seized, and converted to the use of the captors.

The duties of a soldier in war towards the State which he serves and the general who commands him comprehend faithful service, courage, and prompt obedience. Hence desertion, cowardice, and breaches of discipline, are in a soldier grievous sins.

Ambush, stratagem, and deceit are lawful in time of war, for those whose lives are in continual peril cannot be expected to abstain from any practice against their enemies which might tend to lessen that peril. In practice, the resort to such means is limited in some degree by the code of military honour. The use of poisoned weapons and explosive bullets is generally condemned, as causing a great increase of suffering to those wounded by them, without any corresponding military advantage. (Ferraris, Bellum.)

WASHING OF FEET. [See HOLY WEEK.]

WASHING OF HANDS BEFORE AND AFTER MASS. A rubric of the Roman Missal directs the celebrating priest to wash his hands in the sacristy before he puts on his vestments. The Jewish priests used to wash their hands and feet before they officiated at the altar (Ex. xxx. 18–21; 2 Paralip. iv. 2, 6), and in such passages as Ps. xxvi. 6, and lxxiii. 13, there is an allusion to the ethical meaning of this rite. The early Christians adopted a similar usage; only with them the preliminary lustration before prayer was common to all the laity. Many of the Fathers testify to the prevalence of this custom. (See, e.g., Euseb. "H.E." x. 4.; Chrysost. Hom. iii. "In Epist. ad Ephes."; and Cæsar. Serm. 51, numbered 229 in Appendix iv. to St. Augustine.) In later times this preliminary ablution was prescribed for priests only. It is also usual for priests to wash their fingers in the sacristy after Mass when they have taken off their vestments.

Quite distinct from either of these washings is the washing of the priest's hands after the offertory, and again after Communion. (For these see LAVABO; ABLUTION; PURIFICATION.)

WHITE FRIARS. [See CARMELITES.]

WHITE GARMENT. [See BAPTISM, and LOW SUNDAY.]

WHIT-SUNDAY. The common name in England for Pentecost. Mr. Skeat ("Etymological Dictionary," sub voc.) shows that the derivation is plain and certain. It descends from the Anglo-Saxon "hwita Sunnandaeg," and means "White Sunday." It is more difficult to say why the name was given, but probably the author just quoted is right in his suggestion that it refers to the white robe of baptism. Easter and Pentecost were for many ages the times at which baptism was administered, and in cold climates, like our own, Pentecost would be preferred to Easter for the reception of baptism, which, in those days, was given by immersion. If this explanation is correct, our name for Pentecost would resemble the Latin title for Low Sunday, viz. "Dominica in Albis."

WILL. The ancient definition of a will or testament by the Roman jurists was "the lawful sentence of our will concerning that which a person wishes to be done after his death." Many writers hold that the words "with the institution of an heir" should be added to the definition, because such institution is "of the essence of the testament" (Ferraris). The business of will-making, in England at least, is now regulated in all its parts by the statute-law; and those desiring information respecting it can find what they seek in the ordinary law-books, or, which is the safer course, obtain it from their lawyer. All that will be here attempted is (1) to point out some special circumstances about the wills of Christians which the history of primitive times brings to our knowledge; (2) to advert generally to the manner in which the subject was regarded in the middle ages; (3) to specify some of the principal features of the modern canon law in regard to testamentary disposition.

(1) After the conversion of Constantine the imperial law (Cod. Theod. 16, 2, 4) sanctioned and facilitated the bequest of property of all kinds to the Church. Such property became the patrimony of the Church and the poor, and could not thereafter be the subject of a will, except so far as a man might desire, and be entitled, to point out its future dispensers.[1] Clerics, therefore, of all grades, could not dispose by will of any property, movable or immovable, which they had become possessed of in virtue of their office. Justinian, in the Code, allows bishops to bequeath property which they possessed before, or which they had inherited since, their consecration; everything else they could only leave to the Church. This law was enforced by Gregory the Great in several remarkable instances. Justinian, also, while allowing secular priests to make wills (Nov. 76, 1), withheld the right altogether from monks. The power of testamentary disposition was frequently taken from and restored to heretics in the imperial legislation. A constitution of Valentinian (370) forbade women to bequeath property to ecclesiastical persons.

A remarkable anecdote is told by Possidius of St. Augustine. A certain Januarius, who had joined the congregation of clerks which the saint had instituted in his house at Hippo, bequeathed his money to the Church, disinheriting his two children. St. Augustine refused the bequest: first, because his religious had renounced the power of willing when they joined the congregation; secondly, because of the wrong done to the children. He sent for the heirs, and arranged for the division of the money between them. Satyrus left all his property to his brother, St. Ambrose, with a verbal request that he would give to the poor as much of it as he thought right. St. Ambrose gave it all to the poor. The saint made no will, having stripped himself of everything at the time of his ordination, when he made over his lands to the Church, reserving the usufruct, or annual profits of them, to his sister for her life.

(2) During the middle ages, the practice of devising land and other property for religious purposes (ad pias causas) was still largely resorted to. In countries where the society was feudal, the kings and superior lords, finding that the accumulation of lands held by the Church deprived them of various incidental advantages (such as reliefs, wardships, and escheats) which they derived from the same lands while in lay tenure, commenced to legislate against such accumulation, whether effected by grant or will. Hence arose the laws of Mortmain, forbidding any further conveyance of lands to the Church. These laws, however, in England, could be evaded by means of a Licence in Mortmain granted by the Crown. A practice also arose of bequeathing lands to certain persons as the legal owners, to the use of certain other persons—a religious community, for instance; and, in these cases, the Court of Chancery regarded the beneficial ownership as belonging to those to whom the use was devised. This practice—long before uses were turned into possession—was prevented from being of any benefit to the Church by the statute of 1392, which enacted that uses should be subject to the statutes of Mortmain, and liable to be forfeited on any infringement thereof, equally with the lands themselves.[1] Licences in Mortmain ceased to be given after the Reformation, and the statute of 23 Henry VIII. (1532) declared that all grants of lands, on trust for parish churches or other institutions "erected and made of devotion," if for more than twenty years, should be deemed null and void. This statute was held to cut off grants to superstitious uses; those to charitable uses were still valid. But the Mortmain Act of 1736 (9 George II. c. 36) enacted that any grant to a charitable use should be by a deed executed at least twelve months before the donor's death, enrolled in the Court of Chancery within six months after execution, and taking effect immediately upon enrolment.

(3) With regard to wills in modern times, the general rule has been (Ferraris, Test. art. i. §40) to follow the prescriptions of the civil law, in ecclesiastical no less than in secular courts, in all countries belonging to the Holy Roman Empire; in countries subject to the Roman Pontiff, the canon law was followed. The civil law requires that a will be attested by seven witnesses, all males. If the testator is unable to sign it, an eighth witness is required, who signs in his name. The canon law only requires attestation by two good witnesses (idonei testes) and the parish priest. In the absence of the parish priest, there must be four witnesses. According to the rigour of the law, clerks without the consent of the bishops, and religious without the consent of their superior, cannot witness wills. But custom has sanctioned their acting without consent, and they frequently do so.

If executed without the required formalities, and not afterwards validated in one of the ways pointed out by the imperial legislation, a will ad causas profanas, according both to the civil and the canon law, is null; and a celebrated question has arisen, whether, if the intention of the testator be clear, the nullity of the will for want of form should be extended to the forum conscientiæ as well as the forum externum. Much has been written on both sides; an abstract of the arguments may be seen in Ferraris (art. i. 44–57).

Privileged wills (testamenta privilegiata) are those which are held in canon law to be valid although the forms required by the civil law have not been complied with. Such are those ad pias causas, those of soldiers made on a campaign, those of peasants, &c. A testamentum ad pias causas is a will in which a religious purpose or destination is substituted for the heir—such as the support of a church or convent, an almshouse, a school, &c. This is held to be valid, even without witnesses, if written and signed in the known hand of the testator; otherwise, it requires two witnesses.

Anyone can make a will who is not prohibited by natural or positive law. Persons so disqualified, are—infants under seven years, madmen (although a will made in a lucid interval is valid), idiots, spendthrifts interdicted by the courts, slaves, captives, convicts, suicides, &c. This is merely a general statement; exceptional circumstances occur in the case of most of the classes enumerated above, under which a will can be validly made. Professed regulars cannot make a will, because they cannot, as individuals, own property [PROFESSION, REL.]; nevertheless they can interpret and declare a testamentary disposition made previously to profession. Secular clerks of all grades can devise their patrimonial and quasi-patrimonial, or individual, property, as freely as laymen.[1]

[1] Stephen's Commentaries, Part I. ch. xv.

[1] Ferraris, art. iii. 26.

All regulars (except Franciscans) can, with the licence of their superior, act as testamentary executors. Even if they have not such licence, their executorial acts, though not licit, are valid. They are bound to render an account of their administration to the bishop of the diocese.

A will is said to be "ambulatory," and can at any time be revoked or changed down to the last day of life.

(Ferraris, Testamentum; Soglia, lib. iii. §50; Smith and Cheetham; Stephen's "Commentaries," 1868.)

WITCHCRAFT, WITCH (Anglo-Saxon, wiccancræft, wicce; probably connected with Old High German wihan, German weihen). Witchcraft has been defined (Bergier, "Dict. Theol.") as "the art of doing things wonderful, and apparently supernatural, without the intervention of God." Perhaps a more exact definition would be "a power, real or supposed, of producing, in concert with an evil spirit, effects beyond the reach of natural means and operations."

Those who deny the existence of evil spirits, and maintain that all the cases of demoniacal possession mentioned in the Bible and recorded elsewhere are merely cases of disease, are of course still less inclined to admit the reality of witchcraft. Imagination, morbid fancy, terror of the unknown, private spite, knavery, credulity, and hallucination, sufficiently account, in their eyes, for all of which witches have ever been accused, or have accused themselves. The former opinion —namely, that any commerce between human beings and evil spirits is imaginary and impossible—is repugnant to Scripture and the, at least implicit, teaching of the Church, and cannot be held by Catholics. But it does not follow that because we believe that obsession is a fact, and that human beings can and do come under the influence of evil spirits, we should therefore admit the reality of any such leagues or compacts with the devil as the records of witchcraft assume. Perrone, indeed, describes as "rash" the denial of the common opinion that dealings and compacts with the devil actually take place.[1] But other Catholic theologians (see the article Magie in Wetzer and Welte) take a different view, and argue that, just as the belief in the Sabbaths or nightly meetings of the witches, though once universally held, has been so dissipated by reflection and experience that Perrone himself does not admit it, so the tendency of sound opinion is to the extirpation of the view that the phenomena of witchcraft imply, or ever implied, an actual diabolic compact.

[1] Prælectiones, iv. 60.

Without troubling ourselves with the sagæ and lamiæ of Roman antiquity, let us consider the popular notions about witches and their power which prevailed in Europe till quite recent times, and still are harboured in many weak and ill-taught minds. It used to be believed that witches were of three kinds—black, white, and grey: the first could only hurt; the second only help; the third could both help and hurt. Their power came to them in virtue of a compact with the devil, by which they bartered their souls for some earthly object of desire. The witch was thought to be usually "a decrepit, superannuated old woman, who is tempted by a man in black to sign a contract to become his, both soul and body." He gives her a piece of money, and she delivers to him a slip of parchment, on which her name is signed with her blood. An imp or familiar, often in the form of a cat, is given to her, and the bargain is concluded. From this time the witch bore the devil's mark on some part of her body.[1] Whether the witch were the devil's instrument, or the devil hers, was a point not quite settled; but in either case she deserved to be burned.

Reginald Scot, who lived at a time when there were as many as seventeen or eighteen reputed witches in many an English village, describes the way in which the character of witch came to be assigned to a woman. A morose old woman, who has lost her children and friends, lives alone in a hut; she begs food and other things of her neighbours; sometimes she meets with a refusal, resenting which she uses bad language, and wishes some harm may come to the refuser. After a time, some altercation of this kind has taken place between her and many families in the parish. To some members of these, mishaps are sure to happen—sudden seizures of illness, murrain among the cattle, failure of crops, &c. The cause is unknown; one must therefore be invented; the curses of the old woman are remembered, and the whole thing is clear—she has bewitched them. Even the doctors, says Scot, if they find a case defy their art, often encourage the superstitious belief, for inscitiæ pallium veneficium et incantatio ("witchcraft and enchantment are the cloak of ignorance").

[1] Margaret Flower, executed at Lincoln in 1618 for bewitching Lord Rosse, son of the Earl of Rutland, and other persons, confessed that she had two familiar spirits sucking on her—the one white, the other black spotted. When she first entertained them she promised them her soul, and they covenanted to do all things which she commanded them (Brand, Popular Antiquities, ii. 387).

True religion supports the mind under misfortune, ascribing every event to the will or the permission of God, who does nothing except in love. But when the Christianity professed is but skin deep, and temporal gain or loss is the engrossing object of our hope or fear, an ignorant age resorts to witchcraft, whether to explain ill-luck, or to find a short cut to prosperity. "If any adversitie, greefe, sicknesse, losse of children, corne, cattell, or libertie, happen unto them, by and by they exclaime upon witches." So writes Reginald Scot, and illustrates what he says by relating what had happened within his own knowledge. The Rev. J. Ferrall, vicar of Brenchley in Kent, charged Margaret Symons, one of his parishioners, with having bewitched his son, and caused him to fall seriously ill. The woman's dog had barked at the boy as he was passing her house; about this a quarrel had arisen, and angry words been exchanged. When his son, soon afterwards, fell ill, the reverend gentleman, confirmed in his opinion by the other witches living in the village, thought Margaret Symons must have cast a spell upon him. The words printed in italics illustrate a fact which witch-trials abundantly teach —viz. that the belief in witchcraft tends to establish and extend itself in proportion to the number of the reputed witches. The boy was said to have been cured of his illness by another Brenchley witch! and Margaret Symons, we may hope, escaped.

As by degrees the theory of witchcraft, arranging itself round two principal points—the league with the devil and the nightly meetings or Sabbaths—became more definite, the catalogue of mischiefs, rogueries, and portentous events of all kinds, which the witches were believed capable of causing, was continually on the increase. If a German jurisconsult, in a "dissertatio juridica," were at the present day to write as the learned Walburger of Anhalt wrote in 1670, he would be set down as insane. But, at the time, Walburger was considered to write on the conservative, safe, and orthodox side. In his belief, witches can and do cause disease (p. 30); and lay snares to kill unbaptised infants (p. 35) for the gratification of their master the devil; they kill their own children, and offer them to the devil in sacrifice (p. 36); cause wet-nurses and nursing-mothers to lose their milk (ib.); and kill great numbers of children, after bringing them into the world as midwives, by running long needles into their heads. In the previous century a German count had "dedicated to the flames" (Vulcano consecravit) eight witches, who had killed, between them, one hundred and forty infants. Two witches were detected, one summer night, boiling an infant in a cauldron; had they not been interrupted, they said, a strong frost would have been caused by the mighty spell they were brewing, which would have destroyed all the crops. One of the abominations of which, in Walburger's opinion, witches were most frequently guilty, was that of "nodatio"; the coarse and grotesque details in connection with this charge may be seen in Ghirlandus, Bodin, and Delrio, as well as in the present tract. Witches are in the habit of killing animals, usually by poison; of drying up cows, causing abortion, preventing butter from coming and beer from working, and diverting, with the aid of the devil, the milk from cows belonging to other women into their own milk-pails. The Satanic Sabbaths, Walburger tells us, are organised by the devil with peculiar care. The judge Remigius, he says, condemned 800 persons to death in Lorraine for the crime of attending these meetings, all of whom testified that they really took place. The witches ride to them on broomsticks, reeds, goats, bulls, horses, or dogs—the transporting power being supplied by the devil. In Germany the Blocksberg is a favourite place of meeting.

Great though the power of the witch was believed to be, the popular imagination imposed limits upon it, and invented antidotes against their spells. At Christmastide the Babe of Bethlehem restrained the powers of hell:—

> "then no planet strikes,
> No fairy takes, nor witch hath power to charm,
> So hallow'd and so gracious is the time."
> (Hamlet, Act I.)

If one could succeed in drawing the witch's blood, her spells were defeated (Brand, ii. 378). Herb Paris was thought an excellent preservative; vervain and dill were also recommended; people used to hang up these things at their doors. It was also believed that there were infallible means of proving witchcraft against a witch who declared herself innocent. Of these the one first resorted to was to search for the devil's mark; this being found, according to Scot,[1] the judge might sentence her to death at once. A mole, or wart, or birth-mark, found on the unhappy woman must often have sealed her doom. Another method was to weigh the witch against the church Bible; if the latter were the heaviest, she was guilty. Another was to make her say the Lord's Prayer, it being believed that no witch could repeat it to the end without a mistake. Another was to cross-tie her, (right thumb to left toe, left thumb to right toe), and throw her into a pond or river: if guilty she could not sink; if she did sink, this proof of her innocence unluckily came too late. A notorious witch-finder in the seventeenth century, Matthew Hopkins, was famous for applying all these tests; he "hanged, in one year, no less than sixty reputed witches in his own county of Essex."[2]

What are we to say to all this? That confessions of being in league with the devil, and of attendance at the Sabbaths, were sometimes extorted by torture is undoubted; and such confessions few persons would now hesitate to pronounce worthless. But it is no less certain that in numberless instances the witches voluntarily accused themselves of the greatest monstrosities and crimes imaginable. Shall we believe, on their own word, that they went where they said they went, made the covenants which they said they made, saw what they said they saw? To resist belief in their asseverations must have been for a long time extremely difficult, especially when judges and advocates came to the investigation with a fixed conviction that witchcraft was a real crime. But experience must have kept continually adding to the mass of disproved assertions and detected impostures; so that at last it seemed more reasonable to trace the enormities with which these miserable creatures charged themselves to their own crazy and turbid imagination than to suppose them to have an objective existence. To say this is not to deny that the evil spirit has anything to do with witchcraft. Many recorded cases are apparently inexplicable, unless we suppose a demoniacal agency to have been at work. The fact of obsession, and the remedy of exorcism, remain unshaken; but the crime of witchcraft, consisting in a distinct and conscious bargain with the evil one in order to obtain unlawful power, would appear to rest on no secure foundation.[1]

The history of juridical and theological opinion is very curious, and was admirably traced by Tartarotti in the last century. From the introduction to his work, "Del Congresso Notturno," most of the details in the following sketch are taken. The first among mediæval writers to notice the witches' Sabbath was Regino, abbot of Prume, at the beginning of the tenth century; he speaks of "wicked women," who say that they attend great meetings by night "with Diana, the goddess of the pagans," and do her bidding. Diana (Hecate, Trivia) was the goddess of the ways (viarum dea), and therefore supposed to preside at a meeting of her votaries gathered from every quarter.[2] A century later, Burchard, bishop of Worms, speaks of women who believed themselves to ride to the meetings on different beasts. A Council of Treves (1310) forbade any woman to pretend that she rode by night with Diana or with Herodiana—"hæc enim dæmoniaca illusio est." By Herodiana was meant the daughter of Herodias, whose skill in dancing was supposed to be displayed at these Satanical assemblies. From the fifteenth century date the systematic severities of the Inquisition for witchcraft (processus de crimine Magiæ, Hexenprocesse). Dominican writers of that age—Nider, Jaquerio, Sprenger, Institor, &c.—defended the process, and asserted the reality of what the witches confessed; but the Franciscans Cassini and Spina took the opposite view. Cassini wrote a treatise to prove that the witches did not really ride to the Sabbata, but in ecstasy believed that they did so. Sprenger and Institor were the joint authors of the celebrated work "Malleus Maleficarum," which is full of the most startling and horrible stories. After the middle of the sixteenth century the number of those who opposed the popular belief grew rapidly. The work of Wierus, a Cleves physician, on the "Pseudomonarchia Dæmonum," which appeared about that time, made a great sensation. Against Wierus —besides several Catholic writers, as Tanner and Layman—the Protestants Daneus, Hemming, T. Erastus, and Bodin appeared. Bodin, author of "Demonomania," was a French jurisconsult. Wierus declared that the Protestants believed in the Sabbata more firmly than the Catholics themselves. Reginald Scot, evidently a humane and enlightened man, published his "Discoverie of Witchcraft," in which he takes the same line as Wierus, in 1584; but, being in English, the work appears to have been unknown on the Continent. Nicholas Remigio, the Lorraine judge mentioned above, published his "Dæmonolatria" in 1595. Towards 1600 appeared the ponderous work of Martin Delrio, a Jesuit, "Disquisitiones Magicæ," in which the revelations of the witches are still treated seriously. This became everywhere a work of authority in the courts, so that Thomasius says that Protestant jurisconsults "all but copy him out word for word." James I., in his "Demonology," took the same side. The first great shock to the received system came through the publication of a work by the Jesuit, Frederic Spee, "Cautio Criminalis circa Processus contra Sagas," 1631. Father Spee had attended the execution of many persons condemned for witchcraft in the dioceses of Würzburg and Bamberg, and had come to the conclusion that many of them were entirely innocent. Yet, so strong at that time was the general opinion on the other side, that Father Spee did not attach his name to his work, nor did he express disbelief in the Sabbata or midnight meetings, nor propose to abandon the process; he simply pleaded for more caution and circumspection.[1] Leibnitz[2] tells us that this work produced a strong impression on the mind of Schönborn, afterwards Elector of Mayence, and through him on other German princes.

Yet, in spite of Father Spee, a crowd of writers all through the seventeenth century, both Protestants and Catholics, defended the process, and the assumptions on which it rested. Among these were Carpzovius, Crusius, Ghirlandus, Meric Casaubon, and Glanvile. The Lutheran Thomasius published an able tract (1701), "Theses de Crimine Magiæ," on the other side. In the eighteenth century the mistrust of the process grew stronger and stronger. In England the Act 9 Geo. II. (1736) abolished all prosecutions for witchcraft and sorcery; pretensions of the kind were from that time treated as charlatanerie and imposture, and, if attended by attempts to gain money, were punished. Maria Theresa abolished witch-trials in Austria in 1766. The last execution of witches in Great Britain appears to have been in Scotland in 1727, when a woman was burnt on the charge of having ridden her own daughter to the meetings, the said daughter having been transformed into a pony and shod by the devil![1] At Tring in Hertfordshire, in 1751, an old man and his wife, being suspected of witchcraft, were beaten, ducked, and otherwise ill-used by a mob until they expired. The latest instances of witch-burning in Europe appear to have been at Glarus in 1782, and Posen in 1793.

WYCLIFFITES. John Wyclif, or Wycliffe, a native of Yorkshire, born about 1324, studied in the University of Oxford, where he was for a long time a fellow of Merton College, then a great seminary of learned men, and afterwards became master of Balliol College and warden of Canterbury Hall. He was a proficient in the scholastic divinity of his day, and also betook himself zealously to the study of the Scriptures. The Dominicans, Franciscans, Carmelites, and Augustinians, all had at this time flourishing houses at Oxford, and were the object of considerable ill-will to a large body of masters and doctors belonging to the secular clergy, chiefly because they were said to attract promising students from the colleges, and induce them by various means to enter one of their convents. The Franciscans were accustomed to lecture on the excellence of poverty, and to dwell in their sermons on the fact that

[1] He mentions an accusation brought by several witches against a certain regular of having been present at their meeting at a particular hour; but at that hour the regular was in choir singing the divine office, as all his brother monks attested.

Christ and His Apostles lived chiefly by alms. Fitzralph, archbishop of Armagh, maintained that the poverty of Christ was not, like that of the friars, voluntary. On all the controverted matters he took a decided part against the friars, and Wyclif and others joined him. In 1366 Wyclif wrote a tract to justify the king (Edward III.) in refusing to pay, on the demand of Urban V., the arrears of the tribute granted by King John to the Holy See. Some years after this, being made doctor in theology, he began pertinaciously to attack the friars, declaring that their multiplication impoverished the realm, that their letters of fraternity were a delusion, that they introduced many superstitious practices, estranged the laity from their parochial clergy, were avaricious, abetted wars, &c.; also that they taught novel doctrines on the sacrament of the Altar. Wyclif developed about the same time opinions similar to those which had been put forward earlier in the century by Marsilius of Padua, to the effect that the clergy ought to have no coercive jurisdiction, and that no temporal penalty of any kind ought to be inflicted except with the sanction of the civil power. To these he added, that lay lords had full power to take away temporal possessions from the clergy if they judged that a bad use was made of them, and that no one was bound to pay tithes or offerings to parish priests whose lives were not edifying. The Pope (Gregory XI.) heard of this teaching, and addressed letters (1376) to Edward III., the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, and the University of Oxford, urging that Wyclif should be arrested and put on his trial. Some cause of delay arose, and it was not till February 1378 that Wyclif appeared to answer for his doctrine before Bishop Courtenay in St. Paul's Cathedral. An immense crowd thronged the cathedral and its approaches. The Duke of Lancaster, who was present, was at this time rather favourably inclined towards Wyclif; high words passed between him and the bishop; the people, imagining that an outrage was being offered to their bishop in his own cathedral, became angry and clamorous; and the assembly was broken up in confusion. Soon afterwards another assembly was held at Lambeth before the archbishop, to which Wyclif was cited. He handed in a paper in Latin, explaining his teaching on the connection between dominion (or ownership) and grace, on the jurisdiction in temporals claimed for the Church, on the effects of excommunication, and similar questions.[1] This paper is full of scholastic subtleties and distinctions, so that it is difficult in many places to catch Wyclif's real meaning. The judges decided that it was not satisfactory, and the archbishop inhibited him from lecturing or publishing any more on the subjects in dispute. Wyclif then (April 1378) presented a paper in English—or a paper was presented for him—to the Parliament, which is palpably more anti-Papal and insurgent in tone than the statement presented to the archbishop, though it follows generally the same line. About this time Gregory XI. died, and the proceedings against Wyclif were dropped.

In 1378–9 Wyclit appears to have been actively engaged on the translation of the Vulgate Bible into English. It is not known what proportion of either of the two versions which have been printed (Oxford University Press, 1850) actually came from his pen, but there seems no reason to doubt that the first impulse came from him, and that he had an important share in the actual execution.

In 1381 Wyclif lectured on the Eucharist, and was led on by his bitter antagonism to the theologians of the mendicant orders to the enunciation of views which scandalised the Church and the university, and were formally condemned by both. In brief, he propounded the tenet of consubstantiation. "Right as hit is heresye," he said, "to trowe that Crist is a spiryt and no body, so hit is heresye to trowe that this sacrament is God's body and no bred; for hit is bothe togedir."[2] So again, in the "Trialogus,"[3] written probably in 1382, to quote one among many similar passages, he says that the whole Church militant, "since the time of the promulgation of the Gospel, has rightly believed that this sacrament or consecrated host is naturally real bread" (verus panis), "and sacramentally the body of Christ." The chancellor, William de Berton, convened a court of twelve doctors in the schools of the Augustinian convent, who adopted a definition in which, Wyclif not being named, the Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation is formally asserted. Wyclif, who was present, put in a document known as his "Confession."[1] in which, under cover of a cloud of words and copious extracts from the Fathers, he tried to vindicate the soundness of his Eucharistic teaching. Soon after this, the terrible rising of the Commons (in the summer of 1381) turned away men's thoughts for a time from every other subject. Sudbury, the archbishop of Canterbury, was murdered. The new archbishop (Courtenay) lost no time in following up the proceedings against Wyclif. He convened a council at the Black Friars in London, which met in May 1382, and condemned twenty-four propositions extracted from the reformer's writings. Of these ten were declared to be heretical, and fourteen erroneous. The first of the ten was, "That the substance of material bread and wine remains after consecration in the sacrament of the Altar." The fourteen erroneous conclusions belonged either to the peculiar politico-ecclesiastical system which Wyclif, following the Vaudois, had built up in various treatises, or were strong opinions suggested by his animosity towards the friars. The Pope's confirmation of the proceedings of the council was soon obtained, and the archbishop then took very energetic steps to repress the teaching of the condemned opinions both in the university and the country. Wyclif was obliged to leave Oxford and retire to his living of Lutterworth; that no other severity was used towards him seems to have been owing to the state of his health, for about the end of 1382 he was stricken with paralysis. During the two remaining years of his life his literary activity must have been prodigious; the great bulk of his English works (of which the three volumes printed by the Clarendon Press, with the supplementary volume edited by Mr. Matthew, are far from exhausting the list) were produced in this period. According to Gascoyne, (Lewis, 336) he had another paralytic stroke on December 28, 1384, and died on the last day of the year.

It is not known in what part of his career Wyclif founded the institution of the "Poor Priests," whom he sent to various parts of the country to propagate what he conceived to be the Gospel, and declaim against ecclesiastical abuses. Among these men, Herford, Repyngdon, Patrington, Swinderby, and Purvey, were conspicuous. They and their followers were called Lollards, and that they were numerous might be inferred, even if there were not abundant direct evidence, from the chance allusion to them in Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales."[1] To Courtenay Arundel succeeded, and to Arundel Chicheley; and all three—but especially Chicheley, who established in 1416 a regular inquisition of heresy for the purpose of exterminating the sect—used strenuous measures of repression against the Wycliffites. In this the princes of the House of Lancaster, the weakness of whose title to the crown disposed them to court the good will of the hierarchy, zealously aided them. In 1396 twelve delegates appointed by the university picked out two hundred and ninety-eight propositions from Wyclif's works as deserving of censure. In 1411 a council held at London by Archbishop Arundel, attended by thirteen bishops and thirty doctors, condemned forty-five Wycliffite errors. The Council of Constance, among the theologians attending which was the great Carmelite Thomas of Walden, enumerated the forty-five propositions just mentioned, and declared that many of them were notoriously heretical, others erroneous, others scandalous and blasphemous, some offensive to pious ears, and some rash and seditious. At the same time Wyclif's "Dialogus" and "Trialogus" were condemned by name; others of his writings were reprobated in general terms.

[ARTICLES OMITTED.]

ANTI-POPES. In the first twelve centuries of her existence the Church was disturbed some twenty-five times by rival claimants of the Papacy. The strife thus originated was always an occasion of scandal, sometimes of violence and bloodshed, but in most cases it was easy for men of honest will to distinguish between the true Pope and the Anti-Pope or false claimant. It was very different in the great schism of the fourteenth century. For forty years two and even three pretenders to the Papacy claimed the allegiance of Catholics: whole countries, learned men and canonised saints, ranged themselves on different sides, and even now it is not perhaps absolutely certain who was Pope and who Anti-Pope.

It is usually said that Novatian, who became the leader of a schismatical party at Rome in 251, was the first Anti-Pope, but Döllinger ("Hippolytus and Callistus," Engl. Tr. p. 91 seq.) argues with weighty reasons that he was anticipated thirty years before by Hippolytus, the supposed author of the "Philosophumena." In the election of Felix II. (A.D. 355–6) a new element appears which was often to manifest itself again—viz. the influence of the court. The Arian Emperor Constantius, after removing Pope Liberius from Rome, compelled three disreputable bishops (κατασκόπους· οὐ γὰρ ἄν τις εἴποι ἐπισκόπους) "to establish as bishop in the palace a certain Felix, who was worthy of them." So Athanasius writes ("Ad Monach. et Hist. Arian." 75) only three years after the event, and we can scarcely doubt that his account is accurate in the main. It is accepted, e.g., by Natalis Alexander (Diss. xxxii. a. 3 in Sæc. iv.), Hefele ("Concil." i. p. 661), and many other Catholic authorities. But Felix is commemorated as a saint in the Latin Church on July 29, and Pagi ("In Annal. Baron." ad ann. 357, n. 3, ad 357, n. 16 seq.) tries to show that he was no Arian intruder, but succeeded Liberius upon his resignation. After Felix, we meet with no more heretical Anti-Popes, although Laurentius (498) was supported by the Byzantine Court in the belief that he would approve the Henoticon of the Emperor Zeno.

Indeed, for many centuries Anti-Popes were upheld simply by factions among the clergy and people, who had the power of election. Thus Eulalius (418–19) was supported by a minority of clergy and people, and by the Prefect Symmachus; he was finally expelled by the Emperor Honorius (Fleury, "H. E." xxiv. 7 seq.) Laurentius (498) had a party of the people and Festus the patrician on his side; the case was decided against him by the Arian king Theodoric (ib. xxx. 48). Dioscorus (530) was raised by popular faction and died a month afterwards (ib. xxxii. 21). Pascal (687–692) gained a party among the people and the favour of John Exarch of Ravenna by bribery (ib. xl. 39). The tumultuous mob which chose John (844) abandoned him almost immediately (ib. xlviii. 15). The deputies of the Emperor Lothair and the arms of the Frankish soldiers enabled the usurper Anastasius to defy the true Pope Benedict III. for a brief space in 855[1] (ib. xlix. 26). A

[1] At this time the fabulous Pope Joan is said to have reigned. The story first appeared in a book by the French Dominican Stephen de Bourbon (d. 1261); then in early MSS. of the history of Martinus Polonus, also a Dominican (d. 1219). The work of Polonus was the popular history of the middle ages, and obtained new complication occurred in 964. Benedict V. does not deserve to be called an Anti-Pope. He was duly elected by the Roman people. But the Romans had sworn in the previous year that they would not proceed to elect a Pope except with the Emperor's consent and according to his wishes. Benedict was degraded and humbly confessed his sin (Hefele, "Concil." p. 619 seq.) In the two following centuries we find a number of Anti-Popes raised to this bad eminence by the violence of popular and Baronial factions in the darkest age of the Church's history. Such were Franco, a deacon of the Roman Church, who took the title of Boniface VII. and usurped the Roman bishopric in 975 and again in 984 (Fleury, lvi. 36, lvii. 12.); John XVI. (Philogathus), who won his place by bribery in 997 (ib. lvii. 49); a certain Gregory who headed a party after a contested election in 1012 (ib. lviii. 35). It was believed till quite lately that the Church in the middle of the eleventh century was distracted for the first time by the claims of three rival Popes. The recent investigations of Steindorff have shown this supposition to be inaccurate, and his conclusions are accepted by Hefele in his second edition. The following seem to be the facts of the case. In 1033 the Count of Tusculum raised his son, a boy of twelve, to the Papal throne. He called himself Benedict IX. In 1044 this "devil on the chair of Peter" was overthrown in a popular uproar, and Silvester III., not without simony, succeeded to his place. He in turn, after the lapse of a year, resigned in favour of Gregory VI., an excellent man, though apparently he bribed Benedict to resign. Although therefore there were not three rival Popes, still there were three parties in the Roman Church and some reason to fear that a triple schism might arise. It was this fear which induced the German King Henry III. to interfere. A council of Sutri deposed Gregory and Silvester, Benedict was deposed the same year in a synod of Rome, and Suidger of Bamberg, at the recommendation of the king, was canonically elected. He took the title of Clement II. (Hefele, "Concil." iv. p. 706 seq.)

The election of the Anti-Pope Cadalaus (the name is spelt in many ways), known as Honorius II., has greater and wider interest, connected, as it is, with the general history of the Church. The party of reform chose Alexander II. Beatrice of Canossa was zealous in his cause, and he was acknowledged as true Pope in 1062 at a synod of Augsburg. But many feared the strong measures a good Pope might take against the simony and concubinage prevalent among the clergy. The Lombard bishops were determined to have a Pope who came from the Paradise of Italy (i.e. Lombardy), and who would have patience with human weakness. A powerful party at Rome was at one with them, at least on the latter point. Thus it came to pass that Cadalaus, bishop of Parma, a man of licentious life, was chosen Pope at a council of Basle by the Lombard prelates and Roman deputies in 1061, took the title of Honorius II., and was invested by the young King Henry IV. with the insignia of the Papacy just twenty-eight days after the cardinal bishops had elected Alexander II. The schism was a formidable one. The German court abandoned thecause of Cadalaus at the synod of Augsburg, but he found favour ever after that with the Empress Agnes and with the king, and he had money and arms at his command. He died in 1072 (Hefele, "Concil." iv. p. 870 seq.).

Next comes a series of Anti-Popes in the long strife between the Empire and the Papacy. Guibert of Ravenna, the favourite of Henry IV., was recognised by the Ghibelline party as Clement III.; he was followed by the Anti-Popes Theodoric and Albert. In like manner Burdinus of Braga, under the Emperor Henry V., became the Anti-Pope Gregory VIII. (Hergenröther, "Kirchengeschichte," i. p. 767). Anacletus II., a son of Peter Leone and of Jewish family, was chosen by a party among the cardinals in 1130, but by means of simony. His opponent, Innocent II., won the allegiance of the Catholic world as a whole, but Anacletus was upheld by the Normans in Calabria, by the Duke of Aquitaine, and others. After his death in 1138, his party transferred their homage to another Anti-Pope, Victor IV. (ib. 771–3). Once more under universal belief for the legend. It found a place in the Mirabilia Urbis Romæ, a sort of handbook for strangers visiting Rome. Nay, acquiescence in the fable induced John XX. to style himself "John XXI." It was not till the fifteenth century that doubts arose, and the Calvinist Blondel (Joanna Papissa, Amstelodam. 1657) first demonstrated the unhistorical character of the legend. He was followed by Leibnitz (Flores Sparsi in tumulum Papissæ, Goetting. 1758), and by nearly all historians since. (Döllinger, Papstfabeln, 1 seq.)

Frederic I., the war between the Imperial and Papal parties called new Anti-Popes into existence. The first of these, also called Victor IV., had won the votes of the Ghibelline majority among the cardinals. He was acknowledged by a synod of Pavia in 1160, and the true Pope, Alexander III., took refuge in France. Another Anti-Pope, Paschal III. (Guido Clemens), followed in 1164, and another Calixtus III. (John de Struma), in 1168. Frederic ceased to maintain the schism after the peace of Venice in 1177, and the Anti-Pope himself submitted to Alexander III. Some of the Barons tried to continue the schism by declaring Lando Siterio Pope, but the attempt failed utterly and at once, and Pope Alexander, who died in 1181, had seen the fall of no less than four pretenders to the Papacy.

For about two centuries no Anti-Pope disturbed the Church's peace, but in 1378 the election of Urban VI. occasioned a schism rightly called the great, since it was the most grievous ever known. Gregory XI. had just brought the "Babylonish captivity" of Avignon to an end. It is said that, as he received the sacraments of the dying, he warned others against certain persons who advanced ideas of their own as divine inspirations, lamented the step they had induced him to take, and expressed his dread of the consequences to the Church. There were sixteen cardinals present at Rome, of whom eleven were Frenchmen, four Italians, and one Peter de Luna, a Spaniard. Gregory, a few days before his death, had empowered them to hold a conclave at any place and without waiting for their colleagues (Raynald. ad ann. 1378, n. 2). On April 7, 1378, they assembled in the Vatican. Their task was far from easy. It would have been natural for them to elect a Frenchman, but on the other hand, the Romans earnestly demanded a Roman or at least an Italian Pope. On April 8, Bartholomew of Prignano, archbishop of Bari, was elected, and he was crowned on Easter Sunday under the title of Urban VI. French contemporary writers with scarcely an exception represent the cardinals as constrained by violence. They were told by the populace that they must elect an Italian or die; nor were signs wanting that the Roman mob meant to keep their word. There are, however, very strong reasons for refusing belief to these French accounts. Dietrich of Niem, a German and an official in the Papal court at the time, assures us that the election was perfectly free, that the people did indeed beg the cardinals to promote an Italian, but used no force or threats, and that the tumult did not occur till the election was over. Dietrich must have known the truth, and there is every ground to think he told it, for he was by no means an enthusiastic admirer of Pope Urban. The testimony of St. Catharine of Sweden, given at length by Raynaldus (ad ann. 1379, n. 20) is to the same effect. She was present in Rome at the time, and talked over the matter with many of the cardinals. But the most conclusive document is the letter also given in full by Raynaldus (ad ann. 1378, n. 19), which the sixteen electors addressed on April 19 to their brother-cardinals at Avignon. They declare that they had chosen Urban freely and unanimously, and we know that they acknowledged him for several months without a protest.

However, Urban's harshness and imprudence alienated the Sacred College, and in August of that same year the French cardinals declared that the election had been constrained, and renounced all allegiance to Urban, whom they called "an apostate" and "an accursed Anti-Christ" (Raynald. ad ann. 1378, n. 48 seq.) They persuaded three out of the four Italian cardinals to join them at Fondi, where, on September 20, the Cardinal of Geneva was elected, and became Clement VII. Urban found himself deserted by every cardinal, for the fourth Italian member of the college (Tebaldeschi) was dead. All the cardinals at Avignon accepted Clement, who soon after established himself, and was acknowledged Pope in France, Lorraine, Savoy, Scotland, Naples, and Spain. The rest of the Catholic world belonged to the obedience of Urban. Catharine of Siena was eager in the cause of Urban, St. Vincent Ferrar equally so for the Popes of the other line. Urban was followed by Boniface IX. (1389–1404); Innocent VII. (1404–6); Gregory XII. 1406–9. On Clement's death in 1394, he was replaced by the famous Peter de Luna, Benedict XIII.

The Council of Pisa in 1409 tried to remove the scandal of a double line of Popes anathematising each other and dividing the allegiance of Christendom. In Session XV. both Popes were deposed, and in the nineteenth, Alexander V. was elected. For a time this made matters worse, for neither Gregory nor Benedict admitted the validity of the sentence, so that there were now three claimants of the Papacy—viz. Gregory XII., Benedict XIII. and Alexander V. Still, Alexander's successor, John XXIII. was accepted by the Emperor Sigismund, and by the greater part of the Church.

Another attempt at peace was made by the Council of Constance. It annulled the pretensions of all three Popes. Of these, Gregory resigned willingly. John was deposed in Session XII., May 1415, and Benedict XIII. in Session XXVII., two years later. Martin V. was then chosen Pope by the twenty-three cardinals and six deputies from each of the four nations into which the council was divided.

Here the schism virtually ended, and Martin V. ruled over all Catholics. Nevertheless, Benedict XIII. held out at the Castle of Peniscola, on the Catalonian coast. He had received the deputies who brought him the sentence of deposition with solemn protest; he maintained to the last that the little church of his obedience was the ark of salvation, and that he himself was the centre of unity. With his last breath in 1423 he bade his cardinals provide for the election of a successor, which they did by promoting the Canon Muñoz[1] as Clement VII. He, however, resigned the tiara in 1429, and allowed his cardinals to elect "Otto Colonna, known in his obedience as Martin V." Muñoz became Bishop of the Balearic Isles.

Amadeus, Count and afterwards first Duke of Savoy and Count of Geneva, was the last of the Anti-Popes. He was chosen by the Council of Basle, then schismatical, in 1439, and crowned at Basle in the following year. He submitted in 1449 to Pope Nicolas V., who made him cardinal and perpetual vicar of the Holy See in the territories of Savoy, Basle, Strasburg, &c. He died at Ripaille in 1451.

ARMENIAN CHRISTIANS. The native legends recount the preaching of the Gospel to the Armenian nation by Thaddeus, one of the seventy disciples, but the conversion of the Armenian people as a whole was brought about by their great apostle, Gregory the Illuminator, whose efforts were supported by King Tiridates III., just at the beginning of the fourth century. It is clear from Eusebius ("H. E." ix. 8) that the work of conversion was very rapid. Gregory established the chief see at Etchmiazin, near Mount Ararat: he and his ancestors were consecrated by the Metropolitan of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, and the title they took—viz. Catholicos—signified that they were the general procurators and representatives of the see of Cæsarea in Armenia (Le Quien, "Oriens Christianus,' i. 1355). Early in the fifth century the golden age of Armenian literature began. Isaac the Great and Mesrob (both Catholics) invented the Armenian alphabet and translated the Bible from the Syriac Peshitto into Armenian, afterwards improving their work by collating it with good MSS. of the LXX (Hexaplar text) and the Greek New Testament. The work of translating Fathers, as well as works of Aristotle, Philo, Porphyry, &c., from Greek and Syriac was carried on with great zeal. This literary activity was accompanied by other changes of a very different kind. The brave Armenian nation had preserved its independence, but in 390 Armenia was divided between the Byzantine and Persian empires, and East Armenia, the larger and more fruitful part of the country, fell to the portion of the latter Power. In 430 the very shadow of a national monarchy disappeared, and ever since the Armenians have been subject in succession to Persians, Arabs, Turks, and Russians. They were scattered far and wide by the Mongol invaders, and their unity, like that of the Jews, has consisted in the common bond of race, language, literature, and religion. After the Persian conquest the Armenian catholicos became independent of Cæsarea, and this change was followed by another of much greater moment. The opposition of the Armenians to the Council of Chalcedon, mainly due to the mission of Samuel, whom the Syrian Archimandrite Barsumas sent to the Armenian church, was clearly displayed in the synod of Vagarshiabad, A.D. 491. The schism was consummated at the Synod of Dovin in 596 (see Hefele, "Concil." ii. p. 717, 2nd ed., where the statements of Pagi, Mansi, &c., are corrected from the National History published at Venice in 1785), and has endured ever since, though Greek influence induced the Iberian and Colchian bishops to sever themselves from the Armenian catholicos. True, a union between the Armenians and the orthodox Greeks was effected at a council of Charnum (the modern Ezeroun) in 632, but it did not last long. The Armenians held fast to the Monophysite doctrine—viz. that in Christ there was but one nature—and external differences increased the opposition between them and the Greeks. Some of these, such as the addition of the words "Who wast crucified for us" in the Trisagion, and probably the use of pure wine, without the addition of any water, in the Mass, were connected with their theological views. Besides this, they maintained the old Eastern custom of celebrating Christ's birth and his epiphany on one day—viz. January 6. They use leavened bread at the altar, eat lacticinia in Lent (Syn. in Trull. can. 32, 56). They were also charged by the Greeks with making the priesthood into a caste, and only ordaining sons of priests (ib. can. 32); and further, with a semi-Jewish practice of cooking flesh in the sanctuary and giving portions of it to the priests (ib. can. 99).

The catholicos lives at Etchniazin, which has belonged since 1828 to Russia. He is chosen from the metropolitans by the synod, with the consent of the Armenian bishops and of all Armenians present at the place, and the election must be confirmed by the Czar. He is enthroned in his cathedral by the Metropolitan of Siunic. It is his office to watch over religion and discipline; he consecrates the chrism for his bishops, which he does only once in seven years, and he can convene a national council. In matters of importance he must consult his synod. He is Bishop of Ararat. His distinctive dress consists in a silk veil, with gold fringes, which covers his head and shoulders, and is called kogh, and in a pallium folded five times over his breast. The patriarchal cross and torch are carried before him, and he uses everywhere the staff of the vartabed or doctor. He is chiefly supported by a poll-tax on all adults within his diocese, contributions, stole-fees, &c. from the revenues of the monastery at Etchniazin, and the gifts of pilgrims to the shrine of St. Gregory. There are twelve archbishops and bishops, four vartabeds or doctors, sixty monks in priest's orders, and 500 other monks in the great monastery just mentioned. The archbishops, bishops, and archimandrites residing there form his synod. Deputies from the Armenian nation are added to their number at the election of a patriarch.

Next come the patriarchs, who are now almost independent of the catholicos. The patriarchal sees arose from the constant change of the chief see during the disasters of the nation, and also from the dispersion of the Armenians after the Mongol invasion in the fourteenth century. The Patriarch of Constantinople (bishopric since 1307, title of patriarch since 1481) holds the first rank amongst the patriarchs, and is only inferior in name to the catholicos. He is chosen by the Armenians, lay as well as clerical, at Constantinople, and gets his berat from the Porte. He can consecrate the holy oil, and can appoint and consecrate metropolitan bishops throughout the Turkish dominions except at Jerusalem. The church property is under his control, but he must administer it with the advice of a synod of twenty lay members chosen by the Porte. He has also a synod of ecclesiastics for spiritual matters. He has secular jurisdiction over the members of his church, and he represents not only the Armenians but also the Syrian Jacobites before the Turkish Government. The Patriarch of Sis (title granted 1441) is supposed to be chosen by the twelve neighbouring bishops, who, however, really follow the popular choice, which takes place under the influence of the Turkish Government. His jurisdiction extends over Lesser Armenia, Cappadocia, and Cilicia. He receives the holy oil from the catholicos. The Patriarch of Jerusalem (title since the middle of the seventeenth century) is chosen by his suffragan bishops, with the consent of the clergy. He has very limited power, for he leaves the consecration of bishops and of the holy oil to the catholicos, and he can be called to the court of the Patriarch of Constantinople. The Patriarch of the island of Aghtamar (1114) has little power, and his jurisdiction scarcely extends beyond the shores of the lake of Van. He is chiefly maintained by the monastery on the island.

The metropolitans, according to the canons, are empowered to consecrate their suffragans and the holy oils, but these rights are now reserved to the catholicos, or else to the patriarch, and the metropolitans only differ from other bishops by wearing a gold mitre, a triple pallium, a longer staff, and an archiepiscopal ἐπιγονάτιον, which the Armenians call goncher, suspended from the girdle. A monk cannot, except by dispensation, become a bishop, and the bishops are usually chosen from the unmarried vartabeds or doctors. The patriarch may nominate, but usually the bishops are chosen by the clergy and fathers of families. The election is confirmed, and the bishop consecrated by the catholicos or patriarch. The rite of consecration closely resembles that of the Greeks, but the Armenians anoint the head and thumbs of the elect with chrism, and he receives a ring as one of his insignia. Bishops also wear a mitre[1] like that of the Latins, and they do not use the σάκκος of the Greeks (see VESTMENTS OF THE GREEKS). The bishop appoints the chor-episcopi; convents, schools, hospitals, &c., are subject to him; no altars may be set up or relics exposed for veneration without his leave.

The priests are divided into two classes, that of the vartabeds or doctors, who are again subdivided into many grades and who remain unmarried, and the parish priests. The former are far more highly esteemed. A staff is the mark of their office, and their chief duty consists in preaching. They live by collections made after the sermon. The ordinary clergy are married, taken from the humbler classes and trained either by a parish priest or at a monastery. The Armenians have the same minor orders as the Latins, and, like them, they reckon the subdiaconate among the greater orders. A priest is elected by the people, who, however, invariably accept the candidate proposed by the lay administrator of the church property; he must then be approved by the bishop. The priestly vestments are alb, girdle, maniple, stole, chasuble; but they also have a collar of gold or silver stuff called vagas, from which a sort of metal amice is suspended, with the figures of the twelve Apostles upon it, and they wear a high cap with gold or silver crosses. The priest says Mass with covered head till the Trisagion, when he removes his cap, amice, and sandals. Priests live by stole-fees and by offerings in kind at Epiphany and Easter. They also get subsidies from the fund for pious uses. But they are very poor, and generally have to follow some trade.

The Armenian monks follow the rule of St. Basil, but their fasts are stricter than those of the Greek religious. They have many monasteries, and at least one large convent of nuns—viz. on Mount Sion. Silbernagl enumerates between sixty and seventy dioceses, of which fourteen are in Russia, five in Persia (including the see of the Armenian Bishop of Calcutta), the rest in the Turkish territory. He estimates the number of schismatic Armenians in Turkey at 2,400,000, of whom 400,000 are in Turkey in Europe. There are 500,000 in the Russian Empire. Add to these the Armenians in other lands, especially Egypt and the principalities of the Danube, in which last the chief settlement of the Armenians was made in 1342, and we may calculate the whole number as about three millions.

United Armenians.—Some of the Armenians in Cilicia were united with the Catholic Church by Latin missionaries sent there by John XXII. But much more was done by Jesuit missionaries and the Mechitarists among the Armenians scattered from the fourteenth century onwards throughout other countries, and at present there are about 100,000 Catholics of the Armenian rite.

In 1742, Benedict XIV. appointed a patriarch for the Armenians in Cilicia and the Lesser Armenia. In 1830 Pius VIII. nominated a primate at Constantinople for the Armenians in European Turkey; and owing to the progress of Catholicism in the nation, Pius IX. in 1850 empowered the Primate Anthony Hassun to erect six suffragan dioceses. The Pope himself nominated the bishops, and a schism seemed likely to ensue. In 1866 Hassun was chosen patriarch by the bishops of the Cilician patriarchate. Pius IX. confirmed the election, united the patriarchal and primatial dignities, transferred the patriarchal residence to Galata, near Constantinople, provided for the election of the patriarch by the bishops to the exclusion of the laity, and regulated the affairs of the Armenian church by the bull "Reversurus," of July 12, 1867. Some Armenians thought the rights of the nation injured by this bull, and a formal schism arose in 1870; more than thirty-five of the clergy and many of the laity were excommunicated by the Pope. The schism, however, won about 4,000 adherents; a schismatical patriarch was elected, and most of the church buildings and goods passed into their hands. They repudiated the decrees of the Vatican Council. In 1879 the schismatical patriarch Kuppelian made his submission to Leo XIII. Many of the clergy and laity followed his example, and Monsignor Hassun was acknowledged as patriarch by the Porte till he was made cardinal in 1880, and replaced by Monsignor Azarian. At present seventeen dioceses are subject to the Armenian Patriarch. He has no authority over Armenians in Russia and Austria. Russia has many Armenian inhabitants in the Crimea, Kasan, and the Ukraine. Pius VII. sent them a vicar-apostolic in 1809, and the Concordat of 1847 provided for the erection of Armenian bishoprics at Cherson and Kaminiek. This arrangement, however, owing to the troubles with the Russian Government, has not been carried out. Austria has about 14,000 United Armenians. Those in Siebenbürgen, who came there in 1671, and continued for a time Monophysites, are under the Latin bishops. The archbishopric of Lemberg was erected for the Armenians of Gallicia in 1635; and Pius VII., by a brief in 1819, agreed that the emperor should nominate one of three candidates proposed by the Armenian people. The Armenians who settled in Hungary after the capture of Belgrade by the Turks in 1521 are placed under the Mechitarist monks.

The Armenian monks belong to the order of St. Anthony. The Mechitarists have been described in a separate article. (Chiefly from Silbernagl, "Kirchen des Orients," with the addition of the facts regarding the recent schism from Hergenröther's article in the "Kirchenlexikon," edited by Kaulen).

BETROTHAL. [See ESPOUSALS.]

CHALDEAN RITE, CHRISTIANS OF.—The name Chaldeans in ecclesiastical use signifies the Catholics who belong to the church formed by conversions from Nestorianism. Assemani ("Bibliothec. Orient." tom. iii. p. 410 seq.) distinguishes between particular conversions — i.e. conversions of individual bishops and their dioceses and general conversions—i.e. unions effected with a large section of the Nestorians which led to the recognition of a Catholic patriarch. Under the former head he mentions—(1) the conversion of the Bishop Sahaduna and the Gamaræans, A.D. 630; (2) that of Timothy of Tarsus, metropolitan of the Nestorians in Cyprus, and of his subjects, A.D. 1445: (3) that of the Nestorians on the Malabar Coast; (4) that of the Christians of St. John, called Sabæans by the Carmelite Fathers, in Bassora, circ. A.D. 1630. The story of the third of these conversions has been given in the article on the CHRISTIANS OF ST. THOMAS. We doubt the accuracy of Assemani's statement about the Sabæans, whose history has been recently investigated by Chwolson.[1] The third case is interesting from its connection with the Council of Florence. Timothy was converted by Andrew, archbishop of Rhodes (Colopensis), whom Eugenius IV. sent to Cyprus. The union was effected in the second session of the continuation of the council in the Lateran, August 7, 1445. Eugenius, in his bull containing the decree of union, forbids any one to call the Chaldeans heretics. So that here we have a formal recognition of the name "Chaldean."[2] ("Hefele, Concil." vii. p. 815 seq.)

Assemani enumerates the following "general conversions." (1) In 1247 Asa, "Vicar of the East"—i.e. representative of the patriarch in China and Eastern Tartary—under the Nestorian Patriarch Sabarjesu (1226–56), made a profession of Catholic belief to Innocent IV. It was subscribed by the Archbishop of Nisibis, two other archbishops, and three bishops. (2) The Patriarch Jaballaha was reconciled under Benedict XI., A.D. 1304. (3) A dispute about the succession to the patriarchate between Sulâka and Shimoom led to the reconciliation of the former under Julius III., A.D. 1552. (4) The Patriarch Elias became Catholic under Paul V., A.D. 1616. None of these conversions had any wide or lasting influence. (5) The [2] "Meshihaya," which simply means "follower of the Messias"—i.e. Christian—is now used as a distinctive name for the Chaldean Catholics, as opposed to the Nestorians of the same rite. The word (ܡܫܝܚܝܐ "Meshichojo") frequently occurs in Syriac literature as a general name for Christian. (Payne, Smith, Thesaur. Syr. col. 2242.) The Greek word χριστιανὸς has been adopted in the Syriac language, and occurs constantly not only in the Peshitto, but also in late authors, e.g. in the chronicles of Barhebræus. The reader must not suppose that the name Chaldean has anything to do with the Chaldee language. The Catholics of the Syrian and Chaldean rites agree in the use of the Syriac tongue in the liturgy, the former, however, using the Western or Jacobite, the latter, the Eastern or Nestorian, dialect. The differences between the dialects, which are slight and chiefly affect the pronunciation of the vowels, are noted in all the recent grammars. Martin (Syro-Chaldaicæ Institutiones, p. 60) gives a transcription of the Nicene Creed in Roman characters, as he heard it pronounced by a Chaldean priest.

conversion of the Nestorians at Diarbekir led Innocent XI. to establish a new Chaldean patriarchate in that city. Joseph I. was the first patriarch; the last died in 1828. (Badger, "The Nestorians and their Rituals," vol. i. p. 150.)

Here Assemani's narrative ends, but since his great work was published at Rome (1719–28) the most important accession of Nestorians to the Church has taken place. There had been since the middle of the sixteenth century a schism between the Nestorians themselves, and they had two patriarchs, one residing at Kochanes in Central Koordistan, the other at Mosul, or Alkôsh. Elias, the patriarch at the latter place, on his death in 1778, left two nephews, Hanna (=John, the name he took at ordination, his own name being Hormuzd) and Jeshuyan. Both were already metropolitans, both became Catholics, and both were candidates for the patriarchate. The latter had scarcely reached the object of his ambition when he relapsed into Nestorianism. John, who remained Catholic, claimed the patriarchate in his place, A.D. 1782. He had bitter disputes, not only with his Nestorian relatives, but also with the Carmelite missionaries and the Patriarch Joseph, who still exercised jurisdiction at Diarbekir. It was not till the close of the last century that he was recognised by Rome as the spiritual head of all the Chaldeans, and allowed to use the patriarchal seal and exercise patriarchal functions, and he then took the name Elias. He only received the pallium shortly before his death at Bagdad in 1841. He must have been bishop for more than sixty-three years; but it appears from his autobiography, translated by Badger, that he was consecrated metropolitan at the age of sixteen. This last conversion to the Church embraced most of the Nestorians in the plains by the Tigris. Badger, writing in 1852, estimates the number of Catholics belonging to the Chaldean rite at 20,000, thinly scattered through the vast territory which extends from Diarbekir to the frontiers of Persia, and from Tyari to Bagdad. The Chaldeans, says Badger (i. p. 176), are superior to their Nestorian countrymen "in civilisation, general intelligence, and ecclesiastical order." This is important testimony, coming, as it does, from an author who had extraordinary opportunities of judging correctly, and who writes with passionate vehemence against everything Catholic.

Rome utterly abolished the hereditary succession to the patriarchate which had long prevailed among the Nestorians, and John was forbidden to make any of his relations bishops, but it was difficult to root out this abuse. A nephew of the Patriarch John actually became Nestorian for a few months, in 1834, that he might be consecrated metropolitan by the Nestorian patriarch and succeed his uncle, who is said to have approved of this proceeding. The devotion to the old patriarchal house nearly led to a schism, which was fomented by a Nestorian patriarch, Shimoom, who fled from the Kurds to Mosul. Great discontent was caused in 1843 by an attempt of the Patriarch Zeiya to make the Chaldeans keep Easter according to the Latin reckoning. This patriarch was himself cited before the Holy Office on a charge of embezzlement, and resigned in 1846. The next patriarch, Joseph Audu, came into conflict with Rome on account of his claims to exercise jurisdiction over the Chaldeans in India, and because of his uncanonical ordinations. He was forbidden to consecrate bishops without leave from Rome. He refused to accept the decrees of the Vatican Council, which he attended, and renounced communion with Rome. A Capuchin, Bishop Fanciulli, was sent as apostolic visitor to Mosul, and the patriarch made a qualified submission in July 1872. Soon after the patriarch renewed the schism, induced some of the bishops and nobles to join him, and consecrated bishops in defiance of the Pope. The revolt was fostered by the Turkish Government. The patriarch made his final submission in January 1877.

According to the ordinary law the patriarch—unless Rome has previously appointed a coadjutor with right of succession—is chosen by the bishops. The election, if canonical, is confirmed at Rome. He is subject not only to Propaganda but to the Latin Archbishop of Bagdad, as apostolic visitor. He resides at Alkôsh and Mosul.

The metropolitans and bishops, who are chosen from the monks, are nominated and consecrated by the Patriarch. The metropolitan Sees are Amedia, Mosul (both immediately subject to the patriarch), Kerkuk, Seert Gehanan. The episcopal sees are Akra, Diarbekir, Gezir, Mardin, Salmas, Zaku. The secular priests are usually married, and partly support themselves by manual labour. The monks belong to the order of St. Anthony, and there are two monasteries—a very ancient one, that of Rabban Hormuzd, at Alkôsh, which in 1843 had an abbot and four monks, and a small one founded in modern times, and with scarcely any religious, that of Mar Yurgis (= St. George), on the left bank of the Tigris, a few miles above Mosul. The monks live apart in cells which are mostly in the rock. They abstain from wine and spirits and from flesh, except on Christmas Day and Easter Sunday.

Bickell ("Conspectus rei Syrorum Litterariæ," Münster, 1871, §§ vii.–x.) mentions the following printed editions of liturgical books of the Chaldean rite: "Missale Chaldaicum, et Decret. S. Congregat. de Propaganda Fide," Romæ, 1767; "Psalterium Chaldaicum in usum nationis Chald.," Romæ, 1842; "Breviarium Chaldaicum in usum nationis Chald. a Josepho Guriel, secundo editum," Romæ, 1865. He also gives the titles of four liturgical books of the Chaldean rite, but intended for the church of Malabar—viz. "Ordo Chaldaicus Missæ B. Apost. juxta ritum Eccles. Malabar." Romæ, 1774; "Ordo Chaldaicus Rituum et Lectionum juxta morem Eccles. Malabar." Romæ, 1775; "Ordo Chaldaicus Ministerii Sacrament. SS. quæ perficiuntur a Sacerdot. juxta morem Eccles. Malabar." Romæ, 1845; "Ordo Baptism. Adultorum juxta ritum Eccles. Malabar. Chaldæorum." Romæ, 1859. In three instances there is an exceptional use of the word Chaldee instead of Syriac in the title of books meant for the Maronites—viz. "Missale Chaldaicum juxta ritum Eccles. Nationis Maronitarum," Romæ, 1592; "Officium Defunctorum ad usum Maronitarum Gregorii XIII. impensa Chaldaicis characteribus impressum," Romæ, 1585, vol. ii.; "Breviarii Chaldaici æstiva pars" (the former part, printed ten years earlier, is entitled simply, "Offic. Sanctorum juxta ritum Eccles. Maronit. pars hiemalis"), Romæ, 1666.

(Assemani has been our authority for the history down to the close of the seventeenth century, then Badger, carefully compared with Silbernagl's "Kirchen des Orients;" and for the events of the last few years, Hergenröther, "Kirchengeschichte," vol. ii. p. 1009 seq.)

COMB. The liturgical use of the comb is, so far as we know, mentioned once only in our present books—viz. in the Pontifical, where the rubrics for the consecration of a bishop require an "ivory comb" to be provided. But Ducange (ad voc. "Pecten") shows that its use was once far more general. "It was," he says, "counted among the sacred instruments, and was used by priests and clerics for combing their hair before they went [from the sacristy] into the church." Thus Ducange quotes a will of Count Everard, A.D. 837, leaving a comb among the other "ornaments of his chapel." So in the will of Bishop Riculfus, A.D. 915, a charter of 1231, a charter of John, bishop of Capua, A.D. 1301. Mr. Maskell ("Mon. Rit." ii. p. 256) gives other examples—e.g. from an inventory of St. Paul's, London, A.D. 1295—and he quotes a rubric from the Pontifical of Archbishop Bainbridge of York, which directs the bishop, when about to say Mass, to comb his hair after putting on his sandals, and before he assumes the amice. The combing of the bishop's hair was as much a part of the ceremonials as putting on his mitre, and was done by the deacon or subdeacon, sometimes by both (Mabillon, "Museum Italicum," ii. p. 292).

GLOVES (CHIROTHECÆ). A bishop's gloves are blessed and put on his hands at his consecration by the consecrator. Episcopal gloves are mentioned by Hugo of St. Victor, Honorius of Autun ("Gemma Animæ," i. 215), and Innocent III., but not by the older writers, Amalarius, Rabanus Maurus, or even Pseudo-Alcuin, so that they must have been introduced about the eleventh century (Hefele, "Beiträge,' ii. p. 222). There is, according to Mr. Maskell ("Mon. Rit." ii. p. 286), no allusion to the solemn investing of the bishop with gloves in the most ancient Ordinals, or in the Sarum Pontifical, or in Winchester, Bangor, and Exeter MSS., and he concludes that the rite was of late introduction in the English Church.

PISCINA. The word which signified originally "a fish-pond" came to mean in classical writers of the silver age a basin, or bath. In the early Latin Church it was employed as an equivalent for κολυμβήθρα, the Greek word for the baptismal font. In the middle ages it was the common term for the small niche in the wall on the Epistle side of the altar containing a perforated basin of stone, through which the water used in washing the priest's hands was poured. Earlier in the middle ages the ablutions were also poured down the piscina. Examples of mediæval piscinæ abound in old English churches. They are sometimes to be seen in modern Catholic churches.

PLAIN CHANT[1] (cantus firmus),

[1] It was intended to substitute this article for that in the body of the work; and this will be ultimately done; but for the present the known also as Gregorian, or Roman, or Choral Chant, is the distinctive song of the Church. It has been defined to be a grave, diatonic, unison melody, set to the rhythm of the words, without strictly measured time, and used by the Church in her sacred functions (Haberl's "Magister Choralis," translated by Donnelly, Ratisbon, 1877). This is perhaps as good a definition as can be assigned to a subject which, from its free spiritual nature, is hardly definable, however much we may describe certain of its leading characters, its structure and purpose. It is, in brief, the Church's song, the interpreter in melody of her spiritual prayer. And as prayer is an utterance by the believing heart of the word of faith, according to the maxim lex supplicandi lex credendi, so the chant, which is the more solemn mode of liturgical prayer, owes to the faith its creation, its power, and just interpretation. Only when imbued with the faith will the human mind delight in it, and in proportion as it rids itself of the just government of the faith will it discard it.

Its leading characteristics concern (1) Melody; (2) Tone or Mode; (3) Rhythm.

(1) The Church authorises in her liturgy no other music than pure melody, which it assigns respectively to the officiant, to the cantors, and to the choir. This last consists of a trained body of clerics, or of youths or men habited as clerics, occupying the choir or presbyterium, and having an integral part in all solemn rites and functions. The choir, as a part of the edifice, is normally in front of the altar and in face of the people, and those who occupy it are divided into two parts for alternate singing, one occupying the Epistle side, the other the Gospel side. In the act of singing the alternate choirs face each other, and both by position and training are the leaders of the congregation. Whether the two choirs sing alternately or simultaneously, they sing always in unison or at the same pitch. Voices differing in pitch but singing concordantly, however beautiful the effect, are in so far departing from the strict ecclesiastical chant; and even the accompaniment of the organ does not enter into the Church's conception of her song, or of ritual solemnity. To restrict the free melody of the choir by harmonic chords, whether of the voice or organ, however powerful on the feelings the effect may be, has in her conception some element of incongruity with the just ideal of spiritual worship; and whatever toleration or tacit approval she extends to instrumental or vocal harmonies is subject to the condition that her own chant is not thereby despoiled of its supremacy of place and honour. As to the character of her melody, it is at the same time recitative and meditative. It recites the word of the text and meditates upon it. Sometimes it proceeds with great despatch, as in the psalms and sequences, assigning for the most part one note to each syllable; at others, as in her antiphons, it lingers upon the word, pouring out its meaning in rich melodies, based rhythmically upon its syllables. In this way the Church preserves the balance of her offices, accommodating herself to the time and the spirit of the time; now, according to her spiritual mood, dwelling on the sacred word in sustained meditation, now carried forward in a rapid current of melodious praise. In her offices there is never indecent hurry, never loss of time.

(2) Tone or Mode.—In its tones the ecclesiastical chant is distinguished by great variety and adaptability. It was created for the purpose of being the vehicle of the Church's manifold prayer—manifold in the spiritual affections of her soul. Spiritual adoration, thanksgiving, supplication, sorrow, joy, peace, hope, triumph—such triumph, that is, as is just in this valley of tears—find in her tones the apparatus provided for their solemn expression. But however varied the tones, she is very simple and constant in her mode of using them. When once she has determined the tone which is suited to the mood of her spirit, she delivers the whole antiphon, psalm, hymn, or other form of prayer, in that tone. The melody accommodates itself, indeed, to the word and phrase, but is always restrained by the tone from any mere word-painting, or distraction of her spirit from its leading affection. Compare with this the absence of any predominant tone in many of the compositions of figured music, and the intention and practice of the Church will be the more apparent. In the "Gloria," for instance, the Church conceives of it as one whole—as one act of praise; in the "Credo" it conceives of it as one act of faith. The mode once determined, the song of praise or faith hastens on in its first intention with grave beauty and undeviating path to its accomplishment. But in many of original article will be allowed to stand, because to cancel it would have involved too great a dislocation of type.

the figured compositions on the same themes the "Gloria" and "Credo" are divided into parts so differently conceived, with such an absence of unity of tone, or such a blankness of tone, that no incongruity would be felt, or indeed is felt, in piecing together a "Gloria" or "Credo" from different authors. This is foreign to the Church's spirit. She is various in her tones, but constancy to a tone once chosen is a leading feature of her chant.

(3) Rhythm.—The rhythm of the chant is the rhythm of eloquence—free, and not to be reduced to any artificial measure. There is a rhythm which is natural to the human voice. The accent of words is the outcome of it, and the charm of eloquence depends on it. Even the measured numbers of poetry are no substitute for it; for poetry itself, to be eloquently declaimed, must forget its own measures to some degree, and yield itself to the natural accent, phrasing, and intonation of the speaker. Were any one, in declaiming the verses of a poet, to make the measures of the syllables prominent instead of following the rhythm of voice suggested by the sense, he would be enslaving the poetic idea to mere numbers —turning the master into the slave. It is this rhythm of eloquent pronunciation, depending on the accent of the word, the balance of its syllables, the phrasing of the sentence, and the adjustment of sentences into one delivery of the whole intention of the soul, which is the basis of the rhythm of the chant. The longer meditative melodies are assigned to the accented syllables—as is just, for on them is delivered the force of the word. The very derivation of the word "accent" (ad = "to," and cantus = "chant") teaches how just this is. It is the syllable on which falls the rhythmical ictus or stroke of the voice, which is inseparable from speech, and grows in intensity and musical quality as the voice is raised into eloquence. The rhythm of phrase is preserved in plain chant by accommodating the separate breathings of the voice to the phrasing of the sentence, the end of the sentence being indicated by the pause of the melody on the final or one of the chief confinals, while the close of the whole chant, according to a fixed canon, carries the voice back to its final or fundamental note. By all this it is by no means implied that vocal sound has not a natural rhythm of its own. As soon as the voice is kindled into the melody of song it is rhythmical, even though no intelligible word is uttered, the rhythm then depending on the rise and fall and turns of the melody, the pulsation of the breath, and the guidance of that sense of numbers which is ours by natural gift. Hence the prolonged pneumata or melodious breaths, which for the most part hang upon the accented syllable, must be rhythmically rendered. Sometimes these neumes or breathings are hung to the last syllable, when they do not so much lend force to the word as express the lingering delight of the soul once attuned to a divine thought. Wherever they occur, they must be interpreted rhythmically.

Structure.—The modes or tones are all founded on the diatonic scale, or natural succession of seven notes completed by the octave. It consists of two tetrachords or series of four notes, placed one above the other at the interval of a tone, each comprising two full tones and a half-tone, so that the whole scale comprises five tones and two semitones. According to this use of the term, "tone" no longer signifies a mode of chant, but simply one full step of the voice up or down the natural scale or ladder of sound, which scale, because it proceeds chiefly by tones, is called "diatonic," to distinguish it from the highly embellished or chromatic scale, which proceeds by semitones. Calling the seven different notes by the names ordinarily in use, the diatonic scale may therefore be represented thus: do . . . . re . . . . mi . . fa . . . . sol . . . . la . . . . si . . do. But whereas the natural octave or succession of eight notes begins with do, the first mode or tone of the Church begins on re, and consists of the octave from re to re; and we have only to sing this scale from re to re, keeping the half tone between mi and fa and si and do, to discover something of the practical meaning of an ecclesiastical mode. It will be at once apparent that the position of the semitones in the octave of sound has a determining power upon its character. It is this relative position of the semitones which is the first constituent cause of tone or mode.

The octave of sound, moreover, divides itself naturally into a perfect fifth (three tones and a half) and a perfect fourth (two tones and a half), and the observance of this is the second constituent cause of mode. The first mode has its fifth from re to la, and its fourth from la to re, being constructed thus: re . . . . mi . . fa . . . . sol . . . . la, la . . . . si . . do . . . . re. In this scale re is the fundamental note, and because a complete descant within the mode naturally ends on it, it is called the final.

The note second in importance to the final, but bearing more of the burden of the melody, is the dominant or ruling note. In the authentic modes it is the fifth above the final, and in the first mode is therefore la. On this note all mere recitation is made, and it may on this account be called the reciting note. It is prominent in the modulation of the melody, and in its power is found the third constituent of mode. There are also confinal notes, on which by preference each mode finishes the different phrasings of the melody, and these, therefore, are a fourth constituent of mode.

The second tone is closely related to the first, but with a very distinct character. It is constructed on the same final re, by reversing the relation as to pitch of the fifth and fourth, and changing the dominant to the third below the dominant of the first. It is therefore constructed thus: la . . . . si . . do . . . . re, re . . . . mi . . fa . . . . sol . . . . la, and has for its dominant fa. The close relation between the first and second modes is at once apparent. However different in character, they form an allied pair, and transition from one to the other is natural. Sometimes a chant comprises both, using the fourth above as well as the fourth below the fifth, and is then said to be in the mixed tone of the first and second. This will suffice to show what is the construction of all the modes, or tones, for they run in pairs, similarly formed and allied, both as regards final, dominant, and the relation as to pitch of the fifth and fourth. For just as the first and second are constructed on re, the third and fourth are constructed on mi, the fifth and sixth on fa, the seventh and eighth on sol. These four pairs, of which the first of each is called the authentic, the second the plagal, make up the eight grand tones of the Church. The others—namely the ninth and tenth constructed on la, the eleventh and twelfth on si (existing perhaps only theoretically because their fifth and fourth are not perfect), and the thirteenth and fourteenth on do—are of later introduction.

Let this suffice about the structure of the modes. It must not be supposed, however, that the full character of plain chant is to be learnt by the study of its structure alone. The mode of treatment of the several tones has been handed down in the Church from time immemorial in melodies which have sprung from the minds of saints, not idly exercising themselves in songs, but singing from the inspiration of the Spirit of God.

Notation.—The next point to be considered is notation. The admirable system of writing music now in use was originated in the study of plain chant. By a happy invention the ladder or scale of sound is represented to the eye by a pictorial ladder of four rounds or steps, which are indefinitely prolonged. The three spaces enclosed make with the four parallel lines seven grades, corresponding in number to the seven different notes of the octave, and if any one of these is defined by having assigned to it the pitch and name of one of the sounds of the octave, forthwith all the rest have received their pitch and name. This is done by means of two signs, called clefs—(i.e. keys)—namely and , the former of which represents do, the latter fa. It is evident that the ground for selecting for indication these two sounds, and leaving the rest to be inferred from them, is that they point out the semitones, the position of which is the distinguishing character of the modes. They are used one at a time, according as it is more convenient to the mode to point out the upper or lower semitone; and they are sufficient for this purpose without any other sign, because they may be affixed to one or another line according to the compass of the melody. When the representative power of the grades of the ladder or stave has been thus determined, the succession of notes in the melody can be indicated by setting each note in its own grade.

The signs of these notes are three: a square note ■, which is called the brevis, breve, or short note; a square note with a tail , which is called longa, or the long note, and a diamond-shaped note ♦, which is called the semibrevis, or semibreve. They have no measured value; the sense of the words and the spirit of the office and the season, or other reasons, now suggesting that the current of the melody should be brisk, now prolonged. They have only a relative value, and that not so fixed as to be measurable. The only law that can be given is that the breve has the value its own syllable has when rhetorically pronounced; that the long note is longer than the breve, and the semibreve shorter.

This last is especially used in the descending series of short notes, called passing notes, which bind together the different limbs of the prolonged breathings or neumes. These are the only notes used; but besides these a very valuable aid is given to the singer by writing compactly together the notes which belong to one syllable, and another by marking off the phrases of the melody by perpendicular bars.

History.—To know the history of the chant is a powerful help to understand its value.

It is impossible not to believe that there is a continuity of song from the liturgy of the Church of the Old Testament to that of the New. The Apostles sang the psalms, both as members of the Jewish Church and founders of the Christian Church, and with the text the chant must have been preserved. As, moreover, the psalms are bound up with every part of the liturgy of the Catholic Church, we may safely argue that the ancient psalm chants are interwoven in its melodies. Moreover, psalms and antiphons make up the greater part of liturgical song, forming a considerable part even of the chant of the Mass, and as they form one whole, it would seem that the highly modulated antiphon is second in order of origin to the simpler melodies of the psalms.

As soon as the Church was free from the Roman persecutions, we find her occupied in establishing due form and uniformity in the liturgy. Pope Damasus (366–384) ordained that the psalms should be chanted by alternate choirs, and that to each should be added the Gloria Patri. St. Ambrose, bishop of Milan (374–397), shares with St. Gregory the glory of being the founder of the system of Church melody. To him are due the four authentic modes, which he adapted to the needs of the liturgy from the system of tetrachords used by the Greeks. To him also is due a mode of chanting known in history as the Ambrosian Chant, to which St. Augustine alludes in his "Confessions." "The hymns and songs O my God, and the sweet chant of Thy Church stirred and penetrated my being. The voices streamed upon my ears and caused truth to flow into my heart; from whose fount the feelings came welling up. I ended at last in a flood of tears." But it is St. Gregory the Great, Pope from A.D. 590 to 604, who is regarded as the author of the system of ecclesiastical chant. He so developed and perfected it, that from his time it has borne the name Gregorian. To him is ascribed the discovery of the octave as the naturally complete succession of sounds. Of the fifteen notes used by the Greeks as the basis of their system of tetrachords, he saw that after the first seven they were only repetitions of the preceding at a higher pitch, and by calling these seven by the first seven letters of the alphabet, repeating the letters for the next seven, he fixed for ever the true groundwork of all music. He perfected the work of St. Ambrose by adding to each of the authentic modes the allied mode which runs side by side with it, and is therefore called plagal. He adopted a simplified manner of notation, consisting of dots, curves, strokes, and combinations of them, placed above the words at various distances, called Neumata or Nota Romana. To us the system is exceedingly complex, no less than twenty-eight of these easily confounded signs being enumerated and explained in "Die Sängerschule S. Gallens" (Einsiedeln, 1858), taken from the famous MS. at S. Gall, reputed to be a copy of St. Gregory's "Antiphonarium"; and only a persistent tradition and constant teaching could have preserved the Gregorian chants till the advent of a better notation. This "Antiphonarium" was St. Gregory's great work in this field. It was the first publication under the authority of Rome of the Catholic liturgical chant, and was chained to the altar of St. Peter's, that it might be referred to on all occasions as the true exemplar. It consisted of a collection of the existing chants, corrected and improved by St. Gregory, many new ones of his own inspiration, and the method of using them. John the Deacon, writing in the ninth century, tells us that St. Gregory "examined the tones, measures, moods, and notes most suitable to the majesty of the Church, and formed that ecclesiastical music, so grave and edifying, which at present is called Gregorian." It was in the latter part of the eighth and beginning of the ninth century that the modes founded on la and do were introduced. Charlemagne, who laboured for the diffusion of the Roman chant throughout the West, would not at first admit of them, but after questioning and discussion they obtained a liturgical place. With these the system of Gregorian Chant was complete as we now have it. But in spite of the constancy of traditional teaching, the notation was too indefinite to preserve it in its integrity, and the sense of this gradually led to the formation of the stave. The introduction of one line is due to Hucbald, a Flemish monk of St. Amand, who died about 930 A.D. A second was shortly added, perhaps indeed by the same hand. Of these one represented fa, and was coloured red, the other do, and was coloured yellow. How much these would facilitate the interpretation of the neumata of St. Gregory is apparent. But it was reserved for Guido d'Arezzo, a Benedictine monk of the convent of Pomposa, near Ravenna, to perfect the notation. He framed the stave of four lines with its moveable clefs as we have it now, and proved the immense utility of the invention by teaching Pope John XIX. (1024–1033), to sing a chant before unknown to him in one lesson. He also has the credit of having originated our present names for the first six notes of the octave, namely ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la. Si was added afterwards, and some countries, following the Italians, have substituted do for ut. These names are taken from the Vesper hymn of the Feast of St. John the Baptist.

> Ut queant laxis, *re*sonare fibris
> *Mi*ra gestorum *fa*muli tuorum,
> *Sol*ve polluti *la*bii reatum,
> *Sa*ncte Joannes, being the first syllables of the words, commencing each half-verse and rising in pitch gradually according to the natural ascent of the octave.

Guido, however, departed from the principles of the tetrachord and octave for a system of hexachords, or series of six notes, using for his system the variable character of si before explained, and introducing a note lower than the A of the preceding system. This note he called gamma, and as it represented ut in his hexachord system of mutations, the word Gamut arose. His system happily did not endure, but after St. Gregory there is no name in higher honour for services rendered to the chant than that of Guido d'Arezzo. From his time there was no fear that the Gregorian melodies would pass into oblivion by forgetfulness, because the pitch of each note could be precisely written down, whatever their shape. The shape of the notes now in use is of later origin. This, in brief, is the history of the chant till the time when it was complete in structural development, notation, and theory. Thenceforward the spirit of the legislation of the Church in respect of it has been to preserve it in its integrity. By the sixteenth century it had shared in the common relaxation and disfigurement, the causes of the evil being (1) the use of measured rhythm, depending on the beat of hand or foot; (2) the introduction of counterpoint or harmony with its seductive beauty; (3) the mingling in the liturgy of popular worldly music, both vocal and instrumental. In these ways its melodic simplicity and spiritual power were diminished, and the Church assembled at Trent, for the purpose among others of the reformation of discipline, was sensible of the need of it in her chant. The necessary genius was provided by Providence in Palestrina and his pupil Guidetti, and in 1582 appeared the first printed monument of this work of reform—namely, the "Directorium Chori" of Guidetti. Its greatest monument, the "Graduale Romanum," printed by command of Paul V. at the Medicæan press in 1614, is an abiding memorial of Palestrina's Christian fame, though issued twenty years after his death. To him belongs the double glory of restoring the chant to its former grand and simple beauty, and of exhibiting contrapuntal or harmonised music as the vehicle of Christian thought in such marvellous power as to secure for it toleration in the liturgy. In the liturgical reform set on foot by Pius IX. for the establishment of uniformity in the Roman chant, and being continued under the present Supreme Pontiff Leo XIII., the commission to whom the work of revision was assigned republished after matured labours the Medicæan edition of the "Gradual," adding the chants of the new offices instituted since its first issue. These new chants are due to the Rev. Francis Xavier Haberl, Master of the Cathedral Choir of Ratisbon. The printer deputed by the Holy See is Pustet of Ratisbon, who, acting under the Sacred Congregation of Rites and the aforesaid commission, has almost completed the publication of the many different books of the chant. It is an immense work, admirably executed under high commendations from Pius IX. and Leo XIII. (See Decree of the Sacred Congregation, April 10, 1883)

It remains to distinguish plain chant from modern figured music.

The Church's duty is to reform and spiritualise the natural faculties, the musical as much as any other. The discovery of the natural octave belongs to her, but her use of it is most significant. The most natural succession of notes is in her thirteenth tone, but this is the last she adopted, and then only with reluctance, and the affection for this tone marks the transition of the musical art to the modern secular style, in which this tone is almost exclusively used. It is the major mode of modern music. Its minor mode, which is used integrally only in the descending scale, is the ninth tone of the Church, which again was admitted to liturgical rank only with reluctance. And it would seem that a divine instinct was the cause of her misgiving, for the work she continually has in hand to keep the liturgical chant pure is owing to the intrusion into the choir of a music repugnant to her spirit, but springing out of these latest of her tones.

But the chief difference of modern or figured music from plain chant lies in the rhythm. It is called Cantus mensurabilis, because the rhythm of the word is abandoned for an external standard capable of exact measurement. The regular beat of the hand or foot is substituted for the free pulsations of the intelligent and eloquent voice ; and, speaking for the present only of melody, it is clear that this means a subordination of the word to a music conceived independently of it. The bars no longer point out the pauses suited to the eloquent pronunciation of the word, but indicate the close of one set of beats. In consequence, not only the melody but the word sung is made subservient to an external standard, and the singer must give his first attention to this instead of following his inward sense. Hence it would be repugnant to the lowest Catholic intelligence that a priest in the Mass, when he should be in the highest mood of prayer, should sing a music thus reducible to a measure of beats. And even in secular music it is recognised that the highest exponents of the author's mind must exercise a certain freedom of interpretation as to measure. Music, indeed, founded on an external standard cannot be distinctly spiritual. But it may be sentimental and imaginative, and herein lies its distinctive difference In its influence over the sensible feelings, and in the appeal it makes to the imagination is its power, and by this should be estimated its due place in the liturgy. While, for instance, the Church, with directness of aim, makes a spiritual act of faith in the crucifixion, passion, death, and burial of our Lord, merely fixing the tone and building the melody on the rhythm of the word, figured music makes elaborate pictures in music of the sadness, darkness, horror, or other sensible adjunct of the scene of the crucifixion. How far and in what way the sentiment and imagination may be justly used in music for religious purposes is matter for discussion. But arguing from our Lord's use of them in speech, it seems sound to conclude that they are at best a preparation for the spiritual, and that adequate interpretation of the word of faith, which is essentially spiritual, cannot be made through them.

That constituent of figured music on which its title figured depends, is the use of counterpoint or harmony. This has a powerful effect upon the sentiment, and certainly has not the same repugnance to the spiritual as the measured beat has. But it must, unless it were of the simplest kind, restrict the free course of the melody by the necessity of allowing other voices of differing sound to keep up concordantly with it, and the Church shows no disposition to admit that it is any help to the interpretation of her spiritual word. Even to a skilled organist, where there is only question of instrumental harmonies, it is no easy task to accompany the chant when rendered with free and intelligent delivery by a trained choir, and to endeavour to harmonise throughout is only to oppress the voice and hamper the melody.

To listen to Rome, in music as in other matters, would be for the advancement of art. She is the Magistra Fidei, and therefore she is the source and mistress of the chant, which is the interpretative song of the word of faith. Through the exercise of this function she has become the founder of the art of song and the science of music. How studious she has been of the chant, how carefully she has estimated its tones and properties, noted the force of different intervals, classified the various melodious turns of the voice, discriminated what is effeminate and trivial in song from what is worthy and just, and how in labouring to give expression to her spiritual mind she founded the natural science of music, and the art of song, becomes the more apparent the deeper we investigate; while it is at the same time impressed upon the mind that the main cause of the aberrations in ecclesiastical chant which call for repeated monitions from popes and bishops is, that the science of it has been allowed to fall into decay in proportion as figured music has become diffused. Of necessity, some training in this music is received by every one in civilised countries. Our choirs are usually made up of elements whose very qualification is that they have some knowledge of it. What more natural than that they should sing what they know, and like what they can do? Herein is their standard of judgment, and they are thereby unfitted and indisposed to render the spiritual chant of the Church. When, in music as in faith, the word of Rome is held decisive and forthwith obeyed, there will be in it progress and expansion without decay.

PURIFICATION, as distinct from ablution, is the pouring of wine into the chalice after the priest's communion, the wine being drunk by the priest. This purification is not of ancient date. "Liturgical writers," says Le Brun ("Explication de la Messe," P. v. a. 9, § 3), "down to the treatise on the mysteries by Cardinal Lothair, afterwards Pope, under the name of Innocent III., at the end of the twelfth century, simply note that the priest washes his hands, that the water was thrown into a clean and decent place, called the piscina, and that [the water] used to wash the chalice was thrown into the same place." But Innocent III., fifteen or sixteen years after writing his treatise "De Mysteriis," laid it down that the priest should always use wine to purify the chalice, and drink it, unless he was going to say another Mass.

PURIFICATION OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN. The Levitical law (Lev. xii. 2 seq.) declared women unclean for seven days after the birth of a male child; it excluded them from the sanctuary for thirty-three days more; on the fortieth they had to appear in the temple and to offer a lamb one year old for a holocaust and a young pigeon or turtle-dove as a sin-offering. In the case of the poor it was enough to offer two turtle-doves or young pigeons, one as a holocaust and the other as a sin-offering. The Blessed Virgin was not bound by this law, since the child born of her was conceived by the Holy Ghost (see Levit. xii. 2 and St. Thomas "Summa," II. xxxvii. 4). But her divine Son subjected himself to the burdens of the law that He might set His seal to its divine origin, remove occasion of cavil, and leave us an example of humility, and similar motives no doubt induced the Virgin herself to undergo the rite of purification. It is this event which the Church celebrates in the feast which bears that name, and is kept for a reason virtually given already on the fortieth day after Christmas, i.e. February 2. If, however, we turn to the Mass for the day, we find no less prominence given to two other events which were simultaneous with the purification. Candles are blessed and carried in procession to remind us how the holy old man Simeon met our Lord, took Him in his arms, and declared Him the light of the Gentiles and the glory of Israel. Next, in the collect, epistle, and the gospel there are marked references to the fact that our Lord was at the same time presented in the temple before God and redeemed with five holy shekels (Luc. xii. 22, cf. Exod. xiii. 2; Num. viii. 16, xviii. 15). Indeed, these two latter incidents are more prominent in the Mass and office than that of the Blessed Virgin's purification, and it is noteworthy that the preface in the Mass is the same as that of Christmas, not the one which is proper to the feasts of the Blessed Virgin. The Greeks number the festival amongst those of our Lord, and call it ὑπαντή, ὑπαπαντή, i.e. the meeting of Christ with Simeon and Anna. The old Latin title "occursus" "obviatio" points in the same direction. So Bede calls it "Oblatio Christi ad templum," and in the Ambrosian rite it is still reckoned among the solemnities of our Lord's life On the other hand, the name in the Roman Missal and Breviary, viz. "Purificatio B.V.M.," stamps it as a feast of the Blessed Virgin. The English name Candlemas refers, of course, to the candles blessed and carried in procession before Mass.

We have the first certain traces of the observance in the East. No Father of the first five centuries mentions it, for the homily of Methodius on the feast is probably due to Methodius of Constantinople in the ninth century, and in any case is certainly not by Methodius of Tyre, who lived at the end of the third. Similar homilies attributed to Cyril of Jerusalem, Amphilochius and Gregory Nyssen are admitted on all hands to be spurious. In the year 543, says Fleury ("H. E." liv. xxxiii. 7), "they began to celebrate at Constantinople the feast of the Purification, named by the Greeks Hypapante," and he refers to the notes of Baronius on the martyrology for February 2. Fleury's statement is undoubtedly accurate. But there is nothing incredible in that of Cedrenus that there was a local celebration at Antioch begun under the Emperor Justin in 526, while Tillemont ("Mém." tom. 1, note 7 on the life of Christ) infers from a passage in the life of the abbot Theodosius that the day was kept in the Church of Jerusalem as early as the middle of the fifth century. We cannot say for certain when it was introduced in the West, and the conjecture of Baronius that Pope Gelasius, who abolished the heathen festival of the Lupercalia in the month of February, persuaded the people to accept the feast of the Purification instead, is only a conjecture and not a very probable one. Be that as it may, we have evidence that the feast was known to Bede ("De Rat. Temp." cap. 13), who died in 735. It is, moreover, mentioned in the sacramentary of St. Gregory and in the capitularies of Charlemagne (in the latter under the modern title, Purificatio S. Mariæ; see Thomassin, "Traité des Festes," liv. ii. ch. 11), and after that time it was clearly recognised everywhere. The candles borne in procession and held in the hand at Mass are spoken of by Bede, loc. cit., and by St. Eligius ("Hom. ii. in die Purificationis S. Mariæ"), who was bishop of Noyon from 640–648. On the other hand, it does not seem possible to trace the rite for the blessing of the candles beyond the eleventh century.

ROTA ROMANA. A tribunal within the Curia Romana, "formerly the supreme court of justice in the Church, and the universal court of appeal."[1] It was instituted by John XXII. in 1326, and regulated by Sixtus IV. and Benedict XIV. It is of less importance now than formerly, because the spiritual causes of foreign countries, which used to be brought before it, are now usually tried and settled on the spot by judges delegated by the Holy See. [DELEGATION.]

The assembled court, or Plenum, of the Rota, consists of twelve members, called Auditors, presided over by a Dean. It is divided into two colleges or senates. One of these was, before 1870, the court of second instance for civil suits which had been originally tried in the local courts of Rome, Perugia, Spoleto, and other towns of the ecclesiastical state. The other was the court of third instance, that is, of final appeal, for suits coming from—1. The appeal courts (second instance) of the Papal States; 2. All spiritual courts, in the secular affairs belonging to their competence; 3. The Rota itself, deciding in the second instance.

The explanation of the name is said to be (Ducange) that the marble floor of the chamber in which the Rota used to sit was designed so as to exhibit the appearance of a wheel.

The Auditors, in Pleno, sit in a fixed order on either hand of the Dean, the junior member, No. 12, being exactly opposite him. In any case coming before the Rota on appeal, the appealing party can select any auditor at discretion, to be the "Referendary" or presiding judge. The Referendary so chosen, and the four auditors sitting next to him in Pleno, on the left hand, form the senate for the trial of the case. The "Decisions of the Rota," owing to their importance as precedents, have been frequently published. (Wetzer and Welte.)

APPENDIX B.

NOTE.—Contents of Appendix A is included in general Index.

ALEXIAN BROTHERS, OR CELLITES. During the fearful plague which raged all over Europe at one time in the fourteenth century this brotherhood was organized by Louis de Bourbon, Prince-Bishop of Liège, for the care of hospitals for men. The first rules for the government of the Alexian Brothers, drawn up in 1469, were approved by successive popes, and again confirmed, with all the privileges hitherto accorded the Brothers, by Pope Pius IX. in 1870. The Alexian Brothers came to the United States in 1867, and the following year opened a hospital in Chicago, which was destroyed in the great conflagration of 1871, but rebuilt the next year. In 1869 the Brothers opened a fine hospital in St. Louis, to which they added a department for the insane in 1879. In 1880 the foundations were laid in Oshkosh, Wis., of another hospital, to be finished and opened for use in 1884. The Alexian Brothers have pay and free patients in their hospitals, all the income from those who pay being used for the maintenance of the indigent patients, the Brothers depending altogether on the charity of the public for the support of their institutions. Patients of all creeds or none are received alike, for the sake of Jesus Christ, and everything that sanitary science or the skill of physicians and surgeons of repute can do is made use of for the cure or relief of disease or physical injuries. The American novitiate of this excellent community is attached to the Alexian Hospital in Chicago.

BASIL (ST.), PRIESTS OF, OR BASILIANS. This society has no connection or relation whatever with the ancient rule of St. Basil or its monks. It originated in the year 1800 with Archbishop Davian, of Vienne, in France, who established it to carry on preparatory colleges and seminaries for the education of young men for the priesthood. Its first house was in the parish of St. Basil, among the mountains of the Vivarais, whence its name. For a number of years it was a free association until Mgr. Guibert, then Bishop of Viviers, with the help of its superiors, devised a new constitution, which was approved by the Holy See. Its members take the four solemn vows of poverty, chastity, obedience, and stability. The mother-house of the Basilians is at Annonay (Ardèche), France, and they have houses in France, England, Africa, and two in Canada, St. Michael's College, Toronto, and Assumption College, Sandwich.

CHARITY (IRISH), SISTERS OF. This sisterhood was founded in Dublin in 1815, with the approbation and assistance of Archbishop Murray, by Mary Frances Aikenhead, who, in company with another Irish lady, had made her novitiate at the York convent of the Institute of the Blessed Virgin in order to fit herself for the religious life and for the organization of the new society. It differs in several respects from the French Sisters of Charity, these last following the rule drawn up for them by St. Vincent de Paul, while the Irish sisterhood follows a modification of the rule of St. Ignatius. It has many houses, orphanages, asylums, hospitals, schools, etc., in Ireland and in the British colonies.

CHARITY, SISTERS OF, OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN MARY. In the year 1833, the year before the Holy See's approbation of the Irish Sisters of Charity, five young ladies, who had found difficulties in an attempt to live in community in Dublin, came to the United States by the advice of their spiritual director and reached Philadelphia, where they fell to the charge of Father T. J. Donaghoe. He employed them in his parish schools of St. Michael's. Recruits soon joined the new community, which lived under very simple rules, aiming above all at perfection in observing the Ten Commandments of God and the Commandments of the Church. In 1834 the Sisters were thanked by the City Council of Philadelphia for their devotion to the victims of the cholera. But the very same year a bitter anti-Catholic agitation was begun by many Protestant clergymen, some of them of Yale and Princeton. This was aggravated by the Rev. Lyman Beecher, whose incendiary sermons brought about the destruction of the Ursuline Convent in Boston that year. This all culminated in the Native-American excitement of 1844, when an anti-Catholic mob in Philadelphia marched with fifes and drums upon St. Michael's Church and gave it and the Sisters' house to the flames. Nor did their cruel bigotry end there, as is well known. Fortunately, however, the Sisters, though they still held the right to the house, had six months before left Philadelphia for Dubuque, Iowa, on the invitation of Bishop Loras. With the money grudgingly paid them by the city of Philadelphia, for the work of its mob, the Sisters erected St. Joseph's Convent and a novitiate on the prairie eight miles from Dubuque, and in Dubuque itself they found immediate employment nursing cholera patients. But all their buildings were again burnt down by an incendiary. Yet the Sisters persevered under the advice of Father Donaghoe, their founder, who had accompanied them to Iowa, and who remained as their spiritual adviser until his death in 1869. The constitution of the sisterhood, having undergone some necessary revision, was approved by the Holy See in 1875. The Sisters of Charity B. V. M. now have charge of boarding and parish schools in the dioceses of Dubuque, Davenport, Chicago, Peoria, and La Crosse. The mother-house and novitiate remain, where first established, at St. Joseph's, near Dubuque.

CHARITY, SISTERS OF, OF NAZARETH. A sisterhood whose objects are similar to those of the Sisters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul—the charge of hospitals, asylums, refuges, etc., as well as of parish and boarding schools. Its mother-house and novitiate is near Bardstown, Ky., where the sisterhood was founded in 1812 by Father John Baptist David, afterwards bishop of Bardstown, a see later transferred to Louisville. The communities of these Sisters are all south of the Ohio River, along the east of the Mississippi. During the Civil War these Sisters, as well as the Sisters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul and the Sisters of Mercy and others, displayed an heroic charity, in the hospitals and on the battle-field, on both the Federal and Confederate sides.

CHARITY, SISTERS OF CHRISTIAN. This useful sisterhood began in a community established in 1849 at Paderborn, Germany, by Pauline Von Mallinckrodt, a sister of the distinguished Catholic statesman, Hermann Von Mallinckrodt. At first its object was the care and instruction of little children of the working class while their mothers were at work, but afterwards its scope was widened so as to include most of the many labors of charity engaged in by the generality of modern sisterhoods. The first house of the Sisters of Christian Charity in the United States was opened in 1873, in New Orleans, by Mother Pauline herself, who the same year established the mother-house of the North American province at Wilkesbarre, Pa. The mother-house of the South American province is at Valparaiso, Chili, where the Sisters since 1875 have flourishing communities, as well as in Germany, Belgium, and Bohemia. In the United States there are communities in Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, and Louisiana, engaged in the care of hospitals and orphanages, or in the work of parish and boarding schools.

HOLY CROSS, CANONS REGULAR OF THE. These canons live in community and follow the rule of St. Augustine. They are not numerous now, and are to be found in the Austrian empire chiefly and in the Roman state. There seems to have been a house of these canons opened near Milwaukee about 1850, but no trace of their existence anywhere now in the United States is to be found. They were formerly known as "Canons of the Holy Sepulchre," because they originated in the community of priests which was formed about the fourth century near that shrine, and held their place even under Moslem sway until driven out with other Christians in the thirteenth century. They wear a black habit with a double red cross, and are subject to a master-general, who resides at Rome.

HOLY CROSS, CONGREGATION OF THE. In 1793 Father Dujarié organized a community of brothers at Le Mans, in France, in aid of primary education, which had been suffering from the disorders of the time. They were called "Brothers of St. Joseph." In 1837 it was thought best to admit priests to the society, which now assumed the name of the "Holy Cross," and in its present form was approved in 1857 by the Holy See. The congregation consists of priests and lay brothers, all engaged in teaching, or in the necessary manual or other labor connected with the maintenance of schools and colleges, though the priests are sometimes occupied in parish work also. In 1841 Father Sorin, with six others of the congregation, arrived from France and established themselves in Indiana, where the mother-house now is at the University of Notre Dame. The congregation has charge of high-schools and parish-schools in several States of the Mississippi valley.

HOLY CROSS, SISTERS OF THE. This sisterhood, which now numbers seven hundred members in the United States, has its American mother-house at Notre Dame, Ind., and was organized in France in 1834, to work in harmony with the above-named congregation. It was introduced into the United States in 1843, and its constitution was approved by the Holy See in 1857. It is engaged in teaching in parish and boarding schools, and is most numerous in Indiana, Illinois, and in the diocese of Baltimore.

LORETTO NUNS; OR, SISTERS OF THE INSTITUTE OF THE B. V. M. This society originated with some pious English ladies, exiles from their country on account of their religion, who formed themselves into a community at Munich, Bavaria, about 1631. The "English Virgins," as they were popularly called, were not finally approved by the Holy See until 1703. In 1669 a colony of these Sisters returned to England and opened a convent in London, but on account of the persecution they lived with great caution against any surprise from those who were seeking out priests and nuns, and after a while removed to York, where, in spite of many annoyances and dangers, the community has remained till now. The outbreak of the French Revolution caused a reaction among the ruling classes of England in favor of toleration of Catholics, and then the Sisters ventured, for the first time in England, to wear the religious habit openly. An off-shoot, "Loretto Abbey," was founded in 1821 at Rathfarnham, in Ireland, and from this Irish mother-house numerous colonies have gone out, founding convents in most of the British colonies, including Canada. The Sisters are principally devoted to the care of boarding-schools.

LORETTO, SISTERS OF; OR, FRIENDS OF MARY AT THE FOOT OF THE CROSS. A sisterhood founded in Kentucky in 1812 by Father Charles Nerinckx, one of the pioneer priests of that region. The object of the society, which now numbers about five hundred members, is the instruction of girls, both in parish and boarding schools. The mother-house is at Loretto, Marion Co., Ky., and there are convents and schools of these Sisters in Kentucky, Missouri, Alabama, Colorado, and New Mexico.

MERCY, FATHERS OF. The name of a society of missionary priests founded in France in 1806 by Father Jean Baptiste Rauzan. The society was introduced into the United States in 1842, when it took charge of the French Church of St. Vincent de Paul in New York City, which it has kept ever since. The novitiate of the society is in Brooklyn, N. Y., where it has also charge of a parish church. The work of the society in the United States has so far been limited to these two sister cities.

NOTRE DAME, SCHOOL SISTERS OF. This sisterhood was established in France in 1598 by the Venerable Peter Fourrier for the education of girls. It was broken up during the French Revolution, but was revived in the diocese of Ratisbon, in Bavaria, in 1833 by Father Sebastian, with the approval of the bishop. The sisterhood follows the rule of St. Augustine, with certain modifications suited to their special work and to the times. In 1847 a small colony of the Sisters arrived in the United States from Bavaria and was settled in Milwaukee, where now is the mother-house of the Western Province. The mother-house of the Eastern Province of the United States is at Govanstown, Md. The school discipline of these Sisters is excellent, and they have charge of more than one hundred and fifty schools, mainly in the northern Mississippi valley and in Baltimore and its vicinity.

PRECIOUS BLOOD, MISSIONARIES OF THE. This congregation was founded in Italy in 1814 by Father Gaspar del Bufalo and was approved by the Holy See in 1820. Its object primarily is preaching missions, and especially in poor or neglected localities. It is under a director-general who resides at Rome. In 1844 a colony arrived in the United States and opened its first house at Norwalk, Ohio. The mother-house of the American province is at Carthagena, Ohio, to which is attached a theological seminary for the education of scholastics of the congregation only. They have charge of parishes, and have altogether about twenty houses, principally in Ohio, Indiana, Missouri, and Tennessee.

PRECIOUS BLOOD, SISTERS OF THE. This sisterhood, organized in dependence on the above congregation, is occupied chiefly with primary instruction. It was introduced into the United States in 1844. The American province contains about five hundred members, with about twenty convents, in the same localities generally as those mentioned in the previous article. The mother-house of the American province is at Maria Stein, Mercer Co., Ohio.

SACRED HEART OF MARY, SISTERS OF. A congregation which devotes itself, according to circumstances, to any of the works of Christian charity, orphanages, industrial schools, asylums for deaf-mutes, parish and boarding schools, etc. It was founded in 1848, at Béziers in France, and was soon after introduced into the United States, its first establishment, now its mother-house, being at Fordham, in New York City, and its next settlements being at Cleveland and Buffalo, to which three dioceses it seems to be still limited in the United States. Its rule is that of St. Augustine, and, in addition to the ordinary three vows, a vow of zeal is taken. The habit is blue for the choir Sisters and black for the lay Sisters.

SACRED HEART, RELIGIOUS OF THE SOCIETY OF THE. This admirable society, remarkable for its rapid growth and still more for its great services in the cause of Christian education, dates its origin from the first year of this century. In the midst of the darkness which the Revolution of 1789 had spread over France this institute arose, like a divine light, to guide the daughters of the highest ranks of European society in the paths of Christian virtue and to fill their minds with Christian knowledge. The name of the institute was chosen as a tender and touching reparation for the blasphemies which French infidelity had heaped upon the Sacred Humanity, and to quicken and strengthen in the hearts of its pupils the faith of centuries that from that Sacred Humanity comes the knowledge that elevates, blesses, and saves the world. In imitation of the Sacred Heart, the ruling, distinctive spirit of this community, now known and deservedly praised in every quarter of the globe, is generous self-devotion to the great work of Christian education. The little band of four persons whom the founder, Father Varin, of the Society of Jesus, gathered to relay the foundations of higher Christian education in France, has grown and multiplied like the mustard-seed of the Gospel; God has wonderfully prospered their handiwork. The early conviction of the first superioress, Madame Barat—now numbered among the beatified of the Church—that the Society of the Sacred Heart was destined, for God's glory, to embrace the universe, has been realized. It now counts, according to the latest catalogue, one hundred and thirteen houses and five thousand members. In all the great cities of Europe—Paris, Rome, Amiens, Beauvais, Lyons, Turin, Florence, Vienna, Brussels, London, Dublin, and many other places—these Ladies of the Sacred Heart have established large, magnificent schools and are rendering incalculable services to religion. The first school of this society in this country was opened at St. Michael's, near New Orleans, in 1818. From this parent root have sprung three vicariates in the United States, embracing twenty-four houses; the vicariate of Canada, embracing four convents; the vicariate of South America, numbering seven academies. The province of New Orleans has lately opened a promising school in the city of Mexico. Three years ago the convent at South St. Louis, Mo., sent a heroic band across the Pacific to educate the children of the settlers of New Zealand. The academies of the Sacred Heart at Manhattanville, New York City, Philadelphia, Torresdale, Pa., Rochester, Boston, Cincinnati, Detroit, Kenwood near Albany, St. Louis, Chicago, Omaha, St. Charles, New Orleans, United States; Montreal and London, Canada, have won for themselves an enviable reputation. The great, unsurpassed merits of their religious and intellectual training are everywhere recognized.

SULPICIANS. The name given to a society of priests who devote themselves to the care of theological seminaries and preparatory theological schools. In 1640 the island of Montreal was ceded to Father Jean Jacques Olier, parish-priest of St. Sulpice, Paris, and founder of the seminary attached to that church. This famous grant was confirmed in spirit in 1663 by a contract which transferred Montreal with all its seigniorial rights to the new seminary of St. Sulpice, then founded there and still one of the most conspicuous institutions of Montreal. So that the Sulpicians are no strangers in North America. The mother-seminary of St. Sulpice, Paris, was formally opened in 1642, and from that day to this has been illustrious for its brilliant course of studies and for the learning and piety of its graduates. It has served also as a model for diocesan seminaries everywhere. In 1791 some Sulpicians from the great Paris establishment arrived in Baltimore and opened a seminary, since dignified as "St. Mary's University." This and its preparatory annex, St. Charles' College, Ellicott City, are the only foundations of the Sulpicians in the United States. [See SEMINARY.]

VIATEUR (ST.), PAROCHIAL CLERICS OR CATECHISTS OF. This congregation was founded in 1828 by Very Rev. Jean-Louis-Marie-Joseph Querbes, parish-priest of Vourles, near Lyons, France. Gregory XVI. solemnly erected it a congregation by a rescript dated May 31, 1839. The end of the institute is both the primary and higher education of youth and the service of the altar. The members, either priests or Brothers, take the three vows of religion. Brothers duly qualified may be promoted to Sacred Orders. Lay Brothers are employed in the temporal care of the different houses.

In 1847 the Clerics of St. Viateur, at the invitation of Rt. Rev. Ignatius Bourget, Bishop of Montreal, proceeded to Canada and opened a novitiate at Joliette, P. Q. They now direct in that province about thirty houses, among which are: Joliette College, Bourget College at Rigaud, and the Deaf and Dumb Institution at Mile-End, Montreal. In 1864 the Canada Province established a school at Bourbonnais Grove, Ill., where now stands St. Viateur's College. In 1882 the new province of Bourbonnais was erected and a novitiate was immediately opened at the same place for the United States. In 1883 a detachment of priests and Brothers of this congregation started from Joliette to Baker City, Oregon, and now form a distinct province for the far West.—St. Viateur's College, Bourbonnais Grove, Kankakee Co., Ill., is under the direction of the Congregation of St. Viateur. It was founded in 1869, chartered in 1874. It comprises the commercial, classical, philosophical, and theological courses.

XAVIER (ST.), BROTHERS OF; OR, XAVERIAN BROTHERS. A congregation of teaching Brothers founded in 1839 in Belgium, at Bruges, and first introduced into the United States in 1854, when they were established at Louisville, Ky., where the Brothers have charge of a high-school and of several parish-schools, as also in Baltimore. The novitiate and mother-house is now at Carrollton, Md.

APPENDIX C.

ABBACOMITES. The abbacomites or abbates milites, count abbots or noble abbots, were lay intruders, to whom courts gave abbacies for pecuniary profit. Thus Bernard, the youngest of Charles Martel's six sons, was lay abbot of Sithin or St. Quentin. Sons, daughters, wives, &c., were thus benefited before the time of Charlemagne, who, however, effected a reform and made monasteries the seats of schools and literature. In later days other princes, claiming the right of investiture, reintroduced similar abuses; secular priests were often made commendatory abbots.

ABSTINENTS. A name given to the Encratites, or Manichees, because of their professed abstinence from wine, marriage, etc.

AGNOETÆ [ADDENDUM]. Besides those mentioned in the text, the disciples of Theophranius of Cappadocia, about 370, bore that name. He taught that God did not know everything, and that he could acquire knowledge. This error was revived by the Socinians.

ALTAR-CARDS. As mentioned under ALTAR, the rubric requires that an altar-card be placed in the centre under the crucifix; custom has introduced two others, one on each side, the object of all three being to aid the priest's memory, should it fail at any time during the celebration of Mass, though he is expected to have the prayers committed to memory. The centre card contains the "Gloria in excelsis," the "Credo," the Offertory prayers, the "Qui pridie," or beginning of the Canon, the form of consecration, the prayers before Communion, and the "Placeat," or last prayer. That at the Epistle side contains the prayer said while putting the water into the chalice, and the "Lavabo," said at the washing of the fingers. The one at the Gospel side contains the Gospel of St. John.

ANTEPENDIUM. As mentioned under ALTAR, a "pallium," or frontal, varying in color according to the season, is to be placed on the altar. The rubric especially requires this when the altar is not entirely of stone, and the cloth is generally known as antependium, from ante, before, and pendere, to hang.

ANTISTES. A title frequently applied in ecclesiastical history, and in the prayers of the Church, to a prelate or bishop.

BAPTISM OF BELLS. [See BELLS.]

BIRETTA. Another form of BERRETTA (q. v.) It is worthy of note that the cap which the ancient Irish bard wore was called birredh.

CALOTE OR CALOTTE. The French name for the Zuchetto (q. v.), very commonly used in English.

CATHOLIC CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES, THE. I. COLONIAL PERIOD (1500–1775).—Although some writers have thought it probable that the North American continent was first discovered by Irish navigators, no authentic evidence of the fact has been adduced. The first Europeans who are known to have touched the shores of New England were Lief Ericson and Bjorn, who wintered in a fertile country where they found wild vines growing and which they called Vinland. There, on the shortest day, the sun remained nine hours above the horizon, a fact indicating the latitude of Rhode Island, or the 41st parallel. This same country of Vinland was visited in 1120 by Eric, Bishop of Garda, in Greenland, who may therefore be called the forerunner by five centuries of our earliest apostles. In June, 1497, Giovanni Cabot, a Venetian, discovered Labrador, and followed the coast from Cape Breton to Virginia, at the very same time that the Florentine pilot and cosmographer, Amerigo Vespucci, was landing on the coast of Honduras and exploring the continent as far eastward, at least, as Florida.*

* This much must be admitted from the careful study of Bartolozzi and others, who have written about Vespucci. English and American historians, poisoned by Herrera, do great injustice to the illustrious Florentine.

In 1498 Sebastian Cabot, the son of the former, also sailed along our shores from Newfoundland to Cape Hatteras. The Peninsula of Florida, so called by the Spanish adventurer Ponce de Leon, who landed among its flowery everglades on Easter Sunday, 1512, was to have had later the first missionary bishop expressly consecrated for the present territory of the United States. This was Juan Juarez, a Franciscan monk, who, with several of his brethren, accompanied Panfilo de Narvaez in 1528 on an expedition to the mainland. Bishop Juarez and his brethren perished together with Narvaez and his men, almost the sole survivor being Cabeza de Vaca, who was the first to cross the continent to the Pacific. His arrival among the Spaniards of Sonora impelled a Friar Marco, of Nice, in 1539, to attempt an unsuccessful expedition to evangelize the tribes of the interior. The repeated attempts at conquest, colonization, or missionary establishment made in Florida and the adjoining coasts to the east and west, up to 1542, were rendered abortive or disastrous by the spirit of greed and cruelty which animated the adventurers. They were only seeking for gold and slaves; everywhere they provoked the vengeful hostility of the native tribes. As in the islands of the Caribbean Sea, so on the continent itself, the missionaries were most frequently powerless to quell the inhumanity of the Europeans, whose unchristian conduct thus rendered barren the zeal of priest and prelate. Vasquez de Ayllon, in 1525, searched the coasts of the Carolinas and Maryland, pushing inland in quest of imaginary treasures, and perished with three-fourths of his 600 followers. Another adventurer, Gomez, about the same time sought in vain along these same shores a passage to the East Indies, and bore away with him for sole prize a cargo of slaves. De Soto, with a thousand men, traversed the territory extending from Tampa Bay to Memphis on the Mississippi, "searching for gold and pearls, and everywhere outraging and pillaging the Indians" (1539), dying miserably in 1542, and being buried in the waters of the great river. These men, and many others, were only the imitators of the Portuguese, Gaspar Cortereal, who in 1501 explored our coast as far northward as the Gulf of St. Lawrence, called the northernmost shore Labrador, seizing and carrying away the natives into slavery. Such was not the spirit of Christopher Columbus. Undeterred by the fate of Bishop Juarez and his Franciscans, and by the fruitless fatigues of the missionaries who had accompanied De Soto, the Dominicans, in 1549, resolved to make another effort toward colonizing, or, rather, evangelizing, Florida. Philip II. placed a ship at their disposal, and, at their instance, had a royal decree issued in Havana releasing from servitude all natives of Florida. It was in vain. The evil fame of the Spaniards was too well founded in the peninsula. On landing at Appalachee Bay Father Luis Cancer, the apostle of Vera Paz, was seized with his one companion and put to death. Nine years before, in 1540, the Franciscan, Father Marco of Nice, with four of his brethren, set out from Mexico with an expedition under Vasquez de Coronado to explore the "Seven Cities of Cibola" in New Mexico, found these to be poor Indian villages, and returned. Two of the Franciscans, Father John de Padilla and Brother John of the Cross, remained, in the hope of converting the inhabitants. It was at the head-waters of the Rio Grande, in the present diocese of Santa Fé. The two heroic men directed their steps toward the village of Quivira, offering up their lives for the souls of the Indians. They were pierced with arrows and fell there, the Proto-Martyrs of the Church in the United States. Three other Franciscan Fathers in 1580 also bedewed with their blood the soil of New Mexico: they were, Juan de Santa Maria, Augustin Rodriguez, and Francisco Lopez.—The expeditions fitted out by France to explore the northern part of our continent were guided by nobler motives, and productive of more glorious results to religion and civilization. The Florentine Verrazzani under the French flag, in 1523, carefully explored our coast-line, from Maine to the Carolinas, in search of the passage to the East Indies, which had been the aim of Columbus and his successors to find. Verrazzani proclaimed anew what Vespucci had asserted and proved before, that America was a continent distinct from Asia. In 1534 Jacques Cartier, a Frenchman, was sent by his king to utilize the discoveries of Verrazzani. He explored Newfoundland; returned and reported favorably; and, in 1535, was sent out for the double purpose of establishing a trading colony and converting the native tribes. Ascending the St. Lawrence, he built a small fort at Sillery, near Quebec (Stadacona), and pushed up the river as far as Hochelaga, an Indian village on the site of modern Montreal. In 1541 Cartier came a third time to Quebec. This little colony languished till 1608, when Samuel Champlain, the real founder of Quebec, gave it a firm basis, and enabled it to become the first great centre of Catholicity and missionary enterprise for the vast regions of the Gulf, the valley of the St. Lawrence, the basin of the Great Lakes, and the territories drained by the Missouri and Mississippi. In 1605 Champlain, acting under Sieur de Monts, founded Port Royal in Acadie (afterward called Nova Scotia), which was increased and made more secure in 1610, when the Jesuits arrived there. The Marchioness de Guercheville, who purchased De Monts' patent, became the proprietor of all New France, and under her, in 1612, the Jesuits founded the mission of St. Saviour on Mount Desert, on the coast of Maine. This was destroyed soon afterward by the English Virginians under Captain Argall, who killed one of the missionaries, a lay brother named Gabriel du Thet. His is the first blood shed for the faith on the soil of New England. Meanwhile Champlain had explored northern New York, and discovered (July, 1609) the lake which bears his name; the brethren of Gabriel du Thet pushing indefatigably their missionary enterprise among the native populations of Maine, New Brunswick, New York, Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, and Wisconsin; and planting everywhere the seeds of the rich harvest we are at present reaping. Not till 1620 did the Puritan Separatists land in Massachusetts. In September, 1609, Heinrich Hudson entered New York Bay; in 1613 the Dutch built a temporary fort on Manhattan Island, and in 1614 founded Fort Nassau on the site of the present city of Albany.—On April 26, 1607, three small vessels, under Christopher Newport, entered Chesapeake Bay, and on May 13, on the James River, was laid the foundation of Jamestown, the first permanent English settlement in Virginia and in America. But long before the arrival of these colonists, in 1570, the Jesuit missionaries in Florida were enticed to visit the shores of the Chesapeake by the representations of a young Virginian chief, carried into captivity by Spanish adventurers, and who had been converted and adopted by the missionaries. He spoke of his father's country as the kingdom of Axacan (Ahacán); and eight Jesuits, headed by Father Segura, vice-provincial of Florida, set out with the young chief, whom they had named Don Luis de Velascoe, Lord of Vasallos, and with several Indian youths, who had been educated in the Jesuit college at Havana. "They penetrated into the interior, guided by Vasallos, and, after a painful march of several months, they approached the realm of Axacan. At last their guide started on, in order, as he said, to prepare his tribe to receive the missionaries. But after forsaking the Jesuits amid the trackless forests, where they endured all the horrors of famine, the traitor returned at the head of a party of armed men, and butchered his benefactors at the foot of a rustic altar, where they had daily offered the Holy Sacrifice for the salvation of his tribe. The blood of martyrs is the seed of Christians; and such is the first triumph of the Faith on the banks of the Chesapeake."*—Such, then, was the consecration given to the soil on which the Church of Maryland was destined to rise to so proud, so wide, so blessed a pre-eminence! Even so the churches of the central and westernmost States of the Union, like those of the South and the East, were to have their foundations laid in the blood of the martyrs. The heroic Isaac Jogues, René Goupil, and John Baptist Lalande gave their lives and their blood to establish Christianity in the Diocese of Albany: their memory and virtues are the inheritance of all the churches of New York. Their no less saintly brothers, Brébœuf and Lallemand, belong to all Canada and the Northern States. And the blood of Sebastian Rasles is ever pleading for the spread of the Faith in New England.—A little over half a century after the death of Father Segura and his companions—on March 25, 1624—the Maryland Pilgrims, in the Ark and Dove, sailed up Chesapeake Bay, landed on the banks of the Potomac, and the Jesuit Father Andrew White offered up the same Divine Sacrifice which Segura had been wont to celebrate in the wilderness, on the altar at whose foot he and his brethren were massacred. The first settlement was St. Mary's, the Catholics taking formal possession of the country two days after landing, March 27, 1634. Three years later the first legislature of Maryland met, and the Jesuit fathers were invited to sit in it. They, however, in strict obedience to the peremptory rules of their order, declined, and "desired to be excused from giving voices in this assembly."* From the very beginning the Indians were the objects of these devoted missionaries' loving care, and repaid them by surrendering their souls to such apostles. They lived in perfect trust and harmony with the settlers at St. Mary's, while the little band of priests evangelized successfully the surrounding tribes. In 1639 Father White took up his abode among the Piscataways, in the neighborhood of the present city of Washington, and soon numbered 130 converts in his flock, among them the Piscataway chief and his family, with the young queen of the Potopacos and her principal tribesmen. Lord Baltimore proclaimed perfect religious liberty to all Christians within Maryland, "at a time when, in fact, toleration was not considered in any part of the Protestant world to be due to the Catholics." † Thus, says Bancroft, "religious liberty obtained a home, its only home in the wide world, at the humble village which bore the name of St. Mary's." ‡ In 1652 the English Commonwealth sent out commissioners, who, with the aid of the Puritan refugees so hospitably received in Maryland, deposed, in 1655, the Protestant governor appointed by Calvert, and established a government, one of whose first acts was to exclude all "papists and prelatists" from the benefit of the statute of toleration, and to declare that no Catholic should sit in the Assembly or vote for members of it.* A civil war ensued and a dual government. On the restoration of Charles II., Philip Calvert became governor, and the statute of toleration was revived in its fullest extent. In 1689 the Puritan Coode rose in arms, organized an "Association in arms for the defence of the Protestant religion," captured St. Mary's and abolished the authority of Lord Baltimore. In 1691 the king revoked Baltimore's patent, made the Church of England the established religion of Maryland, and disfranchised the Catholics and compelled them to pay tithes for the support of the Protestant Establishment. In 1704 "An act to prevent the increase of Popery in the Province" forbade priests or bishops to say Mass, or to exercise any functions of their ministry. It forbade Catholics to teach, and enabled a Catholic child, by becoming a Protestant, to demand and obtain from its parents its proportion of its patrimony, as though these were dead. Catholic families could only hear Mass within the secrecy of their own homes. This was the only privilege which made their lot better than that of Irish or English Catholics at home. And the exercise of the Catholic religion and worship continued for the next seventy years to be subject to all these restraints in the land which Catholicism had made the home of the free! Every Catholic was taxed twice as much as his Protestant neighbor. It was intolerable. In 1752 Daniel Carroll, father of the first Bishop of Baltimore, went to France to negotiate for the migration to Louisiana of the Maryland Catholics. He did not succeed with the wretched French government of the day. To obtain a liberal education Catholics had to cross the seas to the Continent of Europe, while the penal laws prevented their numbers from being increased by immigrants from the mother-country. This persecuting legislation was only modified in 1774 at the approach of the struggle for independence. But the bitter spirit which dictated it lasted all through the war, and survived it on both sides of the Potomac, a Catholic priest being treated as a wolf if recognized travelling through the country.* In 1755–56 the Acadians to the number of 7,000, in defiance of the sworn faith of treaties, and for the sole reason that they were Catholics, were torn from their homes on the Bay of Fundy, forced on board British vessels, and scattered along our sea-coast from Boston to the Carolinas. In October, 1774, our Congress, in an address to the people of Great Britain, complained that the Metropolitan Government in the "Quebec Act" had granted the French Catholics of Canada full religious liberty. "Nor can we suppress our astonishment," it is said therein, "that a British Parliament should ever consent to establish in that country a religion that has deluged your island in blood, and dispersed impiety, bigotry, persecution, murder, and rebellion through every part of the world." Nevertheless, in 1776 the Province of Maryland, in article 33 of the Declaration of Rights, granted Catholics full toleration and religious equality. "At the moment when Catholics thus obtained a tardy justice, there were in the whole extent of Maryland twenty Jesuits, or rather ex-Jesuits, for the Society had been suppressed some years before. But the Fathers continued to live, as far as possible, in the same way as though their order subsisted in all its perfection." † Their voluntarily chosen Superior, Father Lewis, was vicar-general of the Vicar-Apostolic of the London District, and thus exercised jurisdiction over all priests within the United States. Not till after 1776 were Catholics permitted to have any kind of a house of public worship. "In 1774 Baltimore was only a station visited once a month by a father from the farm at White Marsh. Mass was said in a room in the presence of some forty Catholics, mostly French people, who had been barbarously and treacherously dragged off from Acadia or Nova Scotia in 1756. The priest took with him his vestments and altar plate, for the city where many councils have since been held did not then possess even a chalice!" ‡ In 1783 Maryland counted about 16,000 Catholics, country folk for the most part. In the other twelve States there were, probably, some 1,500 in all, not including the French settlers along the Ohio and Mississippi. The white population of the Western Territory surrendered by the Treaty of 1783 numbered about 4,000 souls.—The history of Catholicism in Virginia, Pennsylvania, New York, and New England, during this period, is not without interest and instruction. In Virginia the Jesuits Pierre Biard and Ennemond Masse, carried away into captivity from the Mission of St. Saviour in Maine (1614), barely escaped being hanged, drawn, and quartered at Jamestown. The fierce spirit of intolerance and persecution which prevailed among the Episcopalians of Virginia till after the War of Independence was only surpassed or equalled by that which ruled men's souls in Great Britain and Ireland. Sir George Calvert, because he was a Catholic, was peremptorily ordered out of Virginia. In 1645 the Maryland priests seized by the Protestant insurgents were sent in chains to Jamestown, where one of them died in prison in 1646. Meanwhile there were in Virginia a large number of Catholics—Irish men and women sent there by the home government as slaves or indented apprentices. After 1641, as we may see in Cromwell's State Documents, from 50,000 to 100,000 Irish Catholics were forcibly deported to America; the majority were sold to the planters of Barbadoes and Jamaica; the others, in great number, to the colonists of Virginia, the women and children being doomed to servitude there, and the men being "pressed" into Cromwell's navy. In 1652 "the Commissioners of the Commonwealth" ordered numbers of Irishwomen to be sold to merchants and shipped to Virginia, where many of them perished beneath the heavy yoke of slavery. Later still other shiploads of unfortunate Irish were sent out to forced labor there, with the privilege, however, of redeeming themselves after a certain period. These were called "Redemptioners." Such as could thus get back their freedom were forthwith sent out of the colony, no free Catholic being then tolerated. The oppressive laws of Virginia against Catholics, enacted periodically and always with increased rigor, continued to be in force during the 17th and 18th centuries, down to 1776.—It was far otherwise in Pennsylvania. William Penn and

George Fox had no sympathy for persecution. The Convention of Chester in January, 1683, enacted that no Christian should be excluded from office. The clause inserted in Penn's Charter by the Protestant Bishop of London secured Episcopalianism the exclusive privileges of a state religion. Nevertheless the Quakers always tolerated Catholics. In 1686 Penn speaks of "an old priest" as residing in Philadelphia. A wooden chapel existed there at that time, and Penn in 1708 writes from England to Governor Logan that people in London complain that he (Logan) "suffers public Mass in a scandalous manner." In 1736 a second chapel was built in the city; and a few miles from it, in 1729, another chapel was built by a young Irish lady named Elizabeth McGawley. In 1730 the Jesuit Father, Josiah Greaton, took charge of Philadelphia, found a little band of Catholics there, and in 1733 erected the little chapel of St. Joseph. The flock thenceforward increased, and St. Joseph's was soon enlarged. To Greaton, dead in 1750, succeeded Father Robert Harding and the saintly Father Ferdinand Farmer (Steenmeyer), who founded St. Mary's Church. Conjointly with the latter labored Father Robert Molyneux. In 1741 the arrival of German immigrants necessitated the coming of two German Jesuits. In 1745 Father Theodore Schneider built a church at Goshenhoppen, which he made the centre of a wide and fruitful apostolate. In 1741 Father William Wapeler founded the missions of Conewago and Lancaster. The latter, in 1751, fell to the care of Father Farmer, who resided there till 1758. In 1784 Lancaster numbered 700 communicants. The Jesuits, before and after their suppression in 1773, devoted their lives and their means to the cultivation of this vast field.—New Jersey, to which Fathers Farmer and Harding extended their labors, is known to have had a congregation of German Catholics at Macoupin. An Irish priest, a Mr. Langrey, is said to have first ministered to them. Their first regular apostle was, however, Father Farmer, philosopher, astronomer, and saint—who also ministered to Catholics at Geiger's, Charlottenburg, Long Pond, Mount Hope, Ringwood, and Hunterdon.—The Dutch Calvinists who founded, under the name of New Amsterdam, the city afterwards called New York, had a greater respect for religious liberty than their English successors. In 1642 Father Jogues, after having been kindly nursed and his wounds dressed at Fort Orange (Albany), by the generous Dutch minister, Dominie John Megapolensis, was forwarded to New Amsterdam, honorably and hospitably received by Governor Kieft, and given a passage on the first ship bound to a European port. While in New Amsterdam he heard the confessions of two Catholics, one of whom was an Irishman, who had borne the yoke in Virginia. How well the poor exile from Erin must have been consoled and strengthened in the faith by the sight of the martyr's bleeding and maimed feet, and of the mutilated hands lifted over him in blessing! Such were the first Catholic ministrations in what is to-day the largest Catholic city in Christendom. Two years later, in 1644, another Jesuit, Father Bressani, a Roman by birth, underwent at the hands of the Mohawks the same atrocious tortures inflicted on F. Jogues, and was, like him, rescued by the Dutch and sent to France. Father Le Moyne, another illustrious Jesuit missionary, visited Manhattan about the same time, to minister to the French sailors and to comfort the scattered Catholic residents. In 1683 a Catholic, Colonel Thomas Dongan, became governor of the now English colony for the Duke of York (soon to be King James II.) Under him the first New York legislature assembled, and on October 13, 1683, enacted a charter of liberties, declaring that "no person or persons, which profess faith in God by Jesus Christ, shall at any time be any ways molested, punished, disquieted, or called in question for any difference of opinion, or matter of religious concernment, who do not actually disturb the civil peace of the province." In 1691, after the downfall of the Stuarts, this Charter of Liberties was superseded by a Bill of Rights, which expressly excluded Catholics from all and any of its privileges. Three Jesuits labored in New York during this brief interval of religious freedom: Fathers Thomas Harvey, Henry Harrison, and Charles Gage. They opened a school for Latin, and had some pupils. Father Harvey ventured to return after 1689, and seems to have only gone back to Maryland in 1719. In 1696 there were only seven Papists in New York. In 1700 it was enacted that any priest found in the province after the ensuing month of November "shall be adjudged to suffer perpetual imprisonment." If he escaped and were retaken, death was the penalty. In 1701 a law was passed excluding all Catholics from office and depriving them of the right to vote. In 1741 came the famous scare about a "negro plot," or conspiracy to burn down the city. "The terrible cry of Popery was raised, which struck terror to the hearts of all, and led to the sacrifice of an amiable and interesting clergyman, of whose innocence there can scarcely remain a doubt, so absurd was the charge against him, and so feebly was it supported."* This was Mr. John Ury, the son of a secretary of the South Sea Company, who, if he was indeed a priest, heroically held his peace about his quality, lest he should compromise any of his persecuted flock; and if he were not, he had no chance of a fair trial or a just verdict from the fanatical public. He was hung August 29, 1741. 11 negroes were burned at the stake, 18 hung, and 50 transported to the West Indies.—In the northern and western portions of the province of New York, as hinted above, the Jesuit missionaries, a century before the death of John Ury, had been sowing the good seed in tears and blood. Father Jogues, during his terrible captivity, had performed 70 baptisms. He had seen his loved companion and catechist, René Goupil, dying under the long series of Mohawk tortures; and, restored to France, the glorious apostle yearned to be back where his brother-martyr reposed and where so many souls created in God's image needed regeneration. He returned to Canada in 1645, helped to negotiate a peace between Huron and Mohawk, and begged to be sent among the Five Nations. This time he was accompanied by Father John Lalande; and, going straight to the scene of his former sufferings, he was seized as a rare prize, perishing with his fellow-apostle the day after their arrival. Their bodies were cast into Caughnawaga Creek. They cut off Jogues' head and planted it on a pole in the village, October 18, 1646. Near the spot on which this precious blood was shed now rises the church of St. Mary's, Schenectady, together with the fair city of that name—not the only city in that region which marks the site of a Jesuit mission and recalls the apostolic labors of the brethren of Isaac Jogues. To Father Bressani, whose sufferings among the Iroquois have been already mentioned, we owe the history of the Huron mission, on which the martyr labored five years after his return to Canada. He painted the sublime charity and unshaken firmness at the stake of Brébœuf, Lalemand, Daniel, Chabaud, Ménard—men worthy of the age of Christ's own apostles. November 18, 1655, witnessed the beginning, among the Onondaga Iroquois, of the chapel of St. Mary, the first church ever built in the State of New York. It arose on the shore of Lake Onondaga, where is now the city of Syracuse. The savages cheerfully wrought with Fathers Claude Dablon and Pierre Chaumonot. The Cayugas, Oneidas, and Senecas soon called in missionaries, while the numerous Huron captives, all Catholics, scattered among the Five Nations, helped on the work of Christianizing them. The man who most successfully continued the work of Jogues among the Iroquois was Father Simon Le Moyne, who, from 1655 to 1661, braved all manner of danger to sustain the faith of the Huron captives, was made a captive himself, and, restored to liberty, returned to the field of suffering. The Onondaga chief, Garacontieh, who was a Christian, befriended him and seconded his efforts. In July, 1667, the Mohawks at length seemed to accept the missionaries. But not till 1668 did the work of conversion begin in earnest, and then the Mohawks surpassed in fervor all the other tribes. In 1673 their two principal Mohawk villages, Caughnawaga and Tinniontoguen, were constituted regular parishes, with schools for the young, and graduated courses of instruction for all. Then came the English domination, and the narrow policy of Governor Dongan marred all the fruit of such heroic and persevering toil. One mighty obstacle to the conversion of the entire body of Iroquois, only a minority of whom dared to profess Christianity, was their dreadful immorality. That, together with the abuse of alcoholic liquors, taught them and fostered by the Dutch traders, caused the periodical outbursts of sanguinary ferocity which blotted out in a day the spiritual fruit of years of apostolic devotion. The missionaries, to preserve from utter moral ruin the converts made among the Six Nations, resolved to transfer them to French territory. In 1669 was founded, in pursuance of that purpose, the Iroquois colony of St. Francis Xavier des Prés, at La Prairie, near Montreal. In 1676 this mission, or "Reduction," was transferred higher up the St. Lawrence, to Caughnawaga or Sault St. Louis, where the descendants of the Christian Iroquois still maintain the faith of their fathers. There lived and died Catherine Tehgawita, the sweetest flower of sanctity which ever sprung from the soil of New York. In 1687 the Canadian governor-general, Marquis de Denonville, treacherously seized and sent over to work in the French galleys a number of Iroquois warriors. This, added to the unchristian policy of the English governor of New York, caused the Iroquois to fly to arms. The missionaries barely escaped with their lives, and all hopes of continuing their labors seemed at an end. In 1697 their hopes revived with peace. In 1701 deputations from the Senecas and Onondagas recalled the Jesuits; but the intrigues of Abraham Schuyler frustrated their designs.—The colonial period in New England offers the same features of heroic missionary enterprise and suffering which we have just seen in New York. After the destruction of the Jesuit mission at Mount Desert, the first successful attempts at converting the savages were made in 1642 by the Capuchins, who established missionary posts and erected chapels along the Kennebec and Penobscot. The Jesuit Gabriel Druillettes about the same time succeeded in converting the Indians of the upper Kennebec. The first Catholics in the settlements at Plymouth and Massachusetts Bay were Irish Catholics sent over and sold to the planters as indentured servants. The Jesuits Gabriel Druillettes and John Pierron visited—the first, Boston, Plymouth, and New Haven, in 1650 and 1651; the second, all New England, New York, and Pennsylvania, in 1670. The desolating and savage wars carried on by the Canadian French and the English colonists of New England enlisted the Indians on both sides, and religious fanaticism on the part of the latter added fresh fuel to national animosity. As in the missions of Northern New York, so in those of Maine, the spiritual harvest again and again disappeared in the whirlwind of men's unholy passions. As conspicuous in Maine as Father Jogues among the Six Nations was Father Sebastian Rasles, who had founded a flourishing establishment at Norridgewock, on the Kennebec. For thirty years he devoted himself to his flock of converts, employing every means to civilize and elevate them. The dictionary of their language, which he had carefully compiled, was found in his ruined home and is preserved at Harvard College. The village of Norridgewock, burned by the New-Englanders in 1705, was rebuilt by Rasles and his converts. The Massachusetts people, deeming the missionary to be the chief upholder of French influence among the Indians, after vainly urging these to expel him and accept one of their preachers in his stead, at length, in 1722, attacked Norridgewock stealthily and plundered his house, while he escaped to the woods. They returned with a body of Mohawk warriors in August, 1724, surprised and surrounded the village, and poured into it a murderous fire. Rasles, knowing that they were only seeking his life, went forth to meet them and plead for his flock. He was shot down at the foot of the mission cross. His church was burned, 30 of his Indians killed, and the rest driven to the woods. To this day his dear Abenakis are Catholics. In 1755 two thousand Acadians were landed in Massachusetts and scattered through the colony. The adults were allowed no spiritual ministrations of their own. Children were pitilessly taken from their parents and brought up Protestants. In 1756 a band of Acadians, who had escaped from the South, and who were travelling back to their old home, were seized by the Massachusetts authorities and scattered throughout the colony. A few only managed, from time to time, to elude their unfeeling masters; they founded the settlement of Madawaska. Every year Guy Fawkes' Day was celebrated throughout New England, the pope being burned in effigy. This custom was first checked by Washington in the beginning of the War of Independence. He also asked and obtained the assistance of the Catholic Indians, who were led by Orano. Not till the arrival in Boston Bay of the French fleet under D'Estaing, in 1778, was a Catholic service tolerated in any New England city. At the close of the war a modest congregation of Frenchmen, Spaniards, and about thirty Irishmen were allowed to worship at Boston in the old Huguenot Church, which thenceforward was called Holy Cross. — Passing to the Northwest, we find converted Wyandots settling at Sandusky in 1740–41 under the guidance of the Jesuits. With the downfall of the French power and the withdrawal of the missionaries faith died out in the descendants of these converts. Along the Wabash a French post was established in 1730 by Bissot, Sieur de Vincennes, who gave his name to the place. In 1749 the Jesuit Meurin there founded the mission of St. Francis Xavier. Another arose near the present Lafayette, under the care of Father Du Jaunay. When France suppressed the Jesuits the missionaries withdrew, till 1769, when the Bishop of Quebec sent thither the Rev. Pierre Gibault, who cared for both missions and extended his labors across the Mississippi. All along the shores of the Great Lakes—at Kiskakon (the present Fort Wayne), at Chicago, at Detroit, and elsewhere—the apostleship of the French missionaries bore glorious fruit in the colonial times. There was a priest with a church at Kiskakon in 1749, and others had been there before him. The State of Illinois, the Indian tribe from which it takes its name, and the neighboring Mississippi, all remind us of the Jesuit Marquette and his brethren. Marquette sailed down the great river in the summer of 1673, returning by the Illinois River, and preached the faith to the Kaskaskia Indians, near the present Utica. In 1674 he spent the winter, sick in body, in a rude cabin on the site of the modern Chicago, and died on his way to Michilimackinac. His brethren did not let his work perish. The Recollect Franciscans in 1678 came to these wildernesses with La Salle, and Father Gabriel de la Ribourde shed his blood there as a promise of the future. The Parochial Register of Father Jacques Gravier of 1688, among the Illinois, still exists. In 1698 the Bishop of Quebec created the valley of the Mississippi into a distinct mission under secular priests. Numerous flourishing missions arose. Rev. Mr. Gibault at the first outbreak of the War of Independence advised his people to join the Americans, thereby securing the great West to the United States.— But to the martyred Isaac Jogues and his brother-Jesuit Charles Raymbault belongs the glory of having first planted the Cross in the West, in 1642, and on the soil of Michigan. They announced in that year the Gospel to the Chippeways of Sault Sainte-Marie. In 1660 René Menard, another Jesuit, founded the mission of Keweenaw, on Lake Superior, and was killed in 1661, while striving to bring spiritual succor to the Hurons on Black River. In 1671 the converts made by his successors at Chegorinegon and Sault Sainte-Marie took refuge from the Iroquois at Michilimackinac, where Father Marquette built them a fort, and began the mission of St. Ignatius. This was the cradle of the Western Church. In 1688 Fort St. Joseph, at Detroit, beheld a number of Canadian families within its walls, accompanied by the Jesuit Vaillant and a Recollect, De Chasle. In 1706 he was murdered by roving Indians outside the fort while reciting the breviary office. This colony lived and prospered through all the vicissitudes of war and revolution. Detroit was held by the English during the War of Independence, passing to the United States in 1805.—In 1750 some French settlers from Illinois crossed the Mississippi and founded Sainte-Genevieve, on Gabourie Creek, Mo. St. Charles was founded in 1762. February 15, 1764, Pierre Liguest Laclède founded the city of St. Louis. Founders and colonists were all Catholics, ministered to by the Illinois missionaries, Father Meurin being the first to say Mass in St. Louis. The Rev. Pierre Gibault built, in 1770, a small log-chapel on a square given by Laclède, and on which stands the present cathedral of St. Louis.

II. National Period (1775–1884). —Father John Carroll was clothed with the powers of Prefect Apostolic June 9, 1784, was elected Bishop of Baltimore by his brother-missionaries in May, 1789, their choice being ratified by the Holy See November 6 of the same year. He was consecrated at Lulworth Castle, England, August 15, 1790. Before leaving England he concluded an arrangement with the Society of St. Sulpice, stipulating that a colony of Sulpicians should forthwith open a seminary near the cathedral of Baltimore. Four priests, headed by Rev. F. C. Nagot, and five seminarians arrived, in consequence, at Baltimore in July, 1791, the forerunners of the glorious cohort of apostolic men who were soon to come to us from France, driven from their country by the great revolutionary storm. The almost simultaneous foundation of the Seminary of Baltimore and the College of Georgetown was a hopeful augury of the increase of the American Church. In November, 1791, the first synod was convened in Baltimore by Bishop Carroll, 20 clergymen being present. A petition was forwarded by the assembly to the Holy See, requesting the erection of several bishopricks within the vast territory of the new Republic. In 1800 Father Leonard Neale was appointed and consecrated coadjutor to Bishop Carroll. On May 25, 1803, Bishops Carroll and Neale wrote to beg of Father Grueber, general of the Jesuits then residing in Russia, the privilege for themselves and their brethren in the United States, once members of the Society, to be readmitted to membership. This was granted, and the permission was followed up by sending nine other Jesuits from Europe to recruit the thinned ranks of the American laborers. On July 9, 1793, 53 vessels with 1,000 white fugitives from San Domingo, and 500 colored people, arrived at Baltimore, increasing considerably the Catholic population. Other swarms of refugees continued to land there and at other ports, so that in 1807 New York contained 14,000 Catholics, "a large part of whom were refugees from San Domingo and other islands." In 1790 Father Charles Neale brought with him from Belgium four Theresian Carmelites, and built them a house near Port Tobacco. In 1792 the Poor Clares settled in Georgetown. In 1805 the Poor Clares returned to Europe, and in that same year Miss Alice Lalor with her "Pious Ladies," soon to become Visitation Nuns, occupied their convent. On January 1, 1809, Mrs. Elizabeth Bayley-Seton, with four associates, founded the first house of the American Sisters of Charity at Emmittsburg. Before the death of the foundress her community numbered 50 members. In 1806 Bishop Carroll laid the corner-stone of three churches in the single city of Baltimore; in 1808 his diocese contained 68 priests and 80 churches.—April 8, 1808, Baltimore became a metropolitan see, with four suffragan sees at New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and Bardstown, the Right Reverends Luke Concanen (Order of St. Dominic), Michael Egan (Order of St. Francis), John Cheverus, and Benedict Flaget (a Sulpician) being consecrated to the new sees. Archbishop Carroll died December 3, 1815, at the age of eighty. Of the four suffragan bishops Dr. Concanen never reached New York. On November 6, 1814, the Dominican John Connolly was consecrated, at Rome, Bishop of New York, setting out for his see in the following January, and arriving there in the beginning of 1816. He found his diocese, comprising the entire State of New York with half of New Jersey, ministered to by three Jesuits, one secular priest, Rev. Mr. Carberry. The Jesuits were Anthony Kohlmann, who had governed the diocese as vicar-general during its widowhood, Benedict Fenwick, and Peter Malon. New York City possessed two churches, and Albany another. Fathers Kohlmann and Fenwick having been recalled by their superiors and Rev. Mr. Carberry having gone to Norfolk, Va., Bishop Connolly remained alone with Father Malon and Rev. Michael O'Gorman, who was soon sent to care for the Catholics of Albany. With the difficulties of providing for the spiritual needs of the new diocese came the famous "Trustee" difficulty, laymen taking on themselves to hold the church property as if absolutely their own, and treating bishop and clergymen as if these were their salaried servants, to be called in and dismissed at will. Unhappily, a Rev. Mr. Taylor, who came from Ireland in 1818 at the call of the trustees of St. Peter's Church, not only countenanced this anti-Catholic spirit, but intrigued to have himself appointed bishop in place of Dr. Connolly, and sought to win over Protestants by accommodating to their prejudices the doctrines of the Church. He soon disappeared, and many conversions consoled the Catholics; but they were not effected by the spirit of compromise. In three years the arrival of some 10,000 Catholic emigrants doubled the numbers of the city flocks. In 1819 the beginning of the Erie Canal drew Catholic laborers to Central New York, preparing the way for numerous congregations. The bishop established the Sisters of Charity near his cathedral. The churches of St. John at Utica and St. Patrick's in Rochester were founded. Rev. Mr. Bulger had charge of what is now the dioceses of Newark and Trenton; the labors of Revs. Michael Carroll and John Farnan comprised the present dioceses of Albany and Ogdensburgh; those of Rev. Patrick Kelly the actual diocese of Buffalo. In the present diocese of Brooklyn Rev. John Shanahan began to labor in 1823. The bishop died Feb. 6, 1825, laboring to the last like an ordinary priest.—His successor, Right Rev. John Dubois, consecrated Oct. 29, 1826, was one of the most devoted and indefatigable of the many apostolic priests sent to us by the French Revolution. He came to Norfolk, Va., with letters of introduction from Lafayette, became an inmate in the family of the future President, James Monroe, and was the first Catholic priest who openly officiated in Virginia. He founded the College of Mount St. Mary's at Emmittsburg, and was known and beloved everywhere. New York City then contained 35,000 Catholics, and the entire diocese 150,000—with 8 churches and 18 priests. The "Trustee" interest arrayed itself against Dr. Dubois from the very beginning, and because his "nationality" was not that of the great number of his diocesans. He struggled heroically against this evil spirit. With money obtained from the French Society for the Propagation of the Faith he pushed forward the building of a church in Albany and redeemed the imperilled church of Newark. In 1837 he purchased Christ Church, in Ann Street, and gave a resident pastor to Brooklyn. May 29, 1833, he laid the corner-stone of a college at Nyack. This aroused the bigotry of the sectarians, and the new college was destroyed by fire. Another was built in distant Lafargeville, but its remoteness compelled the bishop to close it. These foundations gave rise to spirited public discussions, in which Very Rev. Dr. Power, Very Rev. Felix Varela, Rev. Mr. Schneller, and Rev. Thos. C. Levins bore a conspicuous part in defence of the truth. Meanwhile the Catholic population continued to be largely increased by emigrants from Germany, who formed flourishing congregations in New York, Brooklyn, and in the interior of the State. In 1837 the Right Rev. John Hughes, of St. John's Church, Philadelphia, was appointed coadjutor to Dr. Dubois, at whose death, December 20, 1842, the diocese of New York counted seven churches in the city, eleven in other parts of the State, with four in New Jersey; a staff of fifty clergymen, and a Catholic population of about 200,000. Although his efforts toward founding a college had failed, he had left the Sisters of Charity in possession of flourishing schools in New York and Albany, and of orphan asylums in these same cities and Brooklyn and Utica. Sixteen of his priests had been ordained by himself.—In the new diocese of Boston, placed under the care of John Lefèvre Cheverus, everything had to be created. In 1790 the little flock worshipping in the old Huguenot Church (Holy Cross) numbered 100 souls, under Rev. John Thayer, a convert and a distinguished controversialist. In 1792 Bishop Carroll sent to his assistance Rev. Francis Matignon, a French priest; and to the Penobscot Indians, who solicited missionaries, was sent about the same time Rev. Mr. Ciquard. Rev. Mr. Matignon was soon joined by Rev. Mr. Cheverus, the future bishop; and these noble priests extended their labors eastward to the borders of Maine, leaving in town and country names held in veneration even by Protestants. Not without opposition or danger did the missionaries seek out the stray sheep over this immense field. The Church of the Holy Cross, built on Franklin Square, was consecrated by Bishop Carroll September 29, 1803. It became Bishop Cheverus' cathedral in 1808. Under the impulse of his apostolic zeal new churches arose at Salem, New Bedford, and South Boston; at Damariscotta and Whitefield, Maine; and at Claremont, New Hampshire, where Rev. Virgil Barber, a convert, was pastor. July 17, 1826, a colony of Ursulines from Ireland was established at Charlestown, after having been for some time near the cathedral in Boston. But before that, and in 1823, Bishop Cheverus was recalled to his native country and appointed Bishop of Montauban. November 21, 1825, Right Rev. Benedict Fenwick was consecrated as his successor, and at once founded a seminary for the education of priests — the two first pupils being ordained in December, 1827. In 1828 they began to erect St. Mary's Church, Charlestown. In 1832 three Sisters of Charity came to Boston, the parents of that numerous family who have since founded all over New England orphanages, schools, and hospitals. In 1834 Bishop Fenwick had churches at Waltham, Lowell, Sandwich, and Taunton, in Massachusetts; at Hartford and New Haven, in Connecticut; at Dover, New Hampshire; at Burlington and Pittsford, Vermont. In Maine churches were built at Portland and Eastport, and an additional one among the Indians. In that year Boston diocese had a Catholic population of 25,000, with 21 churches and 25 priests. Then occurred in Massachusetts a fanatical anti-Catholic crusade, which extended itself to New York, and which in Boston culminated (August 11, 1834) in the burning of Charlestown Ursuline Convent—one of the nuns dying of fright amid the conflagration and disorder. It is an outrage and a wrong which remain unatoned for. In 1842 was celebrated the first diocesan synod. In 1843 Bishop Fenwick founded the College of the Holy Cross at Worcester. In 1844 the diocese of Hartford was created.

See of Philadelphia (1810–1829).— Right Rev. Michael Egan, the first bishop of Philadelphia, was consecrated October 28, 1810. He was an Irish Observantine, learned, pious, devoted to his duty, but too gentle to battle with Trusteeism, which claimed to have a voice in the nomination of pastors, and met with countenance from two priests, the Harolds, uncle and nephew. To the Orphan Asylum, founded by pious lay people in 1797, Bishop Egan in 1814 called Mother Seton's Sisters of Charity. Thus arose the first establishment of beneficence in the diocese of Philadelphia, at present so blessed with noble institutions of every kind. The bishop's career was shortened by the trustee troubles. From 1814 till 1820 no priest worthy of the episcopal office could be induced to accept the succession of Bishop Egan, so uncatholic was the spirit manifested by the Philadelphia trustees. In 1820 Right Rev. Henry Conwell, vicar-general of Armagh, accepted the trust, all unconscious of the difficulties and trials in store for him. The Rev. Michael Hogan, illiterate, ignorant of theology and canon law, impatient of control, and passionately fond of popularity, had been temporarily appointed pastor of St. Mary's. When the new bishop wished to remove him he identified himself with the trustees, and although repeatedly excommunicated, and with an interdict on the church, he braved both the episcopal and papal authority till his death, in 1851. Long before that, however, he left Philadelphia for the South, entered into secular avocations, wrote scandalous works against the Church, and died unrepentant. On Hogan's departure the schismatical trustees found an accomplice and instrument in Rev. Thaddeus O'Malley, who carried their cause to Rome, was worsted there, and in July, 1825, retired to a monastery humbled and repentant. In October, 1826, the bishop, weary of the scandalous contest, unwisely signed a compromise with the trustees. They, emboldened, soon published a protest, declaring "that they will claim at Rome that in future no bishop shall be named without the recommendation and approbation of the Catholic clergy of the diocese." On April 30, 1827, the Sacred College of Cardinals in general assembly declared the compromise null and void; the decision was promulgated and acquiesced in by Bishop Conwell, but the trustees and their abettors remained unmoved. On March 9, 1828, the Holy See appointed Rev. Wm. Mathews, of Washington, administrator of Philadelphia, summoned Bishop Conwell to Rome, and commanded the refractory Dominicans at St. Mary's, Harold and Ryan, to leave the city and diocese. In 1829 the illustrious Francis Patrick Kenrick was appointed coadjutor bishop and administrator of Philadelphia. — When Benedict Joseph Flaget was appointed in 1808 to the fourth of the new sees asked for by the Council of Baltimore, Bardstown, his diocese comprised Kentucky and Tennessee, with temporary jurisdiction over Ohio and the adjoining States from Pennsylvania to the Mississippi. Bardstown was founded between 1775 and 1780 by Catholic emigrants from Maryland, led by William Coomes, a Marylander, and Dr. Hart, an Irishman, the latter giving up his farm to the Church, and Mrs. Coomes opening the first school in Kentucky. Later came, also from Maryland, the Haydens and Lancasters. They were a race of generous and fervent believers. In 1787 the Capuchin Charles Whelan headed an emigrant party to Kentucky and labored there till 1789. Then appeared Rev. William de Rohan, who erected a log-chapel at Holy Cross; then, in 1793, Mr. Barrières, sent by Bishop Carroll as vicar-general, accompanied by Rev. Stephen Badin, the first priest ordained within the limits of the original thirteen United States, and who was the apostle of Kentucky down to our own days. In 1805 he was given for fellow-laborer Charles Nerinckx, one of the saintly names of the early American priesthood, and the founder of the Nuns of Loretto. In 1807 Rev. Edward Fenwick, O.P., founded the convent of St. Rose for a community of English Dominican Nuns. Bishop Flaget reached his see June 9, 1811, accompanied by two priests and three seminarians. Rev. Mr. David at once founded a seminary and established a house of Sisters of Charity. St. Mary's College was founded in 1821 by Rev. Wm. Byrne, and St. Joseph's by Rev. G. A. M. Elder. The apostolic Sulpician Flaget, made bishop in what was a new world, knew no limits to his zeal and his labors. In the then roadless and almost pathless West he travelled 1,000 miles on his first pastoral visitation, pushing as far as St. Louis! In 1817 his friend Mr. David was consecrated as his coadjutor. In August, 1819, he consecrated the cathedral of Bardstown. In 1821 the see of Cincinnati was created. Such were the beginnings of the Church in the Great West.

The Growth of the Church in the West and South.—Beginning with Louisiana, we need only say that no permanent settlement was made at or near the mouths of the Mississippi till the successive expeditions of Marquette and Joliet, of La Salle, and of Iberville had aroused public interest in Quebec and in France, attracting to the vast regions thus laid open the spirit of commercial enterprise and religious zeal. La Salle planted the cross at the mouth of the Mississippi in 1682, the first Mass being said there by the Recollect Zénobe Membré. In 1699 Iberville built the first fort at Biloxi. Missionaries—Recollects, Jesuits, and secular priests—began to labor there and at Mobile; but the class of settlers were anything but fervent Christians, and the civil authorities did not encourage the labors of the missionary. In 1718 New Orleans was founded. It was visited by the Jesuit historian, Charlevoix, in 1721, who found things in a sad state. The colony was under the control of the Company of the Indies; and in spirituals was under the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Quebec. The entire valley of the Mississippi was divided into three missionary provinces, confided to the Capuchins, Carmelites, and Jesuits. In 1726 the latter were given in charge all the Indian tribes of this vast region, and a central residence was appointed for them at New Orleans, their superior acting as vicar-general of the Bishop of Quebec, and the Capuchin fathers continuing to minister to the French settlers. In 1726 flourishing missions were inaugurated among the Arkansas, Oumas, Choctaws, Albamons, Yazoos, Coroas, and other Indian tribes. The Ursuline Nuns also founded (1727) a house in New Orleans. In this same year (1727), however, the French commandant at Natchez so irritated the Indians that these arose and massacred the French. The devoted Jesuit Du Poisson perished while succoring the sick; and soon afterward the Yazoos imitated the Natchez and shot their missionary, Father Sorrel. In 1787, the Spaniards being masters of Louisiana, three Irish priests from Salamanca were sent to Natchez, and a church was built there for them. They were withdrawn when the Spanish rule ceased, the Catholics there having no regular priestly ministrations till 1819. In 1763 the Jesuit missions in Louisiana were suppressed, and the French authorities there ordered the property of the Jesuits to be sold at auction; the plate and vestments in their churches at New Orleans were given to the Capuchins. In the Illinois country the king's agents seized all that belonged to the missionaries, and levelled their chapels to the ground. The spirit of impiety was preluding the great Revolution of 1789, and the suppressions of 1880. In 1776 the Coadjutor Bishop of Santiago, Cuba, visited New Orleans, bringing with him several of his brother-Capuchins. This drew to Louisiana numbers of the exiled Acadians living in San Domingo. Several parishes were immediately organized. September 12, 1793, Louisiana was created a diocese by the Holy See, Don Luis Peñalver being appointed to the new see. His administration was a new birth for Catholicity in the colony. In 1802 he was succeeded by Right Rev. Francisco Porro, who was never consecrated. In 1803 Louisiana, become shortly before a French possession, was purchased by the United States; its spiritual government was handed over to the Bishop of Baltimore; but the trustees of the city churches created a schism, which lasted for many years. On September 24, 1815, Right Rev. Wm. Dubourg was consecrated Bishop of New Orleans, and his appeals to his countrymen in France led to the creation of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, to whose generous aid every one of our American churches is indebted. Bishop Dubourg brought with him in 1817 to Louisiana five priests and twenty-six seminarians. The trustees prevented his being received and acknowledged as bishop in the city. St. Louis, then the central settlement in "Upper Louisiana," became for a time his residence. In 1824 he was allowed to take possession of his see, leaving Bishop Rosati as coadjutor in St. Louis. In 1827 St. Louis itself was created an episcopal see, and to it Dr. Rosati was transferred from New Orleans, which he had governed since 1824. In 1829 Leo de Neckere, one of the seminarians brought in 1817 by Bishop Dubourg, succeeded Bishop Rosati in New Orleans, filling with the light of his sanctity and his good works his brief career of four years. Dying September 4, 1833, he left in his diocese 22 priests, 27 churches, and a Catholic population estimated at 150,000, a large and widely scattered flock for so small a band of pastors. The Sisters of Charity had a free school, an orphan asylum, and an hospital; the Ladies of the Sacred Heart had two academies, and a college was begun near the city. The good work was carried steadily on by the successor designated to the Holy See by the dying De Neckere—the Right Rev. Antoine Blanc. In 1838 he founded a diocesan seminary, and entrusted it to the Lazarists. The Redemptorists also sent German fathers for the German immigrants. The schismatic trustees all through these years had maintained their assumptions and found unworthy priests to be their instruments. Their charter gave a voice in the election of the board to all, Catholics or not, who were pew-holders. At one time their president was a Freemason, and grand-master of the sect; they attempted to have a Masonic vault in the consecrated cemetery; and would permit no priest to officiate in their churches who recognized Bishop Blanc. But the Church outlived the men and their principles. In 1844 thirty-seven priests surrounded the bishop in diocesan synod. In the new parishes springing up on every side a better spirit prevailed, and a sounder organization. In 1850, in compliance with the recommendation of the Seventh Council of Baltimore, New Orleans became a metropolitan see, July 19, 1850. On January 20, 1856, Archbishop Blanc held his first provincial council, in which were his four suffragans, Bishops Portier of Mobile, Odin of Galveston, Byrne of Little Rock, and Martin of Natchitoches, with their theologians, the officers of the council, 5 superiors of religious, and a numerous body of clergymen. In the city of New Orleans there were then 21 churches and 1 chapel; 51 churches and chapels in the west of the diocese. The clergy numbered 100 priests—among the regulars being Jesuits, Redemptorists, Lazarists, and the Priests of the Holy Cross, whose lay brothers and school sisters rendered invaluable service to education. The Ursulines, the Ladies of the Sacred Heart, and the Sisters of Charity had also increased their numbers and good works. The Lazarist apostle of Texas, John M. Odin, who succeeded Archbishop Blanc, transferred from Galveston in 1861, was doomed during the civil war to drink a deep cup of bitterness. He was too well accustomed to devotion and heroic self-sacrifice not to inspire all around him—clergy and religious communities—with the same spirit. The war over, the last years of the long missionary career were given without stint to rebuilding what the war had cast down. He died, during the Vatican Council, in the home of his childhood in France. Napoleon J. Perché, his coadjutor and successor, was a distinguished publicist, who inherited the episcopal virtues of Dr. Odin. He died in December, 1883, after having beheld a large increase in his clergy, his flock, and the noble institutions which are the nurseries of piety, education, and charity. His successor, Most Rev. F. X. Leray, finds himself, in 1884, at the head of a clergy numbering 162 priests and 10 clerical students, with a flock of 250,000 souls, 94 churches, 34 chapels and stations, a theological seminary, 2 flourishing colleges directed by the Jesuits, 36 female academies and parochial schools, 15 academies for boys, and free schools with an aggregate of 9,000 pupils, besides 1,400 orphans cared for by the Sisters of Charity, 17 hospitals and orphan asylums, 16 charitable institutions, and 34 convents. Surely the barren and unblessed soil in which Bishop Dubourg seemed to labor in vain has borne a wonderful and most blessed harvest. So has it been in every one of the dioceses formerly dependent of New Orleans.—Natchez, created an episcopal see in 1837, had for its first bishop a Sulpician, and a native of Baltimore, Right Rev. Dr. Chanche. He had everything to create. He found, on his arrival, not one church or one priest; but, being a man of God even much more than a man of learning, he toiled obscurely and heroically, hoping against hope, and at his death, in 1852, he left 11 churches and 10 priests. Bishop Van de Velde, his successor, obtained a further supply of good priests, built schools, introduced the Brothers of Christian Instruction, pushed on the erection of a cathedral, and was about founding a college when he was cut off by yellow fever in November, 1855. Another native of Baltimore, Right Rev. Dr. Elder, was sent in 1857 to continue these arduous labors. The great civil war came to disturb these, and the bishop, refusing to acknowledge the right of the Federal commander to prescribe public prayers in Catholic churches, was thrown into prison. Nothing, however, could prevent him, his clergy, or his nuns from bestowing on sick, wounded, and needy of every class their heroic services. In 1880, when Bishop Elder was appointed Coadjutor of Cincinnati, he left his diocese in possession of 41 churches, 33 priests, and upwards of 12,000 Catholics, together with numerous and flourishing institutions of learning and beneficence. Two years in succession the terrible yellow fever spread death and desolation everywhere. But priests and nuns met it with undaunted devotion.—The dioceses of Natchitoches and Mobile properly belong to the Church of Louisiana. The former, comprising the northern part of the State, was erected in 1853, with Right Rev. Augustus Martin as bishop. It contained then a Catholic population of 25,000, with 7 churches and 4 priests. Dr. Martin died in 1875, leaving 16 churches or chapels, with 16 priests. The second bishop, Dr. Leray, before becoming Archbishop of New Orleans, increased the number of priests to 18, with 22 churches, 4 chapels, 4 academies for young ladies, 9 parochial schools for white, 2 for colored children, and 30,000 Catholics. Mobile was in colonial times the most important French settlement on the Gulf. In 1703 this settlement was canonically erected into a parish dependent on the Seminary of Quebec, and ministered to by two priests sent by the seminary. The Carmelites and Jesuits had charge of the Indian missions till 1763, when the Jesuits were withdrawn, the colony fell into English hands, and Catholicity disappeared. In 1825 Alabama and Florida became a vicariate-apostolic under Right Rev. Michael Portier, with three priests to assist him. The single small church in Mobile was destroyed by fire in October, 1827. Two years afterward Mobile became an episcopal see, the bishop having meanwhile obtained several priests from Europe, founded the College of Spring Hill for the Jesuits, and labored with his missionaries to prepare the way for building churches. Not till 1835 had the bishop secured himself a residence; he then laid the corner-stone of his cathedral, completing and dedicating it in 1850. At that time there were 7 other churches in the diocese, with 11,000 Catholics. The second bishop, Dr. Quinlan, succeeded in 1859, and died in March, 1883, leaving in his diocese 20 secular and 23 regular priests, 36 churches, 13 convents and academies, 18 parochial schools, with 1 great college.—Florida, as we have seen, passed through strange and disastrous changes since the first Spanish adventurers discovered it and the first missionaries perished on its shores. Within the last century it passed from the hands of the English into that of Spain (1783), and was then acquired by the United States. In 1823 Florida was made a portion of the vicariate-apostolic of Mississippi and Alabama. In 1850 East Florida was incorporated with the new diocese of Savannah; in 1857 Florida was made a vicariate-apostolic, with Bishop Vérot resident at St. Augustine. This energetic prelate erected churches at Mandarin, St. John's Bar, Tallahassee, Tampa, and Key West. Sisters of Mercy and Brothers of the Christian Schools were called in for the work of education. Six priests were obtained from Europe. In 1861 Bishop Vérot was transferred to Savannah, and Florida was ravaged by our great civil war. In 1870 Pius IX. created the see of St. Augustine, and Bishop Vérot asked to return to it and build up the ruins left by war, and succeeded, before he ended his apostolic labors in June, 1876, in bequeathing to his diocese 19 churches, with 70 missions well attended, and 6 self-supporting academies under the Sisters of St. Joseph and the Sisters of the Holy Names. In 1884, under Right Rev. John Moore, D.D., the diocese of St. Augustine is at the beginning of a new era of prosperity and progress.—The sees of Charleston and Savannah are too closely connected historically not to be mentioned together here. In 1793 there were small congregations of Catholic Irishmen at Augusta and Savannah, ministered to by a French priest, Abbé Le Moine. The Augustinian, Robert Brown, was pastor of Augusta about 1810, and built the Church of the Holy Trinity, remaining in charge till the end of 1824. Bishop England, who had found but one priest in all Georgia, sent clergymen to the principal stations. In 1832 Savannah counted 500 Catholics. The tide of European immigration was not directed to Georgia, and the increase even in the few Irish congregations was slow and uncertain. The diocese of Savannah, erected in 1850, and comprising Georgia and East Florida, only contained about 5,500 Catholics. Bishop Gartland went to Europe to solicit help, enlarged his cathedral, and founded an orphan asylum at Savannah, a Convent of Mercy at Augusta, and several free schools. In 1854 both he and Bishop Barron—the latter invalided by his labors in Liberia—perished, victims of their devotion to the plague-stricken, together with two Sisters of Mercy. Right Rev. John Barry, who took up this undesirable succession, also succumbed to ill health in 1859. Bishop Vérot, consecrated amid the turmoil of civil war in 1861, saw several of his few churches destroyed and their congregations dispersed or discouraged. The war ended, the energetic bishop sought aid everywhere towards repairing the ruin; established new schools, called in the Ursulines, the Sisters of Mercy from Ireland, and the Sisters of St. Joseph to meet the wants of the altered political and social condition. Bishop Ignatius Persico, who took charge of the diocese in 1870, could only labor a brief period. Then came the present bishop, Dr. Gross, finding his flock composed of 20,000 Catholics, with 12 priests. He called in the Jesuits and Benedictines—the former establishing schools at Augusta, the latter devoting their care to the colored people in Savannah. A college was also founded at Macon in 1874. In 1884 the diocese counts 25,000 Catholics, 30 churches, 40 chapels and stations, and 27 priests.—The shores of South Carolina had Spanish settlements at an early period, at St. Helena, on Port Royal, in 1566; and in 1569 the Jesuits began their missionary labors there among the Indians. The Spaniards, however, withdrew as the English advanced along the coast. Neither Carolina nor Georgia tolerated Catholics. The Acadians were compelled to depart in 1756. In 1775 two men, discovered to be Irish and Catholics, were tarred, feathered, and expelled. Carolina, however, was forced to forego her illiberal temper. In 1790 an old Methodist church was purchased by the little Catholic congregation in Charleston and called St. Mary's Church. The little flock, in spite of many vicissitudes, went on slowly increasing till 1820, when Charleston became an episcopal see under the eloquent Bishop England, styled in his day "the light of the American hierarchy." He secured the instruction of young girls by founding, in 1829, the Congregation of Sisters of our Lady of Mercy, who have become very dear to the Carolinians. In 1834 also came a colony of Ursuline Nuns. Both Charleston and Columbia, the capital, were thus put in possession of churches and academies. He established a newspaper to diffuse knowledge and refute error, as well as literary societies. On a field which promised, comparatively, but little increase the great bishop and great scholar bestowed untiring labor. In 1835 he established a seminary. In 1838 his cathedral was destroyed by the flames; but the bishop set about rebuilding it. In 1842 Bishop England died, leaving in his diocese 20 priests, with 17 churches, 44 stations, 2 convents with academies, an hospital, an orphan asylum, and 2 free schools, with a Catholic population of 10,000. His two immediate successors, Bishops Reynolds and Lynch, inherited his eloquence and learning. But as slavery left no room in the Southern States for free labor, emigrants from Europe were diverted toward the free States; and there alone was witnessed the wonderful growth of Catholicity. The great civil war, which had its beginning in Charleston, seemed to have given the death-blow to Catholic institutions, already overburdened with debt, and languishing through want of the industrial activity which prevailed elsewhere. The cathedral, rebuilt by Bishop Reynolds, was greatly injured during the bombardment of the city, and the churches at Sumter and Beaufort were burned. At Columbia church, convent, and college were blotted out. Bishop Lynch spent his remaining years in collecting alms to rebuild these ruins.—North Carolina, a vicariate-apostolic since 1868, is at present under the care of the Bishop of Charleston. It has a scattered population of 2,183, with 20 churches and chapels, 24 missionary stations, 9 priests, a Benedictine monastery, 2 female academies and a college. With a fertile country open to free labor and to immigration, the future is not without its bright hopes of increase and progress.—The see of Richmond, established in 1821, was subject to the same laws of slow increase in its Catholic population which governed all the slave States in the Union. In 1830 Archbishop Whitfield visited Virginia, found four priests in the whole State, with a little wooden chapel at Richmond; a more decent chapel in Norfolk, with a congregation of 600 persons. In 1838 there were 9,000 Catholics in the State, with 8 churches, under Right Rev. Richard Whelan as bishop. In 1855, under Bishop McGill—after the erection of the diocese of Wheeling—that of Richmond alone numbered some 9,000 Catholics, 10 priests, and 11 churches. In 1884, under Right Rev. John J. Keane, there are 25 priests and 14 seminarians, 35 churches, 24 chapels, 2 convents, 4 academies, 32 parish schools, 2 orphanages with schools, and 18,000 Catholics.—At the present writing, also, Rt. Rev. John Joseph Kain, Bishop of Wheeling, has in his mission 31 priests, 62 churches and 8 chapels, 4 convents, 1 select school for boys, 6 academies for young ladies, 28 parish schools, an orphanage, an hospital, and 18,000 Catholics in all.

Returning to Baltimore, the increase from the death of Archbishop Carroll, in 1815, down to 1884 is a wonderful story in itself, and only surpassed by the far more wonderful development of the Church in the free States. For slavery, so long as it lasted in Maryland as elsewhere, was an insuperable obstacle to that increase of the Catholic population due to emigrants from Europe, or the movement of free laborers from one State to another. Under the successive administrations of Archbishops Neale (d. 1817), Maréchal (d. 1828), Whitfield (d. 1834), Eccleston (d. 1851), and Kenrick (d. 1863) there was a steady progress in everything which regarded religion. Gradually and by the inherent force of circumstances each State became a separate diocese, the larger States themselves becoming each an ecclesiastical province, with metropolitan and suffragan sees. As the mighty tide of emigration from the British Islands and Germany, in particular, set in, the Catholic churches along the Atlantic sea-board were inadequate to contain the multitude of worshippers, while the living stream pouring inland toward the north and the west caused civilization to spread with marvellous rapidity, and with the multiplication of new States, Territories, cities, and townships the need of missionaries, churches, and Catholic institutions of all kinds also multiplied in a manner to baffle the calculations of the wisest and the efforts of the most zealous. We can only follow the rapid movement of this inflow and increase—indicating, as we pass along, the principal results. On May 9, 1852, the episcopate of the United States met in National Council at Baltimore, under Archbishop Kenrick, transferred to the metropolitan see from Philadelphia in the preceding year, and appointed apostolic delegate. Six archbishops and twenty-six bishops were in attendance. It was a wonderful growth in half a century. The acts of the council were solemnly approved by the Holy See in July, 1853, and the creation of the sees of Erie, Brooklyn, Newark, Burlington, Portland, Covington, Quincy, and Natchitoches was decreed. And in California, a new empire not yet mentioned in this summary, another ecclesiastical province arose. Archbishop Kenrick, already famed as a theologian and publicist, showed at Baltimore the great qualities and virtues which had won such reverence and admiration in Philadelphia. Loving intensely his adopted country, the breaking out of the war of secession filled him with a grief which preyed visibly upon his health. He died when the clouds of war were darkest. He had a worthy successor in Archbishop Spalding, an able controversialist and an eloquent writer, whose place was filled in 1872 by the first bishop of Newark, James Roosevelt Bayley. After him, in 1877, came the young Bishop of Richmond, James Gibbons—now the ninth Archbishop of Baltimore. Recalling to mind John Carroll and his little band of aged ex-Jesuits in 1783, let us simply state that in 1884, at the end of a century, the Catholic Church of Baltimore, founded by them, has a Catholic population of 210,000 souls, with 269 priests secular and regular, 339 churches, besides 35 chapels and stations, 28 ecclesiastical and male institutions, 30 female religious institutions, 8 female colleges, 19 female academies, 86 parish schools, with a population of 17,000 pupils in both primary, intermediate, and secondary schools. From such fruits judge we the illustrious line of archbishops.—In Philadelphia, created a metropolitan see in 1875, with James Frederick Wood as archbishop, the same marvellous results are to be noted. The flock which Bishops Egan and Conwell had struggled so hard to preserve against schismatical "Trusteeism" grew under the great Kenrick and his successors so as to outstrip Baltimore itself. Archbishop Wood's admirable management saved the churches and institutions of the diocese from all pecuniary embarrassment. And now, in July, 1884, when Archbishop Ryan comes from St. Louis to fill the vacant chair of that venerable man, he finds a flock of 300,000 Catholics, with 134 churches, 53 chapels, 260 priests, 100 seminarians, 1,020 religious women, 22,000 children in the parochial schools, 2,100 young ladies in the female academies, and everything bright with the rich promises of the future. Besides, and outside of the metropolis, Pennsylvania is dotted over with the flourishing dioceses of SCRANTON, HARRISBURG, PITTSBURGH and ALLEGHENY, and ERIE, each with its own separate and independent institutions, its increasing population, and the hope founded on the untold possibilities of a new, rich, and progressive country. Pittsburgh, created an episcopal see in 1843, had for first bishop Right Rev. Michael O'Connor, one of those scholarly men worthy to rank with the Carrolls, Englands, and Kenricks. The city itself is a great industrial centre, attracting a laboring population. Dr. O'Connor and his two successors have profited of every advantage to forward the spiritual and intellectual condition of their people. In 1884 the united dioceses of Pittsburgh and Allegheny possess 150,000 Catholics, 130 churches, 44 chapels, 84 regular and 105 secular priests, 656 religious of both sexes, 8 monasteries, 37 convents, 3 colleges for boys with 570 pupils, 5 academies for young ladies with 345 pupils, 62 parochial schools with an attendance of 16,552, 3 orphanages with 444 inmates, and 3 hospitals.—Scranton, erected into a see in 1868, under Right Rev. Wm. O'Hara, is also a great industrial centre. It has a Catholic population of 57,000 souls, 66 priests, 70 churches, 12 convents, 9 academies, 14 parochial schools.—Harrisburg, the capital of Pennsylvania, and the counties which make up the diocese, contain only a Catholic population of 25,000. But their needs are admirably provided for. There are altogether 49 priests, with a seminary and 9 seminarians, 51 churches, 24 chapels and stations, 8 academies, 23 parish schools with about 3,300 pupils, and 2 orphan asylums. Lancaster and Conewago, the two great centres of missionary labor in the last century, are comprised within the limits of this diocese, one of the loveliest regions in America.—ERIE, situated on the lake of that name at the northern extremity of Pennsylvania, possesses a Catholic population of 45,000, with 67 priests, 165 religious of both sexes, 84 churches, 11 chapels, 2 monasteries, 14 convents, 4 young ladies' academies, 28 parish schools, 2 orphanage schools, 5,937 scholars in daily attendance. Such is the condition of Catholicity in the great State of Pennsylvania, standing with its six dioceses between the Atlantic and the great Lakes, separating the Eastern from the nearest Western States. Ere glancing at these, let us complete our survey of New York and New England.

The Churches of New York State from 1842 to 1884.—It required the genius, the eloquence, the indomitable courage of Bishop Hughes to put down trusteeism, and to set the question of free Catholic education in its true light before the popular mind in America. This was only one of the priceless services rendered by that great prelate to the Church in the United States. To provide for the wants of his vast and ever-growing flock he called in the aid of the religious orders of men and women, Jesuits, Redemptorists, Franciscans, Ladies of the Sacred Heart, Sisters of Charity, Sisters of Mercy, Sisters of St. Joseph, and others. Under him arose St. John's College, Fordham, St. Francis Xavier's in New York City, Manhattan College, the academies and parish schools directed by the Christian Brothers, the orphanages, hospitals, and other beneficent institutions, which have been unfailing sources of spiritual blessing. His own great name, become a national glory, threw a bright halo on his church and the entire State during well nigh a quarter of a century. He saw the diocese over which he was placed in 1842 become an ecclesiastical province, with suffragan sees in Brooklyn, Newark, Albany, Buffalo, and Rochester. The elevation to the cardinalate of his own chosen coadjutor, and afterward his successor, was an homage to the memory of the illustrious dead as well as the just acknowledgment of the merits of the living. John McCloskey completed what John Hughes had planned and begun. Both Albany and New York show the abundant fruits of his husbandry. In 1884 NEW YORK diocese has a Catholic population of at least 600,000 souls, a clergy numbering 265 secular priests and 118 regulars with 76 seminarians, 254 brothers, 1,701 religious women, 4 colleges with 1,085 students, 22 young ladies' academies with 2,316 pupils, 6 academies for boys with 676 pupils, 55 male parish schools with an attendance of 15,583, 60 girls' schools with 19,225; 10 orphanage schools aggregating 2,047 pupils, 10 industrial and reform schools with an aggregate of 5,300—in all a student population of 46,262; 33 beneficent institutions with 10,966 inmates; 173 churches, 54 chapels, and 38 stations regularly visited. Such is the fruitful field on which America's first cardinal can rest his eyes after fifty years of priestly labor!—Across the bay of New York, BROOKLYN with her diocese offers a no less consoling spectacle. Its first bishop, John Loughlin, in 1884, after 31 years of toil, has a Catholic population of 205,000, 156 priests, 89 churches, 37 chapels and stations, 2 colleges, a theological seminary, 18 academies and select schools, 76 parish schools, 16 asylums, and 4 hospitals. What will it be twenty-five years hence?—On the New Jersey shore is the diocese of NEWARK, from which was formed, in 1881, that of TRENTON. When, in 1880, its young bishop became Coadjutor-Archbishop of New York, the church of New Jersey was one of the best regulated in America, thanks to the intelligent zeal and devotedness of its two first bishops and their clergy. In 1884 Newark numbers 150 priests regular and secular, 30 seminarians, 27 brothers, 713 sisters, 86 churches, 3 monasteries, 8 convents, 3 colleges, 17 academies for young ladies, 62 parochial schools, 4 industrial schools and reformatories—a total aggregate of students numbering 22,124; 5 orphanages, 4 hospitals, 3 asylums, with 6,784 inmates, and a total Catholic population of 150,000 souls. The sister diocese of Trenton possesses already 65 priests, 16 seminarians, 133 religious of both sexes, 81 churches, 35 convents, 6 academies with 229 pupils, 24 parochial schools with 4,798 scholars, and a Catholic population of 45,000.—If we examine the northern part of New York State, the field of the ancient Jesuit missions, we find the diocese of ALBANY realizing the prophetic vision of the martyred Jogues. There are 125 churches with resident pastors, and 50 churches without pastors resident; 30 chapels, 4 churches in course of erection, 191 priests, 27 seminarians, 4 academies for boys and 4 for girls, 11 select schools, 11 orphan asylums, 4 homes for the aged, 4 hospitals, 6 religious communities of men and 11 of women, with a Catholic population of 160,000.—Bordering on Canada is the diocese of OGDENSBURG, erected in 1872, and already counting 63,000 Catholics, 73 priests, 93 churches, 3 chapels, 1,406 pupils in its Catholic schools.—ROCHESTER, created an episcopal see in 1868, with Right Rev. Bernard J. McQuaid as bishop, soon gave evidence of his zeal for religion and education. His parochial schools number no less than 7,600 pupils on a total Catholic population of about 65,000. There is in Rochester a preparatory seminary with 16 ecclesiastical students, 3 academies for young ladies, 70 priests, 81 churches, an hospital, and 4 orphan asylums.—BUFFALO, created an episcopal see in 1847, had for its first bishop the Lazarist John Timon, born in Missouri, one of the founders of the Church of Texas, and well known throughout the West as a missionary. The city of Buffalo is built on the site of a French fort, demolished in 1688, a cross 18 feet high being left amid the ruined ramparts, and near the spot on which is now the cathedral of Buffalo. It bore the inscription Christus vincit, Christus regnat, Christus imperat: "Christ is victorious, Christ reigns, Christ rules with supreme command!" In 1822 Bishop Dubois celebrated Mass here in the court-house for seven or eight hundred Catholics, French Canadians, Swiss, and Irish. In 1834 Rev. Nicholas Mertz and Rev. Bernard O'Reilly were the only priests within the present limits of the diocese. Bishop Timon, at his arrival in Buffalo, found 16 priests, 3 churches in Buffalo, 4 in Rochester, with churches or stations in every county. In 1856 the diocese contained 120 churches and chapels, 100 other stations, 78 priests regular and secular, among the former being Jesuits, Redemptorists, Oblates, and Franciscans; a theological seminary, 5 orphan asylums, besides asylums and schools under the Sisters of Charity, St. Joseph, St. Bridget, and Notre Dame. In 1857 the Lazarists founded the seminary and college of Our Lady of Angels. In 1868 the diocese was divided, and Stephen Vincent Ryan, a Lazarist like Bishop Timon, succeeded him, and most worthily fills his place. Buffalo became under him the headquarters of a Jesuit mission for the German populations far and near, with the flourishing College of B. Peter Canisius. The present Catholic population is 100,000, with 102 secular priests and 74 regulars, 176 in all; 42 of whom are devoted to the education of youth. There are 145 churches and chapels, 9 religious houses for men, 44 for women, 4 colleges, 8 academies for young ladies, and 11 charitable institutions.

The Church in New England in 1884.—BOSTON was made an archiepiscopal see in 1875, with suffragans at Springfield, Mass.; Providence, R. I.; Portland, Me.; Hartford, Ct.; Burlington, Vt., and in 1884 the new see of Manchester, N. H., was added. The first Archbishop of Boston, Most Rev. John J. Williams, has under him a flock of 320,000 Catholics, with 300 priests, 80 seminarians, 167 churches, 14 chapels and stations, 2 colleges conducted by the Jesuits, 4 female academies, 17 convents, 10 orphan asylums, 7 hospitals, 40 parochial or free schools.—PORTLAND, erected in 1855, contains 50 churches, 52 priests, and a Catholic population of about 50,000. The new diocese of MANCHESTER has 37 priests, with 38 churches and chapels, and a Catholic population of about 40,000. The educational and charitable institutions in both are flourishing, and under the care of the Sisters of Mercy, the Sisters of the Congregation of Notre Dame, the Sisters of the Holy Cross, the Sisters of the Holy Name, and the Sisters of Charity. There are also in Maine six schools for Indian children conducted by the Sisters of Mercy and the Sisters of the Good Shepherd.—PROVIDENCE, erected in 1872, possesses 90 secular and 3 regular priests, 30 seminarians, 238 members of religious orders of women, 63 churches, 16 chapels, 14 convents, a high-school for boys, academies for young ladies with 700 pupils, 3,500 boys and 5,500 girls in the parochial schools, besides 225 in the orphanage schools, and a Catholic population of 156,000.—HARTFORD, which comprises the State of Connecticut, has a Catholic population of about 175,000, with about 140 priests and 55 seminarians, 114 churches, 28 chapels, 24 convents, and 1 monastery, 13,012 pupils of both sexes in its 67 academies and parochial schools, 3 orphanages, 3 asylums, and a home for the aged and destitute.—BURLINGTON, on Lake Champlain, embraces the State of Vermont. It is still under its first bishop, consecrated in 1853. Being situated on the Canadian frontier, and somewhat outside of the path followed by immigration, its Catholic population does not increase rapidly. It numbers at present 35,000 souls, with 37 priests and 18 seminarians, 71 churches, 11 convents, 3 female academies with 233 pupils, 15 parochial schools with 2,846 pupils, and an orphanage for girls and boys. Such is the Catholic New England of 1884.

The Church in the West.—PROVINCE OF CINCINNATI: We saw how the apostolic Bishop Flaget laid the foundations of the Church in Kentucky, Tennessee, and all along the Ohio. The rise and growth of the churches of Ohio and those immediately adjoining that State is one of the most wonderful chapters in our ecclesiastical history. Passing over the sad vicissitudes of the early Jesuit missions in Ohio, let us say that Bishop Flaget said Mass at the house of a family named Dittoe, near Somerset, Ohio, in October, 1812, Peter Dittoe having given there 320 acres of land for a church. In 1818 Father N. D. Young, O.P. (who died in 1878), there blessed the log chapel of St. Joseph. A Dominican convent soon afterward arose there, and congregations sprang up at Somerset, Lancaster, Zanesville, St. Barnabas, Rehobosh, and St. Patrick's. To the SEE OF CINCINNATI, erected in 1821, was appointed and consecrated Bishop Edward Fenwick, who on taking possession hired a house and sent out for his first meal. He estimated the Catholic population of Ohio at 8,000, with 2,000 Indians on Seneca River, and 10,000 or 12,000 in Michigan. He bought a lot, put up a wooden chapel of 30 feet by 55 for his cathedral, and went to Europe to obtain means. He succeeded, returned, had a more substantial cathedral to dedicate in 1826; visited his diocese, doing the work of a missionary and apostle, succumbing to the cholera in the very midst of his labors, September 26, 1832. He was a far-seeing man; he established in Cincinnati the Athenæum for young men, which developed under his successor into St. Xavier's College, and founded in 1831 the Catholic Telegraph, now the oldest of our Catholic papers. For the education of women and the care of the indigent and infirm he obtained colonies of Sisters of Charity, Sisters of St. Dominic, and Poor Clares. In 1833 John B. Purcell took up his burden and his cross, dying July 4, 1883, after half a century of episcopal labor. He witnessed in the interval the birth and growth of the mighty West. No more venerable or conspicuous figure appeared there than this scholarly man, who united the simplicity of a child and the poverty of a monk to the piety and zeal of an apostle. The cloud which settled on the last years of his long and laborious career only made him an object of deeper and more touching affection to the Catholic community. Many of the priests he had trained at Emmittsburg joined him in Cincinnati. He was in Ohio what Archbishop Hughes was in New York, the defender of Catholic principles against all foes. The great religious orders were called in to help in the great work of the apostleship; in 1836 he built a second church in Cincinnati, and before the close of 1837 there were in the diocese 32 churches and stations, 21 priests, a seminary, a college, a female academy, and an orphan asylum. In 1840 the Jesuits inaugurated St. Xavier's College, and the Sisters of Notre Dame de Namur, the best middle-class educators in all Europe, were encouraged to open academies and schools. The large Catholic German population was tenderly cared for by the good shepherd. Their children became the special charge of the Brothers of Mary. In 1850 Cincinnati became an archiepiscopal see; in 1851 the provincial seminary of Mount St. Mary's of the West was solemnly opened. In 1855 was held the first provincial council, attended by five suffragan bishops, one being absent; there were also present the superiors of five religious orders. Another council assembled in 1858. And so the see of Cincinnati, like the sacred fig-tree of India, sent forth its stately offshoots to cover the land and to feed souls with the grace of Christ. In 1878 Cincinnati possessed, besides the cathedral, 44 churches, and within the territory of the diocese, curtailed by the erection of so many sees, were 150 churches; regular priests of 7 different orders; religious women of 8 different orders; and nearly 120 secular priests. In 1884 Archbishop Elder, on whose shoulders was laid his venerated friend's heavy responsibility, counts in his diocese 163 churches, 32 chapels, 130 secular priests, 84 regulars, 378 men in religious communities, 1,130 women; 2 seminaries, 3 hospitals, a House of Mercy for young women, 2 houses of the Good Shepherd; 22,186 pupils in schools of every degree, and a Catholic population of 180,000 souls. Altogether the ten dioceses which at present are comprised in the Province of Cincinnati contain an estimated population of nearly a million of souls (931,455). Of these suffragan sees two only belong to Ohio—Cleveland and Columbus. Their history is more intimately connected with the growth of the State itself and the development of Cincinnati.—Cleveland, by its splendid position on Lake Erie, can look forward to a great future; it lies on what must soon be the great pathway of commerce across the continent. Sandusky, near at hand, contained the oldest Catholic church in Ohio, the chapel of the Jesuit missionaries. Thanks to Bishop Purcell's intelligent zeal, when, in 1847, the first Bishop of Cleveland, Dr. Amadée Rappe, took possession of his see, he found it in possession of 33 churches, with 16 priests. The Sisters of Notre Dame had a flourishing academy at Toledo; and the Fathers and Sisters of the Precious Blood formed nurseries of Catholic piety and apostolic spirit. The new bishop had soon founded a seminary and a college, a female academy under the Ursuline Nuns, an orphanage under the Sisters of the Sacred Heart of Mary, a charity hospital under the Augustinian Nuns. He was indefatigable in visiting every point of his diocese, and in providing for the wants of the people; in twenty-three years from his arrival he had 100,000 Catholics, 160 churches, 107 priests, a school in every parish; Jesuits, Franciscans, Brothers of Mary, Gray Nuns, Sisters of the Good Shepherd, the Little Sisters of the Poor, together with the communities already named, were all sharing in the good work. In 1872 Right Rev. Richard Gilmour inherited this apostleship, and urged forward every sacred interest of his flock. In 1883 the diocese has 165,000 Catholics, 217 churches, 21 chapels, 151 secular and 28 regular priests, 40 seminarians, 125 parochial schools with an average attendance of 23,000, a seminary, 5 female academies, 5 hospitals, 8 orphanages, 3 homes for the aged, and 2 reformatories.—Columbus, the capital of the State, is no less favored or prosperous in proportion to its Catholic population of 48,000. The two Kentuckian sees of Louisville and Covington have already been mentioned in connection with Bishop Flaget's early labors.—The diocese of Louisville possessed in 1883 150,000 Catholics, 138 priests, 107 churches, 22 chapels, 2 seminaries, 2 colleges, and 2 institutes for boys, 25 young ladies' academies, 128 parochial schools, and numerous establishments of charity and beneficence.—Covington, which might pass for a suburb of Cincinnati, has a Catholic population of 43,000, with a numerous clergy and flourishing institutions of every kind.—Nashville, in Tennessee, another portion of Bishop Flaget's missionary field, became an episcopal see in 1837. The Dominican, Richard Pius Miles, its first bishop, found in the State about 100 Catholic families without a church or a priest. He and his coadjutor and brother-Dominican, Bishop Whelan, labored courageously in this moral wilderness. It is a most touching story. Priest after priest came to help them till, in 1844, Bishop Miles was emboldened to begin a cathedral. When he died in May, 1859, he had 13 priests, 14 churches, convents of Dominican friars and nuns, Sisters of Charity, academies, and parish schools. In 1861 came the civil war with its destruction and dispersions. Bishop Whelan resigned in May, 1863. Bishop Feehan, who succeeded him in 1865, needed no little courage to undertake the work of restoration. In 1866 he could only count in Tennessee 12 churches and 15 priests. In 1878 the diocese had already 29 churches, 33 priests, Christian Brothers, Dominican Sisters, Sisters of Mercy, Sisters of the Good Shepherd, of St. Joseph, and of the Precious Blood, with 2,500 children in Catholic schools. In that same year the yellow fever desolated Memphis, and before the end of September 9 priests and 13 Sisters had perished in ministering to the plague-stricken! In 1879 the scourge returned, and the same miracles of devotion were renewed. Surely such a land must have a great blessing.—In Indiana the sees of Vincennes and Fort Wayne belong to the province of Cincinnati. VINCENNES, created in 1834, had for its first bishop the saintly Simon Gabriel Bruté, one of those gems given by France to the crown of the young Church of the United States. His diocese embraced Indiana and Western Illinois. A plain brick church at Vincennes, unplastered within, without sanctuary or sacristy, such was his cathedral. St. Peter's and St. Mary's in Daviess County were attended by Rev. S. P. Lalumière, and St. Paul's in New Alsace by Rev. Mr. Ferneding. The bishop set to work; he and Mr. Lalumière explored the diocese in different directions to look up the stray sheep. Dr. Bruté gave confirmation at Chicago, visited the Catholic Indians under Chikakos on the Tippecanoe, said Mass at Logansport, and found twenty Catholics at Terre Haute. He sent to Fort Wayne, where they were building a church, Rev. Mr. Ruff, the first priest ordained for his diocese; hastened to Europe to obtain assistance, and with the alms thus solicited established a seminary, an orphan asylum, free schools, completed his modest cathedral, and helped toward erecting a number of churches. He had brought with him from Europe some twenty priests and seminarians. To the latter he taught theology, while fulfilling the duties of missionary and bishop. In 1839 this apostolic life ended all too suddenly, every one feeling that a saint was taken away. Even then his diocese possessed 23 churches and 6 more in course of erection; 24 priests were on the mission; the Eudist Fathers were in charge of a seminary and college, and the Sisters of Charity had a select academy and free schools. Under his successor the Fathers of the Holy Cross came from Le Mans, founding, besides several other missionary establishments, Notre Dame. Bishop after bishop increased the number of missionaries, churches, religious houses, schools, and beneficent institutions. In 1844 the see of Chicago was erected; in 1857 Fort Wayne became a separate diocese. In 1878 the diocese of Vincennes, thus limited, was placed under Right Rev. Dr. Chatard, who in 1884 has under him on the mission 92 secular priests, 37 regulars, 160 churches, 20 chapels, 30 clerical students, 5 religious orders of men, 8 of women, 5 orphan asylums, and 3 hospitals. There are Catholic schools attached to every congregation, the average number of pupils in all being 20,000, out of an estimated Catholic population of 80,000. So prospers the good work begun by Bishop Bruté.—The diocese of FORT WAYNE vies in prosperity with its sister-diocese. It is especially blessed in the work of education. Right Rev. Dr. Luers, the first bishop, found only 20 churches, very poor for the most part, in his diocese, 11 secular priests, and 3 Fathers of the Holy Cross. He stimulated the zeal of his Catholics everywhere, and new and better church edifices, together with a handsome Gothic cathedral, soon arose to reward their generosity. Untiring to promote holiness of life among clergy and people, Dr. Luers died in 1871. Under his successor, Bishop Dwenger, the growth of religion has been extraordinary. With a Catholic population of 85,000 he has 63 secular and 39 regular priests, 24 seminarians, 120 churches, 17 chapels, a university (Notre Dame), 7 academies for young ladies, 59 parochial schools with 7,181 pupils.—CHICAGO, where Marquette first built a log hut for his temporary winter abode, is now an archiepiscopal see, the great commercial metropolis of the West growing in spite of the repeated destruction wrought by flood and flame, so as to promise to become in importance second only to New York. All this country is only a part of the vast field of French missionary labor. It was comprised within the limits assigned by the Holy See to the first diocese of Baltimore. In 1834 Rev. Mr. St. Cyr was the only priest there, and he belonged to the bishop of St. Louis. When Right Rev. Wm. Quarter arrived in Chicago from

New York in 1844 he found only two churches, one a frame building, the other a new brick church, unplastered, with rough board doors, and a debt of $5,000. Only 15 of the 23 priests then laboring in Illinois belonged to him, and the others were recalled by their own bishops. The vicissitudes through which the Church of Chicago passed, under Bishop Quarter and his three immediate successors, must not be dwelt upon here. The bishops struggled heroically to meet the ever-increasing needs of the emigrants arriving from Europe and all parts of the Union. In 1870 the diocese of Chicago, it was estimated, contained 400,000 Catholics. To minister to these there were 142 priests, 30 of whom were regulars. The city itself contained 26 churches; the churches outside the city numbered 175. The Jesuits were preparing to open a college at Chicago; the Fathers of St. Viateur had opened one at Bourbonnais Grove; the Brothers of the Christian Schools had an academy at La Salle; the Alexian Brothers had a large hospital in Chicago. Then there were the Ladies of the Sacred Heart, the Sisters of the Congregation of Notre Dame, the Sisters of Loretto, all with flourishing academies, and three other Sisterhoods devoted to teaching or charity. 50 parish schools were in operation. The Sisters of Mercy, the Sisters of the Good Shepherd, and the Sisters of Charity had each a large establishment in the city. Then the city was swept by fire, and most of these institutions were blotted out. Yet in 1883, under the first archbishop, Dr. Feehan, so tried himself at Memphis in 1878–79, all seems to have once more arisen from its ashes. The clergy comprises 164 secular priests, 62 regulars, 31 seminarians, 184 churches, 2 colleges, 18 academies for young ladies, 24 convents, 26,868 children in the Catholic schools, and a Catholic population of 255,000.

The Church in Michigan.—The sees of Detroit and Grand Rapids are suffragans of Cincinnati for the present. To what has already been said about the early missionary settlements at Detroit we can only add that in 1883 the diocese contained 100,455 Catholics, 78 churches, 104 priests, with 16 seminarians, a college, 4 academies, 42 parochial schools with 9,832 pupils inscribed, 7 asylums, and 1 hospital. The diocese of Grand Rapids counts 44 priests, 42 churches with resident pastors, 25 mission churches with Sunday services, 19 with week-day services, making 130 churches in all; 20 parochial schools with 4,000 pupils, an orphan asylum and 2 hospitals, and 12 religious communities.

The two suffragan sees of Alton and Peoria, detached from the original diocese of Chicago, contain, respectively, 156,000 and 95,000 Catholics, admirably provided with all the sources of Catholic life. Alton possesses 190 churches, 131 secular priests and 38 regulars, 2 monasteries, 2 colleges, 9 academies for young ladies, 11,000 pupils in 100 parochial schools, 3 orphanages with their schools and 11 hospitals. Peoria, on the other hand, has 157 churches, 105 priests, 8 academies, 38 parochial schools with 6,200 pupils.

Province of Milwaukee.—This province, comprising Wisconsin, Northern Michigan, and the Territories of Minnesota and Dakota, is also a portion of the great field once entrusted to the bishops of Quebec. From 1669 to the suppression of the Jesuits in France, 1763, Wisconsin was the seat of flourishing Jesuit missions, founded by the intrepid Father Claude Allouez. A silver monstrance given, in 1686, by a French trader to the Church of St. Francis Xavier in Green Bay is still in existence. The aggregate Catholic population of the province was in 1883 548,700 souls, distributed as follows: Milwaukee, 210,000; Green Bay, 68,200; Marquette and Sault Ste. Marie, 30,000; La Crosse, 54,000; St. Paul, 130,000; Dakota Territory, 25,000; and Northern Minnesota, 31,000. The other statistical details are in themselves a revelation prophetic of a mighty future for religion, if man will only second the designs of Providence. Thus in the diocese of Milwaukee there are already 264 churches built, with 18 chapels, 199 priests secular and regular; a seminary, a normal school, 5 female academies, 12 religious communities, 13 charitable institutions.—In the diocese of Green Bay there are 111 churches with 15 chapels, 82 priests, 40 parochial schools with 4,502 pupils. There are also 1,200 Catholic Indians. In the diocese of St. Paul there are 147 priests in all, with 195 churches, 6 religious orders of men, 14 of women, 5 asylums and protectorates, 10 female academies and boarding-schools.—In that of La Crosse are 71 priests and 21 seminarians, 119 churches with 5 chapels, a college with 80 students, an academy for young ladies with 90 pupils, 100 parochial schools with 4,700 pupils, and an Indian Catholic population of 1,500.—In the diocese of Marquette and Sault Sainte-Marie are 36 churches with 6 chapels, 32 priests, 6 female convents, 3 academies for young ladies, 1,200 pupils in the parochial schools, and about 2,000 Catholic Indians and half-breeds.—In the vicariate-apostolic of Northern Minnesota are 56 priests and 7 seminarians, 73 churches and 6 chapels, a monastery, 8 convents, a seminary, a college, an academy for young ladies, and 1,500 Catholic Indians.—In that of Dakota are 45 priests and 9 seminarians, 82 churches, 4 convents, 4 young ladies' academies, 12 parochial schools with 710 pupils, 6 Indian schools with 270 pupils.

The Province of St. Louis.—In 1876, August 27, the Catholics of St. Louis celebrated the centennial anniversary of the foundation of their cathedral church. We left Bishop Dubourg in the city with two priests. He soon afterwards obtained a colony of Jesuits under Father Charles Van Quickenborne, who founded a novitiate at Florissant, a church at St. Charles, and a little later the university in St. Louis. The Jesuits with the Lazarists formed two nurseries of learned and apostolic men. In 1827 St. Louis became an episcopal see embracing Missouri, Western Illinois, Arkansas, and the then Western Territory to the Pacific. Bishop Rosati called in the Ladies of the Sacred Heart and the Sisters of St. Joseph. In 1841 Right Rev. Peter R. Kenrick took charge of the diocese. St. Louis became thenceforward for the regions beyond the Mississippi as active an intellectual, religious, and civilizing centre as Cincinnati was for the region between the Alleghanies, the Ohio, and the Great Lakes. From St. Louis the Jesuits planned and extended the missionary excursions which brought so many of the Indian tribes on both sides of the Rocky Mountains into the pale of the Church, and which would have kept them in peace, while advancing in the arts of civilized life, if General Grant's baneful administration had not interfered with their advancement. When the civil war began the diocese of St. Louis, after having been partitioned into so many others, still contained 70 churches with 120 priests. At St. Louis, Florissant, Cape Girardeau, St. Charles, Carondelet, Weston, St. Genevieve, St. Joseph, Washington, and New Westphalia were great institutions, nurseries for the apostolate of education and charity. The calamities of the great war checked without altogether stopping all this moral progress. In 1868 the northwestern portion of Missouri was erected into the diocese of St. Joseph. In 1876 the city of St. Louis numbered 150,000 Catholics. The coadjutor bishop, Patrick John Ryan, contributed not a little to the progress of intellectual culture and the spread of piety, because himself a true priest as well as a distinguished scholar and eloquent pulpit orator. In 1884, as these lines are written, the telegraph brings the news of his promotion to the see of Philadelphia. The venerable Archbishop Kenrick meanwhile has the consolation of seeing the 200,000 Catholics composing his flock in possession of 260 priests, 40 seminarians, 1,295 religious of both sexes, 193 churches, 23 chapels, 6 monasteries, 91 conventual houses, a seminary, 4 colleges with 760 pupils, 15 female academies with 901 pupils, 88 parochial schools for both sexes with an average attendance of 23,527, 4 industrial schools and reformatories with 450 inmates, 5 orphanages, 6 hospitals, 4 asylums.—Of the five suffragan sees, Davenport and Dubuque are in Iowa; Leavenworth in Kansas; Kansas City and St. Joseph in Missouri; besides these, there is the vicariate-apostolic of Nebraska. The sees of Kansas City and St. Joseph are united at present under Right Rev. John Joseph Hogan, titular bishop of the former. Their aggregate Catholic population is 40,000, with 74 priests, 75 churches, 60 missionary stations, 2 monasteries, 15 convents with female academies and schools, a college, and 5 parochial schools under lay teachers.—In Iowa, Davenport, erected in 1881, has already a Catholic population of 40,000, with 84 priests, 21 ecclesiastical students, and 120 churches. Dubuque, created in 1837, has a Catholic population of 60,000, 140 secular priests and 7 regulars, 430 members of religious orders, a seminary with 40 seminarians, 145 churches, 90 chapels, a monastery, 20 convents, a college, 8 academies for young ladies with 1,080 pupils, 54 parochial schools, with a total aggregate of 7,611 in all educational establishments.—The diocese of Leavenworth would deserve a more lengthy notice. The Second Council of Baltimore, in 1833, asked and obtained from the Holy See that the Indian missions should be assigned to the Society of Jesus. The Jesuits, in consequence, entered with ardor on the labor of evangelizing them; but the civil and military administrations and the jealousy of the Protestant sects thwarted all their designs for systematic work. In 1850 these missions, which had till then been under the see of St. Louis, were made a vicariate-apostolic under the Jesuit missionary Right Rev. J. B. Miége. The Indian Catholics at the time numbered, it was thought, over 5,000. Soon the Indian Territory was invaded by a white population, most hostile to Catholics. Bishop Miége called in the Benedictines to help him. Irish and Catholic German emigrants also formed settlements. Churches and schools arose. The admission of Kansas as a State was the occasion of sanguinary struggles. Then came the civil war. From 1860 to 1863 the churches in the diocese increased from 16 to 25. Some of the Indians—the Potawatamies—became citizens and farmers; the Osages refused to give up their tribal organization, and with others were removed to the Indian Territory. This was a sad blow to the missions, as settlers occupied the lands thus vacated. In 1875 Bishop Miége resigned, leaving the former mission territory a State of the Union, with 40,000 Catholics, 59 priests, 78 churches and chapels. In 1877 the see of LEAVENWORTH was created, with the Benedictine Dom Louis M. Fink as bishop. The Indians had dwindled to a few hundred. In 1883 the Catholic population numbers 80,000, with 99 priests and 24 seminarians, with 164 churches and chapels, 3 colleges, 3 academies, 35 parochial schools and some 3,500 scholars.—The vicariate-apostolic of NEBRASKA is a part of the former "Indian Territory" east of the Rocky Mountains, and was, therefore, under the jurisdiction of Bishop Miége. In 1855 a Catholic Church was built at Omaha before any Protestant congregation had been formed. In 1857 the Holy See made it a separate vicariate, joining to it Dakota, Montana, and Wyoming. In 1859 Right Rev. James O'Gorman was appointed over it in place of Dr. Miége. In 1868 Montana was made a distinct vicariate; but remained till 1879 under Dr. O'Gorman. Right Rev. Bishop O'Connor, his successor, has in his vicariate 53,240 Catholics, 73 priests, 22 ecclesiastical students, a Jesuit college with 220 pupils, 6 academies with 310 pupils, 17 parochial schools with 1,305 pupils.—The vicariate-apostolic of MONTANA, created 1883, has about 10,000 Catholics, a great portion of whom are Indians, under the care of the Jesuits—Pend d'Oreilles and Flatheads—with boarding-schools and day-schools. There are 17 priests, 19 churches and chapels, 3 academies, 4 parochial schools.—In the vicariate-apostolic of Northern Minnesota, as well as in the present INDIAN TERRITORY, the Benedictines have entered into the inheritance of the devoted Jesuit missionaries. The sons of St. Benedict have founded in Stearns County, in Northern Minnesota, a flourishing monastery of their order together with St. John's University, which already counts 19 seminarians, 153 students, with a staff of 21 professors. Connected with these nurseries of learning and the apostolic spirit is St. Benedict's Convent and Female Academy, directed by Benedictine Nuns, who already number in their community 155 members, counting professed, novices, postulants, etc. On this mother-house 16 other establishments depend. In the academy, the two select schools, 11 district schools, and 9 parochial schools the Sisters educate about 2,000 pupils. Besides the 33 Benedictine priests at work in the vicariate there are 23 secular priests on the mission, with a white Catholic population of 30,000 souls and 1,500 Catholic Indians.—While the Minnesota vicariate is thus zealously cultivated by the German Benedictines under the Right Rev. Bishop Seidenbush, O.S.B., the Indian Territory has been intrusted to the French Benedictines of the Primitive Observance, who, under Right Rev. Isidore Robot, minister to 3,180

Catholic Indians and 600 white Catholics.

The Pacific States.—Passing westward to the Pacific, we come upon a field of modern missionary labor which recalls the venerated names of men most of whom have, not long since, passed to their reward, leaving a few survivors behind as links between two successive eras. Catholic Iroquois Indians from Montreal were the first to make the faith known to the idolatrous Indian tribes of Idaho, during the first half of the present century. In 1830 some Flatheads came to St. Louis to seek for missionaries, dying there after having received baptism. In 1832 one of these same Catholic Iroquois set out for St. Louis to renew the demand for missionaries, was killed by the Sioux on his return, giving his blood as the seed of a new and plentiful harvest of souls. In 1839 two other Iroquois, undismayed by the fate of their brother, appeared on the same errand at St. Louis. Bishop Rosati welcomed them, confirmed them, and sent them away with a promise soon to be fulfilled. In 1840 the Jesuit Peter John de Smet, a Belgian, set out for the Flathead territory, where he soon had 600 Christian converts among the tribesmen and their neighbors, the Pend d'Oreilles. He and his companions, the Frenchman Nicolas Point and the Italian Gregory Mengarini, are the parents of the Indian church in these then inaccessible regions. The work progressed, the harvest increased wonderfully, and in 1843 the indefatigable De Smet arrived from Belgium, after passing round Cape Horn, and landed at Vancouver with Fathers Accolti, Nobili, Ravalli, Vercruysse, and Huybrechts, accompanied by a colony of Sisters of Notre Dame. In Idaho, as well as in the adjoining territories of Montana and Minnesota, De Smet's untiring zeal thenceforward kept the good work progressing. In 1868 IDAHO was created a vicariate. At the latest date it had a total Catholic population of 2,300, with 5 Jesuit priests and 2 seculars, with an academy, a boarding-school, and 2 day-schools for Indian children.—The history of the Church in Oregon cannot be separated from that of Idaho. The mission of Oregon was erected in 1838 by the then Bishop of Quebec, who sent Very Rev. F. N. Blanchet and Rev. Modest Demers to take charge of it. November 25, in that year, the first solemn Mass of thanksgiving was offered up at Fort Vancouver. In 1842 the Revs. Antoine Langlois and Jean Baptiste Bolduc came from Quebec round Cape Horn to join the missionaries.—OREGON was created a vicariate-apostolic in 1843; in 1846 it was made an ecclesiastical province with the metropolitan see at Oregon City, and suffragans at Walla Walla and Vancouver's Island. Jesuits, Oblates, secular priests, Sisters of Notre Dame and of the Holy Names, and the Sisters of Providence came to labor in the distant field. In 1862 the archbishop changed his residence to Portland. In 1850 the district of NESQUALLY was made a diocese, and to this the bishop of Walla Walla was transferred. In 1883 the archdiocese contained a Catholic population of 10,000, with 29 priests, 25 churches and chapels, 71 sisters, and 10 female schools. That of Nesqually, with a Catholic population of about 13,000, has 23 priests, 30 churches and chapels, 65 Sisters of Charity, 2 colleges, 7 schools for boys and 8 for girls.—The diocese of VANCOUVER'S ISLAND, which also comprises the Territory of Alaska, has a Catholic population of 5,400, with 11 priests, male and female schools under the Sisters of St. Ann, and a college.

In the ecclesiastical province of San Francisco the first missionaries (1601) were Carmelite monks. In 1642 the Jesuits began their labors in Lower or Southern California. They were succeeded, at the suppression of their Society, by the Franciscans. The superior of the latter, the celebrated Father Juniper Serra, founded a mission at San Diego in 1769, and at Monterey in 1770; at San Antonio in 1771, at Mount Carmel, San Gabriel, and San Luis Obispo in 1772. On June 27, 1776, was founded the mission of SAN FRANCISCO, and on January 6, the next year, that of Santa Clara. "At each of these missions," says Dr. Shea, "a fine church and buildings were erected; the Indians were collected, instructed, and baptized. They were trained to agriculture and the various trades, and became industrious and skilful. Each mission was a little community, managed by the missionaries, who, remaining poor themselves, prepared their converts to be self-supporting, and made their tribe rich in well-cultivated and well-stocked farms. Father Serra died in August, 1774, leaving 10,000 Catholic Indians in his missions. A fund created under the Jesuits, by generous benefactors, and known as the Pious Fund of California, helped Serra and his brethren to carry out their missionary work. Fathers Francis Palon and Lazven took up and extended it down to 1803, when the last named died. The revolutionary period in France and Spain gave up Mexico to the government of irreligious men, who thwarted or stopped altogether the labor of the missionaries. In 1832 a decree of the Mexican Cortes dissolved the missions; their property was seized by the revolutionary leaders in California, and the missionaries were, literally, left to starve. In 1840 the Two Californias were erected into a diocese under Father Francisco Garcia-Diego as bishop. He had his residence at Santa Barbara. He found the Catholic Indians reduced from 30,000 to 4,000. In 1844, the revenues of the Pious Fund being withheld by the Mexican government, Bishop Garcia-Diego obtained a grant of 35,000 acres of land, enabling him to establish a college at Santa Inez. In 1848, in consequence of the discovery of gold, California, now ceded to the United States, was overrun by immigrants. There was no chapel within three miles of San Francisco. From Oregon came the Canadians, Revs. J. B. Brouillet and E. Langlois, with the Jesuit Fathers Accolti and Nobili. A lot of land with a shanty was purchased by subscription within the present limits of the city. This poor wooden building was the first church edifice in San Francisco; in it the first Mass was celebrated June 17, 1849. Mr. Langlois was appointed vicar-general, and with his companion attended to the spiritual wants of the ever-increasing crowd of Catholics. In 1850 the Very Rev. Joseph S. Alemany, O.P., at the time provincial of the Dominicans in Ohio, was appointed Bishop of Monterey. With him came the Friars Preachers and Dominican Nuns. Soon afterwards arrived the Sisters of Notre Dame, the Presentation Nuns, and the Sisters of Mercy from Ireland (1854). In 1853 the southern part of the State became the diocese of Monterey; a new see being created at San Francisco, to which Dr. Alemany was promoted with the rank of archbishop.—In 1861 the northern part of the State was erected into the vicariate-apostolic of Marysville; in 1868 it became the diocese of Grass Valley. In 1883 the diocese of San Francisco had a Catholic population of about 200,000, with 128 churches, 25 chapels and stations, 75 regular and 100 secular priests, a seminary, 6 colleges, 18 academies, and a generous proportion of charitable institutions. The diocese of Grass Valley has 31 priests, 35 churches, a Catholic population of from 7,000 to 10,000, with numerous and prosperous literary institutions.—In the diocese of Monterey and Los Angeles the increase of Catholicism has been no less consoling. There are 34 churches, 16 chapels and 36 stations, 47 priests, 2 flourishing literary institutions, parochial schools, convents, orphanages, a Catholic population of 28,000, of whom 3,500 are Indians.

Following again eastward the great southern path of travel toward the Atlantic, we traverse two vicariates-apostolic and an ecclesiastical province formed out of another portion of the old Catholic missionary field. The vicariate-apostolic of Arizona embraces many of the missions which had risen to such a pitch of prosperity under the Jesuits previous to their suppression, some of their beautiful churches still standing desolate in the wilderness. The country is now evangelized by 16 priests, aided by 45 nuns; there are some 35 churches and chapels, 7 convents, 6 academies, 6 parish schools, 2 hospitals, a total Catholic population of 31,000, 1,000 of whom are Indians. At Isleta a little band of three Jesuits are laboring to build up a small corner of the vast ruin caused by the Spanish statesmen of the last century. Further eastward, in the vicariate-apostolic of Colorado, is a Catholic population of about 46,000, under a bishop who has spent his life there. He has some 43 priests, 32 churches and 50 chapels, and 6 convents. There are 6 academies for young ladies with 500 pupils, 17 parochial schools with 1,150 pupils, and 6 hospitals.

New Mexico, at whose early missions and martyrs we glanced while describing the Colonial Period, had in 1645 no less than 25 missions among the Indian pueblos, without counting the churches belonging to the Spanish settlements. An unwise rigor employed in suppressing by open force certain inveterate pagan superstitions, and acts of injustice and oppression committed by the Spanish officials, caused a general uprising of the Indians in 1680. Twenty-one missionaries and lay brothers were massacred, and the surviving Spaniards abandoned the province; the convents and churches having been burned to the ground, and all outward signs of the Christian religion blotted out. In 1692 the country was reconquered, the Spaniards returned, and the missions were in part restored. In 1798 the Franciscans had there 18 fathers with 24 missions. In 1805 there were 26 fathers and 30 missions. With the Mexican Revolution came decline, neglect, and the death of religion. In 1850 New Mexico, having become a territory of the United States, was created a vicariate-apostolic. Under the administration of General Grant the labors of our missionaries among the Indians of New Mexico, as elsewhere, were sadly thwarted by the government policy. The pueblo schools were neglected, the missions given over, first to a sect called Christians, and then to the Presbyterians. We have just sketched the condition of Arizona and Colorado. In the archdiocese of SANTA FÉ, established in 1850, there is a Catholic population of 126,000, with 34 parish churches and 203 chapels regularly attended, 56 priests, 6 convents, 4 colleges, and 12,000 Pueblo Indians. The Jesuits have sent thither a numerous colony of able men, who have founded Las Vegas College, publish the Revista Catolica; have, besides, a select family school at Albuquerque and a flourishing mission at La Junta. The Sisters of Loretto have a convent and academy at Santa Fé, with 5 well-attended schools in the pueblos ; the Sisters of Charity and the Sisters of Mercy have also schools and institutions of beneficence. There are two large schools under the Christian Brothers ; and a very favorable opening now presents itself for missionary work among the Apache Indians.—The great State of Texas ought with time to see within its borders one of the most glorious ecclesiastical provinces in the United States, if the heroic self-sacrifice of its early missionaries, and the scarcely less heroic devotion of those of the present century, afford ground to prognosticate of the future. In 1685 La Salle, passing the mouth of the Mississippi, landed at Matagorda Bay, and there built Fort St. Louis. Two Sulpicians and three Recollects were with him. One of each order accompanied La Salle in January, 1687, when he set out to explore the interior. They never returned. The others with the party left behind in the fort were soon afterward massacred by the Indians. Conspicuous among the Franciscan missionaries who subsequently aided in colonizing Texas and Christianizing its native tribes was the saintly Father Antonio Margil, who in 1715 came with 4 fathers and 3 lay brothers of his order, from the missionary college of Guadalupe, together with 5 others from Queretaro. They settled on the Salinas, a branch of the Rio Grande. Amid much hardship he succeeded in founding 7 missions, which were soon broken up by a war with France. Several missions perished by sword and fire. About 1730 the mission of San Antonio, which had a fine church, with a parish, became a centre around which other missions were grouped. Among the Apaches also missions were founded. But the misconduct of the Spanish officers caused the Apaches to abandon them. In 1758 there was a massacre of the missionaries. Good and ill success alternated down to 1794, when the missions were secularized. In 1829 the establishment of Mexican independence attracted to Nueces some Irish colonists with two priests. Then came the Texan war for independence. In 1840 Very Rev. John Timon, a Lazarist, was appointed vicar-apostolic. He sent his subordinate, Rev. John Odin, to Texas in his place, and joined him in December of that year. He visited all the old mission sites, collecting the Catholics, and securing ground for building churches. To the Texan Legislature he also applied himself, demanding, and not without success, the restoration of the former property of the Catholic Church. The Rev. Mr. Odin became vicar-apostolic of Texas in 1842, and fixed his residence at San Antonio. He had then four priests in all Texas. In 1861, on his promotion to New Orleans, he had 29 secular priests, 13 religious, 50 churches, a college, 4 academies, and several schools. In 1847 the vicar-apostolic of Texas became Bishop of Galveston. In 1873 the diocese was divided by the erection of the see of San Antonio. At the present writing the Bishop of Galveston is aided in his labor by 43 priests. The diocese has a Catholic population of 35,000, with 50 churches and chapels, 12 academies for young ladies, 1 college, and 2 charitable institutions. The diocese of SAN ANTONIO has a Catholic population of 56,000, with 46 priests, 50 churches and 8 chapels, 8 female academies, 2 colleges, and 25 parochial schools. The vicariate-apostolic of Brownsville, with a Mexican population of 37,500, has only 2,500 Catholics belonging to other nationalities. The Oblate Fathers have a college at Brownsville. The Ursulines, Sisters of Mercy, and Sisters of the Incarnate Word have also academies and schools. There are 12 churches, 12 chapels, and 21 priests.

CHRISTEN. This word, familiarly used instead of baptize, is derived probably from the fact that in baptism the child is made a member of Christ's Church and receives his Christian name.

CONCELEBRATION. Under the head of EUCHARIST and the subdivision ministration, it will be found that in early days the bishop in conjunction with his presbytery celebrated Mass. Until about the beginning of the thirteenth century it was customary for several priests to unite in offering the same Mass, concelebrate, on the more solemn festivals of the year. The custom still prevails in the Oriental Churches, but the only vestige of it in the Latin Church is found in the Masses said by priests on the day of their ordination and by bishops on the day of their consecration. The whole subject is discussed in the thirteenth chapter of Father O'Brien's "History of the Mass."

CRUCIFIX, JANSENISTIC. Even in symbolic art Jansenism expressed its false doctrine. Jansenistic crucifixes are those in which the arms of our Lord are only partially extended, or thrown upwards, Jansenism teaching that Christ did not die for all, but only for the good.

DEO GRATIAS. At the conclusion of the Epistle in the Mass the server says and the choir sings "Deo gratias," Thanks be to God, as an evidence of the gratitude we owe God for the spiritual nourishment of His sacred words. It is also the response to the "Ite, missa est," and is said or sung after the Gospel of St. John. In ancient times it was one of the principal salutations among Christians when they met.

DIACONATE OR DEACONSHIP. The office or rank of a deacon, diaconus being the Latin for deacon.

DOM. A title applied to the Benedictine monks, as Dom Gueranger, etc. It is a contraction of dominus, first applied to the pope, latterly to bishops, and finally to monks of various orders. Benedictine nuns were similarly called Domna, whence the modern dame.

ECCLESIASTIC. A person holding any office in the sacred ministry of the Church (ecclesia).

GAUDETE SUNDAY. The third Sunday of Advent, so called from the first word of the Introit, Gaudete, "rejoice." On this day cardinals are required to wear pale-rose dresses.

INVOCABIT SUNDAY. The first Sunday of Lent, so called from the first word of the Introit.

LADY-DAY. The feast of the ANNUNCIATION (q. v.)

LAMMAS-DAY. This name applied to the feast of St. Peter in Chains, August 1, is by some supposed to be derived from an Anglo-Saxon word signifying "contribution." Brande says: "Some suppose it is called Lammas-day, quasi lamb-masse, because on that day the tenants that held lands of the Cathedral Church at York were bound by their tenure to bring a live lamb into the church at High Mass on that day." It seems rather to be from hlaef-messe, "loaf-Mass," the Saxons making offerings of loaves of new wheat on the feast.

LECTERN, LECTURN, OR LETTERN. The reading-desk, called also pulpitum or ambo (q. v.), but most frequently lectorum. It was made of wood, stone, or metal, often in the shape of an eagle, whose outspread wings formed the stand for the volume to rest upon.

LUNETTE. A circular crystal case, fitting into an aperture in the monstrance, in which the Blessed Sacrament is placed for exposition.

MADONNA [ITALIAN, "MY LADY"]. A name given to representations of the Blessed Virgin in art, and occasionally used as an invocation in devotions to her.

MAUNDY THURSDAY [ADDENDUM]. The name of Maundy, Maunday, or Mandate, is also supposed to be derived from the maunds, or baskets of gifts, which it was an ancient custom of Christians to present one to another, in token of the mutual affection which our Lord urged, and as a remembrancer of Christ's inestimable gift of His precious body and blood.

MINOR ORDERS. The inferior ranks of the sacred ministry—door-keepers, lectors, exorcists, and acolytes—are said to be in minor orders. In the Greek Church there are only two minor orders, lector and subdeacon. Originally, when a man became a clerk, he was irrevocably attached to the service of the Church (Con. Chalced., can. 7), but since the thirteenth century the Latin Church allows simple clerks, below the dignity of subdeacon, to quit the ecclesiastical profession if they so desire.

MONSTRANCE. From the Latin monstrare, "to show," the vessel in which the Blessed Sacrament is exposed at benediction or carried in procession. It has a large stem and base like a chalice, and the upper portion is generally fashioned to represent rays issuing from the host as a central sun. At first, and even now, it was constructed like the turrets in which the Blessed Sacrament was anciently exposed, and various other designs are employed. When Fénelon's quietism was condemned by the Holy See he had a splendid ostensorium made, the lower part of which represented angels trampling on bad books, one of which bore the title of Fénelon's own work, "Maxims of the Saints." The origin of the monstrance is traced back to the institution of the festival of Corpus Christi (q. v.) It is also called OSTENSORIUM, from the Latin ostendere, and often, incorrectly, Remonstrance.

NAVE. That portion of the Church reserved for the laity. Though the name is said to have been derived from the comparison of a church to a ship [See CHURCH], and the use of the corresponding words in French and other languages seem to justify this derivation, yet many make it to be from ναός, a temple. It was variously called oratorium laicii, ἐκκλησία, and quadratum populi. In English it was sometimes called nef.

OBLATE SISTERS [COLORED]. This order of colored nuns was founded on June 5, 1829, with the approval of Archbishop Whitfield, of Baltimore, by Father Joubert, a native of France, born in 1777 and emigrated with his family to San Domingo in 1801; he came to Baltimore in 1804 and joined the Sulpicians. To overcome a feeling of revenge occasioned by the murder of his parents by the negroes during the revolt in San Domingo, this pious Sulpician spent his fortune and the last years of his life in founding this community. On October 2, 1831, the order was approved of by Gregory XVI., who affiliated them to the Oblates of St. Francis of Rome. The first three members were natives of San Domingo. The object of the sisterhood is the spiritual and temporal welfare of the colored race. They endeavor to promote this especially by educating colored children and improving their morals. They keep orphans, if their means allow. They visit the sick also, as far as rules and time permit. The St. Louis branch was established October 12, 1880, by the Rev. Father Panken, S.J., with the approval of the Most Rev. P. R. Kenrick, Archbishop of St. Louis.

PARISH. In the fourth century priests were first given charge of particular districts. This was the beginning of the parochial system, which, however, does not obtain in the United States, where, strictly speaking, a "parish" is a "mission," and a "pastor" a "rector," and the bishop is the only parish priest. In countries where the canons of the Church in this matter are in full force the parish priest alone can administer the sacraments to his own flock; no other can lawfully administer them without permission. But any priest may be authorized by the Pope as supreme pastor, or the bishop of the diocese, who has the rights of a pastor in all parts of it, to administer sacraments independently of the parish priest. The regulars, in exercise of privileges given them by the Holy See, hear confessions and administer the Holy Eucharist in their churches; these privileges (St. Lig. lib. vi. n. 239, 240) do not extend to other sacraments or to the Eucharist in case of paschal communion or the Viaticum.

PREDELLA. The highest step of the sanctuary, on which the altar stands.

QUADRAGESIMA. [See LENT.]

QUARANTINE. A period of forty days. Indulgences of seven years and seven quarantines are often granted for certain devotions.

QUASIMODO. [See LOW SUNDAY.] It is of such importance that no other feast is allowed to be celebrated on that day.

QUATER TENSES. An old English name for the Ember Days (q. v.), and of the same significance as the Latin, French, and other names.

REGINA CŒLI. An anthem in honor of the Blessed Virgin beginning with these words, and after each of whose four clauses the Alleluia is repeated, which is said at the end of the offices of the Breviary during the Easter season. Pope Benedict XIV., confirming on April 20, 1742, the indulgences granted to the recitation of the "Angelus," ordered that the "Regina Cœli" with its verses and prayers should be said standing, instead, during the Paschal season. An ancient tradition relates that in the days of St. Gregory the Great a plague broke out in Rome. The Pope ordered all the people to march in procession, carrying the picture of the Blessed Virgin painted by St. Luke. As the crowds went towards St. Peter's and reached the bridge across the Tiber, a multitude of angels were seen above the picture singing the first three lines of the anthem. The Pontiff cried out, "Ora pro nobis Deum, Alleluia," completing the anthem, and the angel of the plague was seen sheathing his sword above Adrian's mausoleum, which thenceforth was known as the castle of Sant' Angelo.

REMINISCERE SUNDAY. The second Sunday of Lent, so named from the first word of the Introit.

RORATE SUNDAY. The fourth Sunday in Advent, named from the word Rorate, "rain down," with which the Mass begins. It is also called Canite tuba, the first words of the first response of matins.

SABAOTH. This word, retained in the Sanctus, is often confounded with Sabbath, but has an entirely different significance, being from tsâbâ, hosts. [See SANCTUS.]

SANCTUARY, THE RIGHT OF. This was a privilege attached to certain places whereby persons accused of crime who fled thither were temporarily protected from arrest or molestation and enabled to prepare for their defence. The Christian Church received the right of asylum as a heritage from the chosen people, who, from the earliest times, had their cities of refuge. The book of Deuteronomy records that "Moses set aside three cities beyond the Jordan at the east side, that any one might flee to them who should kill his neighbor unwillingly and was not his enemy a day or two before, and that he might escape to some one of these cities—Bosor in the wilderness, which is situate in the plains of the tribe of Ruben; and Ramoth in Galaad, which is in the tribe of Gad; and Golan in Basan, which is in the tribe of Manasses." This he did in accordance with the directions given him by God, as mentioned in the book of Numbers in these words: "But if by chance-medley, and without hatred and enmity, he do any of these things [strike another with iron, stone, wood, or his hand, and kill him], and this be proved in the hearing of the people, and the cause be debated between him that struck and the next of kin, the innocent shall be delivered from the hand of the revenger, and shall be brought back by sentence into the city to which he had fled, and he shall abide there until the death of the high-priest that is anointed with the holy oil. If the murderer be found without the limits of the cities that are appointed for the banished, and be struck by him that is the avenger of blood, he shall not be guilty that killed him, for the fugitive ought to have stayed in the city until the death of the high-priest; and after he is dead, then shall the manslayer return to his own country."

In a limited sense the right of sanctuary had place among the customs of the first Christians. They referred all the difficulties that arose among themselves to the rulers of the Church, and criminals who were in danger of detection and punishment rushed to the bishops for intercession with those whom they had wronged. This practice of begging the clergy to plead for mercy and to act as the guardians of the accused gradually became such a common and well-established custom that it claimed recognition from the civil power and regulation from canon law. It began to be publicly acknowledged as a right about the time of Constantine. The earliest statute extant concerning it was enacted in the year 392 in the reign of Theodosius; and this was put in the code, not as touching a novelty, but as giving form and limitations to a practice already long in vogue. That it had existed previously is evident from an incident related by St. Gregory of Nazianzen in his "Life of St. Basil," wherein he shielded a widow who had fled to the altar for refuge from the pursuit of the governor of Pontus. A similar circumstance is narrated by Paulinus in his biography of St. Ambrose, to the credit of that ornament of the episcopacy; and in one of the latter's epistles, written to Valentinian the Younger, he declined to turn over to the Arians a church in Milan, saying that he could not obey, but would rather suffer imprisonment or death, if his refusal must be punished, and that in this case he would not fly to the altar to save himself from the emperor's displeasure.

At first only the interiors of churches were sanctuaries. The altar especially was sacred; hence ancient writers frequently referred to it as ἄσυλος τράπεζα—the table from which no one could be taken away. But in the time of Theodosius the boundary of the refuges was enlarged and made to include all the surroundings of the church that were ecclesiastical property—the baptisteries, the dwellings of the clergy, the gardens, the cloisters, and the cemeteries, and also the statues of the emperors and the imperial standard in the camp; and, later on, schools, monasteries, hospitals, and crosses erected on the public highroads were privileged places.

The right of sanctuary was not intended to promote the commission of crime nor to protect the guilty from condign punishment. It was designed to save offenders from the infliction of private vengeance, to offer the innocent and the defenceless a shelter from the evil designs of powerful oppressors, to enable even the guilty to have the means to prepare for trial, and to afford the clergy opportunity to intercede for those delinquents whom they judged to be worthy of mercy.

The usual period of protection accorded to those who sought refuge in the sanctuaries was thirty days. In England, however, by a statute passed in the reign of King Alfred, only five days were allowed. While within the shelter of the altar the refugees were looked upon as the wards of the Church, which, even from the first, had in its legislation the germ of the principle that now obtains throughout the civilized world—that an accused party is to be supposed innocent until his guilt is proved; accordingly, if they were unable to provide for their own support, their wants were supplied by the bishop out of the revenues he possessed for the maintenance of the poor.

Like all human institutions, the right of sanctuary was liable to abuse, and malefactors of high as well as of low degree endeavored to avail themselves of its benefits and to pervert its purposes to save themselves from the consequences of their own misdeeds. Theodosius the Great put a check on one class of rogues by decreeing that public debtors should not enjoy the privilege of asylum, and that if the clergy concealed any man who had embezzled or squandered the funds of the state the bishop should be required to pay the full amount of money that had been misappropriated by the fugitive from justice. Baronius states that, in compliance with this enactment, St. Austin was held responsible for the defalcation of one Fastius, who had fled to the altar for protection, and that the prelate took up a collection in church to save him from torture and to satisfy his creditors. He had not the heart, he tells us himself in his 215th epistle, to see the poor man suffer according to the barbarous penalties of that age, especially as he had appealed to the Church to save him from the cruelties that were about to be inflicted upon him. In private cases, however, the right of refuge was permitted in order that insolvent debtors might have time to raise the money they owed or to arrange with their creditors to compound their obligations. Jews, however, and even those who professed to be converts, were allowed no favors in pecuniary transactions, although in all other cases they, too, had the right of asylum. Heretics and apostates were excluded from the advantages of the privilege. Slaves who fled from their owners were granted one day's rest and entertainment, after which notice of their whereabouts was sent to their masters, who could reclaim them on promise of forgiveness for their faults, provided these were venial.

Not long after Arcadius began to rule the empire the right of sanctuary was, at the solicitation of Eutropius, chief of the eunuchs, completely abolished. St. Chrysostom appealed to the emperor to revoke this decision, and the bishops of Africa sent a deputation to plead for its abrogation. Their intercession was efficacious—the right of sanctuary was restored within a year of its annulment. It is a striking commentary on the mutability of human affairs that, after the privilege was done away with, Eutropius was the first man to need it; for shortly afterwards he fell under the emperor's displeasure, and having nowhere to hide himself until the wrath of his liege had been appeased, and having no one to make supplication for him, he was ordered to be executed. Then did the magnanimity of Chrysostom display its might. He pleaded the cause of the disgraced favorite. In a glowing address he touched the hearts of the people and prevailed upon them not only to forgive the eunuch his trespasses against them in abridging their liberties, but also to carry their charity so far as to approach the imperial throne and petition Arcadius to spare his life. The emperor, moved to compassion, mitigated the sentence of condemnation from death to banishment for life.

One condition to the right of sanctuary was ordained by Theodosius the Younger—that no one should take weapons with him to the refuge, or, having them about him at the time of his flight, should refuse, at the request of the clergy, to lay them aside. To this condition two others were subsequently added—that the fugitives should go quietly to the asylums and not by outcries strive to raise a tumult, and that they should neither eat nor lodge within the churches. Justinian restricted the right of sanctuary, and excluded from its benefits murderers, adulterers, and violators of virgins. It mattered not who they were nor where they were found; they were to be apprehended without delay, and tried with the utmost expedition consistent with justice. Even if they had sought safety in an asylum and were on the very steps of the altar, they were to be seized; and if they offered resistance and could not be captured alive they were to be slain where they stood. This law forces into bold relief the true object of the right of sanctuary. It was not for the worst enemies of society, nor was it to screen the guilty from proper chastisement; it was primarily accepted as clearing the way for the exercise of works of mercy by the clergy and as offering a temporary place of security for the innocent, the helpless, and the injured.

The right of sanctuary had place wherever the Church obtained a foothold, until all over Christendom it was recognized and established. In the troublous days which ended with the Middle Ages, when might was too often right with our rude forefathers, when the law was for the strong against the weak, when villain and vassal had no claim which the feudal lordlings respected, when the virtue of virgins, prized above price, was in peril, when the clash of arms decided questions of law and of fact—in that age of iron the Church used the right of sanctuary to protect the poor, to uphold purity, to defend the guiltless, to brave the wicked in high places, and to obtain even for the most debased wretches a fair hearing and a just verdict. Almost imperceptibly, however, the right of sanctuary fell into disuse. It became a nuisance. It often took the clergy away from more important functions and kept them too much in affairs that had little to do with their mission. It impeded the course of justice. The wicked, wherever they could, perverted it to their own base designs. Notorious evil-doers sought protection through it, and influential rascals made it serve as absolution and satisfaction for crimes, even for those heinous offences with which it was expressly prohibited from dealing. Its restrictions were violated so far that Polydore Vergil could complain that everywhere, but especially in England, the asylums sheltered malefactors of the worst breed, even those guilty of treason and such like enormities. So finally, without any concerted action on the part of all the authorities concerned, but with the approval of popes and princes, the right of sanctuary became a thing of the past.

SEDILIA. The seats in the sanctuary occupied by the priest and his ministers.

SEE (sedes, seat). The place whence a bishop derives his title, and the whole extent of his jurisdiction.

SHROVETIDE. The three days following Quinquagesima Sunday. They are so named from the old Saxon shrive, "to go to confession," for English Catholics were thus wont to prepare for Lent. [See CARNIVAL.]

SPONSORS. "Sponsores," "Fidejussores," "Susceptores," or "Offerentes," mentioned by Tertullian, "Lib. de Bapt.," St. Basil, Epist. cxxviii., and by St. Augustine, are the persons who, according to the practice of the Church, assist at the solemn administration of baptism, to make profession of Christian faith in the name of the baptized. In later times they were called "Patrini"—in English "Godfathers" and "Godmothers." "Gossips" was the old Saxon name by which they were known. They assist at the baptism of adults, but the latter are required to answer the questions put to them by the priest. According to the decree of the Council of Trent, two sponsors at most are permitted—a male and a female (Sess. xxiv. "De Reform.") The sponsors in baptism contract a spiritual relationship to the person baptized which is an impediment to matrimony with that person; hence, not to widen the circle of this spiritual relationship, the number of sponsors is kept at two. According to St. Alphonsus, if a greater number be named the priest may permit them to be present, and even to touch the child, provided he designates from their number two who are the real sponsors. Theologians generally are satisfied that the person acting as sponsor should have been baptized and have attained the use of reason, being at least seven years old. A procurator may be deputed to act as sponsor for another; the sponsor or his deputy must physically hold or touch the child while it is receiving the sacrament, or take it, after baptism, from the hands of the priest. The Catechism of the Council of Trent quotes St. Augustine on the duties of sponsors: "They [the sponsors] ought to admonish them to observe chastity, love justice, cherish charity; and, above all, they should teach them the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, the Ten Commandments, and the first rudiments of the Christian religion" ("Serm. 163, De Temp.") "Theologians, however, commonly teach," says O'Kane, in "Notes on the Rubrics," "with St. Thomas, that sponsors are bound to fulfil these duties only when there is reason to think that they are neglected by the parents or others on whom they naturally devolve in the first instance; and hence, generally speaking, sponsors need have no anxiety about the discharge of these duties towards the children of Christian parents." A Protestant sponsor alone can not be admitted to act; but if one sponsor is a Catholic, the other might be permitted to act as a witness, or the priest, provided a heretic is presented as sponsor, may omit having a sponsor (Lacroix, l. c.) Members of the secular clergy, except when they are excluded by diocesan or provincial synods, may act as sponsors. Sponsors contract a spiritual relationship with the child baptized and its parents which is an impediment to marriage between the godfather and the child or its mother, and between the godmother and the child or its father. Such a marriage would be no marriage at all, unless a dispensation had been obtained; but no spiritual relationship is contracted between the sponsors, and consequently no impediment exists (Carrière, "De Matrimonio"). Sponsors, if admitted in private baptism, contract no impediment; but a baptism in a private house with all the ceremonies is not a private baptism, according to high authorities.

THEOLOGUS, OR THEOLOGAL [ADDENDUM]. Canon xviii. of the Third Council of the Lateran (1179) provided that each metropolitan church should have such an official to give free instruction. He was to have the revenues of a benefice, though not a canon, and could be removed at any time, if he did not give satisfaction. The Fourth Council of the Lateran (1215) extended the privilege to cathedral churches, and canons x. and xi. of that council laid down further regulations for the office.

THEOPHANY. 1. [See TRINITY.] 2. Another name for the Epiphany.

TRANSEPT. In architecture the part of a church which forms the short arms of the cross on which the plan is laid. It extends on the north and south side of the area between the nave and the choir.

TRUCE OF GOD (Lat. treuga Dei, or treua Dei, from German Treue, faith). An institution of the Middle Ages, designed to mitigate the violence of private war by prohibiting hostilities from Thursday evening to Sunday evening of each week, also during the entire season of Advent and Lent, and on certain festival days. Respect was shown to Thursday as the day of Christ's ascension; to Friday as that of His Passion; to Saturday because on that day He lay in the grave; and to Sunday because it was the day of His resurrection. The truce was first proposed in the Council of Charroux in 989. St. Odo, or Odon, sixth abbot of Cluni, and Blessed Richard, abbot of St. Vannes, did much to extend it among the Neustrians. A synod at Roussillon in 1027 ordered that it should be observed from the nones of Saturday to prime of Monday. After the great famine of 1028–30 the bishops of Aquitaine proclaimed a universal peace, but were unable to enforce it, and then limited it to certain days. The right of sanctuary was denied to violators of it. Soon the regulation spread all over France. In 1041 the bishops of Aquitaine ordered that no private feuds should be prosecuted from sunset on Wednesday to sunrise on the following Monday, and this the Council of Clermont extended to the time from Advent to the Epiphany, from Lent to the octave of Pentecost, and afterwards to the feasts and vigils of the Blessed Virgin, of St. John the Baptist, of Sts. Peter and Paul, and All Saints. In 1042 England and Italy adopted it. At the Council of Rheims in 1119 Calixtus II. renewed the truce of God for the abovenamed seasons, pronouncing excommunication against violators, and commanding that, unless they or their children made satisfaction, they should be deprived of Christian burial. The Second and Third Councils of Lateran (1139 and 1179) confirmed the truce, and gradually the necessity for it wore away.

TWELFTH DAY. Another name for the Epiphany, it being the twelfth day after Christmas.

APPENDIX D.

BAPTISTS. The Baptists reject infant baptism, and baptise only adults making a special profession of faith ("Hook's Church Dictionary"). Kenrick ("De Baptismo") thinks that there is no doubt about the validity of baptism as conferred by them. Having given this opinion, he says, "Rem sapientiorum judicio relinquimus." The practice now is to baptise conditionally converts from the various sects of Protestantism, "though inquiry should be made in each case, as is done in Rome, according to a decree of the Inquisition." Baptists, converted, are "to be baptised absolutely, unless they were baptised in adult age" (O'Kane on the Rubrics).

BEARD CLERICAL. In the earliest times the shaving of the hair on the face was considered effeminate (Clem. Al. "Pædagog." iii. 11), and the beard was worn by clergy and laity alike. Early, however, in the middle ages, ecclesiastics in the West shaved off the beard (Bede, "H. E." iv. 14), and this custom furnished Photius, in 867, with the ground for one of the reproaches which he made against the Latins. Pope Gregory VII. required the Archbishop of Cagliari and his clergy to shave, and from the twelfth century onwards, all through the middle ages, synods were constantly enforcing the rule, "Clerici barbam ne nutriant." In the middle of the sixteenth century the clerical beard again came into fashion, and the beard is seen on the portraits of the Popes from Paul III. to Innocent XII. Synods now simply required that the beard should not be too long. At the end of the seventeenth century fashion changed again, under French influence. And when some of the Bavarian priests began to wear the beard, Pius IX., in a brief dated 1863, commissioned the Nuncio at Munich to see that the bishops put a stop to the innovation. This rule, of course, does not apply to an order like that of the Capuchins, with whom the beard is no novelty. [Talhofer, in the new edition of the "Kirchenlexikon."]

CAMPANILE (Latin campana, a bell). Properly, a tower for bells; in its original sense it does not belong to the tower of the church containing bells, but to the detached towers for bells seen in Catholic countries, especially in Italy. A famous campanile is the leaning tower of Pisa; the Farisendi tower at Bologna is another.

CHINESE RITES. The Jesuit missionary St. Francis Xavier desired to preach the Gospel in China, but his wish was not fulfilled, and he died in the forty-fifth year of his age. A.D. 1552, on the little island of Sancian, close to the great empire which was the object of his longing. His religious brethren entered on the labour which he had left undone, and worked with great apparent success. Father Ricci's mathematical knowledge secured the favour of the Imperial Court. He devoted himself to the mission twenty-seven years (1582–1610), and left behind him 300 churches, one of which was in the capital, Pekin. A German Jesuit, Schall, who came on the field in 1622, was also a distinguished mathematician. Shortly afterwards a great change occurred in the fortunes of the Chinese mission. It had been left entirely in Jesuit hands; indeed, Gregory XIII. had in 1585 forbidden the members of other orders to enter China. But this restriction was removed, and in 1631 the first Dominican missionaries appeared, who were followed in 1633 by another Dominican, Morales, and by Franciscans. The new missionaries, and especially Morales, accused the Jesuits of gaining so-called converts by an unworthy compliance with Chinese idolatry and superstition; and the famous controversy on the Chinese rites began. We shall have occasion to enter upon the precise nature of the Jesuit concessions later. Here we content ourselves with stating the main contention as given by the Jesuit advocate Pray ("Hist. Controversiarum de Rit. Sinicis," p. 9 seq.). Ricci and his successors, Pray tells us, considered the offerings of food and the marks of homage given to the dead in general, and to Confucius the great Chinese philosopher in particular, as certainly free from idolatry, and probably even from superstition. Further, the Jesuits allowed their converts to use as the name of God the Chinese words signifying "Lord of Heaven," or "Lord of the Sky," or even the single word Tien—"sky" or "heaven," and they exhibited in their churches tablets with the inscription "King tien," "adore the sky." These were the practices known as the Chinese rites or usages.

In 1643 the Dominicans sent Morales to Rome, and he submitted to the Congregation of Propaganda seventeen propositions on the Chinese usages tolerated by the Jesuits. These usages, after consultation with theologians and the Roman Inquisition, were prohibited by Innocent X. till the Holy See should otherwise determine. Meanwhile, the Jesuit Martini tried to convince the authorities at Rome that the impugned customs had nothing to do with religion, and that the success of the Catholic Church in China depended on their being permitted. He obtained from the Inquisition a decree, confirmed in 1656 by Alexander VII. This edict allowed the practice of the Chinese rites, provided they possessed a merely civil character, were free from all admixture of idolatry, and could not be omitted without grave loss to the Chinese Christians. The complaints, however, were renewed by three Lazarists whom Alexander VII. had made vicars-apostolic, and Clement IX. in 1669 renewed the decrees of 1645 and 1656, with a significant addition in which the regulars were ordered to obey the vicars-apostolic. While these disputes were dividing the missionaries into two hostile camps, the Jesuits were rising in the favour of the Court, and in 1692 the emperor Khang Hi publicly announced that the Jesuits had full leave to preach, and his own subjects to embrace Christianity. Still the opposition of the other missionaries lasted. The Lazarist vicar apostolic forbade the rites in 1693, and sent a priest to Rome three years later to justify the step which had been taken. Innocent XII. died before the commission he had appointed had settled the question, but his successor Clement XI. took the matter vigorously in hand, and, desirous of full information, sent Tournon, patriarch of Antioch, to China as Apostolic legate in 1703. After examination of the points at issue, Tournon in 1707 condemned the Chinese rites as idolatrous, and in consequence of his evangelical courage was imprisoned by the Chinese emperor. It is a melancholy fact that the Portuguese at Macao were not ashamed to act as his gaolers, and there he died in 1710, after his elevation to the dignity of cardinal. The Jesuits and bishops who thought with them appealed against the legate's decision to Rome; but they found less favour there than at Pekin. Clement XI. confirmed decrees of the Inquisition (1709 and 1710) in accordance with Tournon's decision, and finally closed the question by the Bull "Ex illa die" (1715). Every Catholic missionary in China was required to promise on oath all possible resistance to the rites. It was in vain that a new legate, Mezzabarba, tried to modify Clement's ruling. The prohibition was renewed in all its force, the concessions of Mezzabarba recalled, and the oath again exacted by Benedict XIV.

We have abstained from set purpose from discussing the serious charges of rebellion against and cruelty to Cardinal Tournon which are made against the Jesuits. They are contained in the "Anecdotes sur l'état de la religion dans la Chine" (first volume, 1733), by Villermaules; in the "Memorie Storiche del Cardinale di Tournon" (Venice, 1761–2), prepared, as is commonly alleged, by that determined opponent of the Jesuits, Cardinal Passionei; and in the Lazarist "Memoirs of the Congregation of the Mission" (vol. iv.–viii.), collated with other authorities in the Vatican library by Father Theiner, but suppressed by Pius IX., and now an exceedingly rare book. The charges have often been repeated, e.g. by the Protestant historian Mosheim, and they are answered by Pray in the work mentioned above. The writer of this article does not possess the knowledge which would entitle him to an opinion, and what he has read on either side proceeds from writers too much inspired by party spirit to inspire confidence. But, after all, the conduct of the Jesuits to Tournon is not a question of theological moment. It affects the conduct of individuals, or at most of a religious order, but it has nothing to do with the great principles at stake. Fortunately these principles have been stated with Christian moderation and with rigid impartiality by the celebrated Dominican, Natalis Alexander. It is only right to compare his account with that of Pray, but we are confident that the result can only enhance the credit of Natalis Alexander. Besides this, a very clear and authoritative statement of the controversy will be found in the decree of the Roman Inquisition which bears date November 20, 1704, and is printed at length in the "Mémoires pour Rome sur l'état de la religion chrétienne dans la Chine" (1709; no place of publication given).

It is well known that Confucius, who lived about 600 years before Christ, was in no sense a religious teacher, or even a philosopher, if by that term we understand one who investigates the ultimate causes of things. He laid down rules of life based on utility, inculcated great respect for order and for public authority, and great reverence for ancestors, for ancient custom, for all, in short, which represented the traditions of Chinese civilisation. For the rest, he was content to let religion alone; and the ruling classes then, as now, were mostly atheistic, their atheism, however, being perfectly compatible with belief in fate, and in a quasi-immortality of the soul, so far as this, that the forces which constitute man's life were supposed to endure after death mingled with other powers of nature, and with a boundless toleration of popular superstition as a means of restraint suitable to the multitude. Now the Jesuits may have had some excuse for allowing the neophytes to call God the "Lord of Heaven," or even "Heaven," though apparently the Chinese literati used these terms in a pantheistic and materialistic sense. Even here they went to lengths manifestly dangerous and even reprehensible, and we cannot wonder that the Roman Inquisition refused to sanction the inscription "Adore the sky" as suitable for a Christian church. (See the second article in the questions proposed to the Inquisition.) But the worship of ancestors, and especially of Confucius, was far more scandalous. We will quote a description of this worship by a Jesuit Father, Le Comte, who took a prominent part in the dispute. "They prostrate themselves before the name of Confucius, before the name and the tomb of the ancestors. Offerings are made of food and vegetables. Incense is burnt. The duty is acknowledged of respect for the one (Confucius) and gratitude to the others (the ancestors). Such has been their immemorial practice; this is the essence of the rites. That, then, is good and laudable. What more do we want? We do not even ask so much, and we limit ourselves to that which is indispensably attached to the functions of public office" (Lettre du R. P. le Comte, p. 74; apud N. A. Lettre 1, p. 25). Even this is a very inadequate account. Confucius was venerated as the greatest of the sons of man (see decree of the Inquisition in 1704, super iv. artic.) He was addressed in these words: "All hasten to offer the sacrifices and prayers. . . . Let thy spirit come towards us" ("Apologie des Dominicains," append. pp. 37 and 211; apud N. A. Lettre 1, p. 41). Ancestors were worshipped according to a maxim of Confucius, as actually present, and they were invited to rest in their pictures. Even the atheistic Mandarins believed that the subtle air of the sky into which the souls of the dead had been dissolved were attracted to earth by sacrifice and the other rites, and devotion to ancestors was believed to ensure good luck.

The ruin of the Chinese mission is said to have followed the decision hostile to the "rites." But ruin was preferable to success, bought so dear. No one who has read St. Paul's First Epistle to the Corinthians can reasonably doubt what his decision would have been. Christ has no fellowship with idols, and the religion which is from above, as another great authority reminds us, is first "pure," then, and only then, "peaceable." CLASSICS. The word is used here to denote the great writers of Greece and Rome whose works have survived, and it is the object of this article to sketch the opinion held by Catholics concerning them as a means of Christian education.

I. The Patristic Period.—In the early days of the Church the pagan literature of Greece and Rome was, apart from the Bible, the one and only means of liberal instruction, and to renounce the study of the classics would have meant renouncing all culture and forfeiting every natural means of influencing the educated world. Christians showed no disposition to adopt such a course. St. Paul himself quotes Menander (1 Cor. xv. 33); in the Acts of the Apostles a line from Aratus and Cleanthes is cited, as part of St. Paul's speech at Athens (Acts xvii. 28); and in the Epistle to Titus (i. 12) the evil character of the Cretans is given in the words of "their own prophet," Epimenides, or perhaps Callimachus. Irenæus, though bred a Christian, was thoroughly familiar with Homer ("Adv. Hær." ix. 4), and Tertullian ("De Idol." 10), fanatic though he was, admits that it is absolutely necessary for Christian children to attend the heathen schools of grammar. Clement of Alexandria recognised the high importance, even from a theological point of view, of a classical education. He lays down the principle ("Strom." i. 5) that philosophy is useful for piety, and adds that the ἐγκύκλια μαθήματα, i.e. liberal education, of which classical study was a chief part, were the proper introduction to philosophy. His extant works abundantly testify to his high appreciation of the classics. Origen taught the classics personally at Alexandria (Euseb. "H. E." vi. 2). He himself had acquired this literary knowledge under his father, a zealous Christian, and afterwards a martyr.

The zeal with which classical literature was studied in the Church after Constantine's time is apparent from the fact that Julian the Apostate (361–363) thought it worth while, as a means of annoying the Christians, to forbid the study of the classics in the schools of the religion which he hated. The Church was determined not to allow classical study to fall into disuse. The Christian literature, called into existence as a makeshift, was soon forgotten after freedom of instruction was restored (Socrates, "H. E." iii. 16). In the East Gregory Nazianzen ("Or." 43, i. p. 777 in the Benedictine edition) and Basil ("De Leg. Libr. Gent." ed. Bened. ii. 173), in the West Jerome ("Ep." 59[1] ad Paulin.) and Augustine ("Doctrin. Christ." ii. 29 seq.), vindicated the claims of classical learning. There is abundant evidence that these enlightened theories were carried out in practice. For example, St. Fulgentius, when a boy, by the desire of his pious mother, learnt Homer and selections from Menander by heart (Bolland. Jan. i. 33), and at an earlier date St. Augustine ("Civ. Dei" i. 3) takes for granted that boys at school learn Virgil. At the same time there were persons, some even high in authority, who showed a jealousy of classical learning, especially when cultivated by the clergy. Gregory Nazianzen, in the passage quoted above, admits that most Christians had an unjust prejudice (οἱ πολλοὶ Χριστιανῶν . . . κακῶς ἐιδότες) against pagan learning (τὴν ἔξωθεν παίδευσιν), and St. Gregory the Great, in a letter to Desiderius, bishop in Gaul ("Ep." lib. xi. 54), says he has heard with horror that the bishop teaches literature ("grammaticam exponere"). Clearly, the Pope's objection was not merely to a bishop's employing himself in this way. "It cannot be," he says, "that the praises of Jupiter and Christ should proceed from the same mouth. Consider yourself how grievous and criminal a thing it is for a bishop to sing what would be unfit for a religious layman."[1]

II. The Monastic Schools.—In two ways the position of learning underwent a change after the fall of the Roman empire. During the Patristic period the whole of ancient literature was comprised in the classics, whereas the monks of the great Benedictine period were able to look back on a long line of Christian Fathers, on a literature represented by such names as Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, Gregory the Great. The pagan element had vanished from the face of Europe, or, where it remained, lingered only as a remnant, not of civilisation, but of barbarism. Hence the classics were no longer the one and only means of literary cultivation outside of the Bible; there were other writers whom the educated world was content to revere. Again, education was now in the hands of the monks, and there was a natural feeling that devotion to classical studies might interfere with their religious engagements. Certainly Mr. Maitland, in his fascinating work on the "Dark Ages," has collected a number of passages from monastic writers which depreciate classical study. Thus Alcuin, when a boy, is said to have vowed that he would no longer prefer Virgil to the melody of the Psalms (Maitland's "Dark Ages," p. 181). About the middle of the eleventh century the rigid St. Peter Damian blames monks who "go after the common herd of grammarians" and prefer the rule of Donatus to that of St. Benedict (ib. p. 184). "It grieves me," says the author of the famous "Gemma Animæ," perhaps about 1120, "when I consider in my mind the number of persons who, having lost their senses, are not ashamed to give their utmost labour to the abominable figments of the poets and the captious arguments of the philosophers. . . . Moreover," so this charitable and enlightened author proceeds, "how is the soul profited by the strife of Hector, or the argumentation of Plato, or the poems of Virgil, or the

[1] At least Jerome does so practically. He extols the classics as models of style, and quotes Cicero with high praise, besides Persius and Lucan.

[1] See, however, Neander, Kirchengeschichte, v. p. 192 seq., who shows that there are reasons for believing that Gregory's fixed judgment on classical literature was not so adverse as might appear from the quotation in the text. The story of his having the Palatine library "burnt" is an idle legend.

elegies of Ovid, who now, with their like, are gnashing their teeth in the prison of the infernal Babylon under the cruel tyranny of Pluto?" (ib. 185). It is plain, however, that these very denunciations witness to the zeal for classical study in the monastic period. Long before, Origen ("In Levit." Hom. VII. tom. ii. p. 227) had compared heathen literature to the beautiful captive whom the Hebrew might espouse after her head had been shaved and her nails pared; and this allegorical fancy, as Mr. Maitland himself allows, was the standing excuse among mediæval monks for indulgence in secular literature, and he gives an extract from the letter of an abbot, written about 1150, which treats the matter in a more reasonable and manly tone. "Nor can I bear," he writes, "that that noble genius, those splendid imaginations, such great beauties both of style and language, should be lost in oblivion" (ib. p. 175). But we can learn more from inquiring what the actual curriculum of the Benedictine schools really was, and to this question Cardinal Newman has furnished a full answer: "In the monastic school the language, of course, was Latin; and in Latin literature first came Virgil; next, Lucan and Statius; Terence, Sallust, Cicero; Horace, Persius, Juvenal. . . . Thus we find that the monks of St. Alban's, near Mayence, had standing lectures in Cicero, Virgil, and other authors. In the school of Paderborn there were lectures in Horace, Virgil, Statius, and Sallust. . . . Gerbert, afterwards Sylvester the Second, after lecturing his class in logic, brought it back again to Virgil, Statius, Terence, Juvenal, Persius, Horace, and Lucan. A work is extant of St. Hildebert's, supposed to be a school exercise; it is scarcely more than a cento of Cicero, Seneca, Horace, Juvenal, Persius, Terence, and other writers. Horace he must have known by heart" (Newman's "Historical Sketches," ii. p. 460). Nor were the lessons forgotten in maturer age. "Let us turn," says Cardinal Newman, "to the familiar correspondence of some of those most famous Benedictines, and we shall see what were the pursuits of their leisure and the indulgences of their recreation. Alcuin, in his letters to his friends, quotes Virgil again and again; he also quotes Horace, Terence, Pliny. . . . Lupus quotes Horace, Cicero, Suetonius, Virgil, and Martial. Gerbert quotes Virgil, Cicero, Horace, Terence, and Sallust. Petrus Cellensis quotes Horace, Seneca, and Terence. Hildebert quotes Virgil and Cicero. . . . Hincmar of Rheims quotes Horace. Paschasius Radbert's favourite authors were Cicero and Terence. Abbo of Fleury was especially familiar with Terence, Sallust, Virgil, and Horace; Peter the Venerable with Virgil and Horace. Hepidann of St. Gall took Sallust as a model of style" (ib. p. 464 seq.). In their correspondence the monks of that age were constantly begging the loan of classical manuscripts; they raise questions of grammar, and show "a loving curiosity about the nicety of languages." Their ignorance of Greek was their misfortune and not their fault, for they eagerly seized the rare opportunities of learning it. Thus Theodore of Tarsus became Archbishop of Canterbury in the seventh century, and taught it to the Anglo-Saxon youth (Bede, "H. E." iv. 2), while Rabanus Maurus is said to have learned it from Theophilus of Ephesus. As to Latin style of that period, it falls far short of the strict classical standard, but "it is good Latin both in structure and in idiom. At any rate, the change is wonderful when we pass from the Benedictine centuries to the Dominican which followed" (Newman, p. 470).

III. The Period of the Mediæval Universities—In the later middle ages, the period of the universities, 1150–1350, it seems to be admitted on all hands that classical study, though it did not wholly perish, languished and decayed. The old tradition was maintained by John of Salisbury and his disciple Peter of Blois (died about 1200). In the college of Navarre, founded at Paris in 1304, the classics, according to the testimony of Peter d'Ailly, were studied, and Gerson, educated there, shows a considerable acquaintance with the ancients. But the ruling passion was for dialectics or philosophy, not for grammar—i.e. literature. The ancients were valued for their matter, not for their style; and Aristotle, read in barbarous translations, ruled the schools. The faculty of arts was separated from that of grammar, and in 1456 the "grammarians" were excluded from the privileges of universities and the title of "regents."

Everyone knows the triumph which the scholars of the Renaissance obtained over the old Scholasticism, how the Greek Muses, driven from their ancient homes, found refuge in Italy, how the "new learning" brought new insight into antiquity, with a marvellous mastery of the Latin tongue, and how powerful it was for good and evil. All this does not concern us here, except so far as these new influences affected the Church. "In itself," says Cardinal Hergenröther ("Kirchengeschichte," ii. p. 172), "the new tendency was not hurtful to the Church or theology, but, on the contrary, beneficial. For that reason it was encouraged by Popes, bishops, and theologians." After the strife between the Humanists and theologians had broken out, the Church maintained the classical discipline in her schools; nay, the seventh rule of the Index promulgated by Pius IV. in 1564, after prohibiting licentious books, says of classical authors, even if of immoral character, "propter sermonis elegantiam et proprietatem permittuntur, nulla tamen ratione pueris prælegendi sunt." This implies à fortiori that these writings, when free from moral stain or when objectionable passages have been removed, are a valuable instrument of education. The Jesuits in their "Ratio Studiorum" adopted this principle, and attained brilliant success as teachers of the classics. The "Delphin Classics" and the "Gradus ad Parnassum" may be mentioned among books familiar to the Protestant school-boy thirty years ago which were due to the Society. Among works of a higher class we may mention the famous book of the Jesuit Viger, "De Præcipuis Græcæ Dictionis Idiotismis" (Paris, 1628). It appeared in numerous editions, it was perfected by the care of Dutch scholars, and the great Hermann edited it with annotations of his own. The study of the classics is still pursued at all the higher Catholic schools. In France, various provincial councils (e.g. that of Lyons in 1850) have recommended that the students for the priesthood in seminaries should read treatises of the Fathers as well as the heathen classics. The Abbé Gaume and Veuillot, then editor of the Paris "Univers," wished to exclude the study of the classics altogether. The cause of humane letters was defended by the celebrated Bishop Dupanloup; and when Veuillot, whose journal had been prohibited by the Archbishop of Paris, appealed to Rome, Pius IX., in an encyclical of 1853 to the French episcopate, expressed his wish that the youth should be trained in the knowledge of the best heathen as well as of the best Christian authors; the former, however, were to be expurgated, if necessary, for moral reasons. Some zealots, such as Father Ventura in his Lent discourses at the Tuileries for 1857, tried to maintain the war against the classics without contradicting the encyclical, but the controversy was virtually ended.[1] [On the whole history, Daniel, "Etudes Classiques"; Pohle's article in the new edition of the "Kirchenlexikon." COLUMBANUS, ST., RULE OF [see p. 3]. The "Regula Monachorum" of St. Columban († 615) was printed by Goldast from a St. Gall MS. in his "Paræneticí Veteres" (Insulæ, 1604). It consists of only fourteen short chapters. Though it speaks much of the beauty of moderation and discretion, and of the preservation of a mean between excess and defect, practically it prescribes a life of extreme austerity. The keynote is obedience to the abbot (capp. 1, 2, 3, 14); when a monk acts in obedience, even if what he does is open to censure, he cannot be blamed; while, if he act on his own responsibility, though he may take the right course, his indocility deprives him of all merit. Chapter 4 prescribes perpetual silence, except so far as speech is absolutely necessary. The one meal (cap. 5) is to be taken at even; it was to consist of common vegetables, pulse, dough, and a small twice-baked loaf ("cum parvo pane paxmate"). The true "mortificatio" of a monk (cap. 14) extended to his thoughts, his words, and his movements; he should be ready always to say to his superior, even when giving contrary orders, "Not as I will, but as thou wilt."

GILBERTINES. [See SEMPRINGHAM, ORDER OF.]

HOLY GHOST, CONGREGATION OF THE, AND OF THE I. H. OF MARY. This congregation, as its name might suggest, arose out of the fusion into one, in 1848, of two pre-existing institutes—the Congregation of the Holy Ghost, and the Missioners of the Immaculate Heart of Mary. The former was founded at Paris in 1703 by a poor Breton student, Claude Desplaces, who gave all he had, and all that he could obtain by begging, for the support of ecclesiastical students still poorer than himself, who after being carefully trained might carry the teaching of the cross into the neglected and poverty-stricken districts of France At one time he supported seventy such students. He consecrated his little society to the Holy Ghost under the protection of the Immaculate Virgin Mary. Desplaces died in 1709 in his thirtieth year; his work, however, survived him and prospered. Ever dutiful to the Holy See, on which account they incurred the ill-will of the Jansenists, the fathers of the congregation passed through the fiery trial of the Revolution without having a single defection to deplore, and after having given several to the roll of its martyrs. Finally, in 1823, they were allowed to buy back their confiscated seminary in the Rue l'Homond. After 1835 they undertook, with the approbation of the Holy See, the formation and direction of the clergy of the French colonies. But the task was too heavy; the congregation had not then sufficient resources, either in men or money, to discharge it adequately. In 1845 they had sent most of their best men to the colonies, and the number that remained at home was alarmingly small.

Meantime a holy and beautiful thought, ripened gradually into a purpose, a work, a manner of life, had directed a few powerful and resolute souls into a course nearly parallel to that of the congregation. In 1839 two fervent students at Saint Sulpice, one from the Isle Bourbon, the other a Haytian, felt themselves strongly moved about the same time to labour that the Gospel might be carried to the teeming negro population of their native islands. Each, unknown to the other, recommended the design to the prayers of the great arch-confraternity of the Immaculate Heart of Mary, then in the rush of its early fervour under its saintly director the Abbé Desgenettes. They also sought counsel from a former fellow-student, a Jewish convert from Alsace, poor, disowned by his family, and subject to epilepsy, so that it was thought he could never become a priest, but the force, depth, and purity of whose character had profoundly influenced all the Sulpicians of his standing. This was Francis Mary Paul Libermann.[1] Baptised in 1826, he had since then "passed through all the degrees of prayer and suffering,"[2] and was regarded by the numerous clergy and others who consulted him as a man of God, eminently enlightened by the Holy Spirit. Libermann thought over the design which the two students had imparted to him, and before long he formed the conclusion that he himself too was called to labour for the salvation of the blacks. He made his way to Rome, living by alms, and after many months of prayer and study laid a memorial before the College of Propaganda on the subject of the proposed mission. He soon received a favourable reply, with the expression of a hope that his health might ultimately be so far restored as to admit of his being ordained priest. He went to the shrine of Loretto; there after a time he saw his way clearly, the malady by which he had been afflicted left him, and he prepared to receive holy orders. Returning to France, he was ordained subdeacon and deacon (1841) by the Bishop of Strasburg, and in the same year founded the novitiate of the new congregation (which was to be styled "of the Immaculate Heart of Mary") at La Neuville, near Amiens. A few days before the foundation he had been ordained priest. His first associates were M. le Vavasseur (one of the two originators of the design) and another Sulpician, M. Collin. Gradually they and their ideas became known; at the end of three years the congregation numbered from twenty to twenty-five members. Before 1848 Père Libermann had sent missionaries to Bourbon, Hayti, the Mauritius, Senegambia, Guinea, and Cayenne. In that year, it having been long observed that the aims of the two societies were to a great extent similar, a fusion was effected between the congregation of Libermann and that of the Fathers of the Holy Ghost, whose superior, Father Monet, had seen the missioners of the other society at work in Bourbon. The rule of the Congregation of the Holy Ghost (which had been lately approved at Rome) was to be retained, and the constitutions of the missionaries (which Libermann, after many vain attempts to frame them, is said to have drawn up with ease after he had consecrated his work to the Immaculate Heart) were for the most part incorporated in it.

The Père Libermann, the first superior of the united congregation, died in 1852. A process has been commenced for his canonisation, and he was declared "Venerable" in 1875, no other Jewish convert having ever been so distinguished.

Under the three successors of the Ven. Libermann, FF. Schwindenhammer, Le Vavasseur, and Emonet, the work has been carried actively on, and is "visibly blest by heaven."[1] In 1884 it had about eighty houses, of which fifteen were in Europe, fourteen in America and the West Indies, and more than forty in Africa and the islands adjacent, with about thirteen hundred members. The constitutions, as finally settled at a general chapter held in 1875, have been approved at Rome without change or addition. "The society . . . is governed by a superior general elected for life. Its missions are directed by bishops or vicars apostolic chosen from its own body. All the members—fathers and brothers—consecrate themselves to God by the three simple vows of religion, at first temporary, afterwards perpetual; and they bind themselves to the congregation by their act of profession, which contains an engagement of perseverance. Besides the professed members there are the oblates, who, from the age of fourteen, after a trial of at least six months, are received into the congregation as its children, are clothed with its habit, and take the engagement to persevere till their profession." The novitiate is ordinarily for two years. "The congregation always pursues as its main and direct object, after the perfection of its members, the evangelisation of the blacks, especially of the blacks in Africa itself."[1]

Indirectly the congregation pursues the same end by founding institutions primarily devoted to different objects. A house at Rome being found to be necessary, they established there a French seminary, canonically erected in 1853, which has been treated with remarkable favour both by Pius IX. and by the reigning Pontiff. Again, it was thought desirable to encourage vocations in Ireland, and as a means to this end two colleges for secondary education have been established by the congregation, at Blackrock and Rockwell (near Cashel), and have achieved in a few years, owing to the skill and ability with which they have been conducted, an extraordinary success. The Irish houses were founded by F. Leman, whose name is loved and honoured wherever an alumnus (and they now amount to thousands) of one of the "French colleges" is found in any part of the world.[2]

IRREGULARITY is defined as a "canonical impediment, which prevents a person from entering the ranks of the clergy, from rising to a higher order, or from exercising the order which he has received" (Gury). The term "irregular," according to the eminent canonist Phillips, first occurs in the decretals of Innocent III. An "irregularis" is one who does not fulfil the "rules" imposed upon, or the requirements which the Church makes of, those who seek to be tonsured or ordained. The same Pope distinguishes between the "nota defectus" and the "nota delicti," and this is the basis of the division of irregularities which still prevails among canonists and theologians, viz., into such as proceed from defect (ex defectu) and from crime (ex delicto). This arrangement is a convenient one, but it is not strictly scientific. In reality irregularity is always "ex defectu." It is not a penalty, and so is quite distinct from censure, deposition, or degradation. It may arise, no doubt, from crime, but only indirectly—so far, that is to say, as crime constitutes a defect in the reputation which is desirable in a clergyman. Hence repentance, sacramental absolution, and amendment do not in themselves remove the irregularity "ex delicto." We observe before going further that, though the term "irregular" is of mediæval origin, the idea is ancient. From early times "bigamy" (in a sense to be explained presently), bodily defects, ignorance, recent reception of baptism, military service, servile condition or entanglement in worldly business, and crimes which subjected a man to public penance, have been regarded as impediments to ordination.

I Irregularities ex Defectu.

(1) Ex Defectu Animi.—Lunatics, &c., are irregular, so are persons without sufficient knowledge. Ignorance is mentioned as a bar to ordination by Popes Hilary (Ep. 2, Mansi, tom. vii. 928), and Gregory the Great (Ep. lib. ii. 37). The Council of Trent (Sess. xxiii. De Ref.) requires for the tonsure ability to read and write, with elementary religious knowledge; for minor orders acquaintance with Latin; further instruction in letters and ability to fulfil their respective duties is exacted from those who desire to be subdeacons and deacons, while a priest must have proved himself on examination fit to instruct the people, administer the sacraments, &c. Provincial synods are to provide a careful form of examination and inquiry into the knowledge and other qualities of one who is to be consecrated bishop (Sess. xxiv. De Ref. c. 1). Neophytes are excluded from ordination. This defect, called "defectus fidei confirmatæ," is recognised by Pope Siricius (Mansi, iii. 669), and has its justification in 1 Tim. iii. 6.

(2) Ex Defectu Corporis.—Which may arise either from some horrible mutilation or the like, which might cause horror in the people, or else from the want of some sense, member, &c., necessary for the performance of clerical duty. Thus one who has lost his left eye, called the "eye of the canon," because chiefly used in reading the canon of the Mass, cannot receive the priesthood. Bodily mutilation is mentioned in this connection by Popes Hilary and Gregory (Ep. 2, Mansi, vii. 928, "in qualibet corporis parte vitiatum," Ep. lib. ii. 37). The prescriptions of the old law seem to have weighed here.

(3) Ex Defectu Natalium.—Which excludes children born out of wedlock, unless their parents have subsequently married, or unless the illegitimate person has made his profession in a religious order. Otherwise the bishop may dispense for minor orders, the dispensation for Holy Orders being reserved to the Pope, and a fresh dispensation being needed in case of promotion to the episcopate. This impediment, Phillips says, was not distinctly recognised till the eleventh century. It arose partly because in the German nations illegitimate children were without civil rights, partly because the prevalence of clerical concubinage and the frequent promotion of priests' sons to their fathers' office threatened to bring the spirit of caste into the clerical ranks. As early, however, as A.D. 845, we find a Council of Meaux (Can. 64, Mansi, xiv. 834) prohibiting the ordination of children born before marriage to "raptores virginum aut viduarum."

(4) Ex Defectu Ætatis.—The older rule admitted very young people to the minor orders, of which then the subdiaconate was one, but the diaconate was reserved for the thirtieth, the priesthood for the thirty-fifth, and the episcopate for the completion of the fortieth year. The decretals prescribe for the tonsure the seventh year complete, for the subdiaconate the eighteenth year, for the diaconate the twentieth, for the priesthood the twenty-fifth year begun, for the episcopate the thirtieth year complete. The Council of Trent (Sess. xxiii. De Ref.) has partially altered these rules, requiring for the subdiaconate the twenty-second, for the diaconate the twenty-third begun.

(5) Ex Defectu Libertatis.—Pope Leo I. (Ep. 4) excludes slaves, and generally those under the power of others, and Innocent I. (Ep. 2, Mansi, iii. 1035)—"curiales vel quibuslibet functionibus publicis occupatos." These rules still subsist, and married persons are also excluded, at least from Holy Orders, unless they obtain their wife's consent, and she, if young, enters religion (Gury).

(6) Ex Defectu Sacramenti.—This irregularity affects those who have been married twice, or, having married once, were wedded to one who was not a virgin. The former part of the rule is found, as many think, in 1 Tim. iii. 2; Tit. i. 6, and certainly obtained in the Church at a very early date (see, e.g., Tertull. "De Monog." 12). The second part of the rule was in force from the fourth century (see Ep. Siric. Mansi, iii. 670; Innocent I. Ep. 2, Mansi, iii. 1034; Hilary, Ep. 2, Mansi, iii. 928; Gregory, Ep. lib. ii. 37). The canon law extends the prohibition to one who has continued to live with an adulterous wife, or has gone through the form of marriage after religious profession or the subdiaconate. All such unions fail in the "sacramentum" or mystical resemblance to Christ's perfect union with his Church.

(7) Ex Defectu Lenitatis.—The early Church (see, e.g., Siric. Mansi, iii. 668) would not allow soldiers to be ordained, and the canons forbid the ordination of any who, although justly, have concurred "willingly, actively, efficaciously, and proximately" to the death or mutilation of another by an action tending in its own nature to that end.

(8) Ex Defectu Famæ.—This applies to persons notoriously guilty of some enormous crime, to those who are well known to have committed a crime stigmatised as infamous by the law, to those who have been sentenced in a public court, even if they are innocent. Infamy which simply comes of notorious crime, without any judicial sentence, may cease of itself without the need of any dispensation. When a court has passed sentence, the sentence may be reversed, and the consequent irregularity disappear.

II. Ex Delicto.—It was a constant principle of the ancient Church not to admit persons who had been under or had become liable to public penance to orders (see, e.g., August. Ep. 185, § 45; the ancient collection known as "Concil. Carthag. IV." Mansi, iii. 1046; "Greg. Magn. Ep. lib. ii. 37; Isidor. "Eccl. Offic." ii. 9). The modern law, after the disuse of the penitential system, limited irregularity ex delicto to the following cases: (1) The reception of baptism without necessity by an adult from a declared heretic; reiteration of baptism with solemn rite; receiving baptism in such circumstances; assistance thereat by a cleric. (2) Pretending solemnly to exercise a holy order never received; receiving orders in various unlawful ways —e.g. by stealth, from the bishop of another diocese without dimissorials, from a suspended, schismatical, simoniacal, or heretical bishop; receiving more than one holy order on the same day. (3) Solemnly exercising an order while bound by a censure. (4) Crime—i.e. the special crimes of public heresy and apostasy from the faith. The sons of heretics are also irregular. (5) Murder and mutilation.

III. Dispensation.—Certain irregularities—e.g. total blindness, hopeless lunacy, &c.—cannot be removed. Others—such as the defect of age and infamy (see above)—may cease of themselves. For the rest the rule is that all irregularities which flow from any secret crime except murder may be removed by the bishop or by the prelates in a religious order. The Pope only and his delegates can remove those ex defectu or ex homicidio. The exceptions to these rules have been noted above.

LAMMAS DAY. [See the end of the article on PETER'S CHAINS.] It appears that the precise origin of the term was, "the blessed bread which is hallowed on Lammas Day"; see "Anglo-Saxon Dict." Bosworth and Toller. The erroneous explanation in the "Promptorium Parvulorum," "festum agnorum," seems to have had something to do with, or perhaps is only the exponent of, the popular notion that not "loaf" but "lamb" was at the root of the word.

LORETTO NUNS. The founder of this order, Mrs. Mary Teresa Ball, an Irish lady, took for her pattern the rule and customs of the Institute of the B.V.M. (see that article), in the York house of which community she had been trained to regular discipline during seven years, and made herself fully acquainted with the excellent system of female education there practised. Returning to Ireland, and supported by the approbation of Archbishop Murray, Mrs. Ball purchased a large mansion at Rathfarnham, near Dublin, and, in November, 1822, "commenced the institution which has since become so well known, and so deservedly celebrated, as the convent of 'Our Lady of Loretto.'"[1] There are at present (1884) sixteen other convents of Loretto nuns in Ireland.[2] In 1841 a colony of eleven sisters went to India, and, with the aid of Archbishop Carew, established themselves in Calcutta, whence they have sent out several branches. In 1845 the order was introduced into the Mauritius, and two years afterwards a colony of nuns was planted at Toronto in Upper Canada, whence they have spread to several other places. MARIST BROTHERS.—This is a teaching confraternity, founded by a Marist father, which has seven schools in England (at Peckham, Jarrow, and five localities in London) and four in Scotland (Edinburgh, Glasgow, Dundee, and Dumfries).

MARIST FATHERS.[1]—I. Origin.—This religious order, much as it has been blessed by God's merciful providence, does not yet count very many years of existence. It was founded early in the present century by a humble and zealous priest, the Very Reverend Father Colin, who was born on the 7th of August, 1790, in the diocese of Lyons.

From childhood he cherished the thought of the society which he felt himself called to found. It was, as he afterwards said, "the idea and desire of his whole life"; and he had scarcely entered upon the sacred ministry, as assistant priest to his own brother, in 1816, when he persuaded him and a few others to unite with him in the pious work.

When he had traced the first sketch of his rule, full of confidence in his mission, he wrote to Pius VII. a letter, which concluded with these words: "Such are our plans, as laid down for us in constitutions, which we have not drawn from any book or rule. We hope to submit them personally to your Holiness, and to make you fully acquainted with the source whence we derive them." Pius VII. replied to this letter by a Brief, dated the 9th of March, 1828, expressive of his approval. Encouraged to pursue his designs, the young founder increased the number of his associates, and in 1829 the rising society, at the request of the Bishop of Belley, took charge of the ecclesiastical seminary of that town, thus uniting the work of education to that of preaching missions, already carried out with much fruit.

About 1835 the attention of the Holy See was seriously turned to the distant missions of the South Sea Islands, a field much in need of labourers. Cardinal Franzoni wrote to the council of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, at Lyons, inquiring whether there could not be found in France some priests to undertake the glorious task of preaching the gospel in Western Oceania. The Marists readily embraced the proposal when made to them. Then Pope Gregory XVI., to encourage and fortify the new apostles, signed, on the 29th of April, 1836, the brief Omnium Gentium, which approved the "Society of Mary" under the very same name which it had from the beginning. The founder of the society was canonically elected its Superior-General on the 24th of September of the same year; but this office never ceased to be a cause of alarm to his humility, and in 1854 he begged leave to resign his charge, that he might in solitude apply himself to the completion of the rule. For eighteen years longer he consulted, meditated, and prayed. It was then that his children, several times reassembled around him, were able to appreciate his genius and virtue. After the general chapter of 1872 he considered the work complete. This rule, the matured result of so much time and care, now required only the confirmation of the Vicar of Jesus Christ, and this final sanction Pius IX., the Pontiff of the Immaculate Conception, gave on the 28th of February, 1873. Then, relieved of all care, the venerable founder prayed God to let him depart in peace.

The Very Reverend Father Colin died at Notre Dame de la Neylière (Rhône) on the 15th of November, 1875, at the age of eighty-five.

II.—Progress of the Society.—Before his death he had the consolation of seeing that God had blessed his work. In France the Society of Mary, of which the mother-house is at Lyons, was already divided into two provinces. The province of Lyons contains:—two houses of formation; a novitiate and scholasticate; two great seminaries; five missionary houses; three houses of retreat for the aged or infirm religious, and five colleges for intermediate education—Aubenat, St. Chamond, Riom, Toulon, and La Seyne-sur-Mer. In the latter there are preparatory courses for the military college of St. Cyr and the naval school.

The province of Paris, besides the novitiate and scholasticate, embraces the great seminaries of St. Brieux and Agen, the colleges of St. Vincent of Senlis and Montluçon, and seven missionary houses.

From the beginning the Society of Mary devoted itself to the foreign missions. The Congregation of the Propaganda entrusted to it the spreading of the faith in Western Oceania, where no Catholic priest had yet penetrated, and where all the savage tribes, scattered over a great number of islands, had been, or actually were, cannibals. The first departure of missionaries took place in December, 1836. Father Bataillon was the first to land, in the island of Wallis. In the course of four years of preaching, amid dangers and fatigues, he succeeded in converting the whole island, and since then the Catholic faith has reproduced among that savage people the marvels related of the missions of Paraguay and the first ages of Christianity. Father Bataillon became first Vicar-Apostolic of Central Oceania, and died in his much-loved island of Wallis on the 11th of March, 1877, after forty years of missionary labours. Another of the first band was Father Chanel, who was placed at Futuna, an island inhabited by cannibals of the worst type. The preaching and example of the missionary proved alike ineffectual; the conversion of this people demanded the blood of a martyr. Father Chanel fell a victim to their hatred of the faith on the 28th of April, 1841. Almost instantaneously the whole island, moved by Divine grace, embraced the Catholic faith. Dr. Epalle, at first missionary in New Zealand, and afterwards named Vicar of Melanesia and Micronesia, was not spared to display his zeal in the new field assigned to him by the Holy See. He was massacred on the island of Isabella by the savage tribes to whom he was carrying the gospel of peace. In this same Vicariate Apostolic several Marist missionaries have fallen victims to the cannibals.

Dr. Douarre, bishop of Amata, started for another Vicariate Apostolic in New Caledonia. This archipelago was occupied by tribes engaged in constant warfare with one another, prompted by their appetite for human flesh. The courageous apostle, undaunted by the dangers, made an attempt to carry out his object, but failed. A missionary was killed, and the establishment completely destroyed. Obliged to quit the unfriendly land, the missionaries left, but with the intention of coming back; and at a later period they did return, to recommence and pursue the work of civilisation and the salvation of souls.

In Australia the Marist Fathers have three houses, one in Sydney and two others in the neighborhood.

In New Zealand Marist missionaries were the first to announce the true faith to the Maoris. Afterwards, when this extensive country became an English colony, the Marist Fathers, who had founded all the stations, first of the diocese of Auckland, and then of the diocese of Dunedin, turned their attention exclusively to the diocese of Wellington. The clergy of this diocese, as large as the two others combined, are almost all Marists.

In the Vicariate Apostolic of Central Oceania, except at Wallis and Futuna, the fathers have to contend with the established influence of Protestantism. Notwithstanding, however, all the resources of its adversaries, Catholicity gains ground. Its progress must be ascribed to the self-sacrificing spirit of the missionaries.

The archipelago of the Navigators' I., formed into a Vicariate Apostolic in 1851, was confided to another Marist, Dr. Elloy, of cherished memory, a true apostle. At Samoa he endeared himself to all, even the Protestants, who frequently chose him to settle their disputes.

The archipelago of Fiji, which forms a pro-Vicariate Apostolic, has been in the hands of the society since 1844. The sufferings undergone by the fathers among this barbarous population are incredible. Never was there a mission more beset with difficulties, more fruitful in sufferings, and more barren, at least apparently, of results. At last, however, God begins to bless this zealous perseverance ; from day to day the movement in favour of Catholicism becomes more and more pronounced.

In New Caledonia the clergy of the French colony are all members of the society. The fathers have charge of the penal settlements, and also continue to spread the faith among the natives.

In the British Isles and the United States the establishments of the society are numerous. In London it has charge of two missions, that of St. Anne's and that of Notre Dame de France (for the French residents). There is a novitiate at Paignton, near Torquay ; the fathers have also charge of the mission. In Dublin the society has a scholasticate and a day-school, and a college at Dundalk (co. Louth).

In the United States it has charge of four important missions, and the flourishing college of Jefferson, on the left bank of the Mississippi, above New Orleans.

To conclude, the Society of Mary, in virtue of an Apostolic brief, bearing date the 8th of September, 1850, established a third order, for pious persons living in the world. The number of members already affiliated to its different fraternities is considerable.

III.—A sketch of the Constitution of the society will comprise the four heads which follow:

1. Object of the Institution.—According to the constitutions, finally approved by the Holy See in 1873, the members of the Society of Mary unite the active with the contemplative life; and the name they bear sufficiently tells under whose banner and patronage, and in what spirit, they strive to attain the two-fold object of their own and their neighbours' sanctification. The works of zeal, which refer to the latter, are the training of youths in colleges and ecclesiastical seminaries, the home and foreign missions, and preaching, with the other functions of the sacred ministry in the places of residence.

2. Admission and Obligations.—After twelve or eighteen months' novitiate the candidate is received into the Society of Mary by making the three simple and perpetual vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. In accordance with the discipline of modern religious orders, the vow of poverty does not deprive the subject of the right to possess, but merely of the free and independent use of property. The Marists are recommended to follow a simple and unostentatious mode of life, distinguished in nothing exteriorly from that followed by pious and modest priests of the country wherein they live.

By the vow of obedience they undertake to execute all orders of their superiors which are consistent with the object and spirit of the constitutions. Ten years after their entrance, when not less than thirty-five years of age, the Marist Fathers go through a second novitiate, and make the vow of stability in the congregation. The Society of Mary is a society of priests, yet it receives some lay brothers to fulfil household duties.

3. Studies.—The constitutions prescribe two years of philosophy and four years of theology. A more extensive course (six years) of theological study is granted to those who show a special aptitude.

4. Administration.—The Society of Mary is governed by a Superior-General, elected for life, aided by a council of four assistants, appointed by the general chapter each time it assembles. The general chapter assembles regularly every seven years, and consists of members elected by the provincial chapter.

From its infancy this society has been baptised in the blood of martyrs ; and now, breathing the spirit of its founder, and inspired by the example of its first fathers, it continues, without show, but zealously and devotedly, to pursue its apostolic career throughout the world, having no other object than labour, under the standard of the Blessed Virgin, for the glory of God and the salvation of souls.

MARIST NUNS. These religious, whose institute was initiated by the Père Colin (see preceding art.), have houses at Peckham and Richmond, in the diocese of Southwark.

MARIST SISTERS. This also is a teaching institute ; it has a school in Spitalfields, under the superintendence of the Marist Fathers there.

PASSIONISTS. Through the kindness of one of the religious of Mount Argus, the Passionist retreat near Dublin, we are enabled to make the following corrections in and additions to the article in the body of the work.

The dress of the religious would be more accurately described as follows : It resembles that worn by regular clerks ; to the left side of the tunic, and also on the mantle, is sewn a heart, with the words "Jesu Christi Passio," and a cross above it ; a black leathern girdle is worn round the waist, from which hangs a rosary with a small brass cross at the end of it.

When the Passionists first came to England, their provincial here was not Father Spencer, but Father Dominic of the Mother of God, the same who received into the Church Dr. (now Cardinal) Newman and many of his followers. Father Ignatius (Hon. George Spencer) was one of the first who entered the novitiate of the Passionists in England.

St. Paul of the Cross was canonised by Pius IX. on June 29, 1867.

Benedict XIV. confirmed the institute in 1741, and the rules in 1746, and appointed St. Paul general of the congregation. Clement XIV. again confirmed both rules and institute in 1769.

At his death St. Paul left twelve flourishing retreats, and a convent of Passionist nuns at Corneto.

The first superior of the retreat at Mount Argus, Dublin, was the Very Rev. Father Paul Mary of St. Michael (Hon. C. R. Pakenham), who died at his post in 1857.

The Passionists have at present (1885) eight houses in their Anglo-Hibernian province. Four of these are in England, at Broadway (where is the novitiate), Harborne near Birmingham, Highgate (London), and Sutton near St. Helen's. The Irish and Scotch houses are those named in the body of the work (p 638). The eighth house is in the Avenue Hoche, Paris ; it was designed for the benefit of the English-speaking community at the French capital. At Highgate they have a school of theology, and one of philosophy at Sutton; classics and general literature are taught at Mount Argus. In all three cases only those are admitted as pupils who intend to become Passionists. In Rome they have a college at the Scala Santa, which was built and presented to them by the late Pope ; it was designed for the benefit of English, Irish, Franco-Belgian, and American students, the most talented among whom are selected for admission, and here complete their studies in theology and Canon Law.

The whole order comprises nine provinces, of which three are in Italy, one in France, one in England and Ireland, one in America, one in Spain, one in Mexico and Buenos Ayres, and one in Bulgaria and Wallachia. This last province is governed by a Passionist bishop, under the jurisdiction of the Propaganda. Altogether there are 59 houses, and between 800 and 900 religious.

A general chapter is held (ordinarily at Rome) every six years for the election of a new father-general and other officers. Provincial chapters, for the election of new provincials and new rectors in the several retreats, are held once in three years.

PERPETUAL ADORATION OF THE BLESSED SACRAMENT. In very ancient times perpetual adoration of God by psalm and prayer was maintained by communities of monks, e.g. by the ἀκοίμητοι in the East, and in the monasteries of Agaunum, founded by King Sigismund in 522, by the monks of Habendum in Lorraine, St. Denis and St. Germain in Paris, of Corbie, Dijon, St. Martin in Tours, St. Médard, St Mary in Soissons, &c. Abbot Augilbert of St. Riquier in Picardy, who died in 814, left special directions for this perpetual adoration. When it died out in Gaul, and whether it ever spread into other lands, is not known (Falle, Ew. Anbet. im Mittelalter, in the "Katholik" for 1868, ii. 228–32).

It was in France also that the perpetual adoration of the Eucharist began. Anne of Austria asked her confessor, M. Picotté, a priest of St. Sulpice, to make a vow in her name to God for the deliverance of France from the scourge of war. M. Picotté resolved to found a convent of nuns for the perpetual adoration of the Blessed Sacrament, and chose Mother Mechtilde of the Holy Sacrament to carry out his intention. She was born in 1614, at St. Dié in Lorraine, and was known in the world as Catherine de Bar. She became a nun of the order of the Annunciation, and afterwards, when her community had been scattered by war, she was a nun and then an abbess in the order of St. Benedict. The troubles of the time had driven her from place to place. She was at Paris at the time when M. Picotté was seeking to found his convent, and having ever since her fourteenth year intended to devote her life to the honour of the Blessed Sacrament, she entered readily into the priest's design. A little house was bought in the Rue Féron, and here Mother Mechtilde with her sisters began the perpetual adoration on March 25, 1654. The sisters observe the primitive rule of St. Benedict in all its rigour. One or more of them is always kneeling before the altar, and on Fridays a sister kneels there with a rope round her neck and a lighted torch in her hand from prime to vespers, to do penance for sinners. The feast of the Annunciation is observed by them as the feast of their foundation. Special constitutions were added to the Benedictine rule. These were examined at Rome, amended, done into Latin, and printed by the Camera Apostolica in 1705. Soon new houses were founded and old Benedictine convents incorporated. At present the order has fifteen houses in France, one in Alsace, one in Poland, four in Holland, all of which last are occupied by exiled nuns from Germany.

A similar order is that of the Monachette del Corpus Domini, founded in the Papal States by Hyacintha of Bossi in 1683. The nuns are tertiaries of St. Dominic.

In 1701 the Abbess of the Convent of Notre Dame de Valdorne in Champagne established a convent for perpetual adoration at Charenton, near Paris. The rule is that of St. Benedict with relaxations. A convent of Augustinians was devoted to the same purpose at Marseilles by Father Le Quieu. At Rome a congregation of Franciscan tertiaries (enclosed), united for this purpose, was established in 1807 by Mary Magdalene of the Incarnation. They received special constitutions in 1818. Their first church was that of SS. Joachim and Anna by the Quattro Fontane ; later, Gregory XVI. gave them the church and spacious convent of St. Mary Magdalene on the Quirinal, which they still occupy. They have also houses at Naples and Innsbruck.

The example of these orders has been followed by many other communities of men and women in various orders, who keep up the perpetual adoration. There are twelve such communities in Switzerland. In France the devotion is followed by several male and female communities of the congregation of Picpus, by the Pères du Très-Saint Sacrement at Paris, founded by Father Eudes, by the Dames Réparatrices in the Rue d'Ulm at Paris and at Lisle ; in Belgium by the Dames du St. Sacrement, instituted at Brussels by the Jesuit Father Boone, and by the Dames Réparatrices at Liége, who were founded by the Countess d'Outremont, and have a novitiate at Brussels ; in Germany by the Servite Nuns at Munich and the Franciscan nuns at Mayence : in England by at least two or three convents of Benedictine nuns. Lastly, various lay confraternities have endeavoured, so far as possible, to carry out the perpetual adoration. Some of them are affiliated as a kind of third order to the institute of Mother Mechtilde. (Kaulen, in the new edition of "Kirchenlexikon.")

PRIVATE REVELATION. The Christian religion is described as a revelation, on the ground that God through Christ has revealed truths to which the unaided reason could not have attained, or attained with the same certainty. This revelation was made to the whole world, just as the Mosaic religion, also a revelation, communicated God's will to a single people. But after the full revelation made to the whole human race through Christ, the New Testament speaks repeatedly of private revelations made to individuals for a particular end. Thus St. Paul (Gal. ii. 2) on a memorable occasion went up to Jerusalem "in accordance with a revelation" (κατὰ ἀποκάλυψιν); and he speaks elsewhere of such revelations as made repeatedly to himself (2 Cor. xii. 1), and as of frequent occurrence in the Church (1 Cor. xiv. 6, 26), or at least that part of the Church to which he was writing. Justin ("Dial." 88, ad fin.) and Irenæus ("Adv. Hær." v. 6, 1) speak of prophetic gifts as enduring in the Church of their own day; and later Fathers, in their strife with the Montanists, did not attack those sectaries simply because they claimed to prophesy, but partly because of the contents of their revelations, partly because these supposed prophecies were made in an ecstatic state, which impeded the use of reason. Thus the Montanist Tertullian ("Adv. Marc." iv. 22, cf. "De Anima," 45); whereas Miltiades, an early Catholic opponent of the sect, wrote a book to prove that "a prophet must not speak in ecstacy" (περὶ τοῦ μὴ δεῖν προφητὴν ἐν ἐκστάσει λαλεῖν, Euseb. "H. E." v. 17). This principle became an accepted one in the Church (so, e.g., Chrysost. Hom. xxix. in Epist. 1 ad Corinth.; Epiphan. "Adv. Hær. Montan." 2 ; Hieron. "Præf. Comm. in Nahum."; "Præf. Comm. in Habacuc"); but the possibility, and even the actual occurrence, of private revelations in the Church of all ages was, as we shall see presently, never denied.' The whole subject has been investigated with patient learning by Eusebius Amort in his work entitled "De Revelationibus, Visionibus et Apparitionibus Privatis Regulæ tutæ" (Augsburg, 1744). For the remainder of this article we are largely indebted to him; and in theological principles we have been content to follow him, though the historical facts have been drawn from various sources. We should add that Amort's book contains an analysis of all that has been said by the chief theologians and mystics who have treated of the question.

So far as we are aware, the first attempt to classify revelations from the subjective side was made by St. Augustine ("De Genesi ad lit.," xii. 1 seq.) He divides them into such as are sensible, i.e. given through sensuous images; such as are spiritual, i.e conveyed through the imagination, which presents to the mind the figures of bodily things not actually present; and such as are purely intellectual. The last he considers the most perfect, because least subject to demoniacal illusion, since devils, as was supposed, could influence the bodily powers, among which imagination is reckoned, but could not directly influence man's intellectual nature. Even intellectual visions are certainly from God only so far as the objects and the light by which they are manifested transcend nature. St. Augustine's principles are accepted as fundamental by the later mystics, e.g. by St. John of the Cross and St. Teresa, whose opinions are given by Amort at length.

St. Augustine evidently believed that these private revelations were made from time to time, though on each particular revelation he leaves others free to think as they please ("Ep. lix. ad Evod."; "Doctrin. Christ." i. Prolog.), and he sharply contrasts their authority with that of the Bible ("De Catech. Rud." 6).

In the middle ages a notable change was effected since mediæval Popes have actually given their solemn approval to private revelations of saints. So Eugenius III. approved the revelations of St. Hildegarde (see Baronius, ad ann. 1148, n. 32), and Cardinal Turrecremata tells us that those of St. Bridget of Sweden were sanctioned by Urban VI. and Boniface IX. (see Turrecremata's Prologue prefixed to the folio edition of St. Bridget's works, Munich, 1680, and the extracts from the bull of Boniface IX., renewed and confirmed by Martin V.) Of St. Gertrude's revelations Blosius merely says that they were examined and approved by "most learned and enlightened men," and that no spiritual person will venture to impugn them (Blosius, Appendix to the "Monile Spirituale"). It is but another sign of the growing importance attached in the mediæval Church to private revelations and their closer connection with ecclesiastic authority, when we find Leo IX., in his bull "Supernæ," forbidding private revelations to be published—e.g. in sermons—unless already approved by the Holy See (see Castaldus, "De Potestate Angelica," Rome, 1650, apud Amort).

This prominence of private revelations in the later Church has given them a greater influence on devotion and pious beliefs. No doubt even in the early Church the "Shepherd" of Hermas had for a time quasi-canonical authority. The vision of St. Perpetua promoted the belief in purgatorial pain; the origin of the Trisagion was attributed to private revelation (St. John of Damasc. "De Fid. Orthodox." iii. 10); the second Council of Tours appeals to a private revelation for the proper number of psalms at Sext (Mann's "Concil." ix. 797); and the Corpus Juris supposes (c. "Nosse," De Consecr. D. 3, Pius I.) that an early Pope was led to institute the celebration of Easter on Sunday by the revelations of Hermas. But till the middle ages it may be safely said that no private revelations exercised anything like the wide and enduring influence enjoyed by those of St. Gertrude, St. Bridget, St. Catharine of Siena, and many others who might be named. Still, no marked change was made in theological principle. For,

(1.) Private revelations are only approved by the Pope in some general sense, as containing nothing contrary to faith or good morals, while the particular facts given in them are only approved as probable and calculated to promote piety. Amort points out that Suarez, although he believed in the truth of St. Bridget's revelations, does not scruple to contradict them on details in the history of Christ's passion.

(2.) They cannot in any case avail to settle a controversy of faith still undecided by the Church. It is true that Amort quotes two theologians who judged otherwise, Corduba ("Question." lib. I. q. 44) and Orlandus ("In III. Sent." D. 3, q. 3, dub. 4), and even St. Augustine clearly thought, when in doubt about the validity of baptism given in joke, that the question might be decided by private revelation, "per alicujus revelationis oraculum concordi oratione implorandum" ("Contr. Donat." vii. 53). But the whole weight of theological opinion is, as Amort abundantly proves, on the other side. An attempt was made to influence the controversy on the Immaculate Conception in this way. The Dominicans were the great adversaries of the doctrine, the Franciscans its champions. St. Bridget, who was a Franciscan tertiary, asserts in her revelations (vi. 49) that she heard the Blessed Virgin say, in so many words, "The truth is, that I was conceived without original sin." To this the Dominican theologian St. Antoninus of Florence replies ("Theol." P. I. tit. viii. cap. 2) that St. Catharine of Siena, who was a Dominican tertiary, and "other female saints, illustrious for miracles, had a revelation to the contrary effect" ("habuerunt revelationem de contrario").

SACRIFICE AND SATISFACTION OF CHRIST. 1. The Biblical Doctrine.—The idea that the suffering or death of one may make atonement for the sins of others frequently occurs in the Hebrew Bible. It appears, for example, in the history related in 2 Sam. xxi. 1–14. Twice over in the Book of Proverbs we are told that God accepts the sufferings of the wicked as a ransom for the just (Prov. xi. 8; xxi. 18); and, on the other hand, in the fifty-third chapter of Isaias the just "servant of Jehova" is represented as making his own life a "trespass offering" for the sins of the people. It need scarcely be said that this feeling of the need and possibility of atonement through the death of a victim was common to heathen nations (see, e.g., Herodot. ii. 39). Indeed, so natural is the desire to make propitiation for sin by sacrifice, that the prophets of Israel were perpetually protesting against a superstition which degraded Jehovah to the level of Baal, and made a mechanical ritual the substitute for a pure heart and upright life.

The Levitical law, however, does distinctly sanction the belief in propitiatory sacrifice. The blood was looked upon as the element of life. It contained the soul, which was the immediate gift of God, and continued to be in a special sense the property of God. No Israelite was allowed to use it as food, but for another purpose God was pleased to give it back to his people. "The soul of the flesh is in the blood, and I have given it to you on the altar, to make atonement[1] for your souls, since the blood will make atonement by means of the soul" (Lev. xvii. 11). An elaborate code was prescribed for the regulation of these sin and trespass offerings. What was the exact difference between these two species of sacrifice is a question which in the fragmentary state of our knowledge cannot be satisfactorily answered. Apparently the original design of the trespass offering was to compensate for injury done to the rights of property. Be that as it may, each kind falls under the general class of propitiatory offering. The words in Michah (vi. 5) express a feeling natural to the heart of man—

"Shall I give my first-born for my transgression?
The fruit of my body for the sin of my soul?"

No, the priestly lawgiver replies; such sacrifice is neither necessary nor lawful. Jehovah puts into your hands the blood of the ox or the sheep in which its life or soul is latent; that blood you may offer on His altar for the evil you have done, and He will accept it in atonement for your sin.

Nothing seems more reasonable at first sight than the theory that in such offerings the life of the beast was substituted for the human life forfeited by sin, that here we have in fact the formal doctrine of vicarious sacrifice. The offerer put his hands on the head of the victim: did not this imply that he placed his own guilt upon it? He slew it, and the priest poured out its blood at the foot of the altar. Was

[1] כִּפֶּר and its derivative לְכַפֵּר are the technical words for "atone" and "atonement," and the history of the word is thus drawn out by Wellhausen (Geschichte des Volkes Israel, p. 66). The first sense is "to cover." Then by a metaphor one who had given offence was said to cover the face or eyes of the injured person by a gift, bribe, &c., so that the crime or wrong could no longer be seen by the latter. So Gen. xxxii. 11; 1 Sam. xii. 3; 2 Sam. xxi. 3. Afterwards the original meaning was half obliterated, and כֹּפֶר, or covering, came to mean simply "ransom" (Amos v. 12; Exod. xxi. 30–xxx. 12), or even "equivalent" (Is. xliii. 3). In the Levitical law the metaphor assumes an altered form. Now it is the injured person, i.e. is God, who "covers," and the object covered is the offender or his sin. The means of covering is the blood poured out or sprinkled by the priest as the representative of Jehovah. This account is combated with ingenuity and learning, though, as we think, quite unsuccessfully, by Dr. Robertson Smith, "The Old Testament in the Jewish Church," p. 438. He supposes, appealing to Isa. xxviii. 18, that the original meaning is that of the Syriac ܟܦܶܪ, i.e. to "wipe out." But there is no proof, not even in Isa. xxviii. 18, where the word has the general sense of "annul," that the Hebrew verb ever meant to "wipe out"; and even if כִּפֶּר פָּנִים could mean to "wipe out the wrinkles of the face" (cf. the use of חִלָּה), what possible sense could be attached on this theory to the use of לְכַפֵּר in 1 Sam. xii. 3: "From whose hand have I taken a כֹּפֶר so as to cover my eyes therewith"?

not this the offering of life instead of life, of the innocent for the guilty? Still, we are convinced that it is an anachronism to look at the Hebrew sacrifices in the light of any full and definite theory on vicarious suffering. In the first place, we must remember that these were not sacrifices for sin as such, but for sins of "inadvertence" (Lev. iv. 2), though it must be admitted that this term was understood in a very wide and liberal sense. For him who sinned with "a high hand" no sacrifice availed; he was to be cut off from the congregation (Num. xv. 30, 31). Again, on the theory of substitution, the slaughter of the victim must have been the most important part, whereas it was effected by the lay worshipper, the sprinkling and effusion of the blood only being reserved for the priest. Nothing can be inferred from the laying on of hands, a rite common to holocausts and peace-offerings. And while, had the victim been laden with sin, it would have been impure; it was on the contrary declared "most holy," and eaten in some cases by the priests (Lev. vi. 22, cf. however, for traces of another view, Lev. vi. 23, xvi. 28; Num. xix.) Lastly, the Talmudical maxim, "No atonement except through the blood" (Yoma, f. 5 a. apud Dillmann) is not justified by the sacrificial law, since a man too poor to furnish a victim might offer the tenth part of an ephah of flour instead (Lev. v. 11). To sum up—the Israelites were taught that Jehovah accepted the life of the victim as an offering instead of the life of the transgressor. Further we cannot go. The sin was not transferred to the victim: much less did the latter undergo punishment instead of the sinner. (The view here given is substantially identical with that of Kuenen, "Godsdienst van Israel," ch. viii.; Dillmann on Lev. p. 476.)

Our Lord, as His words are reported in the synoptic gospels, only on one occasion applied sacrificial language to Himself, and His ordinary teaching in His parables and other discourses is moral rather than doctrinal or mystical. The exception, however, is certainly a significant one. "The Son of man" is proposed as a model of self-sacrificing love, for He came not to be served, but to serve, and "to give His soul a ransom instead of many" (λύτρον ἀντὶ πολλῶν, Matt. xx. 28; Marc. x. 45). It is St. Paul who develops the idea conveyed in these words, and though he of course is very far from setting forth a systematic and complete theory, still Christ crucified is the central point of his teaching.

He constantly calls attention to the inborn depravity and helplessness of mankind, and here he sees the significance of Christ's life. He, who knew no sin, condemned "sin in the flesh" from the very fact that He first in His own person set a limit to its dominion, which had been hitherto universal (2 Cor. v. 21; Rom. viii. 3, 4). But only in Christ's death was our redemption actually secured. First, Christ was a sacrifice. He was our paschal lamb slain "in our behalf" (ὑπέρ not ἀντί, and so always in St. Paul, 1 Cor. v. 7). In this sacrifice Christ took our place and became "a curse" (Gal. iii. 13), that is, the curse which was ours rested on him. Nay, God made Him who knew no sin to be "sin for our sake, that we may become the justice of God in Him" (2 Cor. v. 21). He was, as it were, the very concrete embodiment of sin, so truly did the penalty of our offences rest on Him. Through this sacrifice God reconciled the world to Himself (2 Cor. v. 18), and justified us through Christ's blood. The classical passage is Rom. iii. 23 seq.: "Whom God sets forth as a propitiatory sacrifice through faith by means of His blood for an exhibition of His justice, because of the passing over of past sins in the forbearance of God, for an exhibition (I say) of His justice in the present time, that he might be just and the justifier of him who is of the faith of Jesus." The Apostle means that God had appeared to be unjust because He had, not indeed forgiven past sins (quite the contrary), but still passed them over for a season without adequate penalty. Now, he sets forth Jesus as an atoning sacrifice, thus at once justifying His own dealings with men and justifying the believer. God now could consistently with His justice refrain from "reckoning" the offences of mankind (2 Cor. v. 19).

Next, St. Paul often implies that Christ's death was a satisfaction. He describes believers as redeemed from the law (Gal. iii. 13), or redeemed without further specification (ἀγοράζειν, 1 Cor. vi. 20, vii. 23; ἀπολύτρωσις, Rom. iii. 24; 1 Cor. i. 30; Ephes. i. 7; Col. i. 14).

But we must observe that St. Paul, although his language shows that he regarded Christ's sufferings as in some sense vicarious, never uses that or any corresponding word, such as substitution or the like. He does not dwell on the view that Christ's death was an equivalent for ours, but he recurs to an idea of a very different order—viz. the mystical doctrine that believers are one with Christ, die and rise again with Him to newness of life. Thus in 2 Cor. v. 14 his conclusion from the promise "One died for the sake of all" is not "therefore we have escaped," but "then all died." It is this point which above all others brings into relief the noble morality of his doctrine, and gives such pathetic eloquence to his words. Christ has sacrificed Himself, therefore the believer also is dead to sin and to the world, and constantly sacrificing self with his Master (cf. Rom. vi. 1–11). Further, the theory of satisfaction is left quite undeveloped.

Two points in the Epistle to the Hebrews are worthy of note in this connection. The sacrifices of the old law are taken as the types of Christ's death (viii.), and Christ Himself is represented not only as a sacrifice, but also as a high-priest (iv. 14, ix. 11, x. 19). The former view is involved in St. Paul's conception of Christ as the paschal lamb, but the latter is of capital importance in the history of the doctrine. We may briefly dismiss the rest of the New Testament writings. The First Epistle of St. Peter speaks of Christ as "bearing our sins in His body upon the tree" (ii. 24). We are "redeemed" with precious blood, "as of a lamb without blemish and without spot" (i. 19). In the Apocalypse the "lamb" who has been slain, and through whose blood we are redeemed, is a constant title of Christ. In the Gospel and Epistles of St. John (cf. e.g. John i. 29, xvii. 19; 1 John i. 7, ii. 2, 12, iii. 5), little or nothing is added, and there is nothing the least like the full exhibition of the atonement in St. Paul.

2. The Doctrine in the Fathers.—The earliest Fathers do not carry us much beyond the very words of Scripture. In Clement of Rome Christ is said to be "the high-priest of our oblations" (1 Ep. 36), to have given His flesh for our flesh, His soul for our soul (ib. 49); in the Epistle falsely ascribed to Barnabas, to have ransomed us from death (Barnab. 19); in Ignatius (ad Ephes. v. 1), to have presented Himself as a sacrifice and oblation to God. The notion of satisfaction is more prominent in Justin, who says (Dial. 95) that Christ "took on Himself the curses of all," while Clement of Alexandria ("Quis Dives," 37, p. 956) says that our Lord "laid down His soul as an equivalent for all" (ἀντάξιαν τῶν ὅλων). In the great work of St. Irenæus, who wrote a little earlier, we meet for the first time with a full and dogmatic exposition of the doctrine of the Incarnation—an exposition wrung from him in his controversy with the Gnostics. According to him, it was not enough for God to vindicate Himself: He had to vindicate His workmanship ("Adv. Hær." iii. 23, 1); it was necessary that man should return to the sanctity and obedience for which God had destined him, and overcome the devil as God meant him to be overcome. For this task fallen man was utterly unfit. But what mere man could not do, the Word of God, being made flesh, did (iii. 18, 2, iii. 18, 7). Christ "passed through every age, restoring communion to God with each" (ib.) The new Adam died on that day on which Adam died (spiritually) by disobedience to God (v. 23, 2). His atonement had a retrospective efficacy. He was the "man who strove for the fathers, and by obedience paid for disobedience" (iii. 18, 6). For the rest, he contents himself with the words of Scripture, and lays down the principle that the Word ransomed us by His death, without inquiring to whom the ransom was paid (v. 1, 1).[1] Very similar is the doctrine of Tertullian ("Adv. Marc." iii. 9), that Christ reformed our birth by His, and destroyed our death by His own.

But soon the speculative mind of Origen applied itself to Christ's satisfaction, and struck out a theory which was to exercise a great and lasting influence in the Church. The Gnostics maintained (see Baur, "Christl. Gnosis," p. 272 seq.) that Christ deceived and overcame the demiurge or lower god who created the world. In the place of the demiurge Origen put the devil. He asks (in Matt. tom. xvi. 8) to whom it was that Christ gave His soul as a ransom. He distinguishes the soul from the spirit, which He commended to the Father, and suggests that Christ's soul was paid as a ransom to Satan that he might let us go free. Satan thought he could hold Christ bound in death. But it was not so. Christ was "free among the dead," nay, so much stronger than Satan, that He wrested from the power of death all who believe in Him. In the East this strange fancy of Origen had only a partial success. It was adopted by Gregory Nyssen ("Orat. Cat." 22 seq.), who explains the deception of the devil on the ground that, although he knew Christ's miraculous birth and power, he saw Him clothed in flesh, and believed he could secure Him as his own. But at an earlier date Athanasius tacitly rejects it. His view is ("De Incarn." 8) that Christ "delivering His body to death instead of all, offered it (προσῆγε) to the Father."[2] Gregory Nazianzen,

[1] Baur's statement (Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte, p. 131), that Irenæus held the devil's rule over us to be just, is refuted by the saint's own words (v. 1, 1) "injuste nobis dominabatur apostasia."

[2] We deliberately reject Baur's interpretation of St. Athanasius, viz. that Christ paid the ransom to death conceived of as a person.

although ("Orat." xxxix. 13) he accounts for the deception of the devil much as Gregory Nyssen had done, yet in another place ("Orat." xlv. 21) distinctly repudiates the supposition that Christ paid a price to the devil. The Father received it, "not asking for it, or needing it, but because of the dispensation (διὰ τὴν οἰκονομίαν), and because man had to be sanctified by the human nature of God" (τῷ ἀνθρωπίνῳ τοῦ θεοῦ). St. John of Damascus sums up all results of theological speculation in the East, and he utterly sets aside Origen's theory. It was the Father who had been offended, and He, not "the tyrant," must "receive the ransom" ("De Fid. Orthodox." iii. 27).

In the Latin Church Origen's tenet struck deeper root. St. Augustine ("De Lib. Arbitr." iii. 10) holds that after the fall Satan claimed men as his own "by most just right." But he slew Jesus, who was not only sinless, but born without concupiscence, and so most justly was obliged to loose those who believe in Jesus. Augustine is followed by St. Leo (Serm. xxiii. 3 et 4), "Per injustitiam plus petendi totius debiti summa vacuatur"); by St. Bernard ("De Error. Abælard." cap. 5 et 6); and by the Master of the Sentences ("Sentent." lib. iii. distinct. 19).

3. The Doctrine of the Schoolmen.— St. Anselm's famous treatise, "Cur Deus Homo," marks a new epoch in the treatment of the doctrine, and the discussion of it within the Church has continued ever since within the lines which he has laid down. He lived before Bernard and Peter Lombard, but we have not placed him in strict chronological order, because the new position which he occupied did not become immediately the accepted one in the Church. His view did, however, finally prevail in substance, and became dominant in the Scholastic period, just as that of Origen had been among the Western Fathers. He fixed attention on sin mainly as an offence done to God's honour, to whom and not to the devil reparation must be made, for he utterly denies the devil's rights over man (i. 7). God was constrained by a moral necessity to punish sin or else to provide an atonement. "Necesse est ergo ut aut ablatus honor solvatur aut pœna sequatur" (i. 13). Christ's human nature enabled Him to incur, His Divine nature to satisfy, the debt (ii. 6 et 7). As He made this payment or satisfaction freely, He merited a reward which He did not need for Himself, and therefore transmitted to us.

The theory of St. Anselm was amended and developed by St. Thomas. He denies, in opposition to Anselm, the necessity of Christ's passion. God is subject to no restraint, and might have liberated us from sin and its consequences without the death of Christ ("Summa," ii. 4, 2 et 3). So, again, Christ's death was not a penalty inflicted upon Him by God. He as man willingly offered Himself for us, and God permitted wicked men to work their will upon Him, and accepted His death as a sacrifice and satisfaction for our sins (ib. 47, 3); nor did the merit and satisfaction of Christ consist in His mere death and sufferings considered by themselves. The passion was meritorious because willingly undergone (ib. 47, 1). Christ's death was a perfect satisfaction. For full satisfaction is made when the offended person receives that which he loves as much as or more than he hates the offence done to him. Now Christ's satisfaction was superabundant, first, because of the exceeding love which led Him to suffer, then because He offered the life of a God-man for our ransom, thirdly because of the greatness of His sufferings (ib. xlviii. 2). It was also a sacrifice, inasmuch as it was offered "for the honour properly due to God," and in order to propitiate Him; and here too it was the free will and love of Christ which made His oblation acceptable (ib. 3), and the merit of Christ's sacrifice and satisfaction is infinite because of the dignity of His person (this is implied in iii. qu. xlvi. obj. 6, compared with the answer). As sin partakes of the nature of infinity because committed against God, who is infinitely great and good, so with the worth of Christ's atonement, because offered by a person of infinite dignity. This, however, by no means excludes the necessity of acceptation on God's part. It was necessary that He should freely give up His Son for the life of the world, just as it was necessary that Christ should freely suffer.

Like St. Thomas, Duns Scotus rejected the notion that Christ's death was the only means by which we could have been freed from sin and death, but he brought another point in the discussion prominently forward. He regarded Christ's merit as finite, not infinite, because it proceeded from a created human will: "Meritum Christi fuit finitum quia a principio finito essentialiter dependens" (3 dist. 19, n. 7, quoted by Werner, "Johannes Duns Scotus," p. 457 seq.), although the dignity of Christ's person made it "congruous" that God should accept His satisfaction for us all (ib.) Here we reach the last stage in the history of the controversy among Catholics. Clem. VI. (in Extravag. "Unigenitus," lib. v. tit. 9, De Pœnit. et Remiss.) speaks of Christ's "infinite merits," and asserts that one drop of His blood would, because of its "union with the Word," have sufficed for the redemption of mankind. The Scotists rightly refused to take this as a dogmatic decision on the matter, and although the Thomist opinion has been widely adopted even by those who do not belong to the Thomist school (see e.g. Billuart, "De Incarnat." Diss. xix. a. 5; and for an invaluable catena of Patristic passages, Petavius "De Incarnat." xii. 9), the question is still open. The Council of Trent (e.g. Sess. vi. "De Justific." cap. 11) contented itself with general statements, e.g. that Christ is the propitiation for the sins of the whole world "through faith in His blood." For the history of the doctrine we have been chiefly helped by Ritschl, "Altkatholische Kirche;" Baur, "Lehre von der Versöhnung," and "Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte"; Jowett, Epistles of St. Paul, vol. ii., where there is an essay on the subject; Pfeiderer, "Paulinismus"; Schenkel's "Bibellexikon," Art. Versöhnung; Petavius and Franzelin, "De Incarnatione." Much has been done to popularise the subject in England by an English Catholic, Mr. Oxenham, in his interesting work on the Atonement.

SARDICA, THE COUNCIL OF, was summoned, as the members of the synod expressly state, by the two emperors Constans and Constantius (αὐτοὶ οἱ εὐσεβέστατοι βασιλεῖς συνήγαγον ἡμᾶς—apud Athanas. "Apol. contr. Arian." 44). The wish for the convocation of the synod began on the part of the bishops Julius of Rome, Hosius of Cordova, and Maximin of Trèves. They addressed themselves to Constans, and he arranged matters with his brother (Athanas. "Apol. ad Constant." 4). The date of meeting was long a subject of debate, but the discovery of the Paschal letters of Athanasius in a Syriac translation (first published by Cureton, London, 1852) makes it certain that the synod was held either in 343 or 344, and Hefele ("Concil." i. 535) is in favour of the latter date. The place of meeting—Sardica, now Sophia in Illyria—lay conveniently on the borders of the two empires.[1] The synod gives three reasons for its convocation: first, the troubles which had arisen from the persecution of orthodox bishops, particularly Athanasius, Marcellus of Ancyra, Asclepas of Gaza; next, the extirpation of the Arian heresy; and, thirdly, the restoration of true faith in Christ (see the letter quoted above, and a slight variation in the statement, Mansi, "Concil." iii. 40). The bishops of the Eusebian or Arianising party numbered 76, those of the Catholic party 94 (see Hefele, "Concil." i. p. 541). Julius bishop of Rome was represented by the priests Archidamus and Philoxenius; but it was Hosius bishop of Cordova who presided (Athanas. "Hist. Arian. ad Monach." iv. 16, ἡ ἁγία σύνοδος ἧς προήγορος ἦν ὁ μέγας Ὅσιος; also Theodor. "H. E." ii. 15; Sozom. iii. 12). In the list given by Athanasius ("Apol. c. Arian." 50) the Roman priests sign immediately after Hosius. The Eusebians, finding the majority favourable to Athanasius, Marcellus, and the other bishops incriminated by them, withdrew to the neighbouring city of Philippopolis, whence they addressed a letter to the clergy of Christendom. In this they repeat their accusations against Marcellus, Athanasius, Paul of Constantinople, Asclepas of Gaza, and the bishops generally who were assembled at Sardica. They append a semi-Arian creed, which is nearly identical with that known as the fourth formula of Antioch. It omits the ὁμοούσιος, which was the test of orthodoxy, and at the same time anathematises the Anomœans or strict Arians. The Eusebians claimed to be the true synod of Sardica. The text of their encyclical is given by St Hilary of Poictiers (Fragm. iii. p. 1307–1326).

Meanwhile, the orthodox bishops were left to pursue their work in peace. After investigation, they acquitted Athanasius, Marcellus, and Asclepas, &c., and anathematised the Eusebian leaders, Theodore of Heraclea, Narcissus of Neronias, Acacius of Cæsarea, Stephen of Antioch, Ursacius of Singodunum, Valens of Mursia, Menophantes of Ephesus, and George of Laodicea.

Next, dogma came directly under consideration, and some proposed that the synod should issue a new Creed. It was ruled, however, that no addition should be made to the Nicene symbol (Athanas. "Tom. ad Antioch." 5). The Sardican creed, therefore, given by Theodoret ("H. E." ii. 8) cannot be genuine, though the Ballerini conjecture (edition of St. Leo, tom. iii. p. xxxix.), with great probability, that this Creed, a translation of which is given in the Latin acts of the council discovered by Maffei, was actually put forward and approved by some of the Fathers.

[1] It was in Illyricum Orientale, and so in the dominion of Constantius, about 59 miles west of Constantinople. The present town is in European Turkey. It has 50,000 inhabitants, of whom 6,000 are Christians, and is the seat of a Greek metropolitan and Catholic vicar-apostolic.

Lastly, the council passed a number of canons for the regulation of discipline. Canons 1 and 2 forbid the translation of bishops. Canon 3 forbids bishops to ordain or perform other spiritual acts out of their own dioceses, except when called upon to do so by the metropolitan and bishops of the provinces. Charges against a bishop are to be judged by the bishops of the province. Then follow decrees concerning appeal to Rome, which have been the subject of eager controversy. At the end of canon 3, already quoted, the council supposes the case of a bishop who has been condemned by the bishops of his province, and still pleads innocence. It proceeds, "If it seems good to your charity, let us honour the memory of Peter the Apostle." Hefele ("Concil." i. p. 576) gives the following summary of the council's determinations on this right of appeal to Rome:

(1) A bishop deposed by his comprovincials may appeal to the Pope personally (canon 5), or through the court of first instance—viz. the comprovincial bishops who have condemned him (canon 3).

(2) Rome may confirm the former sentence or appoint a court of second instance (canon 3).

(3) This latter court is to consist of bishops from another, and that a neighbouring province (canons 3 and 5).

(4) The Pope may appoint legates to act as assessors and to preside (canon 5).

(5) If a bishop appeals to the Pope, his see is not to be filled up till Rome has either confirmed the original sentence or deferred the matter to a court of second instance (canon 4). Of course, in the latter case no step could be taken till the cause had been tried a second time.

In many copies the Sardican canons were appended to, and so confused with, those of the first Nicene council. It was this, in all probability, which led Pope Zosimus, in his dispute with the African bishops, to allege a Nicene canon which recognised the Pope's right of re-examining the cause of a bishop condemned by his colleagues. And, acting on this principle, he received the appeal of the priest Apiarius of Sicca, who had been condemned in his own country (Hefele, i. p. 357). The African prelates replied that they could not find the canon in question; and, in fact, even the Sardican canon does not contemplate appeals from priests. It was not till the ninth century, in the controversy with Hincmar of Rheims, that the Sardican rule underwent essential alteration, so that all charges involving the deposition of bishops were reserved to Rome as causæ majores, even in the first instance. This latter principle found complete expression in the forged decretals (Hefele, i. p. 577).[1]

Canons 7, 8, 9 restrict, and in great measure prohibit, the visits of bishops to the Imperial Court. Canon 10 forbids episcopal consecration per saltum. Canons 11 and 12 enforce episcopal residence, and forbid a bishop to officiate in a strange diocese. Canons 13 and 14 forbid one bishop to restore a cleric whom another bishop has excommunicated, but permit the cleric to appeal to the metropolitan or, in his absence, to the nearest bishop. Here the Latin text inserts a canon which forbids a bishop to ordain for his own diocese a cleric who is subject to another bishop. Canon 16: clerics, like bishops (see above, canon 11), must not be absent from their diocese more than three weeks. Canon 17: only if unjustly expelled from his see may a bishop remain in a strange city. Canons 18 and 19 concern the strife for the bishopric at Thessalonica and the quarrels that had arisen thence. Canon 20 enforces the previous canons (7, 8, 9) on episcopal visits to the Court, and gives a certain control over travelling bishops to the prelates of the sees on the great roads.

Three additional documents of importance are still extant: the first an encyclical to all Christian bishops; the second a letter to the Church of Alexandria, declaring the innocence of Athanasius; the third a letter to Julius, bishop of Rome, recognising his reasons for absence and giving him an account of the proceedings.

By some historians and critics, viz. Baronius, Natalis Alexander, the Ballerini, and Palma, the Council of Sardica has been considered œcumenical. No doubt it was convoked as an œcumenical council. Moreover, its canons were approved by the council in Trullo, and received, according to Pope Nicolas I., by the whole Church (see Hefele, i. p. 622). This latter fact, however, proves nothing, since the disciplinary enactments of many other councils—e.g. of Ancyra and Neocæsarea—were generally received. On the other side it is to be remembered that, although the episcopate of East and

[1] The Carthaginian synod of 424 A.D. rejected appeals to Rome as infringing the rights of the African Church (Hefele, ii. p. 137 seq.) Yet Popes Celestine and Leo the Great and the 12th synod of Toledo make the same confusion between Nicæa and Sardica (Hefele, i. p. 621).

West was summoned, scarcely any Eastern bishops were actually present at the deliberations. This might have been compensated by subsequent subscription of the decrees on the part of absent bishops. But, although the decrees were transmitted through Christendom, only about 200 absent bishops signed, of whom ninety-four were Egyptians. No single ancient authority speaks of the council as œcumenical. St. Augustine ("Contr. Crescon." iii. 34, iv. 44; Ep. 44 ad Eleus. 3) did not even know that an orthodox synod had met at Sardica. Gregory the Great ("Epist." lib. ii. Ep. 10) and Isidore of Seville ("Etymolog." vi. 16) recognise four General Councils only, viz. Nicæa, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon. These are the chief reasons which have constrained Bellarmine, De Marca, Tillemont, Fleury, Du-Pin, Ceillier, Neander, and many other scholars, to deny Sardica a place among the General Councils [Hefele, "Concil." i. p. 533 seq.]

SEMPRINGHAM, ORDER OF. This order was founded by Gilbert the priest of Sempringham in Lincolnshire, about 1135, for both men and women. The rule for the women was that of Benedictine nuns, that of the men was the same as that followed by Austin canons; in either case St. Gilbert added particular statutes of his own. The habit of a Gilbertine canon was a black cassock with a white cloak over it, and a hood lined with lambskin. At his death in 1189 St. Gilbert left thirteen houses of his order, of which nine were double, and the others for men only. In the double monasteries the only common portion was the church, and in that the nuns and canons could neither see nor hear each other; the other buildings were placed at a considerable distance apart. Robert Mannyng, the well-known author of one of the old English "Rhyming Chronicles," was a member of this order.

At the Dissolution, the following twenty-five Gilbertine houses were suppressed:

SISTERHOODS [see p. 764.]

Sisterhood of Bon Secours.—This institute was founded by Mgr. de Quelen, archbishop of Paris in 1822, for the care of the sick in their own homes, and also of orphans. It was formally approved by the Holy See in 1875. Many congregations had been established before 1822 to minister to the spiritual and corporal necessities of the sick poor, but this was the first which undertook to attend on rich and poor alike. On application being made to the Rev. Mother Superior of any house of the sisters, she sends to the house of the sick person a sister, who takes charge of the sick-room, giving her attendance at night or during the day, as may seem to be best; if she is up at night, she takes six hours' rest during the day. "When the Bon Secours sister is in the sick-room, the family of the patient may feel as secure at night as if they all watched at the bedside of their relative. Nothing that can contribute to the ease and comfort of the sick person is omitted by the sister. Every change is watched, every symptom noted, and the instructions of the physician are scrupulously obeyed." The dying are "especially aided and consoled by these experienced and holy daughters of religion."[1] An offering, according to the means of the family calling in the sister, is made for the support of the community.

In 1884 this sisterhood had eleven houses in France, the mother house and novitiate being at Paris, one in London (Bayswater), four in Ireland (Belfast, Cork, Dublin, Tralee), and one in the United States (Baltimore).

Sisters of La Sainte Union des Sacrés Cœurs. This congregation was founded at Douai in 1828 by the Very Rev. the Abbé Debrabant, a priest of the diocese of Cambrai. The rule and constitutions are chiefly taken from the mild rule prescribed by St. Francis de Sales to the nuns of the Visitation [VISITATION, ORDER OF THE]. The special object of the institute is the education of girls in every rank of society. In capitals and large towns the sisters open boarding and day schools for the richer classes; elsewhere their schools are on a higher or more moderate scale, according to the requirements of the locality. The superior-general, who governs the congregation with the aid of a council, resides in the mother house at Douai. There are about two hundred houses in France and Belgium. Willing testimony to the good done by the sisters has been borne by several of the French bishops, particularly the archbishop of Cambrai, while the educational inspectors in France have certified the efficiency of their teaching.

There are seven convents of La Sainte Union in the United Kingdom, the principal of which is at Highgate Road, London. Since 1883 two houses have been established at Buenos Ayres.

The Abbé Debrabant died at Douai in the odour of sanctity in 1880, having previously secured for his institute the final approbation of the Holy See.[1]

Sisters of Notre Dame. [We are glad to correct and extend the short notice in the text (p. 766) by means of a "Sketch of the Life of the Servant of God, Julie Billiart," kindly sent to us from the convent at Clapham.] Marie Rose Julie Billiart was born at Cuvilly, in Picardy, in 1751. She was the child of poor parents, and born to a lot of constant labour, but from a very early age she sanctified her life by prayer and the zeal of winning souls. For thirty years in the middle of her life she was unable to walk on account of some nervous disease; in 1804 it left her and did not return. She narrowly escaped ill-usage at the hands of the revolutionists, who (1790) were exasperated by her refusal to hold communion with the "constitutional" priest [CONSTITUTIONAL CLERGY] who had been sent to Cuvilly. After the Terror was over, the Countess Baudouin, who had known Julie at her native village, took her with her to Amiens. The commencement made in 1797 proved abortive; it was not till 1803 that, with the sanction of the bishop, and by the counsel of the celebrated F. Varin, Julie Billiart and her friend Françoise Blin de Bourdon, Viscountess de Gézaincourt, laid the permanent foundations of the institute of the Sisters of Notre Dame, "an order which had for its primary object the salvation of the souls of poor children." In 1809 the mother house and the administration of the order were transferred to Namur. The foundress lived to see fifteen convents of her institute, dying in 1816. The rules and constitutions received the formal approbation of the Holy See in 1844. "The congregation is now flourishing in Belgium, England, and America, possessing (in 1883) 106 convents, while its apostolate extends over the souls of more than 140,000 children and adults." A process for the beatification and canonisation of Julie Billiart was opened at Namur in 1881.

due from the incumbents of benefices to the bishop. The word occurs in the preface to the Anglican prayer-book. The name seems to have originated in the practice of making this payment on the occasions when the clergy met the bishop in synod. (Hook's "Church Dictionary.")

TESTAMENT. In the Old Testament, ברית (from ברה, "to cut") is the usual word for "covenant." It occurs first in Gen. vi. 18, and then in a large number of passages. The idea of covenant passes off into that of a promise made by one of the contracting parties (Gen. ix. 10), into that of a precept to be observed by the other (Deut. iv. 13), or into that of a dispensation or economy (Jer. xxx. 1, 33). In almost every case the LXX translators render ברית by διαθήκη.[1] It seems strange, at first sight, that the LXX should have so persistently used διαθήκη with a meaning which it rarely has in classical Greek, while they had the common and unambiguous word συνθήκη at hand. Aquila and Symmachus, "In Gen." vi. 18 (Field, "Hexapl. Orig." vol. i. p. 24) do employ συνθήκη. Yet it was a true instinct which led the LXX to avoid a term like συνθήκη, which might have seemed to put God on a level with His people. Moreover, the sense given to διαθήκη, though uncommon, was still distinctly sanctioned by good authors.[2]

In the Deuterocanonical books of the Old Testament (see instances in Schleusner), and in the New, διαθήκη retains its meaning of "covenant." It never, except in a single instance, has the usual classical sense of "will" or "testament." Even in the solitary passage which is an exception to the general rule—viz. Heb. ix. 16, 17—the writer starts with the notion of covenant, and then is led by the thought of the inheritance which this covenant conferred and the death of our Lord, who is the "mediator of the covenant," to use διαθήκη for "testament."[3]

It is plain, however, that the authors of the Old Latin version misunderstood the Biblical use of διαθήκη, and hence they constantly render it by "testamentum." This must have obscured the meaning of "testamentum" itself, for sometimes it seems impossible to make the passages where it is found intelligible without recurring to the idea of covenant (cf. e.g. Ps. lxxxii. [iii.] 6, "simul adversum te testamentum disposuerunt"). St. Jerome tried to remedy the mischief. A glance at the Latin concordance shows that almost all the places where "testamentum" is now found belong to those parts of the Bible which he merely revised. If we turn to his psalter, "ex hebraica veritate," we find that out of the twenty-one places where the Latin psalter now in Church use has "testamentum" not one was left unchanged by him. In each he substitutes "fœdus," "pactum," or the like. Still, even Jerome is not quite consistent. In seven verses of the Bible he has "testamentum" for the Hebrew בְּרִית, "covenant," viz. Num. xiv. 44; Jer. iii. 16; Dan. xi. 28, 30, 32; Zach. ix. 11; Mal. iii. 1. But in any case the use of the Latin Church was already fixed, and even St. Jerome could not have altered it.

[1] The only exceptions, so far as we can find, are 1 Kings xi. 11, where ἐντολάς is used, and Deut. ix. 15, where μαρτυρίων is probably the true reading. On the other hand, διαθήκη answers to אחוה ("brotherhood") in Zach. xi. 14.

[2] Bishop Lightfoot (on Galat. p. 138) quotes Aristoph. "Av." 438, ἢν μὴ διαθωνταί γ' οἵδε διαθήκην ἐμοί.

[3] Other cases in the New Testament where διαθήκη is said to mean "testament" are alleged, even by some modern scholars of repute—e.g. by Cremer "Lex. N. T." Eng. Transl. p. 549—but, as we are persuaded, erroneously.

Since our Saviour represents the redemption which He wrought as a διαθηκη sealed with blood just as the older διαθηκη had been διαθήκη and "testamentum" became accepted titles of the Gospel dispensation among Greeks and Latins respectively. Then, as the canon of the new dispensation arose and was naturally contrasted with the sacred books of the Jewish church, it became usual to speak of τὰ τῆς παλαιᾶς διαθηκης βιβλία (so Melito of Sardis, apud Euseb "H. E." iv. 26): αἱ τῆς καινῆς διαθήκης γραφαὶ (τὰς δηλωθείσας τῆς καινῆς διαθήκης γραφάς, Euseb. "H. E." iii. 25), κ.τ.λ. This phraseology, as might be easily shown, has always continued, nor do Christian writers, down to Irenæus inclusive, ever go beyond it. To them διαθήκη or "testamentum" means an act or state consequent upon that act, but never a collection of books.

But at the beginning of the third century a new terminology was introduced, and became popular. By an easy abbreviation, διαθηκη or "testamentum" was substituted for αἱ τῆς διαθήκης γραφαί, "scripturæ testamenti," etc. How easy this change was appears clearly enough from St. Paul's language (2 Cor. iii. 14), ἐπὶ τῇ ἀναγνώσει τῆς παλαιᾶς διαθηκης. He means, of course, "the old covenant," but were we to translate the "Old Testament" in our modern sense, unscholarly as the version would be, the substance would not be seriously affected. It is, therefore, often very hard to determine the precise meaning of the terms διαθηκη and "testamentum" in later authors. And this the more because heretics from the Gnostics downwards, who denied that God was the "auctor" of the old dispensation, also denied that he was the "auctor" of the Hebrew Bible. Still, there is decisive proof of the early date at which the innovation was made in the use of the words, and so much is admitted by men of very different schools, such as Bishop Lightfoot (on Galat., p. 141), Hilgenfeld ("Einleit. in das N. T." p. 30), Rönsch ("N. T. Tertullian's," p. 47). (See also a much older writer, Planck, whose dissertation on the word κανών is printed in the second volume of Rosenmüller's "Commentationes theologicæ."

The following are the most important passages:—

Tertull. "Adv. Marc." iv. 1: "Duos deos dividens, proinde diversos, alterum alterius instrumenti vel quod magis est usui dicere, testamenti." "Instrumentum" is a technical term of the Roman law, retained by Tertullian in its original sense of "document alleged in proof" (cf. e.g. "Apol." x. 48; "Spect." 4; "Testimon." 1; "Coron." 4; "Scorp." 15), and is here identified with "testamentum." Therefore "testamentum" must have come to signify a collection of writings. The latter may have this force in "Resurrect." 39, but it is not certain.

Lactantius, "Inst." iv. 20: "Scriptura omnis in duo testamenta divisa est . . . ea vero quæ post resurrectionem ejus scripta sunt, novum testamentum nominantur; Judæi veteri utuntur."

Rufinus, in translating Origen "In Exod." Hom. viii. 3: "Solum vetus non sufficit ad bibendum, sed veniendum ad novum testamentum." Here, as in Tertullian, "testamentum" is made equivalent to "instrumentum," i.e. to a document. The same in his translation of Origen's "Prolog. in Cantic.": "Illud tamen palam est, multa vel ab Apostolis vel ab evangelistis exempla esse prolata et novo testamento inserta, quæ in his scripturis quas canonicas habemus nunquam legimus, in Apocryphis tamen inveniuntur." The insertion of apocryphal passages (e.g. in 1 Cor. ii. 9) fixes the sense of "testamentum" as a book.

Augustine. "Civ. Dei," xx. 4, sets out by dividing the Bible into the books of the old and new "instrumentum," but seems in the same chapter to use "testamentum" as a synonym.

It is more difficult to produce evidence for a similar use of διαθήκη. But the following are to the point:—

Epiphanius, "Hær." xxx. 7: Μαρθαῖος μόνος ἑβραιστὶ καὶ ἑβραικοῖς γράμμασιν ἐν τῇ καινῇ διαθήκῃ ἐποιήσατο τὴν τοῦ εὐαγγελίου ἔκθεσίν τε καὶ κήρυγμα. We may be confident that the latter meaning of διαθήκη is intended here. In the wider sense the statement would have been notoriously false.

St. John of Damascus, "De Fid. Orthodox." iv. 17, giving a list of the canonical books: εἷς ἐστιν ὁ θεός, ὑπό τε παλαιᾶς διαθήκης κηρυττόμενος καὶ καινῆς. This is not decisive, but the context and the present participle κηρυττόμενος favour the later meaning of διαθήκη.

Add to this the early use of ἐνδιάθηκοι βίβλοι, γραφαί, κ.τ.λ. (e.g. by Origen apud Euseb. "H. E." vi. 25). It means "books put in a collection, or existing in a collection, called διαθήκη."

The Syriac Christians adopted the Greek word διαθήκη, simply transcribing it into their own character, ܕܝܰܬ̈ܩܹܐ; and in St. Ephraem we find ("Carm. Nisib." ed. Bickell, iii. 119) the expression "two Testaments" (ܬ̈ܪܝܢ ܕܝܰܬ̈ܩܹܐ), in the modern sense, meaning, i.e. two collections of books.
